Mdlle. Tietjens made her first appearance for the season in the part of Valentine, and was received with a warmth which showed that her past services are by no means forgotten. We need not enlarge, for the hundredth time, upon the merits of a representation, in some respects unapproached. Suffice it to say, that Mdlle. Tietjens was equal to the demand upon her vocal and dramatic powers, particularly in the great duet with Raoul. Whether stimulated or not by the vigour of her playmate, she has rarely sung the music with more energy, or given a more notable impersonation of a heroine whose love was even unto death. That the situation demands ability of no common order our readers well know; in point of fact, it is a situation so exacting as never to be wholly satisfied; but the Valentine of Mdlle. Tietjens was that of a great artist, who can put more nearly than any other, fulfil the requirements of the trying rôle. Urbino's music was sung by Mdlle. Scalchi so as to win the favour of the audience. The first few bars of "Nobles seigneurs, salut," showed that this rising contralto is quite prepared to follow up her last successes. Much was expected from Herr Wachtel's Raoul—that is to say, much of a vocal character; for, with an audience accustomed to the Raoul of Signor Mario, dramatic success in the part could hardly be anticipated. On the whole, however, there was reason for regarding Herr Wachtel's performance hopefully. The music demands plenty of energy and plenty of voice, requirements which, everybody knows, can easily be met by the German tenor. So far Herr Wachtel was a Raoul beyond reproach. In the duel scene he fairly shouted down his six opponents, and finished by delivering the high C with immense power. Throughout the great duet he in all respects perfected the muscular character of the performance, and conveyed the impression that, if anybody could deliver a more resonant B flat than Mdlle. Tietjens, or escape from the detaining arms, it was Herr Wachtel. Apart from this energy of voice and action, Herr Wachtel failed to satisfy our ideal of the gallant Protestant gentleman. He wanted a high and chivalrous bearing, and that graciousness which knows no stronger way for a German of strength—qualities by no means strangers to the boards on which he appeared. Herr Wachtel was frequently applauded, and, at the close of the duet, was, in company with Mdlle. Tietjens, called before the curtain. Signor Bagagiolo as Marcel was much the same as he usually is—that is to say, it lacked the bluff heartiness of the faithful soldier; while, on the other hand, the music was well sung. M. Petit's fine voice appeared to advantage in the part of St. Bris, and Signor Cotogni made a good impression as Nevers; especially in the scene where he learns the designs of the Catholic nobles. Against either band or chorus nothing important can be said; and much of the excellence of both, as of the performance generally, was due to Signor Vianesi's careful conducting. The mise-en-scène was not less effective than heretofore.

AMSTERDAM.—Herr Bruch's Symphony in E flat major was lately performed at a concert, but did not create a particularly favourable impression.

DRESDEN.—The following is a translation of an article which appeared recently in a Dresden paper:—

"Herr Charles Oberthür, principal professor of the harp at the London Academy of Music, gave, on the 4th March, a musical soirée in the Hôtel de Saxe, and the partiality felt for his poetic instrument attracted a numerous audience, though the season was just drawing to a close. Herr Oberthür began by playing, in conjunction with Herren Medefind and Biekmann, a grand trio for harp, violin, and violoncello. He then gave two solos for the harp; after that he took part in a duet for harp and piano, all these pieces being of his own composition; and, lastly, executed a fantasia by Parish Alvars. He displayed in every instance a great amount of virtuosity and great taste of style, a very gentle piano being a noticeable feature in the latter, on account of its pleasing effect. In addition to the gentlemen mentioned above, the concert-giver was assisted by Mdlle. Marie Wieck and Mdlle. Theodora Schmidt. The former gave evidence of her powers of execution by the perfection with which she performed several small pianoforte pieces; while Mdlle. Schmidt, in an air by Spohr, and songs by Schubert, Schumann, and Lassen, proved that she possessed, especially in the higher register, a very pleasing voice, pure intonation, and clear pronunciation; greater warmth and more vivacity are qualities she will probably acquire in due time."

EARL DUDLEY v. THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL.

(From the "Birmingham Post".)

It is, generally speaking, an impolitic as well as an ungracious act to look a gift horse in the mouth, but when a hostile rider is in the saddle, no one can reasonably be blamed for declining to receive the animal into stable. No apology, therefore, is needed for the very emphatic refusal, by the city and county of Worcester, of the Earl of Dudley's offer of assistance in the Cathedral restoration work, seeing that the offer was saddled with conditions at once distasteful to the feelings and compromising to the independence of the recipients. Lord Dudley, it will be remembered, proposed to present the sum of £10,000 to the Dean and Chapter of Worcester, for the purpose of completing the restoration of the Cathedral, subject to the condition that the restored edifice should no longer be used for those Triennial Festival performances which have now been associated with its history for a period of nearly a hundred and fifty years. The money, of course, would have been acceptable enough in the present exhausted state of the Cathedral fund; but the inhabitants were not willing to barter away, even for £10,000, the pleasure and privilege of celebrating in the only local building adapted to the purpose, a Festival which has rendered, and is still capable of rendering, so much good service, both to musical art and charity. At a large and influential meeting of the city and county, convened for the purpose of considering the offer, it was almost unanimously condemned and a memorial to the Dean and Chapter was adopted, praying that the Musical Festival might be continued, as in time past, and urging on the Cathedral dignitaries not to allow themselves to be influenced by Lord Dudley's proposal. The expression of public opinion on this question has been so nearly unanimous in the diocese that the answer of the Dean and Chapter may be regarded as a foregone conclusion; and by withdrawing his offer, therefore, the noble Earl has but forestalling a formal rejection. We wish we could describe his new overtures as more satisfactory. He proposes now to divide his £10,000 between the Cathedral and the Charity for which the Festival is held, conditional upon a like sum being raised by the city and county for the edifice only, but in the event of this arrangement not being successfully carried out within the prescribed time, the inhabitants are to bind themselves to offer no more opposition to his original proposal. This plausible scheme seems to us to unite with the objectionable features of the first, others even more offensive; for while it still contemplates the abolition of the Festival as a penalty in reserve, it answers the protest of the inhabitants against that step with a challenge to measure purses with their wealthy patron. It professes to meet the objection aroused by the first offer, but touches only the pecuniary side of the question. Even if it fulfilled all that Lord Dudley apparently contemplates, it would be no substitute for the Festival it is intended to replace, in respect to social influence, pleasure-giving power, or advantage to musical art; for it involves no provision for the continuance of those triennial celebrations which contribute so largely to the prestige and hospitable opportunities of the faithful city. We do not care to discuss Lord Dudley's views as to the propriety or impropriety of sacred musical performances in a cathedral; they are quite beside the matter at issue, which is simply whether the opinions of an individual, or those of the community at large, are to regulate the uses of the building. If the Earl is really anxious to contribute to the restoration of the Cathedral, he should do so freely and unconditionally, and not make his donation the price of a sacrifice on the part of the great majority of the local residents. He should remember that noblesse oblige, and that such huckstering is unworthy both of his rank and of the cause he proposes to serve.

To Dr. Abraham Saboke Silent.

DEAR SILENT,—Old fogies often talk of the decline of the drama, and say that nobody cares nowadays to spend an evening at the theatre. But somebody must entertain a different opinion, or we should not find put forward such intelligence as this:—

"NEW THEATRES.—In addition to the theatre now building in the Strand we hear the Coliseum will be opened as an opera, and be connected with the Metropolitan Railway. A theatre and winter garden will shortly be constructed on the site of Saville House, and we believe that a new theatre is in progress of erection in Sloane Square, to meet the wants dramatic of the playgoers in Belgravia."

There is over thirty theatres open now in London, and over forty music-halls where performers, of more or less merit, display on the stage. Yet Belgravia "wants" a theatre, at least so we are informed, and Leicester Square another, at least so we may infer that the designer doubtless thinks. Well, the more the merrier—at any rate we will hope so. But for this place or the other "wanting" a new playhouse, convenient to itself, we fear such multiplication may prove to be vexation, not merely to the managers but the playgoers as well. Centralize your actors, and you get your plays well acted, and your theatres will pay; but if you scatter them about in Brixton and Belgravia, in Kensington and Kennington, in Hampstead and in Houndsditch, your stars will be dispersed, and haply cease to shine, and your taste for things theatrical will daily grow debased. Yours in the spirit(s).

Punch.

Digitized by Google

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS,

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

LAST MORNING PERFORMANCE

OF THE SEASON,

THIS DAY (SATURDAY), APRIL 9TH, 1870,

To Commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

QUARTET, in B minor, Op. 3, No. 3, for Pianoforte, Violin, Viola, and Violoncello—MM. CHARLES HALLE, JOACHIM, STRAUS, and PIATTI ..... Mendelssohn.

SONG, "Old German Spring Song"—Miss SINCLAIR ..... "

VARIATIONS on an original Air in F, Op. 34, for Pianoforte alone—Mr. CHARLES HALLE ..... Beethoven.

SONATA, "Il Trillo del Diavolo," for Violin, with Pianoforte Accompaniment—Herr JOACHIM ..... Tartini.

SONG, "Pack clouds away"—Miss SINCLAIR ..... Macfarren.

OTTET, in F, Op. 166, for two Violins, Viola, Violoncello, Double Bass, Clarionet, French Horn, and Bassoon—MM. JOACHIM, L. RIES, STRAUS, LASARUS, PAGUS, HUTCHINGS, REYNOLDS, and BLATTI ..... Schubert.

Conductor ..... Mr. ZERBINI.

THE LAST CONCERT OF THE SEASON

WILL TAKE PLACE ON

MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 11TH, 1870,

To commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

THE DIRECTOR'S BENEFIT.

Programme.

PART I.

CHORALE and VARIATIONS, for Organ—Master CHARLES LE JEUNE ..... H. Smart.

QUINTET, in B flat, Op. 87, for two Violins, two Violas, and Violoncello—MM. JOACHIM, L. RIES, STRAUS, ZERBINI, and PIATTI ..... Mendelssohn.

SONG, "Ave Maria"—Miss EDITH WYNNE ..... Cherubini.

HARPSICHORD LESSONS, for Pianoforte—Mr. CHARLES HALLE ..... Scarlatti.

ROMANCE SANS PAROLES, for Violoncello, with Pianoforte Accompaniment—Signor PIATTI ..... Mendelssohn.

SONG, "The Maiden's Dream"—Miss EDITH WYNNE ..... Benedict.

SCHERZO, in B flat minor, for Pianoforte alone—Madame SCHUMANN ..... Chopin.

PART II.

RECITATIVE and ADAGIO (from 6th Concerto) for Violin, with Pianoforte Accompaniment (by desire)—Herr JOACHIM ..... Spohr.

VARIATIONS on "See the conquering hero comes," for Pianoforte and Violoncello—MM. PAGUS and PIATTI ..... Beethoven.

SONG, "Orpheus with his lute"—Miss EDITH WYNNE ..... Sullivan.

CONCERTO, in C major, for three Pianofortes, with Quartet Accompaniment—Madame SCHUMANN, MM. CHARLES HALLE and PAGUS ..... Bach.

Stalls, 5s.; Balcony, 3s.; Admission, 1s. Tickets to be had of AUSTIN, 28, Piccadilly; KEITH, PROWSE, & Co., 48, Cheapside; HAYE, Royal Exchange Buildings: R. W. OLLIVIER, 19, Old Bond Street; and of CHAPPELL & Co., 50, New Bond Street.

BIRTH.

On the 3rd inst., at 15, Queen Anne Street, Cavendish Square, the wife of WILHELM GANZ, Esq., of a daughter.

NOTICE.

Owing to a press of matter we are obliged to hold over our notice of one of the chief musical events of the season—the performance of Bach's "Passions-Musik," in Exeter Hall, on Wednesday evening. Full particulars of this interesting revival will be given next week.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1870.

LORD DUDLEY'S STRATEGY.

THE noble enemy of our oldest musical Festival could hardly have reckoned upon the actual result of his attempt to bribe the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. He ought to know something about the power of money; and it is very natural that he should form an exaggerated estimate of what gold can do. But Lord Dudley has now discovered that a long purse cannot always force its way through the world, as might a burly ruffian through a crowd of women and children. What effect the famous 10,000 sovereigns have had upon the Dean and Chapter we do not yet know; but on all sides else they have stirred up most formidable opposition. How the city and county, led on by Sir John Fakington, have put themselves in array against the Earl and his gold, our readers well know. But we have this week to report an expression of opinion which crowns the opposition, and makes it irresistible. Birmingham, the largest town in the diocese of Worcester, has spoken, through its musical representatives, and, with almost unanimous voice, has condemned Lord Dudley's proposal. Here is a report of certain proceedings at the last meeting of the Birmingham Festival Committee:—

"Mr. Richard Peyton, said he had received a communication from Worcester in reference to the Festivals being held in Worcester Cathedral. He had been requested to lay the following memorial before the Birmingham Festival Committee and other influential persons:—

"'To the Very Reverend the Dean and Chapter of Worcester Cathedral.

"'Gentlemen,—We, the undersigned residents in the city and county of Worcester, request your careful consideration of this memorial, adopted at a public meeting, convened and presided over by the Mayor, in compliance with a requisition numerously and influentially signed.

"'We have heard with regret that a large sum of money has been offered towards completing the restoration of your Cathedral, on condition that if you accept it you shall hereafter refuse the use of the Cathedral for musical Festivals by which, for nearly a century and a half, charity and devotional feeling have been alike promoted.

"'We pray you to act in this matter as you and your predecessors have for that long period acted.

"'We know of no sufficient reasons for putting an end to these ancient Festivals. We are aware that, from time to time, other opinions on this subject have been avowed, and we regard them with that respect to which all conscientious feelings are entitled.

"'But we cannot admit that consecrated buildings are not the most fitting and appropriate for the celebration of the solemn and devotional compositions by which these meetings of the Three Choirs have always been distinguished.

"'We sincerely desire that they should be conducted with due reverence and propriety, and we believe that when so conducted, they not only aid the cause of charity and tend to the cultivation of the highest and most Divine form of musical art, but that the moral effect is elevating and beneficial.

"'We are, therefore, of opinion, while we share your anxiety to complete the restoration of the beautiful temple committed to your care, that an institution so ancient, so popular, and so good ought not to be abandoned; and, above all, we deprecate an unfavourable decision on your part on any other ground than deference to a manifest preponderance of public opinion.

"'We hope you will seriously consider that the views we have thus expressed are widely entertained by your neighbours in town and country, and we respectfully and earnestly beg you to decline the proposal you have received.'

"Mr. Peyton said they asked an expression of opinion in their favour from the gentlemen who managed the Birmingham Festivals. He had, therefore, the following resolution to propose:—'That this Committee, being of opinion that music of a sacred and devotional character may be suitably performed in sacred buildings, and being at the same time desirous of expressing their appreciation of, and sympathy with, the long continued exertions made by the promoters of the Worcester Festivals in the furtherance of art and in the cause of charity, desires to unite with the memorialists of Worcester and the neighbourhood in respectfully urging upon the Dean and Chapter the arguments embodied in the memorial now presented for consideration.' No doubt all the members of the Committee were aware of the offer of Lord Dudley. He thought they should sympathize with those who wished to carry on those Festivals in Worcester as in Hereford, Birmingham, and Gloucester. The offer of Lord Dudley did not apply to the object for which the efforts were made—namely, for the widows and the orphans of the clergy.

Digitized by Google

"Alderman Brinsley did not think such a resolution should emanate from that meeting. He thought Birmingham ought to have nothing to do with Worcester. Each Cathedral, he spoke against the resolution.

"The Chairman seconded the resolution. He could not agree with the views of Alderman Brinsley. They must not shut their eyes to the fact that if the result should be that the Festival could no longer be held at Worcester it would so disorganize the whole arrangements of the Three Choirs that it would be no longer held in Gloucester. It would not end at Worcester, but would go on to Hereford, and would be a serious matter to the organization of the Festival here, because they mutually helped each other, and so of course they had their fullest sympathy. He should be as sorry to see those Festivals given up as he would to see theirs given up, because he could not help feeling that before Sir Michael Costa was at the head of the Sacred Harmonic Society, or the Birmingham Choral Society existed, the Festival of the Three Choirs were well known, and were almost the only Festivals of that character in the kingdom. They have been in the face of the public for the last 100 years. If they could not look to a body like the Birmingham Festival Choral Committee to strengthen their hands he did not know where they were to look for sympathy and help. He felt very strongly in the matter, and recommended the resolution for adoption.

"Dr. Sebastian Evans reminded the meeting that Worcester Cathedral was their cathedral. Birmingham was the largest town in the diocese, so they, at all events, could very justly claim some right in deciding to what use the Cathedral should be put. He supported the resolution.

"Sir Michael Costa supported the motion. It would be a great pity to do away with the Festivals at Worcester. Earl Dudley wanted to restore the Church, but he had forgot the Charity. If he had been kind enough to give them another Town Hall like Birmingham, then they might have done without the Cathedral, but he did not propose to do this. He had great sympathy with those Festivals. They did good to art, religion, and the profession, and he hoped they would support them.

"The resolution was carried unanimously, with the exception of Mr. Brinsley, and signed by the Chairman on behalf of the meeting."

After reading the above, and taking it in connection with other expressions of public opinion, we are not surprised to find Lord Dudley's confidence rudely shaken. Victory by a coup de main being impossible, the noble Earl is now trying what strategy can do. Defeat awaits him even at that game, we fully believe, and Lord Dudley may add another to the list of titled authors, by writing another "Retreat of the Ten Thousand." At present, however, we have to do with his change of tactics.

In a second letter to the Worcester Journal, Lord Dudley, has made a complete change of front; and, we readily admit, has performed the operation with much cleverness. His original proposal had primarily to do with the Festival; and the work of Cathedral restoration was only used as a means to an end. In other words, Lord Dudley attacked the Festival, through the needs of the Cathedral. From this position he has withdrawn; and now, we see him anxious, first of all, on account of the Cathedral, while willing to allow the Festival question to stand over. After bemoaning the position of the Dean and Chapter [a position for which they have to thank Lord Dudley alone] the noble writer goes on to say:—"As I hold that the restoration of the Cathedral is the first consideration" [a very recent holding, this] "I venture to make the following proposition, which I hope may be accepted as a solution of the difficulty. * * * Let the county and city make themselves responsible, through a committee, for the sum of £5,000 each, during the next three years, to which I would add a third £5,000 without any other condition than this: That if this arrangement is not carried out, the opposition to the acceptance of the present offer to the Dean and Chapter shall not be pressed." [The italics are ours.] "I am induced to make this proposal for several reasons: first, because I desire to carry out this great work (one to which we have all put our hands, and from which we cannot in conscience recede from any secondary consideration), with the full assent and co-operation of the county and city, and not in opposition to it" [sic]; "and secondly, because I hope that the general feeling of the whole diocese will be that no such use shall ever be made of the beautifully restored Cathedral, as in times bygone, when once they" [who?] "see the work complete, so that it" [what?] "may be one of harmony and not of discord." Let us see to what all this amounts.

In the first place it is an attempt to make the supporters of the Festivals pay £10,000 for their continuance. Put down £10,000, says Lord Dudley, and the music meetings may go on till public opinion abolishes them; fail to put down the money, and the Dean and Chapter may accept my bribe on the original conditions. As we said just now, this is a clever move. It tests the sincerity of those who have loudly declared their devotion to the Festival, while the effect of its success would be to restore the Cathedral. The question now is—What will Sir John Pakington and his supporters do? On the one hand, they may accept the challenge, with its conditions—and hazard the existence of the Festivals; on the other, they may repudiate Lord Dudley altogether, and ask by what right he attempts to fine them £10,000. For ourselves we should prefer the latter course. We would answer Lord Dudley:—The Festivals shall go on as heretofore, because we have no right to stake their existence on the chance of our raising £10,000. As regards the Cathedral, we believe the Dean and Chapter would prefer that it should remain unfinished rather than owe anything to extorted means. At all events, we reject the dilemma you propose, and will retain both the Festivals and our own liberty of action.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

KING LOUIS of Bavaria has been the cause of much laughter, if not of wit, among the critics of that music to which he is devotedly attached. He is described as one of those juvenile heroes of chivalry found in sentimental German stories, and depicted in drawings which children delight to colour. There may be a somewhat lackadaisical element in the Monarch who rejoices in the traditions of office while abhorring its restraints, and who regards Court ceremonial from an operatic point of view. Yet, with all this, King Louis has lately shown an inclination to play a serious part in affairs of State. His romantic temperament might have made him an enthusiast of altar and sacristy, as well as of lyric drama; but happily, his friend, Herr Richard Wagner, is politician as well as composer, and the King has no liking for priests.

THE Emperor of Russia has conferred on the Marquise de Caux, better known as Adelina Patti, the Order of Merit, and appointed her first singer at Court. The decoration is set with diamonds and surmounted with the Imperial Crown. This is doubtless a very great honour—but, after all, the greatest honour an artist receives comes from the popular voice. There is a theory which maintains that the standard of excellence in art depends on the judgment of the "fit and few." There is another which maintains that all great art is popular; the greatest art being popular from age to age. Whichever of these theories be accepted (we accept neither) Madame de Caux might please an Emperor, and yet not be great. She has obtained the plaudits of thousands; and the Emperor Alexander II. merely confirms the verdict of the popular voice.

THE following paragraph on change ringing, is from a sporting contemporary:—

"A short touch of Bob, Stedman, and grandsire doubles (three hundreds' of each), containing 1080 changes, was rung upon the bells of Hallaton Church, Leicestershire, on the 12th inst. The hundreds by the Bob system were—(1) with singles, 2d, the observation; (2) with singles, 3d, the observation; (3) with bobs, 5th, observation. Those on Stedman's principle consisted of—(1) crambo; (2) commencing from rounds with a slow six; (3) commencing with a quick six; the singles being made in the two latter hundreds in four tives, so as not to interfere with the bells doing the 'slow work.' The hundreds in the grandsire method were—(1) singles on 2d-3d; singles on 3d-4th; (3) singles on 2d-4th; in each case the 5th being the observation. The above was conducted with thirty-three 'calls,' by No. 3, the ringers being J. Eaton, treble, C. Hinrich 2, B. Eaton 3, R. Grocock 4, J. Freer, tenor."

Digitized by Google

The uninitiated public, we imagine, will be puzzled to understand much of this.

A CORRESPONDENT who signs "A. M. M." is mistaken altogether about no record having been given in one of the principal morning journals, of the first performance of Verdi's Don Carlos at the Royal Italian Opera. We happen to have in our possession a copy of the paper he names, and transcribe, for "A. M. M.'s" instruction, the article which appeared on Wednesday, June 8, 18—:—

"Last night Mr. Gye fulfilled one of the most important promises of his prospectus by producing an Italian adaptation of Verdi's last grand opera, Don Carlos, with the splendour and completeness to which the frequenters of his theatre have been accustomed since Meyerbeer's Huguenots was brought out in 1848. The French Don Carlos is in five acts, the third of which includes a grand ballet. In the Italian version we have only four acts, the first being omitted altogether; and this, together with the excision of the ballet and some curtailments of less significance, reduces the opera to the more reasonable proportions to which English audiences are habituated. Beyond stating that the principal characters in Don Carlos were represented by Mdlles. Lucca, Fricci, and Ackermann, M. Petit, Signors Naudin, Graziani, and Bagagiolo (a new bass with a magnificent voice), and that the performance was received from beginning to end with every mark of favour, by a house crowded in every part, we reserve comment. Don Carlos is to be played a second and third time on Thursday and Saturday."

The opera was produced on Tuesday, June 4.

WE have received the subjoined protest (rather late) from one who signs himself "An amateur visitor to the last Handel Festival and intended visitor to the next":—

"We may not be musical, but that is no excuse for walking about during the Messiah at the Crystal Palace. It is hard, perhaps, in the artistic interest of the many, to curtail the conversational propensities of the few; but the few have a couple of rows among the audience at their mercy. During the entr'acte ladies must have ices brought to them. Now as a waiter cannot be every where at once, if he attends the tables in the entr'acte he must wait upon his seated customers while the performance goes on. Now, a waiter with an obbligato of one spoon, a glass, a shilling, and a small earthenware plate can materially interfere with the enjoyment at a certain distance of one of Mr. Sims Reeve's recitatives, or even go far to neutralize the effect of the 'Hallelujah' on those in his immediate neighbourhood. Talking is the rule at the Opera, silence the exception, but nuisance as it is there, it is doubled at an oratorio, or a Monday Popular Concert. If ever the time 'to be silent' was clearly marked off from the 'time to speak,' surely it would be during the performance of such works as the Messiah and Israel."

Here is something for Mr. Bowley, General Manger of the Crystal Palace, to reflect on between this and the summer of 1871.

THE dinners given in connection with the charitable funds too often cost more than the entire amount of the subscriptions and donations received during the year. That at least was the statement, sometime since, of a subscriber to one of them, although its principal manager professed to be not dissatisfied with the outlay, on the ground that the dinner was a splendid advertisement. No doubt a pleasant annual holiday is thus secured, but it is questionable whether subscribers intend their money to be spent in encouraging a number of gentlemen to make fanny speeches at a feast. People will be chary of subscribing to a fund which can only be said to advance "professional interests" so far as it enables a few excellent people (with twenty pensioners somewhere in the back-ground), to meet once a year and celebrate each other's praise. The "advertisement" may be gratifying to personal vanity, but does not assist much in carrying out the true design of a charity.

WHEN shall we learn to dissociate "effect" and noise? The one is supposed to include the other of necessity, and hence the liberties taken by conductors and singers with music which does not recognize the connection. Some of those liberties are serious, a case in point being furnished by the performance of Bach's Passions-Musik in Exeter Hall. Everybody who knows the work at all knows and loves the beautiful and elaborate chorale, "Oh, man, thy heavy sin lament," which so quietly and affectingly ends the first part. This was omitted in the performance. Why? We can only suppose because it is so quiet. It was necessary to close the first part with a sensation, and the double chorus, "Have lightning and thunders" did the work. But this Mr. Barnaby, to whom be every honour for his spirited labours in the cause of art, only acted up (or down) to the accepted rules of concert-giving. But we have hopes of him that he will grow out of this bondage, and show the noise-loving public that noise is not of necessity effect.

ACCORDING to a paragraph in the Post (which journal, as our readers know, lives, and moves, and has its being in the haut ton), the "fountain of honour," has resolved upon splashing Mr. Brinley Richards and a Mr. Clarke with the dignity of Knighthood!—the one because he wrote "God bless the Prince of Wales," the other, because he conferred some analogous blessing on the community. We hope nobody will receive this information with irreverence. Are not baronetcies given to mayors because they happen to be mayors when a bridge is opened; and are not knighthoods conferred on city grocers, whose duty it may be to wait on Royalty in a gilded coach, instead of waiting on Royalty's subjects behind a counter? Why, then, should not similar honours be tendered to Messrs. Richards and Clarke, whose claims are just as good as the claims of mayors and grocers! Instead of wondering at the offer, let us wonder how the offer will be received. Of course both gentlemen, being artists, will decline to be put on a level with the people who are usually made knights. Imagine Sir Brinley Richards, as junior, compelled to give the pas to Sir Gobbit Hard, Alderman and Ex-Sheriff, who years ago congratulated Majesty on the birth of Royal Highness.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

The following extract from a report recently presented by the Orchestral Committee of this Festival, will be read with interest:—

"In reporting to the General Committee in 1867 that Mr. J. F. Barnett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner, had been accepted for performance at the Festival, the Orchestral Committee expressed the confident hope that the production of the work would enhance the reputation of the young composer, and reflect credit on the committee for affording him an opportunity of being heard at the Festival. How fully these anticipations have been realized will be appreciated by those who have watched the progress of musical events since the production of the work in 1867, and the Orchestral Committee, finding it in their power to apportion to another short secular cantata by the same composer a portion of one of the evenings, have undertaken the production of his new cantata, entitled Paradise and the Peri, the subject being taken from Moore's celebrated poem, and on this music of which Mr. Barnett has now been for many months engaged, and which will be very shortly in readiness for rehearsal.

"In consideration of the fact that the reputation of the Birmingham Musical Festival extends far beyond the shores of this country, and with a desire still further to extend that reputation and to excite elsewhere an increased interest in our proceedings, the Orchestral Committee have, as already intimated in their former report, considered it to be for the interests of the undertaking that if possible some work should be obtained for production at the Festival from the renowned German composer, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne. The subject was accordingly brought under Dr. Hiller's notice by the chairman, at a personal interview in the course of last summer, and was at once cordially entertained by him; and after some short further negotiations, Dr. Hiller undertook the composition of a secular cantata for performance at the Festival miscellaneous evening concerts, at the same time pledging himself to visit this country in order to be present at the Festival, and to conduct the first performance of his music in person. Dr. Hiller (in obedience, as the committee understood, to a summons from the Grand Duke Michael of Russia) has spent the winter in St. Petersburgh, but letters have recently been received from him announcing his return to Cologne and communicating certain particulars as to the progress of his work, which, though apparently somewhat retarded by his sojourn in the Russian capital, will, it is confidently expected by the committee, be placed in their hands in due time to ensure its efficient production and performance. The subject which has been selected for musical illustration by Dr. Hiller is from an Indian poem, and is entitled Nala and Damayanti."

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

At the last of the interesting series of concerts of chamber music, given by Messrs. Henry Holmes and Pezze, at St. James's Hall, Mr. Cipriani Potter's masterly trio, in B flat, was played by these artists and Mr. W. H. Holmes, our eminent English pianist, with genuine success. At the same concert Mr. W. H. Holmes played an Andante and Allegro for piano alone, which were unanimously re-demanded. Madame Raby-Barrett was the lady singer, and gave great satisfaction.

A soirée was held at the Architectural Rooms, Conduit Street, on Tuesday evening, in aid of the funds of "The Women's Club and Institute," Newman Street. The rooms were well filled, and the institute must have benefited in a pecuniary sense, as well as otherwise, by the number of persons made acquainted with its claims to support for the first time. Among the artists engaged were Miss Emily Spiller, Miss Palmer, and Mr. Temple, vocalists; Miss Stevenson, pianist; and Mr. Cheshire, harpist. The audience were marked in their applause to Miss Palmer for "Always alone," a ballad bearing the name of "Henriette," a composer who, no doubt, will be often heard. Miss Stevenson, who accompanied the vocal music, contributed also solo performances on the pianoforte, among which may be singled for praise an Etude ("Nursery Tale"), by her teacher, the late Moscheles—played con amore. Some readings were introduced, including, among other things, "Molly," by Mr. Sydney Anderson, who also contributed a song in the style of Mr. John Parry, entitled, "Romeo and Juliet," which was very successful.

The third of Mr. and Mrs. Blagrove's concerts took place in St. George's Hall, on Thursday se'nnight, and attracted, for reasons which will presently be seen, a large and appreciative audience. The programme was long and varied; moreover, it contained things seldom heard, as well as novelties not generally available. First came Beethoven's quartet in E flat, for strings and piano; a work familiar to and beloved by all amateurs of the great master's chamber music. It was admirably rendered by Mrs. R. Blagrove, Messrs. H. Blagrove, R. Blagrove, and Aylward. The second instrumental piece was Mr. R. Blagrove's fantasia for concertina on airs from Orphée aux Enfers, in which the composer once again showed conclusively what he can do with the resources of his popular instrument. Vieuxtemps' Fantasia Caprice for violin afforded Mr. Henry Blagrove an opportunity of displaying his well-known skill as a violinist; and Mrs. R. Blagrove was heard to no less advantage in Thalberg's transcription from Moïse, the difficulties of which she surmounted with admirable ease. Herr Silas's Andante Religioso (MS.) was played by Mr. R. Blagrove on the baritone concertina with remarkable skill and effect. This, by-the-bye, constituted one of the distinguishing features of the concert; and it is to be hoped that a second performance will take place before the series closes. Spohr's Andante and Rondo from the characteristic duet, and the concert-giver's own duet on airs from Faust were also attractive, if only for the excellent style in which they were performed by Mr. and Mrs. Blagrove. The vocalists were Miss Robertine Henderson, Miss Watts, Madame Talbot-Cherer, Mr. Carter, and Mr. Winn, each of whom sang one or more favourite songs with acceptance. Dr. Austin Pearce acted as accompanist with all needful skill. The next concert takes place on the 23th inst.

A concert, in aid of the relief fund of the Lodge 566 of the United Ancient Order of Druids, was given at the Vestry-hall, Chelsea. The vocalists were—Miss Harris, Mrs. A. B. Rolfe, Miss Nellis Woodward, Miss Lynda Palmer, Miss A. A. Steadman, Messrs. E. G. Alfred, George Sherborne, E. Christie, J. M. Johnson, and Hawkins. Instrumentalists—solo violin, Miss H. Camille Dunbar; pianoforte, E. A. Todd, Mdlle. Amy Weddle, the Misses Bloor, and Miss Jones. Miss Dunbar performed the opening solo, "Air Varié de Bellini" on the violin with a dash and brilliancy quite astonishing in so young a lady. "The Lover and the Bird" was warbled excellently by Miss Berrie, and the same remark applies to her "Bird." Mr. G. Alford won great applause, and all his songs were enthusiastically encored. A vocal duet, "Flow on, thou shining River," by Mrs. J. B. Rolfe and Miss Woodward, was warmly appreciated. Special notice is due to a young artist, Miss Amy Weddle, a pianist of high merit. We should whether any of the cognoscenti of Chelsea who heard her on Monday, for the first time, were fully prepared for the rich treat which awaited them. Miss Amy Weddle's first piece was "Irish Diamonds," by Willis Pope, and on her recall, she played the "Monogram Caprice," by the same distinguished composer. Mr. G. Christie might make a good comique if possessed of more confidence; Mr. George Sherborne fairly brought down the house in the "Death of Nelson." Mrs. J. B. Rolfe, has a splendid voice, with a thorough knowledge of how to use it. Her song, "Duckling's Row," was loudly applauded, and rapturously re-demanded. The duet, "Look from thy Lattice," was prettily sung by Miss Linda Palmer and Miss Amelia Steadman. Taking it as a whole, the concert was a decided success.

PROVINCIAL.

Brighton.—The following is from a correspondent:—

"The members of the Musical Union of this town gave their second subscription concert in the Dome Concert-room on Friday week, Handel's Dettingen Te Deum, and Weber's Mass in G, forming the programme. Miss Marion Severn, Mr. Hunt, and Mr. Briggs were the solo vocalists in the Te Deum, and Miss Arabella Smyth soprano soloist in the Mass. Messrs. Steru, Gates, and Wells were respectively leader, pianist, and harmoniumist."

Northfleet (Kent).—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"A concert, in which the performers were chiefly amateurs, was given at the new schoolroom, in aid of the building fund. The room was filled by the élite of the neighbourhood. A novel feature was the singing, by four clergymen (the Revs. T. Griffith, Sorsbie, Shepherd, and F. Southgate, vicar), of certain glees. The honours were shared by the Misses Ferrari, and Captain and Mrs. Thomas. The young ladies sang charmingly; more especially a duet by Mrs. Glover, for which they received a unanimous encore. The pecuniary results are, we hope and believe, satisfactory."

Cork.—We extract the following notice of a concert given by the Christ Church Choral Union from the Cork Examiner:—

"The second concert of the season was given by this association in the Protestant Hall. The first part was devoted exclusively to selections from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, and Sullivan. The second consisted of miscellaneous vocal and instrumental music, opening with the pretty little ballad, 'Tell me, Mary, how to woo thee,' by Mr. Henry Baker, who executed it with great taste. The chorus gave two part-songs, Macfarren's 'Spring,' and 'Has sorrow thy young days shaded,' arranged by Balfe, in which they succeeded very well. 'Dream of Home,' an English adaptation of 'Il Bacio,' by Miss Creag, elicited loud applause, and a flattering encore, which she replied to with 'Maggie's secret.' A charming duet, 'Let us wander,' was excellently rendered by Miss Evanson and Mr. Bakar. Mr. C. H. Sykes gave the fine old song, 'Over the Rolling Sea.' The two principal features of the evening's entertainment were the performances of Miss Bella M'Carty and Mr. George Sippi, the former on the piano and the latter on the violin. Miss M'Carty appears daily to improve, and her execution last evening of a most difficult piece, Weber's 'Polonaise,' was really marvellous. In compliance with an encore she played 'Tarantalla,' a work of Thalberg's, with the same skill. An excellent treat was afforded by Mr. Sippi's solo on the violin. He selected an 'Air Varié,' by De Beriot. His performance was highly appreciated by the audience."

Worcester.—The following appeared in last Saturday's Worcester Journal:—

"The fourth concert in connection with the choir of St. Clement's Church was given on Monday evening. The programme comprising selections from the Hymn of Praise, Elijah, and St. Paul. Miss Nawth, Miss Davis, Mr. Fower, Mr. Millichap, and Mr. Stone kindly gave their assistance, and Miss Doward occupied the post of accompanist. Mrs. Fowler sang 'Angels, ever bright and fair,' and 'O rest in the Lord,' with much taste and feeling. The following were encored:—Mr. Stoyle in 'Wave from wave' (Handel); 'As pants the hart' (Spohr); Miss Binns and choir, the double quartet, 'For He shall give His angels;' and the air, recitatives, and chorus, 'Open the heavens' (Mendelssohn), Miss Haliam. Among their portions most pleasantly worth notice were Mr. Millichap's excellent singing of 'He counteth all your sorrows,' 'Holy, holy' (Spohr); Mr. Gummery and choir, the chorale, 'To Thee, O God,' the recitative, 'And they stoned Him,' being very expressively delivered by Mr. Gummery; and the concluding chorus, 'How lovely are the messengers.' As a whole, the concert was a decided advance on all former ones, and reflected much credit on all who took part in it."

Derby.—The following is condensed from the Derby Advertiser and Journal of April 1st:—

"The inauguration of the prize organ, Paris Exhibition, erected by Messrs. Bevington & Sons, of London, in the Volunteer Drill Hall, Derby, took place on Tuesday evening, when the interest attached to a recital by such an eminent organist as Mr. W. T. Best, of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, drew a very large audience. The programme was purely classical. Mr. Best was assisted by the Derby Choral Union, under Mr. W. W. Woodward. Of Mr. Best's masterly performance criticism is superfluous. His manipulation of Bach's Rondo (E major) and Fugue (G minor), a work so difficult as to place it beyond the reach of any but the Best (?) players, was a marvel. But the gem was his rendering of the pedal subject in the Fugue, in which he brought out the trombone stop: anything finer than this we have never heard on the instrument. The last piece of the first part was one of Guilmant's solos, interpreted by Mr. Best with true artistic sympathy. The second part was opened by Mr. Best playing a Pastorale and fugue, composed by himself, which, being unanimously encored, gained the audience an additional treat in an entr'acte from Schubert's Rosamunde, which we understand the Derby Philharmonic Society have been practising for some time past for their next concert; so that Mr. Best unconsciously stole an honour from our society by giving it for the first time in Derby. Tha air, with variations, in G minor, Beethoven, again showed Mr. Best's wonderful mastery of the organ. The last solo, Marche Religieuse, was given with all the ability required. The Choral Union sang 'Then round about the starry throne,' 'Fixed in His everlasting seat,' and 'O Hills, O Vales.' 'God save the Queen,' which Mr. Best accompanied with full organ, was the concluding piece. We congratulate all whose efforts have gained for us so valuable an instrument, upon the success of their inaugural concert, under Mr. Best's ordeal. The committee and Mr. Woodward deserve the thanks of their townsmen for their spirited enterprise. With such an instrument and the two musical societies, there is promise that Derby will very soon regain that position in the musical world she occupied in former years, but which, through apathy, she lost. A musical correspondent, on whose judgment we can implicitly rely, writes as follows:—"It is a great pity there is not more space between the organ and the roof; as a natural consequence at times the tone of the instrument suffers most materially, and gives the impression of being noisy and harsh. The Great Organ would certainly have been greatly benefited by an additional 8 feet open diapason: it seems to want this foundation stop to counterbalance the great number of "mixtures" on this row of keys. The Swell Organ is particularly fine, and some of the solo stops on this organ, and also in the Choir Organ, are of a delicious quality. From some cause connected with the acoustic properties of the hall, parts of the Pedal Organ have had to receive an additional weight of wind, conveyed from a separate sound-board. The Swell Organ and the Pedal Organ we consider the most effective parts of the instrument."

Digitized by Google

LIVERPOOL.—We condense (unwillingly) an interesting article from the Liverpool Daily Courier (April 6), upon a recent performance of Israel in Egypt, by the Philharmonic Society:—

"At the Philharmonic Society's fifth subscription concert last night, Handel's Israel in Egypt was performed for the first time in its entirety in Liverpool since the opening of the Philharmonic Hall. The performance, on the whole highly satisfactory, was remarkable for the introduction of Macfarren's extra orchestration, and Mendelssohn's organ obbligato. We were disappointed to find the interpolation of certain airs which break the connection between those eight inimitable choruses which describe the plagues of Egypt and the deliverance of the Israelites. That Handel himself had to submit to such interpolations is true, but in the present day it is considered desirable to give the works of great masters in the form in which they conceived them. The choruses were sung with almost invariable efficiency, the 'Hailstone Chorus' received a hearty and well-deserved encore. The liberality of the audience in the matter of applause at various important stages of the work, being remarkable for its cordiality, was a pleasing deviation from the general frigidity of the Philharmonic audience. The solo music was entrusted to Mdlle. Carola, soprano; Madame Patey, alto; Mr. Thomas, tenor; and Messrs. Winn and Patey, bass. The band was in excellent order, and Mr. Hirst's organ accompaniments in the best taste. Mr. Benedict, to whom we are indebted for a performance of Handel's chef d'œuvre, discharged his onerous duties with rare ability."

Recognition of Genius.

England has had some great composers, though this country never produced a Mozart or a Beethoven, and did not produce but only nourished Handel; but that is something: for there is an element in his grandest music which it could have derived only from genius fed on the best of beef. It is extractum carnis liquified; but still extractum carnis; sublimated, etherealized extractum carnis bovinæ. England has had some great composers? Yes, marry, and hath. For, look you, there are, saith the Post, to be created:—

"NEW MUSICAL KNIGHTS.—There is a rumour that two popular composers of music are to have the honour of knighthood—viz., Mr. Brinley Richards, the composer of the well-known and popular song, 'God Bless the Prince of Wales,' and Mr. J. P. Clarke, a military composer, for his new national chant, 'Hail to the Duke.'"

"Hail to the Duke" may not perhaps be quite comparable to the "Hallelujah Chorus," nor "God Bless the Prince of Wales" to the "Hallelujah." That loyal anthem and that loyal chant are, however, evergreen tunes which have their merit, and happy man be the dole of Mr. Richards and Mr. Clarke that it is merit such as to have won the honour of knighthood. Of course Sterndale Bennett will be offered a Baronetage.

Punch.

WAIFS

Madame Arabella Goddard has gone to Boulogne-sur-Mer.

Herr Strakosch left London for Paris on Thursday.

The Richings opera troupe have done well in New Orleans.

Mr. Massy has left the Lyrique and gone to the Rue Pellattier.

A vacancy at midsummer in the choir of Exeter Cathedral is announced. The emoluments average £80 per annum.

Sig. Biscaccianti is about to try a season of Italian opera management in Boston. Adelaide Phillipp is one of the company. The rest are Joel and Levi's wrecks.

P. S. Gilmore has not purchased a residence on the Hudson, He is busily engaged, at his residence in Boston, writing a book on the National Peace Jubilee.

The Countess Delawarr has bequeathed the sum of £666 in the Three per Cents. for the choir and organist of Withyham, Sussex, a living in the gift of the Earl.

Mr. Vernon Rigby has been engaged for the Birmingham Festival, to sing the principal tenor part in Ferdinand Hiller's Eastern Cantata, and Mr. John F. Barnett's Paradise and the Peri.

General Sheridan tells us that the Santee Indians chant psalms around their camp-fires, and often substitute, at their scalp and other dances, one of Watts' hymns for the ordinary Indian songs.

A Minstrel troupe organized in Indianapolis last Monday, played Tuesday night, "busted" Wednesday morning, and Thursday afternoon the leader went to sawing wood at four shillings a cord.

Frou-Frou, translated and adapted by Fred. Williams, has been produced at the Boston Museum. Another version of Frou-Frou is in rehearsal at the St. James's Theatre; principal part by Mdlle. Beatrice.

Messrs. Debenham, Storr, and Sons, of the Great Metropolitan Auction Mart in Covent Garden, announce by circular that Mr. Pottick, auctioneer, late of No. 47, Leicester Square, has joined their firm as partner.

Il Trovatore and the Gazetta del Teatri speak in most glowing terms of Miss Kilas Trafford, an English vocalist at Saluzzo. They state that in the opera of Fulvi Monciarj the young prima donna was loudly applauded and recalled three times. She sang also the cavatina from Rigoletto with most excellent effect.

Miss Agusta Thomson has returned to Mr. J. Russell and his Covent Garden Company. This time she will not sing second, but first. She is now prima donna assoluta of Offenbach opera in England, and will at Manchester in Easter week appear as Boulotte in the Barbe-Bleue, and a few weeks after lead the company back to London, to fulfil an engagement at a West-end theatre.

An admirable performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater took place on last Sunday evening at the Clarendon Square Chapel, Camden Town, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Barnett. Miss Banks, Miss Palmer, and Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Lewis Thomas were the principals, and there was an efficient choir. Mr. John Francis Barnett presided at the organ. The Rev. Mr. Pennington was the officiating clergyman.

The Welsh chinrches have begun to sing the choral service in the Welsh language. The effect is something like this:—

Li grwmpp ff mrw gil dst
Wmut plial trmws dwmp
Stspl ngiw mpggl wtmn
Fwial mgiwp brgy hptl.

The people of St. Lewis, not to be behind those active fellows in Chicago, are determined to have a new and magnificent operahouse, which, singular to state, is to be erected by the Missouri Life Insurance Company. What music has to do with life insurance, we really don't know; but we suppose that the lyric drama in some occult way promotes longevity, in spite of Shakspere's line:—

"That strain again;—it had a dying fall."

A guinea a stall is gradually becoming the regular price for any performance in London a little out of the common, and while people are willing to have the price of their amusements raised about 200 per cent. theatrical speculators and managers will of course take advantage of their easy disposition. We do not say that Mdme. Schneider is over-dear at a guinea, but the practice of fixing this price for stalls ought not to be extended much further. Otherwise, the patrons of that part of the house will be obliged for self-defence to offer a partial revival of the celebrated O.P. performances for the approval of managers.

Digitized by Google

If any proof were wanted of the cosmopolitan character of New York, we could point to the fact that we can command the resources of five different operas at one and the same time. No other city in the world offers such facilities. Paris, London and Vienna can only occasionally claim the riches of two operas, while we have had five—English, Italian, German, French, and Russian. If we add to this the Ethiopian, which is still flourishing in all its splendour, we can justly say that in opera, as in everything else, we beat all other nations. This is of course very gratifying, and must add considerably to the equanimity of our musical temper.—New York Weekly Review.

Herr Oberthur has returned to London after an extended tour in Germany. Among the various towns he has visited were Meiningen (where he played, at the Herzoglisches Hoftheater, his concertina for harp and orchestra, and other compositions), Nordhauser, Altenburg, Magdeburg, Dresden (where he enjoyed the co-operation of Mdlle. Marie Krebs, who played with him his harp and piano duet on airs from Oberon), Passau, Nürnberg, and Ratisbon. At the concert at Ratisbon the Princess of Tour and Taxis was present. Herr Oberthur's concertina for harp and orchestra, and a fantasia by Parish Alvars, afforded such satisfaction to that distinguished personage that she requested to hear something else, when Herr Oberthur gave his "Cascade." At Saarbrücken he again played the concertina (with pianoforte accompaniment, there being no orchestra), the Souvenir de Londres, "Meditations," "Cascade," and a brilliant fantasia on I Capuletti e I Montecchi, by Parish Alvars.

The Philadelphia Enquirer writing about the Parepa-Rosa's performance of Weber's Oberon, says :—

"The production of the opera was in the highest degree creditable. We have rarely seen any first representation accompanied by so few drawbacks, and when the scenic affects are considered, it was wonderful how smoothly everything proceeded. Madame Parepa appeared more graceful and becoming in her oriental costume than we have seen her in any other character. Her singing of the sublime air in the third act was more than a triumph—it was one of her grandest efforts. The orchestral accompaniments were powerful and impressive. Mrs. Seguin as Fatima made a most pleasing impression in 'A lonely Arab Maid,' and a still greater in 'Araby, dear Araby.' Mr. Castle, as Sir Huon, deserved great credit. Miss Warden, as Puck, made a good impression; she has a contralto voice of considerable power. Mr. De Solla looked too terrestrial for a fairy. The air in act third he sang, however, with much effect. The choruses were generally good. Mr. Lawrence received the first encore in the opening air to Act 4. We could not help thinking how finely this gentleman's voice would sound in Don Giovanni. The orchestra contributed largely to the success. The overture richly deserved the encore it received. Both Oberon and Marriage of Figaro owe much of their success here to the excellence of the orchestra, and the watchfulness of the conductor. The skill and energy with which Mr. Carl Rosa assumes the duties of a director have been generally commented upon. In the various operas he has led in this city we have yet to see a blunder in the instrumental department—a record as rare as it is honourable to him. We cannot better express our sense of his services than by repeating a compliment we have already heard paid him—' Nothing could reconcile us to the loss of Mr. Rosa as a soloist, except the appropriateness of his position in the director's chair.'"

The Paris correspondent of the Graphic wrote as follows last week :—

"As regards musical fêtes, we have had a commemorative festival of the late Berlioz. Before speaking of it, let me recommend you to read the amusing memoirs of this imperfect musician, who might have been, if the Fates had so permitted him, a first-class writer. This French Wagner, who little liked the Berlioz of Germany, had united in him the exalted sentiments of young Werther and the biting irony of Candide. You will be above all interested in the history of his passion for Henrietta Smithson, your celebrated tragic actress, who in an unlucky moment consented to marry him, and thus exposed herself, an involuntary victim, to all the storms of a conjugal life which the passionate jealousy of her husband rendered more than once terribly bitter. But to return to the festival, which has not been a complete success. Little but the compositions of Berlioz himself was executed, and this evening music is not universally liked among us. Faure and Mdme. Miolan-Carvalho sang without sufficient confidence, and without producing the slightest effect, the duet from, L'enfance du Christ. The famous septett from the Troyens, formerly so applauded at the Théâtre Lyrique, fell flat, and the finale et Romeo and Juliet, although very fine, did not awake the audience from the torpor into which they seemed to have fallen. The only pieces of Berlioz which succeeded were the March from Pèlerinage d'Harold en Italie, the overture to the Carnaval Romain, the grand scene from the Damnation de Faust, and among others the solo of Mephistopheles, which Faure executed in a most masterly manner. Mdme. Guaymard gained much applause in the air from Gluck's Alceste, 'Divinités du Styx,' and the finale to the second act of the Vestale (Spontini) with much approbation, although Mdlle. Nilsson (doubtless fatigued, as on the eve she had obtained a great success in Robert le Diable) did not give to her part the necessary set off. In fine, could the shade of Berlioz have been present at this fête in his honour, it would have been astonished and somewhat indignant at a homage which left so much to be desired."

Miss Louisa Pyne has announced her intention to retire from public life, and arrangements have been made for four farewell oratorio performances, under the direction of the National Choral Society. The first performance of the series will be the Messiah, on Tuesday, the12th (Passion Week), at St. James's Hall.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

Chappell & Co.—"Ireland," Grand Fantasia by Brinley Richards.

Novello, Ewer, & Co.—"The Organist's Quarterly Journal," for April.

Wheeler & Co.—"The Silver Moth," song by Kate L. Ward; "Go, lovely Rose," song by Mrs. John Holman Andrews.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING

OF

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.

And may be obtained of Signor Ferrari, alphis residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

Has maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Whole sale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

The HOLY FAMILY, for the Holy Week. Complete in 13 Books. Sacred Melodies, arranged by W. H. Callcott, for the Pianoforte. 3-8ou, 5s. each; duets, 6s. each; accompaniments for flute, violin, violoncello, 1s. each. Each at half-price, with an extra stamp for postage.

The Beautiful Poem, "TELL HIM I LOVE HIM YET," full of pure sentiment, has been most successfully SET to MUSIC by A. S. Gatty, and is well worthy the attention of all lovers of English songs. Post free for 18 stamps.

Carl Czerny's LETTERS to a YOUNG LADY on the ART of PLAYING the PIANOFORTE, 2os.; Ditto, on Thorough Bass; Ditto, Exercises on Figured Basses. Each free by post for 4s.

The LIFE OF HANDEL. By Victor Schoelcher. 443 pages, 8vo., cloth boards, free by post for 7s. 6d. in stamps.—London: Published only by Rudall Cocks & Co., New Burlington Street.

Bach's "PASSIONS-MUSIK," Edited by Professor Sterndale Bennett, translated by Miss H. F. Johnstone. The folio edition complete, net 21s.; all the favourite solos can be had separately.—Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

W. Sterndale Bennett's song, "THE BETTER LAND," as sung by Mr. Cummings at the last Monday Popular Concert. Sent free by post for 18 stamps.—Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

NEW SACRED SONG

FOR BARITONE, CONTRALTO, OR MEZZO-SOPRANO,

"THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD,"

WORDS FROM PSALM XXIII.

Music by J. MILES BENNETT.

KEY E♭ MAJOR. COMPASS FROM B♭ TO F♯.

Price 3s.

"The music finely expressive of the words."

London: Cramer & Co. (Limited), 201, Regent Street, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."

SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.

Adagio maestoso, Allegro non lento, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,

By BERNARD FARRHOTHER.

London: Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

To be ready Next Week,

"MEDEA."

SCENA ED ARIA FOR SOPRANO,

Song by Madame Rudersdorff at the Gewandhaus Concerts, Leipsic, and by Mdlle. Tietjens, at the Norwich Festival.

Composed by ALBERTO RANDEGGER,

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY HERMANN EISOLDT

"BRIDAL BELLS"

(MORCEAU DE SALON),

For the Pianoforte, by Hermann EISOLDT.

We read in the Dresden Journal:—"Hermann Eisoldt's 'Bridal Bells' was beautifully performed by the splendid Orchestra of Herr Music-Director Trenkler, and met with great applause. The piece being very melodious is sure to become popular." Published, price 4s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Now Ready—Vocal Score, with Organ Accompaniment, 3s., nett; Set of Vocal Parts, 1s., nett. Free by Post on the usual terms.

DR. SPARK'S

NEW EASTER ANTHEM,

"CHRIST BEING RAISED FROM THE DEAD."

Chorus, Soprano or Tenor Solo with Chorus, Choral Recitative, and Final Fugal Chorus.

"The plan of the work is clear and well defined, the subjects are melodious and uncommon, and the harmony throughout is pure and healthy."—The Queen.

London: NOVELLO, EWER, & Co., 1, Berners Street, W.

Published This Day,

TWO SONGS BY MARIA HAYES.

No. 1. "I'M WEARY WAITING" .. .. 3s.
„ 2. "INVITATION" (Barcarolle). .. .. 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"I LOOKED AMONG THE LILY-BELLS,"

BALLAD.

By JACQUES OFFENBACH.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

MASON & HAMLIN'S GOLD MEDAL CABINET ORGAN. ALWAYS IN TUNE, FOR ALL CLIMATES. Five Thousand Three Hundred and Four Full Reed Organs were Manufactured and Sold in 1869, being Seventeen each working day. Illustrated Books, one stamp.—BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGANS.—NEW STYLES.—Six Octave Nine Stop DRAWING-ROOM ORGANS. Ten Stop Chapel Organ, with Pedals of Knee Swell, Super-Octave Coupler, and Manual Sub-Bass. Always in Tune. Price lists, one stamp.—BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. VON WEBER have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s. d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3 0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3 0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY ...	3 0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY ...	3 0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3 0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY ...	3 0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	4 0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WALLINGTON GUERNSEY ...	3 0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad) ... ... And the Answer to it.	FLORENCE PERCY ...	4 0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY ...	4 0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS,
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION,

The Silver Trumpets

PLAYED AT

ST. PETER'S, ROME,

DURING THE

RECENT FESTIVALS.

For the Pianoforte . . 3s.
„ „ Duet . 4s.
For the Organ, with Pedal Obbligato . . . 3s.
For the Harmonium . . 3s.

LONDON:

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, NEW BOND STREET, W.

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s. d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various kinds	7 6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	5 0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	2 6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonised in various ways, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard. ...	5 0
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7 6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 6s. each, or one vol., boards, 12s. This book, containing 53 Compositions, includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 59 of his best Pieces. ...	6 0
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 35. Six Books in one vol.	6 0
J. T. STONES ORGAN-BOOK, an arrangement of 18 Classical Compositions	6 0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

45. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3.—Op. 13, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
48. SONATAS, Op. 22.—Op. 26.—Op. 27, No. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
49. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastorale), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
50. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53.—Op. 54 (Appassionata), and Op. 57.
51. SONATAS, Op. 78.—Op. 79 (Caracteristique).—Op. 81.—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
52. SONATAS, Op. 106.—Op. 109.—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Fantasia and Sonata), 2, 3.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Complete in one volume, 5s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complete in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42.) No. 2 (Op. 53.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 120.) No. 4 (Op. 122) No. 5 (Op. 142.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 147.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, Nos. 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS for PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 48 to 80 pages, including Overtures.

FIGARO	GRAND DUCHESS
ROBERT LE DIABLE	FIDELIO
DON JUAN	BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA
LUCREZIA BORGIA	SONNAMBULA
DER FREISCHUTZ	BALLO IN MASCHERA
CRISPINO E LA COMARE	TRAVIATA
TROVATORE	MARTHA
NORMA	WILLIAM TELL
DON PASQUALE	CROWN DIAMONDS
FRA DIAVOLO	MASANIELLO
RIGOLETTO	DOMINO NOIR
ZAMPA

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 6s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.

138. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and "Où voulez vous aller?"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY.
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VOLKSLIEDER for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring." "Soldaten Lied," "True Love," &c.
140. STEPHEN HELLER'S 24 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s. ; post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

96. SANTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original compositions, published in no other collection.
77. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BALFE, BARNES, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY, ALEXANDRA LEE, &c.
83. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep," "My Pretty Page," "As it fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Lesson Duet," &c.
76. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
64. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
43. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
33. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET

Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.

1. TWENTY-FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CREATION, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S FIFTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND HESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS.
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, HERZ, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.

SHILLING BOOKS OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.

113. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
100. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
130. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LAST ROSE, and LILLIE DALE.
117. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete.
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
73. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
99. FRANZ SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS, and SIX MOMENS MUSICALX. All complete.
87. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Partant," "Semiramide," &c.
86. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Musical Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
85. STEPHEN HELLER'S PROMENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
80. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
94. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS.
79. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Perles et Diamans," "Il Corricolo," &c.
33, 34, 94. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.	WALPURGIS NIGHT.
HAYDN'S IMPERIAL MASS.	BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C.
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.	ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.	MOZART'S REQUIEM.
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.	DETTINGEN TE DEUM.
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.	ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE MESSIAH.	THE CREATION.

BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees 2 0

					s.	p.
BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 60 Glees	...	...	...	...	2	6
THE CHORALIST, 86 Part-songs. 2 vols, each	...	...	...	...	6	0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	...	...	...	...	1	0

The above Works, for Societies in penny numbers.

THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs	6	0
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 50 Part-songs for village and school use	6	0

LONDON:

BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Digitized by Google

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (da Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
2d Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Posca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

SYDNEY SMITH'S

FOUR

New Pieces.

ROBERT LE DIABLE.

Fantaisie Dramatique sur l'Opéra de Meyerbeer.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

BARCAROLLE.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

FAIRY REALMS.

Grand Brilliant Waltz.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.

Paraphrase.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

LONDON

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Printed by Henderson, Raff, and Fenton, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex. Published by William Duncan Dyson, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, April 9, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART AFFEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT REPRESENTS."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 20s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 16. SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1870. PRICE { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—LAST SATURDAY CONCERT, THIS DAY.—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Nelson Varley. Conductor—Mr. MANNS. Programme includes the Pastoral Symphony, Prelude to "Lohengrin" (overture), "Manfred" (Schumann), and "Zampa" (cantata, "Mayday" (Mackarren), &c. Admission, Half-a-Crown, or by Guinea Season Tickets; Stalls, 21s. 6d.

ITALIAN OPERA,
THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

THE SEASON WILL COMMENCE ON SATURDAY, 16TH APRIL, 1870, WITH Verdi's Opera, RIGOLETTO.

IL DUCA	..	Signor MONGINI.
RIGOLETTO	..	Mr. SANTLEY.
SPARAFUCILE	..	Signor FOLI.
MONTERONE	..	Signor RAGUER.
MARULLO	..	Signor ZOBOLI.
BORSA	..	Signor ARCHINTI.
CEPRANO	..	Mr. LYALL.
LA CONTESSA	..	Mdlle. BRIANI.
GIOVANNA	..	Mdme. CORSI.
MADDELENA	..	Mdme. TREBELLI-BETTINI.
AND
GILDA	..	Mdlle. ILMA DI MURSKA.

ON MONDAY, 19TH APRIL,
Donisetti's Opera, LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR.

ON TUESDAY, 19TH APRIL,
Rossini's Opera, IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA.

Composer, Conductor, and Director of the Music .. SIGNOR ARDITI.
Acting Manager .. .. MR. JARRETT.

MISS EDITH KINGSLEY'S FIRST GRAND EVENING CONCERT, under the Patronage of the Right Hon. The Earl and Countess of Malmesbury, will take place at St. George's HALL, WESTMINSTER, April 27th. Principal vocalists—Miss Blanche Cole, Mr. George Perree, Mr. Harley Vinning and Herr Formes. Instrumentalists—Mr. John Cheshire, Chevalier Bosworth, Mr. Charles Malcom. Conductors, Mr. Louis Roemmerl and Mr. F. Stanislaus. After which the comedy of "THE HONEYMOON," under the direction of Miss Marie Somerville. Stalls, 5s.; Tickets, 3s., 2s. and 1s.; at Mr. Austin's St. James's Hall, and at St. George's Hall.

MISS EDITH KINGSLEY AND Mr. GEORGE PERREN will sing NICOLAI'S popular duet, "ONE WORD," at St. George's Hall, April 27th.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD begs to announce that she will give a RECITAL of PIANOFORTE MUSIC, consisting of Selections from the works of CHOPIN and HUMMEL, at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Saturday Morning, May 28th, on which occasion she will have the assistance of some Celebrated Vocalists. Full particulars will be duly announced.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD will play "MADAME GURK'S WALTZ," composed by CHOPIN, at her Recital of Pianoforte Music.

SIGNORINA EMILY TATE has the honour to announce that her THIRD ANNUAL GRAND CONCERT will take place under the Special Patronage of Sir Roderick Murchison, &c., at St. George's Hall, on TUESDAY, 3rd of May, 1870. Full particulars will be duly announced. No. 79, Cook's Road, Kensington Park.

MR. EDWARD MURRAY (Baritone), now engaged with the Drury Lane Italian Opera Company, respectfully requests that all communications may be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co. 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. EMILE BERGER.

MR. EMILE BERGER will return to London for the season on the 23rd May. All letters to be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., Foreign Music Warehouse, 244, Regent Street, W.

HERR CARL FORMES will sing his renowned song, "IN SHELTERED VALE," at St. George's Hall, April 27.

HERR CARL FORMES is now in Town for the season and can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios and Operatic Performances. Address—care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

FOR SALE, Two splendid old CREMONA VIOLINS, thoroughly genuine and authentic. Address—G. DENEHAN, London Road, Reigate.

NEW PIANOFORTE DUETS.

TWELVE MELODIES, Composed by W. STERNDALE BENNETT. Selected and arranged by W. HUTCHINS CALLCOTT. In Two Books, 6s. each.—LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

SONGS OF SCOTLAND, HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.—Mr. KENNEDY, the Scottish Vocalist, will give his celebrated Entertainment on the SONGS OF SCOTLAND, April 25th, 27th, and 29th; May 2nd, 4th, and 6th, at Eight o'clock. A Special Morning Entertainment on Saturday, April 30th, at Three o'clock. Tickets, 1s. and 2s.; Numbered Stalls, 3s.; at all the Musicsellers, and at the Rooms.

Published this Day,

"THE WEAVER,"
BALLAD.
The Words by EMILY JUDSON.
The Music by KATE LUCY WARD.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

To be played, for the First Time in London, on Monday next, at the LYCEUM THEATRE,

"LE PETIT FAUST,"
OPERA-BOUFFE,
BY HERVE.

All the Vocal Music (with French words), as well as Quadrilles, Waltzes, Fantasias, &c., for the Pianoforte

(EDITIONS OF HEUGEL & CO., PARIS),

Can now be obtained of

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

'INSTRUCTION IN SCIENCE AND ART FOR WOMEN.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S Lectures "ON THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF VOCAL MUSIC" (in continuation of the Course now being delivered), will be given in the Lecture Theatre, South Kensington Museum, on Tuesdays and Fridays, at 11 a.m., commencing on the 26th April. Tickets for the Course of Twelve Lectures, £1 1s.; with Practice, £1 11s. 6d. Single admissions, without Practice, 2s. 6d.

Persons who may wish to attend this Course of Lectures are requested to send their names to the Hon. and Rev. Francis Byng, Treasurer, South Kensington Museum.

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square (where Haydn made his first bow to an English audience).—Ladies and Gentlemen intending to engage these unique Rooms for Concerts, &c., are respectfully invited to make early application, in order to secure the best days. For terms, apply to Mr. Hall, at the Rooms. ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

Digitized by Google

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Instituted 1822.—Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1830.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CHRISTIAN,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

President—The EARL OF DUDLEY.
Principal—Professor W. STERNDALE BENNETT.

The Easter Term will commence on Monday the 25th inst., and terminate on Saturday the 23rd of July.
Candidates for Admission can be examined at the Institution on Thursday, the 21st inst., at Eleven o'clock, and every following Thursday at the same hour.
By order, JOHN GILL, Secretary.
ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
4, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square.

MR. ROBERT BERRINGER will play his admired "VALSE DE BRAVOURE" at the Crystal Palace, This Day, April 16th.

MR. GEORGE PERREN will sing (by desire) ASCHER'S popular Romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" at Miss Matilda Baxter's Evening Concert, May 6th.

MISS MATILDA BAXTER will perform ASCHER'S brilliant Fantasia, "ALICE," at her Concert, May 6th.

MR. WILFORD MORGAN will (by desire) sing his popular ballad, "MY SWEETHEART WHEN A BOY," on April 20th at St. James's Hall.

MISS AMY PERRY will perform ASCHER'S popular Fantasia, "ALICE," at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 14th.

MISS LILY SIMESTER and Mr. GEORGE PERREN will sing NICOLAI'S admired duet, "ONE WORD," at the Manor Rooms, Hackney, May 10th.

MISS JULIA ELTON will sing Miss KATE WARD'S new song, "THE WEAVER," at St. James's Hall, April 20th; at Sydenham Lecture Hall on the 22nd, and St. James's Hall on the 23rd.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S CONCERTS:—Guildford, April 21st; Bishop Stortford, May 5th; Miss Amy Perry's, Hanover Square Rooms, 14th; Stone Street, June 4th, July 16th; Hanover Square, June 28th. Communications, Norfolk Road, Heywaker.

REMOVAL.

MRS. RONEY (Miss Helen Hogarth) begs to announce her REMOVAL from Gloucester Crescent, to No. 6, Chalcot Terrace, Regent's Park Road, N.W.

MR. CHARLES STANTON (Tenor) may be engaged for Concerts, Operettas, and Oratorios. Address, 10, Duke Street, Portland Place, W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING is prepared to accept Engagements for Oratorios, Concerts, in Town or Country. For terms, address 126, Regent Street,

"LITTLE WILLIE," by JULES BENEDICT. This charming new song (by the popular composer of "Rock me to Sleep") is now being sung with distinguished success by Miss EDITH WYNNE. Price 3s., and may be obtained for 19 stamps from the publisher, DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ARBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier Branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."
SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to
MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,
By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.
London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Just Published,

"REVIVALS,"
EDITED BY
J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA
(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),
FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY
WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA
(IN C MAJOR),
FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY
WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

N.B. "REVIVALS" will consist of Pieces hitherto only existing in Manuscript, or which have been long out of Print. Selected from the Works of Eminent Masters.

Now Published,
"SUNSHINE,"
MARSHALL HALL BELL'S NEW SONG.
"SUNSHINE" was rapturously encored when sung at the composer's concert by Miss Robertine Henderson, and is published, price 3s., by
DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Just Published,
DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND AND MASTER, Z. BUCK, ESQ., MUS. DOC.
"FAREWELL,"
SONG.
Sung by Mrs. H. ROBERTON MIRRS, the Words by LORD BYRON.
The Music by GEORGE GAFF.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.
Where may be obtained, Composed by GEORGE GAFF,
"MAIDEN, WRAP THY MANTLE ROUND THEE."
POETRY BY KIRKE WHITE.

Just Published,
TARANTELLE,
POUR LE PIANOFORTE.
Par PAUL SEMLER.
Prix 2s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,
"O LADY, TWINE NO WREATH FOR ME."
SONG.
The Poetry by SIR WALTER SCOTT.
The Music by W. FRIEDRICH.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,
"LANDLER WALTZ,"
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
Composed by PAUL SEMLER.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

In two further representations of Lucia di Lammermoor Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi maintained, and, indeed, may be said to have improved, her position. Nevertheless, if report may be credited, it is rather in comic than in serious opera that the talent of the fair-haired Austrian songstress lies; and of this we are promised a speedy opportunity of judging in Donizetti's Figlia del Reggimento, which is being got up expressly for Mdlle. Sessi. At the third performance of Lucia the resources of Messrs. Gye and Mapleson's company were favourably put to the test. Herr Wachtel and Signor Graziani having to rehearse for Guillaume Tell, which was to be produced on the very next opera night, were unable, or at least unwilling, to sing in Lucia. Another Edgardo, however, was immediately at hand, in Signor Della Rocca, and another Enrico in Signor Cotogni—both of whom appeared to give satisfaction.

Lucia was followed by the Huguenots, in which Herr Wachtel essayed the part of Raoul de Nangis, for the first time before an English public. Although this gentleman evinces but small dramatic ability, and is by no means an artistically finished singer, his voice serves him at times to excellent purpose in the trying music which Meyerbeer has put in the mouth of his hero. Wherever pure pathos and expressive delivery were required Herr Wachtel was deficient; but in the quartet of the duel scene he gave out the famous concluding passage with remarkable power. True, he transposed it (as Mario always did) to a lower key; but enough remained to show off to advantage his admirable tenor qualities. In the duet with the Queen he was anything rather than satisfactory. Indulgence, however, may reasonably be claimed for him on the plea that the lady who assumed that character seemed but imperfectly acquainted with the music. In the first scene duet with Valentine, Herr Wachtel had not the same excuse, seeing that here his associate was Mdlle. Tietjens. How that accomplished lady acts and sings the part of Meyerbeer's most interesting heroine our operagoing readers need not be informed. It was the first character in which she appeared among us—when, in 1858, Mr. Lumley still directed the fortunes of Her Majesty's Theatre; and it remains to this day one of her most forcible and finished assumptions. She was, perhaps, not on this occasion so completely mistress of her unwonted physical means as might have been wished; but there was the old enthusiasm; and that sufficed to impress all her hearers, and to win a loud summons before the curtain at the termination of the duet—ill-balanced as were the powers, vocal and dramatic, of the two performers. In the other great duet—that with Marcel in the scene of the Pré aux Clercs—Mdlle. Tietjens was much more efficiently supported; for if Signor Bagagiolo, judged from the histrionic point of view, can hardly be compared with other impersonators of the rugged old Puritan whose names will instantly recur to many of our readers, he has not only a voice both strong and rich, but possesses considerable facility as a singer. This he had already shown in the well-known air, "Piff paff," and now confirmed in the duet to which we refer—one of the masterpieces of the opera. The other parts were in every instance more or less well filled. M. Petit, despite his apparently unconquerable "tremolo," was a good St. Bris, and Signor Cotogni an excellent Nevers; while Madame Scalchi gave forth the air of Urbano, "Non paventar," especially the "No, no, no," composed expressly for Alboni, in artistic style and with adequate fluency. The choruses were, for the most part, very effectively rendered; although the halo that used once to surround the grand scene of the "Blessing of the swords" seems to have vanished. The orchestra might almost play the accompaniments to the Huguenots without book; and Signor Vianesi, the new conductor, again proved himself thoroughly fitted for the post. After this, another word about an opera so familiar and so many times discussed will hardly be expected.

To the Huguenots succeeded Rossini's magnificent Guillaume Tell, given with the traditional curtailments, and the finale to Act 4 omitted in a nobler Rossini's nor Sir Michael Costa's (as has so often been asserted), but the work of an obscure Florentine chef d'orchestre. The overture was encored; yet we cannot agree with Signor Vianesi's reading of the last movement, which he begins slower than customary, gradually increasing the speed until the climax. For this, having no authority from the composer, he may fairly be called to task. Moreover, as the passages near the end cannot be distinctly heard, so quick has the pace become, the new reading is just as ineffective as it is unwarranted. The introduction, too, one of the loveliest, freshest, and most tuneful pieces of music in existence, was taken so much too fast as to be robbed of half its grace; and the performance generally of Rossini's masterpiece was one of the least admirable we remember at Covent Garden. Herr Wachtel's Arnold is a series of anti-climaxes. Big, powerful, and "metallic" as is his voice, he does not possess the art to manage it. In the first duet (familiarly known as "Dove vai?") he gave out all his power, unmindful that the beautiful phrase, "Ah, Matilde, io t'amo," is a reflexion aside, not intended to be overheard by Tell, who wishes to make Arnold become a patriot, instead of a lover, and to abandon Mathilde for Switzerland. In the duet with Mathilde (Act 2) Herr Wachtel was far better; and in the last movement, "Il core che t'ama," where the impassioned love-phrase is sung by the two in unison, he exhibited genuine feeling. True, the voice of Mdlle. Vanzini (Mathilde) was at times almost inaudible by the side of his; but here, at all events, Herr Wachtel was both dramatically in earnest and dramatically correct. The great trio in Act 2, where Arnold is informed of his father's death, was marred by Herr Wachtel's exaggerated delivery of the passionate outburst, "Troncar suol di," &c., for which the high "C sharp" in the final movement (snatched at, at the best) made sorry amends. In the last scene, when, after much unnecessary exertion in the slow movement, "O muto asil," he came to "Coriam voliam" ("Suivez-moi") in which the "ut de poitrine" of Dupres, some 40 years ago, may be said to have sounded the death knell of Rossini's impressive and beautiful fourth act, Herr Wachtel was no longer master of his resources. Almost for the first time within our memory this famous air, with which, late as it came in the opera, Signor Tamberlik used to rouse the house to enthusiasm, passed off with scarcely a hand of recognition. It is a pity that the owner of such a voice as that of Herr Wachtel should be so little of a musician, and boast of so slender a modicum of judgment. A word or two may suffice for the other performers in Guillaume Tell. The character of the Swiss patriot is not perhaps suited to Signor Graziani, who, nevertheless, did his very best, and in the pathetic apostrophe to Jemmy, just before Tell, at the command of Gessler, is about to shoot the apple from off his son's head ("Resta immobile"—Act 3), exhibited rare feeling. The expression, however, would have been twofold had Signor Graziani refrained from accompanying his admonition by a variety of inappropriate gesticulation, confided it rather to the ear of Jemmy, as something intended for him exclusively—after the admirable example of Ronconi, whose Tell, although the music lay too low for his voice, was in a dramatic sense, the finest ever witnessed on the lyric stage. The imposing music of Walter is well suited to the sonorous tones of Signor Bagagiolo's bass, and Mdlle. Locatelli is a sprightly Jemmy; but Signor Fallar, as Melchthal, made us regret the absence of Polonini, and Mdlle. Vanzini was somewhat overweighted in Mathilde—as was especially demonstrated in the recitative and air, "Selva opaca" (Act 2). Mdlle. Scalchi, Signors Casaboni and Marino, were respectively competent in the subordinate characters of Eudige (Tell's wife), Leutoldo, and Rodolfo; Signor Della Rocca sang the beautiful air of the "Pescatore" tolerably well; and that long-tried favourite, Signor Tagliafico, was, as ever, the most picturesque and imposing of Gesslers. The general performance as we have hinted, was scarcely up to the Royal Italian Opera mark; nevertheless, the choruses in the gorgeous scene of the meeting of the Cantons were for the most part highly effective. The scenery remains as of old; and, familiar as it is, the picture of the Lake of the Four Cantons, seen from the valley in the mountains of Rutli, must always command admiration. The ballet music of Fidelio, as ever came from the ready and practised brush of Mr. W. Beverley. The grouping and action of the accessories, together with the general stage arrangements, under the superintendence of Mr. A. Harris, are as effective as of yore.

The opera on Saturday night was Fidelio, the conductor on the occasion was Signor Bevignani. That the system of employing two conductors is a mistaken one we stated as our opinion last year. We have nothing whatever to say in disfavour of Signor Bevignani; but the manner of directing the orchestra differs materially from that of Signor Vianesi. One may be right, the other wrong; both may be right, or both wrong; these are questions apart; but the orchestra must naturally lend its preference to one or to the other. To which side that preference is likely to be extended we should have slight hesitation in suggesting. The question lies deeper; it is not a question as to the comparative merits of two conductors, but a question as to the advisability or non-advisability of a system; and on this topic more than can be stated in a passing comment.

We have heard better performances of Fidelio than that of Saturday evening; but on the whole it may be commended as one of average excellence. The overture—the great Leonora, No. 3) was encored and repeated; and the impressive "Prisoners' chorus" was unusually well done. About the Leonora of Mdlle. Tietjens—the only Leonora at present on the boards—there is not a word to be said which has not been said over and over again. The musical public owes this gifted lady a debt of gratitude for having been the means of keeping the one opera of Beethoven on the stage. Without her its eloquent music would for years have been unheard. The Florestan of the evening was Dr. Gunz (some time ago engaged at Her Majesty's Theatre), who has all the German, and therefore the true traditions of the past, and who, in spite of a somewhat rebellious voice, sings with earnestness and intelligence. M. Petit, as Don Pizarro, is quite in his element, although the great air of the prison scene, with its overpowering orchestral accompaniment, somewhat over-taxes his means,

Digitized by Google

It was agreeable to find the three characters of Marcellina, Jacquino, and Rocco represented so generally well by artists to whom the great work of Beethoven must have been hitherto unfamiliar—perhaps, indeed, unknown. Signor Capponi, who played Rocco, and sang the music admirably well, and Signor Marino, the Spanish tenor, who was equally acceptable in that of Jacquino, have been for some time members of the Royal Italian Opera Company; but Mdlle. Madigan (in plain language Miss Madigan—an Englishwoman), who undertook the part of Marcellina, is new to our stage. This young lady, who, we understand, has lately studied at Milan under Professor Sangiovanni, has everything in her favour—a fresh and agreeable mezzo soprano voice, a prepossessing appearance, a natural ease upon the boards, and a vocal talent which may, without hesitation, be pronounced promising. She gave the one air of Marcellina (Act 1) unaffectedly and charmingly. The part of the State Minister, Don Fernando, who only appears in the last finale, was not sustained, as the programme gave out, by Signor Tagliafico, but by Signor Caravoglio. On the whole, the performance of Fidelio was enjoyable, and due honours were paid to the high merits of the Leonora.

On Tuesday Lucrezia Borgia was performed, with a new contralto, Mdlle. Cari, as Maffeo Orsini. The other three principal characters were sustained by Mdlle. Tietjens (Lucrezia), Signor Naudin (Gennaro—his first appearance for the season), Signor Graziani (Alfonso), and Signor Tagliafico (Gubetta). The new contralto was received with great favour, and encored in the "Brindisi." The rest was as usual. Mdlle. Tietjens was in fine voice. Signor Bevignani conducted.

On Thursday night Mdlle. Cari made her essay a new character—that of Maria in the Figlia del Reggimento. Further particulars in our next.

To-night, the Flauto Magico, with Mdlle. Sessi in the "Queen of Night"—a bold essay, to say the least.

PRÆTORIUS AND HIS *SYNTAGMA MUSICUM.

Michael Prætorius may be designated as one of the greatest and most celebrated writers on music and also the ablest composer of the 16th and 17th centuries. Through him Germany attained the reputation of a first-rate musical country. Born at Kreutzberg, in Thuringia, on the 15th of Feb., 1571, he died on the 15th of Feb., 1621 (his birthday), at Wolfenbuettel, 50 years of age. He was Chapelmaster to the Duke of Brunswick, and Court-composer, also appointed secretary of his privy council, and was Prior to the Cloister of the Order of Benedicts, at Ringelheim, near Goslar. The greatest work ever written on music, and which will remain for all ages as a remarkable monument in the history of music, and through which he already earned during his lifetime a far-famed name, is his Syntagma Musicum, which was published, in 1614 and 1618, in three volumes, 4to, at Wittenberg and Wolfenbuettel. The first vol. in Latin, and the second and third vols. in the German language. No writer on the art of music and its history can dispense with it, and as this extraordinary work and its contents are not generally known, a description of them may be acceptable to the student and amateur of music. The first vol. consists of two parts, of which the first is again divided into four chapters; and the second part into two principal chapters:—

First Part.—The first chapter contains at large all that is necessary with regard to Psalmody. The second chapter treats on Liturgy. The third chapter treats on the Christian Church, and of all known Church songs up to the author's time. The fourth chapter informs us of the Rites of the Levitical Divine Service by the Jews. The fifth chapter instructs us on the Ancient Secular Music, their celebrated Masters, and Writers on Music; their Harmony and Melody, the effect produced generally by Music, and the various modes in which use is made of this Art. The sixth chapter describes the Flutes, Cithara (Zither), Lyra, and other instruments of the Ancient Greeks, and all other known instruments up to the time of the author.

The second volume gives a complete analysis on Organography, and also contains a great number of drawings of various instruments. The third volume contains explanations on Italian, French, and English songs; of Musical Notation, Modes, Transposition; the Mathematical Measurement with regard to Musical Instruments; on Thoroughbass, the Art of Singing, and how to Arrange a Vocal and Instrumental Concert. This volume contains, also, a complete catalogue of his compositions, which are numerous. Twenty-five large collections have been published. With the exception of one they are all vocal—viz., Masses, Motets, Church-songs, Te Deums, for one up to twenty-four parts, therefore for six choruses. Some of his Chorales are still to be found in choral books. Rühnau, in his Choral book, gives some in their original purity—viz., Ich danke dir, o Gott; O aller hoechster Menschenhueter, and Ich denk' dir schon durch deinen Sohn.

There is a posthumous work by Prætorius, called, On the Revision of Organs. Gerber, in his New Encyclopædia of Musical Artists and Authors, gives also a complete catalogue of his works. In the Church of Wolfenbuettel, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, his portrait is hung up, with the following inscription:—

"Michael Prætorius consobli Ringelheimensis Prior, in aula Ducum Brunsv. et Lunob. cum Wolferbyti et Chori Musici Magister, quos et olim Capellarum Electoralium, Ducalium Director ac Sphores. Sacras Musicas Adornet, Decus Columen."

The Syntagma Musicum is becoming rather scarce, notwithstanding there are several editions of it; but those who know this extraordinary work and possess it will not readily part with it, considering it as a musical treasure. I should have wished to recommend to those who feel interested in the work, the Reading Room of the British Museum, but feel sorry to inform them, notwithstanding the million of books the Institution possesses, that this celebrated work, the Syntagma Musicum, is not to be found in the catalogue; a sign that the literature on music is undiversally represented, considering the general study of the musical art has become a "household word" in England.

March, 1870. DR. FERDINAND RAHLAS.

* Sketches of Composers and Musical Writers of the Earlier Centuries.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From an Occasional Correspondent.)

As I see nothing of your regular correspondent in this week's World, and promising that he might be absent or otherwise prevented from writing, I send you a few musical scraps which will perhaps interest some of your readers. First, let me tell you of the inauguration of a new organ, specially built for the private residence of an English nobleman, at the cost, I am told, of "eighty thousand francs." Alexandre Guilmant, who was the organist on this occasion, gained the hearty applause of the audience which crowded the fine hall of "Cavaille-Coll," the builder of this superb workmanship. I enclose you the programme of the séance as it was styled, but I must particularly mention "Fantaisie en la mineur" (Lemmens), "Prelude, thème et Finale" (Guilmant), and a duo for pianoforte and organ, "Marche funèbre and chant seraphique," by the same composer. The pianoforte part was finely played by Mr. Widor, the newly appointed organist of St. Sulpice. Now, to something else. Have you ever attended one of Vieuxtemps' Friday Evenings? if not, do so on the next occasion you visit Paris; I am certain you will be heartily received by Mdlle. Vieuxtemps, who does the honneurs of these receptions with much grace and amiability. Besides meeting there a host of gens de lettres, artists of the best class, and last but not least, as you somewhere said, beautifully attired ladies of high position, you may listen to a string quartet by some of the standing great masters, in that way played I need not say, the host being the leader; or a sonata for violin and piano, in which Schulhof or some other pianist, always at hand, takes part; a song of Schubert or Mendelssohn, on the last occasion introduced by Herr Reichardt, &c., &c.

A great hit has been made by a young débutante, Mdlle. Priola, at the Opéra-Comique, as Zerlina, in Fra Diavolo. Her voice is a clear, high soprano, extremely flexible, and of a very agreeable quality. I predict that she will become a great favourite with the Salle Favart. As for concerts I will not trouble you with them, as they are legion; still, I must mention one or two. At the Salle Lhera, Mdlle. Nilsson gave her concert for a charity concert, which was crowded. About her singing your admirable pen has often bestowed such lines of well-merited praise, that I must abstain from referring upon it, but I must tell you what she did on this occasion, besides her superb rendering of four pieces set down on the programme. After the first part, l'enfant gaîte went round the audience to ask money for the poor, and with such grace did she her business, that the sum she gathered was a very considerable one I am told—something like 10,000 francs.

Notre ami Virier will have his concert on the 10th of next month, at the Salle Erard, for which, I heard, all tickets are gone—tant mieux! Then there are other concerts for which tickets are also gone a week before they take place, but in a different way; for instance, a gentleman addressed himself to Mr. G. "Monsieur," says the stranger, "I wish to give a concert." "Well," says G., "I am your man." Stranger: "Yes, but how much will it cost me?"—Answer: "250 francs." "In all?" says Stranger.—"In all," replies G.—"But I have no artists to assist me." "Je m'en charge," says G.—"And I don't know anyone here, and I wish very much to have a concert room?"—"Je m'en charge, encore," says G.—"What! artists, public, and only 250 francs?" says the astonished man; "here is the money, the titles of my pieces. At what time must I be in the concert room?"—"At 9 of G."—And off goes the newly-arrived artist, who is no more to be seen until 9 o'clock on the evening of his concert, when he finds a crowded room and receives salves of applause for his playing on a new instrument, the name of which escapes my memory just now.—Adieu, A bientôt.

Paris, March 20, 1870.

WARSAW.—Mad. Artôt-Padilla made her first appearance, this season, in M. Gounod's Faust. The house was crammed. The fair artist was to remain until the 15th inst.

Digitized by Google

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.

Bach's Passion (according to St. Matthew) was given in Exeter Hall on Wednesday week, by the directors of the Oratorio Concerts, in whose prospectus it held a position even more important than that of Beethoven's Second Mass. Much surprise has naturally been expressed at the neglect of this work by English concert-givers. There are, however, cogent reasons for such neglect apart from the question of merits or demerits. In the first place, the music was written at least a hundred and forty years ago (it was performed in 1729), and public taste has so far changed since then that scarcely a piece of contemporary work survives out of the libraries of the curious. Next, Handel has occupied much the same ground as Bach, under conditions more favourable to success. The Messiah was written for the concert-room, with a view to musical effect. This object was studied in the construction of the libretto, and in the treatment of the subjects as they arose. Hence, Handel being what he was, the amazing popularity of the "sacred oratorio." Whether, under like conditions, Bach could have produced a like result, is a question we are not to discuss here. The important fact is that Bach wrote for circumstances altogether different. We need not point out the distinction between a "Passion" and an oratorio. The musical reader knows well enough that the former was for the church, and not, like the latter, for the concert-hall. It was the original recital of the sufferings of Christ, aided, as an after-thought, by the effect of music. The conditions of a recital were, however, still enforced to a large extent. Hence the preponderance of recitative, and the absence of largely developed movements such as are found in the Messiah. Putting these two things together—the antiquated style of the music, and the rivalry of Handel's masterpiece—we are at no loss to account for the neglect into which Bach's Passion has fallen. Moreover, we have no hesitation in saying that this neglect is likely to continue. The prospect may be regrettable; but the reasons are intelligible. Having said this in explanation, let us do justice to the great old Leipsic Cantor. The design of the Matthew Passion shows Bach in the character of an original worker. Its conception may be credited to Solomon Deyling; but the musician elaborated, in his own way, the crude idea of the divine. None save Bach at that time (not even Handel, whose genius ripened later) would have thought of the gigantic machinery we here see employed—of the two orchestras and organs, with their respective choirs, and of the great chorus of the people ever and anon breaking the continuity of the story with the hymns of their church. The plan is Titanic, and only to be equalled by that of Israel in Egypt, or, to go far away for a parallel, one of Mayerbeer's operas. To write at just length about the happy manner in which Bach did his work would take up all our space. It must, however, be remarked that an adequate conception of the Passion can only exist where there is some knowledge of the composer's character. In the absence of such knowledge the mistake might be made of believing that Bach failed to do all that was possible with the grand situations of his story. No mistake of the kind can be made in view of actual facts. Bach's was an eminently religious nature, and he approached the Passion with as much reverence as he would have drawn near to the person of Jesus. He saw but a single duty before him, and that was not to exhibit his own genius, nor to use a sacred narrative as a means of musical display, but to employ art as an incentive to religious emotion and an enforcer of religious lessons. Hence the stern repression of self which we cannot but feel the composer to have exerted when dealing with the sacred story, and which enabled him to give such natural and unaffected expression to its various parts. The incidental choruses forcibly illustrate this. They might have been made, as music, much more effective than they are, but their length—

"is limited" (we quote Mr. G. A. Macfarren) "by dramatic propriety, and never exceeds what may well be supposed to be the duration of the embodied action; and where the words are reiterated in such extension, it is for the sake of increasing the vitality of the scene rather than for that of completing the musical idea."

Here we have the reason why only three choruses can lay claim to elaboration, and why those are extra-biblical, standing apart, from the current of the narrative. We dare not enter upon a criticism of the Passion music in detail. It would carry us beyond all reasonable limit; and even then leave much to be said. Let it suffice if we direct attention to the expressive melodies with which the work abounds—melodies as natural as they are expressive, and therefore standing almost alone in regard to contemporary productions. Nothing shows the genius of Bach more clearly than the character of his themes. A hundred illustrations might be taken from the Passion alone, which go to prove that the old master was as far ahead of his time in melodic invention as in contrapuntal device.

"It is not a quality," says Forkel, "but rather a consequence of its qualities, that Bach's melody never grows old. It remains 'ever fair and young,' like Nature, from which it is derived. Everything that Bach mixed in his earlier works, conformably to the prevailing taste of his time, is now antiquated; but where, as in his later works, he has developed his melodies from the internal source of the art itself, without any regard to the dictates of fashion, all is as fresh and new as if it had been produced but yesterday."

This is said with a biographer's partiality for his hero, allowing for which, nothing remains but truth.

The performance of the Passion was, generally, very good; all the more, therefore, was its mutilation regrettable. Mr. Barnby "cut" largely, and with an impartial hand. He took away from the chorales, from the reflective airs, and from the Scriptural narrative; not seldom excising that which could ill be spared. He was moved to do so, no doubt by a conviction of necessity; none the less, however, was it uncomplimentary to assume that the audience attracted by such a work could not sit it out from beginning to end. Apart from this drawback, every thing was satisfactory. The choir had been well trained, and sang, with equal confidence and precision, music requiring both qualities in no ordinary degree. An encore followed the mighty chorus, "Have lightnings and thunders;" a like compliment being fairly earned by the delivery of the beautiful and touching finale, "In tears of grief." The chorales were particularly well given, and not less well received. Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas did justice to their respective parts—a special word of praise being deserved by the gentlemen for a careful and efficient delivery of the sounding recitatives; and Mr. Barnby helped largely to success by his watchful conducting, as he had previously done in a still greater degree by zealous superintendence of long and earnest preparation. The Passion is announced for performance during each successive season. It may be, therefore, Mr. Barnby will eventually increase the obligation under which he has laid his public by giving the music entire.

FROM MADRID.

A conversation which I held the other day with a party of English travellers on the Spanish frontier confirmed me in an opinion which I had long entertained—that our countrymen when they cross the Channel for the purpose of amusement run after every object indicated by the perennial Murray but entirely overlook the people. Though they know no more of architecture than your humble servant, and never have taken the trouble to enter Westminster Abbey, they consider themselves morally bound to see certain cathedrals at the hour most convenient to themselves, however their æsthetic proclivities may interfere with the feelings of the devout when they will jauntily between the worshipper and the object of veneration; and they will go miles out of their way to behold an alterpiece for the contemplation of which they would grudge a threepenny omnibus fare if it were exhibited at the South Kensington Museum. Their pleasure, indeed, seems rather of an arithmetical kind, based on a stern resolution to view the largest possible number of objects in the shortest possible time. I may be right or I may be wrong, but it is my conviction that to exhaust a great city thoroughly, to observe those habits of men that are totally different, from our own, is a process far more instructive than a feverish search after an infinity of things inanimate. I come to Spain to learn something about Spaniards, and I bear in mind the assertion of Schiller—that man is never in earnest except when he plays. Having no personal knowledge of any Spaniard, I will look at the people through their amusements.

On Friday, the 1st inst., I arrived at Madrid, and the first objects which met my view were a programme of a bull-fight that was to be held on the following Sunday, and an announcement that on that very evening, at the Teatro de los Variedades (Théâtre des Variétés), something would be performed entitled Los Siete Dolores de Maria—in English, The Seven Dolours of the Virgin Mary. Here, at any rate, was something out of the common. Was the performance to consist of a play or a moving picture? At half-past eight—the time when plays generally begin at Madrid—I betook myself to the Teatro de los Variedades, and on paying the price of admission found myself encumbered with a formidable collection of mysterious documents. On inquiry I learned that these entitled me to remain in the theatre for the entire evening, inasmuch as I was a magnificent person, who had paid my 8 reals (2 francs) for the best place, whereas the more economical patrons of the theological drama contented themselves with a portion of the performance. The "half-peice" familiar in London when I was a juvenile has long vanished: but in Madrid they have a "quarter price," with a tariff corresponding to the division; and at the end of every act a bookkeeper took away one of my documents as a voucher for value received. Was the performance to consist of a play or a moving picture? A play certainly decided. Without any preface, and in very violent efforts at sensation, the life of the Redeemer, from His presentation in the Temple to His descent from the Cross, was dramatically represented before a body of persons who evidently regarded the whole affair as a matter of course. We hear of a representation of the Passion that occurs once in three years in Southern Germany, and we read of the Coventry and Chester Mysteries; but in these we have cases of grand exceptional exhibitions. The remarkable peculiarity in the Madrid mystery is that there is nothing solemn about it. On a Friday in Lent a dramatized version of the New Testament is as much in place as a pantomime on Boxing-day in our capital; only, let me add, that whereas the pantomime creates an excitement, the sacred history is contemplated with the sort of respectful indifference that would signalize the revival of a standard comedy. The theatre is neither empty nor very full, and looks very much as the theatre in Tottenham Street looked before it was polished by Miss Marie Wilton into the Prince of Wales's, and animated with the genius of Mr. T. W. Robertson. Babies are brought by their mothers; the spectators generally are of a humble class, and if a gentleman wishes to make a remark to his neighbour he is not in the least deterred by the representation of the awful event on Calvary. How was this monstrous piece performed? The question cannot be answered till all English notions are violently thrust aside. In London such a performance would be a simple abomination; in Paris it would only be tolerated from a morbid love of wickedness; but in Madrid one feels that it accords with the sympathies of the multitude, and I may venture to affirm that the lawful subject is treated with great modesty and refinement. The resources of the theatre are evidently limited; there is no luxury in the way of decoration, but the manager has learned the use of the line-light, and I can scarcely conceive a more effective tableau than that which was presented to the spectators when the curtain rose for the fourth act and discovered the Redeemer crucified between the two thieves.

Digitized by Google

I do not suppose that the actors at this little Teatro de los Variedades are to be taken as specimens of histrionic art; but so far as I am able to judge, they play with good emphasis and discretion, articulating with exceeding distinctness. The Virgin, the Redeemer, the Magdalen, and Pontius Pilate are marked characters; and still more conspicuous is the penitent Thief, who in the early part of the story appears as the protector of the Holy Family during their sojourn in Egypt. I have left my Thilo and my Trechendorff at home; but, unless my memory greatly misguides me, this early appearance of the Thief in the sacred history is derived from one of the apocryphal Gospels; and I think I may say the same of the miraculous preservation of Mary and Joseph by the descent of a branch of a tree, which conceals them from their pursuers. The Protevangelium, the Book of Infancy, the Book of Mary, and other apocryphal works of this kind, had an enormous influence on the popular Christianity of the Middle Ages, and in Madrid the nineteenth century is still mediæval. The conventional manner of representing the three "Kings" or wise men, the ox and the ass at the Nativity, the assumption that Joseph is an old man (which, by the way, I do not find on the Spanish stage), are all derived from the apocryphal Gospels. N. D.

Madrid, April 2.

KOENIGSBERG.—"What is one man's meat is another man's poison" is rather a hackneyed saying, not to say vulgar, proverb, but it is very true for all that, and its truth has been strikingly exemplified, within the last week or two, by the worthy burghers of this celebrated old town. While the Viennese and Berliners receive Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg in anything but a flattering manner (the latter people have condemned it after a masterpiece that three performances in one week were necessary to satisfy their "Wagnerian cravings." To repeat the sentiment—only in a different form—with which the paragraph commenced—De gustibus non est, etc.

AN EPISODE OF "DIE MEISTERSINGER."—At the conclusion of the first act, on the night of the production of the above opera at Berlin, a well-known admirer of the Lucerne anchorite rushed wildly along one of the corridors towards the door of the theatre. "Where are you off to, in such a hurry?"—asked a friend whom he ran against, and nearly knocked down. "Oh! I'm off to the Telegraph Office, to inform the Moniteur what a colossal triumph he has achieved. What a misfortune that it will take me so long to write out the message that I shall lose a good bit of the splendid second act."—"How's that?" replied his friend. "Don't you always have your description of the first night's performance of one of Wagner's operas ready cut and dried beforehand?"

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

The final concert of the season took place on Monday night, and was given, as usual, for the benefit of the director, Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, on whose account, as much, we hope, as on account of the programme, a very large audience assembled. Quite apart, however, from the director and the special attractions of his closing performance, there would, we opine, have been a good attendance. The Monday Popular Concerts have created—and for twelve years have educated a special public—a public not sufficiently educated, perhaps, because too often "pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw," yet having taste enough to value the good things set before them, and to part from them with regret. This personal following of classical chamber music could, in any case, be depended upon for crowding the hall on the last night of the season.

Mr. Chappell's programme—one of unusual length—was evidently drawn up to please those who like variety. Hence it contained but two important works; the rest were short pieces of no particular consequence, though sufficiently interesting in their way. Giving precedence to the former, we must speak first of Mendelssohn's quintet in B flat, for strings, which, played only a week after a similar work by the same composer, enabled the audience to judge between his Op. 18 and Op. 87. We question if preference was given to the riper composition. That it is in all respects a more masterly thing, few will dispute; but Mendelssohn in his seventeenth year could, as the A major quintet shows, pour out a stream of fresh and delicious melody which more than atoned for want of ripeness in other respects. Every movement of the work played on Monday night was received with marked favour, but adagio especially; but the audience did not have upon each phrase as when the youthful Mendelssohn spoke. We need not say how the quintet was played by artists such as MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Piatti. The second of the important features to which we have referred—Bach's triple concerto in C major for three pianos, with quintet accompaniment of strings—will be remembered as having been played at Mr. Chappell's benefit two years ago. The work is attractive more as a curiosity than as anything else. Its great ingenuity and skill must be apparent to all, but it conveys no ideas whatever beyond. It begins, we know not why, and ends, we know not wherefore, the beginning and the end being connected by a series of utterances which, though they fall pleasantly on the ear, express nothing. Nevertheless the concerto has a right to be heard. It is a great thing in its way, and a worthy representative of a style of composition which has gone out of vogue for ever. The three pianists were Madame Schumann, Mr. Charles Hallé, and Herr Pauer, and the quintet was led by Herr Straus. First among the comparative trifles came a chorale with variations for organ, by Henry Smart. Of its merits we could not judge, through no fault of the organist, Master Charles Le Jeune. An obstinate pedal pipe persisted in booming from beginning to end, and the performance was distressing. Mr. Pauer, however, gave the youthful performer another chance, and the pedal pipe was discreetly silent through a capital rendering of "O! ruddier than the cherry." Mr. Charles Hallé played three movements from Scarlatti's Harpsichord Lessons in his usual style; and was followed by Signor Piatti, who gave Mendelssohn's romance in D (posthumous). Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor (Op. 31) was played by Madame Schumann in a manner more than vigorous for music of such small calibre. Herr Joachim began the second part with the recitative and adagio from Spohr's concerto in G minor. How the great violinist acquitted himself may be imagined; as may the rendering of Beethoven's variations on "See the conquering hero comes," by Signor Piatti and Herr Pauer. Miss Vezalli was Miss Edith Wynne, who sang, in her own charming way, Cherubini's "Ave Maria" (clarionet obbligato, Mr. Lazarus), Benedict's "Maiden's dream," and Sullivan's "Orpheus with his lute."

PRAGUE.—An interesting concert was given lately by the pupils of the Conservatory, who performed, among other works, the Suite in C minor by Herr Franz Lachner, General Musical Director, who himself conducted.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Eduard Marxte, Professor in the Rhenish School of Music, Cologne, has completed a two-act lyrical opera, Lisa, oder die Sprache des Herzens, which will shortly be produced at the Grand-Ducal Theatre here.

LEIGNITZ.—A grand Musical Festival will be held here on the 2nd and 3rd June, when Mendelssohn's Elijah; J. S. Bach's second Suite; Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day;" and the "Adventlied," by Schumann, will be among the works performed.

COLOGNE.—The members of the Männergesangverein lately gave a performance of Kreutzer's Nachtlager in Granada, at the Thalia Theatre. It was a great success, the choruses, of course, being given with a degree of correctness and power not always met with when the singers are "professionals."

Digitized by Google

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The 132nd anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain took place last Saturday at the Freemasons' Tavern. The chair was taken by his Royal Highness Prince Christian, K.G., who was supported by the Earl of Dudley, president of the Royal Academy of Music; Sir Thomas Gladstone, Bart.; Theodore Martin, Esq.; T. T. Bernard, Esq., director of the Royal Academy of Music; Mr. Sergeant Sargood; J. C. Stevenson, Esq., M.P.; Prof. W. S. Bennett; Sir Henry Thompson; Dr. Sellé; A. S. Sullivan, Esq.; G. F. Anderson, Esq., hon. treasurer; W. G. Cusins, Esq., master of the music to her Majesty; C. S. Grunesen, Esq.; A. T. Willy, Esq.; Henry Lazarus, Esq.; Charles Coote, Esq.; H. C. Lunn, Esq.; Henry Kirkman, Esq.; G. W. Martin, Esq.; J. Coward, Esq.; Sig. Ferrari; J. H. Jewson, Esq.; Lamborn Cock, Esq., and 150 other Esquires. On the removal of the cloth the usual loyal toasts were duly honoured, and, in response to "The Army, Navy, and Volunteers," Sir John Pakington referred, amid loud cheers, to the part he had taken in connection with the threatened Festival of the Three Choirs. The right honourable laronet said that it gave him much pleasure to announce that opposition to that Festival had ceased, an announcement, which we need hardly observe, elicited renewed applause. In proposing the toast of the evening,—"Prosperity to the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain"—Prince Christian made an earnest appeal on behalf of this charity, which ought to have had, and doubtless did have, an effect on the subscription list read at a later period. From the balance-sheet we gather that the receipts for the year amounted to £3,490 15s. 7d., and the expenditure to £2,847 2s. 1d., the difference having been invested in stock. The society is, therefore, in a flourishing condition. The musical arrangements (always an important feature at this festival) were ably superintended by Mr. James Coward, who was assisted by the Mesdames Blanche Reeves, Jewel, Ferrari, Severn, Messrs. Byron, Patey, De Kontski, Svendsen, Lazarus, &c. A number of ladies were in the gallery—the floor being as yet forbidden to them. Why musicians should deny to the fair sex privileges accorded by actors, we know not.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Handel's Solomon was performed in Exeter Hall, on Friday, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, who gave it with Sir Michael Costa's recently added accompaniments. We shall not accept this latest challenge to a discussion of the propriety of "additional accompaniments," nothing itself has been submitted to, more or less quietly, from Mozart's time down to the present, and the fact is that Handel unadapted is now Handel unpresentable. We have only, then, in dealing with the impropriety of the old master, to set upon it a mere of respect they show him. With regard to Solomon, Sir Michael Costa is thus far blameless. Throughout he is unobtrusive, and in many of the airs, notably in "See the rich palm," his vivid touches published by beauty as well as good taste. The oratorio was largely denuded of wearisome recitatives and airs; yet much was retained that could well have been spared—the business of the "judgment," for example, wherein music of the least value is allied to utterly worthless verses. It cannot be necessary to say either that the grand choruses were all splendidly given, or that they made ample atonement for shortcomings elsewhere. "May no rash intruder" was encored, and each of the series preceding and following that masterpiece of art gave the utmost satisfaction. The solos were delivered with more or less efficiency by Mesdames Wynne, Vinta, and Patey; Messrs. Rigby and Lewis Thomas. Sir Michael Costa conducted, as he only can conduct large masses of performers, vocal and instrumental.

MUNICH.—Herr Nachbaur has had the Gold Medal for Art and Science conferred on him by the Grand Duke of Hesse.

MANNHEIM.—Herr Hirlich's opera, König Georg, is announced for production very shortly.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The programme for the next Italian operatic season has just been issued. The following artists are announced:—A. Patti, Volpini, Maria Sass, Barcelloni, Cataldi and Barbara Marchisio, Perelli, and Dal-Aresse; Calzolari, Mongini, A. and J. Corsi, and Rossi; Graziani, Steller, and Everardi; Bagagiolo, Capponi, Zucchini, Fortuna, and Boccolini; conductor, Sig. Vianesi.

MOSCOW.—Great activity reigns at present in musical circles here, and hardly a day passes without a good concert being given. The programme of the last concert of the Russian Musical Society comprised: Fragments from the symphony, Romeo et Juliette, Berlioz; choruses from Israel in Egypt, Handel; the Thirty-Second Psalm, Marcello; Pianoforte-Concerto in G minor, Moscheles; Russian songs, Dargomyschky; and the "Jubel-Ouverture," C. M. von Weber. The last concert of the Society this season was announced for the 2nd inst., when among the pieces to be performed were R. Schumann's Paradies und die Peri, and Herr R. Wagner's Walkyrenritt.

PROVINCIAL.

STROUD.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The Messiah was given by the New Choral Society (March 24th), before a large audience. The vocalists were Mesdames Lancia and Laura Baxter; Messrs. Alfred Bayley and Brandon. There was a competent band and chorus. Mr. Edward Bond conducted."

TEWKESBURY.—In Berrows' Worcester Journal we read that:—

"The last of the Choral Society's concerts was given at the Music Hall on Monday evening, April 4th, and was numerously attended. The performances consisted of a selection of sacred music from the works of Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn. The band, under the leadership of Herr Hauptmann, consisted of Messrs. Diaper, Watson, Mather, Yarnall, Matty, Sekell, Fowler, Hyett, Allcock, and Rushing; and the principal vocalists were Mrs. Corson (Gloucester) and Mrs. F. G. Houne, the Misses Rice, Chandler, Watson, Marsh, and White, and Messrs. Home, Newman, Creese, and Mayall; numbering with the chorus about 70 performers. The proceeds of the concert were for the benefit of the conductor, Mr. Hounsilow, who deserved the compliment for the care and attention he has bestowed on the society since its formation."

SALISBURY.—We read as follows in the Salisbury Journal of April 9th:—

"On Tuesday evening the Sarum Choral Society gave its first subscription concert for the present year, when Handel's Messiah was performed. The choruses showed that there had been a good deal of careful preparation. Among the solo vocalists was Mdlle. Vinta, who possesses those three great requisites for a singer—a beautiful voice, well-studied delivery, and an agreeable presence. Miss Severn, who sang the contralto music, was heard at her best in 'He was despised,' Mr. Hunt, of the Chapel Royal, Windsor, sang the tenor songs. Mr. Hilton, who sang the bass solos, has lately joined the Cathedral Choir. Altogether, Mr. Read, the new conductor, may be congratulated upon this his second concert. The general arrangements were carried out by Mr. T. E. Darkin, hon. secretary of the society."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

On Thursday week Mr. Henry Leslie gave a concert of sacred music in St. James's Hall, with Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Poole, and Mr. George Perren as chief vocalists. The programme consisted mostly of old favourites, such as Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," and "Hear my prayer," Mozart's "Ave Verum," Schubert's 23rd Psalm, and Wesley's "In Exitu." We have so often had to use terms of highest praise with regard to the manner in which these works are presented by Mr. Leslie that another expression of opinion is needless. Enough that everything was as well done as usual; said, as much as usual, enjoyed by a large and enthusiastic audience.

On Thursday week Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave an evening concert in the Hanover Square Rooms, to a "full house." The programme was drawn up with Monday Popular model, and began with Mendelssohn's sonata in B flat for piano and violoncello. This favourite work was admirably played by Miss Zimmermann and Signor Piatti, who, it need hardly be said, obtained much applause. With these two artists were associated Mr. Henry Holmes in Beethoven's trio for piano and strings (Op. 97). The concert-giver played, as her solo, Schubert's popular sonata in A minor, and took part with Madame Schumann in Schumann's Andante and variations for two pianos. After both efforts she was recalled. Mr. Henry Holmes played Bach's Fuga Allegra in G minor with capital effect. The vocalist was Mr. Cummings, who sang Mozart's "Costanza," and two of Miss Zimmermann's songs, in his own excellent way. An attempt was made to encore "Love, I may not tarry here."

On Friday week Herr Coenen gave the second of his chamber concerts of modern music in the Hanover Square Rooms, assisted by Herr Reinecke, M. Wiener, Herr F. Ries, Signor Zerbini, and M. Daubert, with Miss Julia Elton, as vocalist. The following was the programme:—Sonata, No. 2 (Op. 121), Schumann—Messrs. Coenen and Wiener. Songs: "Comunia" (Magnus), A. Thomas; "O cruidiella," F. Ricci—Miss Julia Elton. Quartet, in B flat, (Op. 22), Franz Ries—Messrs. Franz Ries, Wiener, Zerbini, and Daubert. Songs: "The Weaver," K. L. Wardy; "O fair dove, O fond dove," Smith—Miss Julia Elton. Quintet, in A (Op. 83), Carl Reinecke—Messrs. Coenen, Wiener, Franz Ries, Zerbini, and Daubert.

THE death is announced, at Berlin, of Herr Œsten, a pianist and composer for the piano of some note.

MAYENCE.—L'Africaine has been most successfully produced at the Stadttheater.

THE success of Lohengrin at Brussels naturally elated Herr Wagner, and he has addressed what Le Ménestrel calls a "proclamation," to Herr Hans Richter, beginning in a fashion which reminds us of a Napoleonic "order of the day after victory"—(See "Occasional Notes.")

Digitized by Google

Dialogue de Mr. Dimitri d'Olbac, fils du Roy Florestans de Mesopotamie et de la Belle Gueuse, fille de Bandolin, Empereur de Cocagne. Usopin, by Jean Jacques, dit le Petit Organiste. A perfect copy of this extremely rare Romance to be had for FIVE GUINEAS.
Enquire of DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

DEATH.

On April 7th, after a very short illness, ELIZABETH ASBURY FREDERICA SCHMIDT, the youngest and dearly beloved daughter of W. H. HOLMES, Esq., of Beaumont Square.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1870.

THE LAST OF LORD DUDLEY.

PROBABLY many of our readers would have been glad to see this heading before, and will now give it a hearty welcome. The probability has all along been present with us, but there was no chance of acting upon it. Lord Dudley, with his 10,000 sovereigns, his dislike to oratorios in church, and his reverence for holy stones, may together make up a tiresome subject; but the existence of our oldest musical Festival was at stake, and we were bound to concern ourselves with matters in the abstract neither interesting nor important.

Happily, the whole business has now ended, if we may believe what Sir John Pakington is reported to have said at the dinner of the Royal Society of Musicians. That staunch defender of the Festivals—who ought for the future to quarter his arms with those of St. Cecilia—had gone down to Worcester on the previous day, and presented a memorial to the Dean and Chapter, the result of which was his ability to state that the Festivals were out of danger. Assuming the speech of the right hon. baronet to be correctly reported, we may now sing pæans, and organize a triumph wherein Sir John shall wear the laurel, and drag Lord Dudley at his chariot wheels. Poor Lord Dudley!—we cannot but feel something like pity for him. It is not his fault that he is a rich man; nor is it unnatural that he should trust in riches, seeing how English society grovels in the dust before the Calf of Gold. He got hold of a whim, and, with the instinct of wealth, laid hands upon his cheque-book as the sure and speedy means of indulging it. But there is nothing sure in this unstable world, and Lord Dudley's cheque-book failed for once. We can dimly fancy the wealthy earl's perplexity, and can picture him dashing those miserable failures, the 10,000 sovereigns, into a corner, or sending them to Mr. Lowe on behalf of the National Debt.

When next Lord Dudley reads Robinson Crusoe he will be ready to sympathize with the contempt of the lonely castaway for the "shining dust," which could do less for him than a rusty nail. But such tribulation burns the dross out of a man, and Lord Dudley may emerge from it purified and exalted. We can imagine him still glowing with zeal for the Lord's house, and no longer fighting with carnal weapons, but—like another Peter the Hermit—preaching, in every town and village of the Midland Counties, a moral-force crusade on behalf of the Holy places.

One other matter, and we have done. Lord Dudley has hinted at the law, as a deterrent against the Festivals, and has published a very illogical and absurd "opinion" purporting to come from Sir R. Phillimore. We have already dealt with this so-called "opinion;" but, to complete the case, we must now reprint a letter, addressed to the Worcester Journal, by Sir John Pakington. The worthy baronet writes as follows:—

"SIR,—Lord Dudley's recent letters oblige me again to request you to allow me some space in your columns; but I wish, in the first place, to endeavour to correct the erroneous impressions which may have been made on some persons by Sir R. Phillimore's opinion as to the legality of holding a musical Festival in the Cathedral.

"It may appear presumptuous in a civilian to dispute the judgment of so able an ecclesiastical lawyer as Sir R. Phillimore, but it seems to me impossible to read that opinion without feeling that it was a somewhat hasty decision, and not very carefully written.

"I venture to submit that not only is it opposed to long established usage, sanctioned by successive Deans and Chapters, and by successive Bishops, for a century and a half—not only is it, in fact, limited to proving what no one, so far as I am aware, has ever called in question—but I think I can show that in attempting more, it is inconsistent both with various recognized customs in the affairs of our national Church, and with existing, clear, recently enacted law.

"The opinion, when stripped of the usual circumlocution, seems to me to amount only to this:—

"1. That no services other than those contained in the Prayer-book, together with sermon, &c., can lawfully be performed in any consecrated church.

"2. That it would not be lawful for the Dean and Chapter to exclude any one in the diocese from attending Divine service in the Cathedral, nor to demand payment of money as a condition of entering the Cathedral for that purpose.

"Now, Sir, I repeat that I never heard of anyone who would dispute either of these two propositions.

"I will not seriously refer to Sir R. Phillimore's suggestion—I presume only offered in the absence of better arguments—that neither Samson Agonistes nor Hannah More's David ought to be acted in a consecrated church.

"I proceed to the fact that Sir R. Phillimore does not bring a shadow of an authority to prove that a church may not legally be used for other purposes than Divine service.

"It is notorious, on the contrary, that the Chancellor, a lay officer, holds his court in the Cathedral, and in other churches, as well as visitations for swearing-in church-wardens, and at other times that the Practors for Convocation are elected in churches, and that vestry meetings may legally be held in the church of any parish where the population is less than 2000.

"But I wish more especially to refer to the Act 13 and 14 Vic., ch. 57, passed in 1850, and which must, I presume, have escaped Sir R. Phillimore's recollection. It is entitled 'An Act to prevent the holding of vestry or other meetings in churches,' &c., &c. And in the second section it is enacted that no meeting 'for the purpose of holding a vestry, or for any other purpose than that of Divine worship, or some ecclesiastical or charitable object, or some other purpose approved by the Bishop of the Diocese, shall be holden in any parish church or chapel, or other consecrated church or chapel, nor in the chancel thereof,' &c.

"It may, perhaps, be said that this Act was passed with reference to crowded vestry meetings in populous parishes; but I submit that it cannot reasonably be denied that the reservations, so carefully guarded in the second section, must be held to govern and define the law with respect to what may or may not be done in all consecrated buildings.

"Indeed, one is tempted almost to believe that Parliament, in passing this Act, must have had regard to our Musical Festivals, and must have desired to declare their perfect legality!"

Surely no comment is needed on the above. The baronet has encountered the lawyer as well as the lord, and overthrown each on his own ground. We congratulate him, and, with him, all lovers of the Festival, who now know that on their side is not only the religion that "visits the fatherless and widows in their affliction," but also the law which, to so many, is a sanction higher still.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A REMARKABLE gentleman with a disposition to write upon musical matters (about which he is generally in a muddle) sometimes helps to make up the ha'porth of news called The Echo. He contributed an article last Monday, headed "English Music and Musicians," which may be accounted his chef d'œuvre. We defy him, even in his most inspired moments, to beat the following:—"M. Thalberg is a pianist who, although for many reasons inferior to Madame S. Dolby in oratorio, in his own line has never been surpassed."

Digitized by Google

School-boys are sometimes puzzled when asked what would be the product of multiplying seven oxen by ten sheep; but the Echo writer has suggested a greater difficulty. What must be the mental condition of a man who compares M. Thalberg with Madame Sainton-Dolby!!

' "After an intermission of 1,890 years, Laugmie has lately re-opened the Pompeii Theatre with The Child of the Regiment. He solicits the continuance of the patronage bestowed upon his predecessor, Marcus Quintus Martius, and promises to equal the efforts of that eminent manager." We are not informed whether M. Laugmi heads his bills, VESUVIO VOLANTE.

THE managers of the Paris theatres are about to form themselves into a defence society. The deed has been drawn up, and several adhesions have been given in. The association will have three objects:—Firstly, to assist managers temporarily in want of funds; secondly, to resist the claims of the Dramatic Authors' Society, "when tempted to abuse its power;" thirdly, to control the pretensions of certain stars, "in the habit of absorbing the greater part of the receipts." (Hear! hear!)

A GERMAN version, of Racine's Athalie, with Mendelssohn's music, has been performed at the Royal Operahouse, Munich, with wonderful success. It was produced by the express order of the King, who was present at the performance. Herr R. Wagner had better look to this. If his Bavarian Majesty hears much of Mendelssohn's compositions, his taste for the Music of the Future may become vitiated.

PARIS is suffering just now from a horde of epidemics. There is an epidemic of small-pox, another of bronchitis, and another of fever No. 1, and another of fever No. 2; there is, also, an epidemic of commissions, not less than twenty of which are in full blast. The twentieth is bent upon taking to pieces the present Conservatoire Impérial de Musique, and restoring it with alterations and improvements. Twenty-eight men compose the band in question; and among the twenty-eight men are Auber, Thomas, Perrin, David, Gounod, Gevaert, Gautier, Comettant, Jonvin, Poniatowski, and About. Something great ought to come from the united generative power of such men.

WRITING in La France Musicale, M. G. Bénédit gives a wonderful description of Herr Rubinstein at the piano. He says that Herr Rubinstein seats himself at the piano without pretension, without eccentric movements, and like an ordinary mortal. (We suppose, then, he was expected to stand on his head, or make a Catherine wheel of himself.) He begins to play delicately, says M. Bénédit, but soon a black spot shows itself on the horizon of the key-board; it augments, grows, expands, and finally becomes a storm, roaring, whistling, and growling; the piano, meanwhile, being "transformed into an instrument which has no name in musical language,"—that is to say, it is no longer a piano. How if it were remarked of Herr Joachim that, in his hands, the fiddle is no longer a fiddle; or that in the hands of Signor Piatti the violoncello is no longer a violoncello? Imagine the shout of laughter certain to follow the sapient observation. Yet we do not laugh at M. Bénédit. Can it be that he spoke the truth?

IMMEDIATELY after the first performance of Lohengrin at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, in Brussels, Herr Richard Wagner wrote as follows to his pupil, Herr Richter, who conducted on the occasion:—"My dear Friend—Once more have you held aloft our banner. At Munich, when Rheingold was produced, you did so by courageously refusing to conduct an imperfect performance; at present you have done so, by guiding safely into port my Lohengrin's skiff, past reefs and difficulties of all sorts. On German soil not a voice was heard agreeing with your courageous behaviour; an incapable chief, and envious colleagues, impatient to obtain your place, lost no time in raising a cry of high treason, and an indolent public let them do as they chose. May the triumph achieved in the French language compensate you for your sad experience of your native land. I thank you with all my heart; and beg you will, moreover, particularly thank M. Louis Brassic, whose zeal and intelligence so admirably seconded you. Yours most cordially, RICHARD WAGNER. Lucerne, 28th March, 1870."—Herenpon the Berlin Echo observes:—"Immediately after the first performance of Lohengrin, at Brussels, R. Wagner addressed to the conductor, Herr Richter, who officiated on the occasion, one of his usual bombastic letters of thanks; and the recipient appears not to have lost an instant in publishing the defiant and inflated document, in honour (!) of himself and of its writer. It is, perhaps, no longer any use saying, compassionately, to the great Richard and his partisans: 'Si taceuisses,' when everyone of their effusions surpasses the previous ones—in impudence. We should not, however, be astonished if, on the first opportunity, the people at Munich prove they recollect the gentle and grateful manner in which they especially are mentioned in the letter."

THE production of Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin at Brussels has established one fact that was not generally known, namely, that the capital of Belginm numbers fewer Jews, and is freer from Jewish influence than any other capital, except St. Petersburgh and Moscow, in Europe. We always thought that Brussels could boast of as fair a share of members of the Israelitish persuasion, or, perhaps, rather more, but we were wrong. The local press is almost unanimous in the favourable character of its criticisms on Lohengrin, and that would not be the case if the Jewish element predominated,—unless, indeed, Herr R. Wagner is not quite correct about all he says in his Judaism in Music. The idea however, of Herr R. Wagner's ever being mistaken is, of course, preposterous.

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD'S BENEFIT AT THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph," April 6.)

The concert on Monday night was for the benefit of Madame Arabella Goddard, whose long association with, and distinguished services to, Mr. Chappell's enterprise make any such compliments peculiarly fitting. Our great English pianist is noted for the zeal with which she brings forward unfamiliar compositions of merit. Few, however, know how much of this work she has done in connection with the Monday Popular Concerts. A very great majority of the pianoforte pieces marked "first time" in the long series of programmes had Madame Goddard for an executant; and this fact, to say nothing of unsurpassed ability, justifies her claim to the special consideration bestowed on this occasion. The large audience who gave Madame Goddard so hearty a welcome, not only honoured her, but themselves also, in no mean degree. Mendelssohn's quintet in A major (Op. 18), for strings, opened the concert—how gracefully, and with what effect we need not stop to describe. The lovely andante was heard with all the pleasure it is calculated to inspire; but the scherzo—an example of the fairy-like music which Mendelssohn invented—roused the audience to enthusiasm, and had to be repeated. The performance by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Piatti, was worthy the theme; we know no higher praise. With all the remaining works, songs of course excepted, Madame Goddard had to do. She first gave Schubert's beautiful Fantasirie-Sonate in G major (Op. 78), one of the compositions introduced by her at these concerts. Apart from the merits of the sonata—merits we have neither time nor space adequately to discuss—the choice was a wise one. It brought out all the strong points of Madame Goddard's playing. In the first movement every gradation of tone was exhibited, from the faintest whisper to the loudest thunder of which a Broadwood "concert grand" is capable, and that with an absence of effort very remarkable. The theme of the andante illustrated the almost vocal qualities of the piano when in the hands of an accomplished artist; and nothing could be more delicate than Madame Goddard's rendering of the trio; while the difficulties of the finale were mastered with an easy confidence which most astonished those who knew them best. The audience at once recognised this finished performance as such, and twice recalled the artist with acclamation. Among them there was, or, at all events, ought to have been, a feeling that, with Arabella Goddard at command, England need not doubt the result of any international struggle for the post of champion pianist. The second part of the concert began with Dr. Sterndale Bennett's chamber trio in A major for pianoforte and strings; which admirable work—another honour to English art—was given in consequence of its success a few weeks back. Once more the serenade made a great effect, and an attempt to encore it only met with defeat, because the ever-popular "Kreutzer" sonata of Beethoven came after. To hear the latter played for the thirtieth time at a Monday Popular Concert everybody stayed of course. Equally, of course, the executants being Madame Goddard and Herr Joachim, everybody was well rewarded for staying. We need not give any opinion about music which all amateurs know by heart. Its rendering was as near perfection as possible, and the audience responded, as only a deeply interested audience can, to every special effort on the part of each player. As was beforehand certain, the andante cantabile (theme, and variations) elicited the warmest tokens of approval; and the struggle for excellence—a drawn battle—between piano and violin, was watched with unflagging interest. With this performance ended a notable concert.

Digitized by Google

The vocalist was Mr. Cummings, who sang Gounod's "Medjé," and Dr. Sterndale Bennett's "Better Land," in admirable style. He was recalled after the English composer's charming song, and right well deserved the honour.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Queen, of the 9th inst., speaking of Madame Arabella Goddard's recent benefit at the Monday Popular Concerts, has the following:—

"The staunch supporters of classical chamber composition always assemble in extraordinary numbers when the annual benefit concert of Madame Arabella Goddard comes off in St. James's Hall. The inducements to attend are strong indeed. First, it is certain there will be a powerful programme, executed by ability of the first class; and secondly, there is the popularity of the pianist herself. The evening of the 4th formed no exception to previous gatherings. The hall was filled to overflow, and what was as curious as it was interesting, the master of eclecticism—literary, scientific, and musical—was as remarkable as the array of fashion, independently of those ardent admirers densely packed behind the pianoforte platform and the upper balcony, who have derived such intellectual instruction from the now European-famed Monday Popular Concerts. The accomplished bénéficiaire, although her playing was confined to three pieces only, had Herculean labour. It would cramp the fingers of many public players to have to disentangle the intricacies of Schubert's Fantasie-Sonate in G major, Op. 78. The work is called a 'fantaisie,' perhaps because it is fantastic enough. Its difficulties are prodigious, its complications ear-perplexing, if not developed with such singular skill as that of the lady. Composers who will write their leading themes in solid chords cannot expect that ordinary artists will be quite clear in their articulation; but to Madame Goddard the unravelling of the divers threads of intricate passages with which the sonata is interwoven, forms no difficulty. Fortunately, there is an andante (played to perfection), which falls on the ear like music on the waters—doubled more, of course, for there is a little plain sailing with Schubert. Madame Goddard had the courage to introduce this sonata in March, 1867, and its reception caused its repetition on the 4th; but Schumann's criticism—that no one is to meddle with the last movement or try to solve its problems, who has not an imagination of his own—will suffice to show that only an executant hors ligne need touch the sonata. In vivid contrast with Schubert's torrents and avalanches came a soothing serenade from Sterndale Bennett—all sunshine. This charming inspiration is embodied in a trio, in A major, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; and in the middle movement the violin is played pizzicato, to imitate the tinkling of the guitar, whilst the lover's voice in tender strains soars above on the pianoforte, the violoncello undercurrent sustaining the harmony. The 'Kreutzer' sonata (in A, Op. 47) came as a bonne bouche to wind up this remarkable concert. It could have no other place, for it would have killed every other composition in the programme. Never was this sublime sonata, the ne plus ultra of refined as well as intense expression, interpreted with more eloquence than by Madame Goddard and Joachim. It was vocal finish and delicacy emanating from the keyboards of the piano and violin. Amateurs in Germany and France, who will soon again have the opportunity of hearing Madame Goddard, and of marking the great progress in executive skill which has characterized her career, will recognize in her the now greatest of living pianists. With her marvellous manipulation and mechanism she combines a poetry of style which is unrivalled, and what she achieves in done with the steadiness and self-possession of a true artist. There is no exaggerated action, no swaying of the body, no uplifting of the eyes or spasmodic distortion of the features; but, like the leading masters who have presided at the pianoforte, she seeks to make the composer speak to the intellect and appeal to the heart."

In an article on the same event the Athenæum of the same date writes as subjoined:—

"The Popular Concert on Monday was given in the name of Madame Arabella Goddard, whose annual benefit is not the least interesting event of the musical year, because, either in programme or performance, there is always something noteworthy. On the present occasion Madame Goddard played first, Schubert's so-called Fantasie-Sonate in G major, one of the most beautiful, if not, as regards beauty, the absolute first of its composer's works for the piano. Imagination, taste, and no mean technical skill, are all conspicuous in it to a degree which alone would refute those, if any there be, who deny the master's genius. Madame Goddard's performance was exquisite in its true appreciation of each part, and in the mechanical completeness with which her idea of the composer's meaning was expressed. A hundred display of executive power, and of the ability to interpret a great work (qualities by no means co-existent of necessity), has rarely been made. The audience saw this, and twice recalled the artist. Madame Goddard also joined MM. Joachim and Piatti in Dr. Bennett's chamber trio, about which we had to speak a short time back, and once more played, with the first-named gentleman, Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' sonata. The latter performance was as perfect as performance could be. Each artist being thoroughly familiar with the music, and equal to anything on the instrument in hand, each, however, being stimulated by the excellence of the other, a unique result was assured. About the work itself there is nothing to be said that has not been said a thousand times. Yet not after the thousandth hearing can its beauties lose their freshness. Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' will literally realize Keats's 'joy for ever.'"

The Sunday Times says:—

"Madame Goddard did not, as usual, come with a novelty in her hands. She may well be excused for once, seeing how long and zealously (and at what sacrifice) she has laboured in the cause of an extended musical knowledge. Madame Goddard's reception was very hearty, and so if in response, she played her very best. Rarely has the accomplished lady asserted more convincingly her claim to the highest honours an artist can receive. From first to last, her performance was one of unique excellence. Schubert's sonata, which is among the loveliest of his creations, had a rendering worthy of its loveliness. Madame Goddard's execution was faultless, even in the difficult finale; and her reading of the work was equally good. Justly, therefore, did the audience twice recall the artist, in order to express the pleasure received. Dr. Bennett's charming trio, about which we spoke a short time back, once again had entire justice done it. The worthily-associated players must have satisfied even the composer, who was present on this occasion. An attempt was made to encore the serenade; but the majority of the audience were anxious to hear their favourite Kreutzer sonata, and it failed. The sonata just named was given in connection with three concerts for the thirtieth time, and every bar of it being known, it was listened to with not less intelligence than intentness. A finer performance we cannot imagine. It was stimulated by the other, Madame Goddard and Herr Joachim played as they play only when in the most exalted mood. No wonder, therefore, that the entire audience remained to the end. They could not choose but hear such music so rendered."

The opinion of the Pall Mall Gazette is thus stated:—

"Madame Arabella Goddard's benefit last Monday signalled the proximate close of the Monday Popular Concerts. The occasion is always interesting, even though it come after a long course of attractive things. To say nothing about the prominent part naturally taken by Madame Goddard, her scheme makes more than an ordinary promise of good things. As a rule, novelty holds a place therein; and novelty was expected last Monday by all who remembered what the artist has done to enlarge the musical knowledge of the public. For once, however, Madame Goddard held her hand, and played only what the audience had learned to know and love. By adopting this course she made the gratification of her hearers none the less; while it may have been that she made the immediate honour to herself all the more. Mendelssohn's quintet in A major (Op. 18) began the concert, and was thoroughly well played by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Piatti. It is needless to say that its great beauty charmed everybody, even those who waited most impatiently for the heroine of the evening. The scherzo (a 'jest' which begins as a fugue, and is not a burlesque) was encored in harmony with many precedents. Madame Goddard first played Schubert's Fantasie-Sonate, in G major (Op. 78). She originally introduced this work at the Monday Concerts, and its repetition, besides delighting the audience, reminded them of what they owed the performer. Popularity has quickly attended Schubert's beautiful inspiration; a result at which nobody wonders so long as music, fresh, tuneful, and imaginative in the highest degree, has power to charm. Madame Goddard played superbly from first to last. The least merit that could be claimed for her rendering of the sonata was perfect mechanism; beyond and above this were grace and truth of expression, and the power, denied to so many, of grasping the whole idea of the work while seeming to concentrate every faculty upon its details. A more remarkable display of artistic and executive ability has rarely been made, and the double recall which followed did the performer no more than justice. The next work was Dr. Sterndale Bennett's chamber trio, repeated by desire of some who heard it a few weeks ago. We spoke of it then, and extended remarks now would be unnecessary repetition. The beautiful serenade very nearly obtained another encore; therefore it just missed another deserved compliment. Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' sonata followed, and for the thirtieth time a Monday Popular audience honoured themselves as well as it by profoundest attention. Madame Goddard and Herr Joachim have so often been associated in the performance of this great work that they have come to be associated with the work itself. Assuredly no two artists could do it greater justice. Each is equal to the music, and therefore each is equal to the other—a most essential feature, as those will grant who know anything about the sonata in question. The vocalist was Mr. W. H. Cummings, who sang Gounod's 'Chanson Arabe' and Dr. Bennett's 'Better Land' with perfect taste. The offertory this excellent tenor is heard at the Monday Popular Concerts the better."

Digitized by Google

In an article upon the recent performance of Dr. Bennett's symphony at the Crystal Palace, the Musician (in its April number) has the following:—

"Although credit cannot be given to the directors of the Crystal Palace for displaying much readiness in the production of English music, their good service in that direction last month, when Dr. Bennett's noble symphony in G minor was performed, must not go unacknowledged. This work has been known to the Philharmonic audiences for the past six years, and been duly appreciated in Germany, where our countryman's delicate genius is perhaps better understood, and more highly valued, than among us. Throughout this work the ideas have a fanciful, dainty individuality; the workmanship and development few living writers could approach; and the instrumentation, without being startling, is, at all times, piquant and refreshing. A distinct flavour is imparted to the first movement by the large use of dotted notes; at times prominently pervading the whole mechanism of a subject, at other times cunningly placed as an undercurrent below a broad stream of cantabile melody. Much ingenious development and skilfully balanced modulation is to be found in the latter part of this movement. Of characteristic grace is the subject of the minuet, in which the oboe is prominently employed, and in which many charming contrasts between the strings, reeds, and horns appear. The rhythm, although measured, is, through the clever dovetailing of the sentences, delicately marked throughout. A rather go-ahead proceeding for one understood to be pledged, as Dr. Bennett is, to liberal-conservatism in instrumentation, is the trio, set entirely for trumpets, horns, and trombones. * * * Dr. Bennett's use of the last-named instruments is confined to the first movement (chiefly in short pregnant piano phrases after the modern manner) and to the trio. The return to the minuet is neatly managed by a phrase of repeated notes for the four horns emerging upon the original dominant. To the violas is assigned the motive of the third movement, a romanza, larghetto, cantabile;—a luscious tune, admirably adapted to the subdued passionate genius of this branch of the string department. A charming tone of obbligato is imparted to the first part of this by the intermixture of duplets and triplets between solo and accompanying parts. Of noteworthy ingenuity and lightness is the conduct of the rondo finale, in the scherzo manner, a charming specimen of workmanship, conceived in just proportions, with happy, but not excessive, contrast in the material employed, and all the parts interwoven with the practised touch of a ripe scholar. While men can be found who can write like Professor Bennett, there is little fear of the principles of proportion and unity in art being lost sight of, to whatever length those adventurous spirits may go who would have us believe that art is the slave of emotion."

BACH'S "MATTHEW-PASSION."

The Daily Telegraph, in the course of a long article on this great work, says:—

"In a preface to the book of words, written by Mr. G. A. Macfarren, it was stated with desirable clearness that the Passion was not intended for concert-room display, but for purposes connected with religious worship. Those who know anything about even the elements of musical history are aware that Bach was neither the first nor the last to put music to set form the story of the sufferings of Christ. From the beginning of the Lutheran church, the resources of art were more or less employed upon the Passion, and in preparation for the Good Friday service every Lutheran choirmaster found the best field for taste and energy. Bach, therefore, was only one among many who made the difference between him and them being simply the ability to grasp a more elaborate design, and to fittingly work it out. The great master, however, had to consider the exigencies of a religious ceremonial in the midst of his developments; and this largely influenced what he did. Above all things, he was required to honour the sacred narrative. On its different salient points he might bang reflections; but not so as to hide, or even to take away from the prominence of, the Evangel. Hence the fulness with which St. Matthew's story is told; and, also, the absence of largely developed movements aiming rather at musical effect than religious edification. The words 'religious edification' are, in point of fact, a key to the whole composition. How strictly the master subordinated himself to this one idea few need to be told; and it is easy to imagine how sharp the struggle was between the promptings of Bach's musicianship on the one hand and the requirements of his church on the other. With what pleasure, when exalted by the great theme upon which he laboured, the consummate musician would have given the rein to his genius, and how great may have been the results of such a step, are speculations by no means vague; but we have reason to be content with the Passion, even though it can only be heard now in concert-rooms under strange conditions. It is, indeed, a wonderful work—most wonderful to those who are not only acquainted with its details, but with the music of the time when it was written. The largeness of its design, the beauty of its melodies, its alternate tenderness and gigantic power, and the reverential spirit which breathes in every bar, are qualities which lift the Passion of St. Matthew to the highest rank of inspired works. We could fill a column with illustrations; but, leaving the reader to supply those himself, we go on to point out a feature of more interest than any other—the dramatic force which the music so frequently exhibits. This is apparent in the opening chorus, where the mournful invitation of the Soonites is answered by the interjections of those to whom it is addressed. The short choruses of the Jews, and those numbers in which the Christians, as though unable to restrain themselves at sight of what is being done, give abrupt expressions to their feelings, belong also to a high order of dramatic composition. It is worthy of note here that much of this dramatic writing is contrapuntal—another illustration of the elasticity of true music, and, moreover, interesting as showing the influence of scholasticism at the time when Bach wrote. Years after, Handel made the Jews taunt their victim through a regularly worked-out fugue; and it may be questioned whether music has gained by departure from this fashion to which we owe 'He trusted in God.' One other feature of remarkable excellence could not well be overlooked in ever so brief a notice. We refer to the recitatives, which embody for the most part, the Gospel narrative. These are models for all time, both as regards adaptedness to the words and declamatory force. Nothing shows more conclusively the thoughtful care with which Bach worked. He might have slighted his recitatives (as sometimes did his great contemporary, Handel) without serious results; but, so far from this, it is evident that he gave to them no ordinary labour."

CARLOTTI PATTI.

The Richmond (Virginia) Daily State Journal of the 22nd March has the following:—

"Ta say that we were charmed last night by the singing of Patti is but poorly to translate by language the transports of the soul. Enchantment were the better word, and yet we are ashamed of its poverty. Rarely has an audience been so enraptured and enthused. The very first trill of her sweet voice, sent an electric thrill through the house, and held it in delicious surprise. We never heard singing before, and never wish to hear again anything that shall fall below the standard Patti has set up for us. We shall be prepared to be disgusted with all who come after, and shall break all the idols of song we have worshipped in the past. The cavatina from Linda di Chamounix was sung with indescribable sweetness and unequalled grace and elegance in movement and execution. Her voice filled the whole house with harmony and melody, and was as flexible as a mocking bird's. We have no idea of committing a sacrilege and shall, therefore, not attempt anything like a technical criticism or analysis of her genius. Her execution was too entirely faultless and grand for cold or calculating art rules, and we shall not play the surgeon and in song froid cut a thing of beauty to pieces. She was encored twice, and returned to bow her acknowledgments. In the second part, her 'Carnival of Venice' (Benedict), was one of the rarest musical gems that we ever heard, coming as it did through the lips of one of the rarest queens of song. She was encored here also, and sang a very pretty song, altogether French, in which there was a good deal of musical laughter that was contagious. The closing duet, from L'Elisir d'Amore, in which she was assisted by the rich voice of Nims Theodore Ritter, was magnificently sung, and playfully acted. This ended the concert, and the house fairly shook with applause when the curtain dropped."

HERR JOACHIM goes to St. Petersburgh in January for six weeks. Joseph Joachim, Alfredo Pitti, and Arabella Goddard have been the mainstays of Mr. Arthur Chappell's admirable entertainments from the beginning. Whether they will next year appear as tria juncta in uno is at least doubtful.

MR. BENEDICT has been in Paris, to assist at the rehearsal of his St. Cecilia, in which Mdlle. Christine Nilsson is to take part, on the 30th instant. He returned to London for the last Monday Popular Concert.

Times for Music.

To be Belgian Ambassador
Contenteth Van der Weyer;
But Ambassador of all Nations,
Is Monsieur Van der Wire.

Punch.

Digitized by Google

RICHARD WAGNER'S MEISTERSINGER VON NÜRNBERG.*

A Historical Explanation.

(Concluded from page 230.)

II.

It is clear from the observations in Chapter I. that the efforts of the Meistersinger were directed to entirely material objects, and that their highest aim was pedantically correct rhyme. The reader will, therefore, not be astonished when he is informed that their productions were, poetically considered, beneath mediocrity, and that they, namely, the Mastersingers, wrote nothing of any importance, either as to form, which they treated far too slavishly, or as to purport, since this was a matter of perfect indifference to them. Art, therefore, suffered from these fraternities, though it still exercised that moral influence which no one who has anything to do with it can escape. Even at the present day, governments might learn from the example of the Mastersingers, what an ethical power they allow to lie fallow by not encouraging art among the people. It is to those associations of simple burghers and mechanics that we principally owe that religious and moral spirit which then distinguished the inhabitants of the cities from the rude and licentious nobility. Every Masteringer was bound by the Tabulatur to lead a pious, moral life, and be strictly upright in his conduct, and it is natural that the more the fraternity increased in public estimation, the greater would be the influence which its members would, by their pure life, exert upon their fellow-citizens. These associations, exercised, also, a most beneficial effect upon the intellectual culture of cities; the practice of art, however mechanical that practice, could not fail to elevate mentally the simple workman, to sharpen his understanding, and, above all, to render him susceptible of the higher social sentiments. It was most assuredly not by mere chance that those cities in which Mastersong flourished were those which particularly espoused the cause of the Reformation, especially in Southern Germany, all of which, with the exception of such places, remained strictly Roman Catholic.

In consequence of the great spread of Mastersong, and of its peculiar development, the number of those who busied themselves with the "holdselige Kunst" (the "graceful art") was, of course, legion, and an innumerable quantity of songs emanated from the Mastersingers. Only a very few, however, were printed, and the others probably never will be, for in no respect are they much worth notice. For this reason, we are, as a rule, intimately acquainted with only a few Mastersingers, and even those few became celebrated more on account of their other poems than of their Mastersongs. Such are Heinrich von Müglein, Suchensinn, Muscatblüt, the "Teichner," Mich. Behetim, Hans Rosenplüt, and Hans Folz, all of whom, however, practised art as a source of profit, a fact which never happened subsequently. The leading man among them all, and, consequently, the pride of the entire fraternity, always was and always will be Hans Sachs.

If we bear in mind what the Minnegesänge, or Songs of the Minnesingers were—with the fancy they displayed, and the fantastic element, which was the abortive product of that fancy—we find that a great difference between them and the singsong effusions of the Masteringers was the sober sense of the latter, a quality which found its way even into the courtly art of the period. That art could not escape the influence of the middle classes, who were growing stronger and stronger, thanks to their eminently practical spirit, so that isolated attempts to restore in all its purity the Minnegesang of chivalry necessarily failed to exert any permanent effect. In both cases, true poetic life is found only in the genuine folk's-song, which, springing from the inmost recesses of the soul, cannot fail, even though defectively executed, to re-act upon the soul, and that is the aim of all art.

III.

Such is the historical period, such are the circumstances and state of things that Wagner has turned to account in his libretto. One gratifying fact connected with the latter is that the Hotspur-like poet-composer totally ignores the reforms formally proclaimed by himself as necessary, namely, that every work of dramatic art must take its subject from the Myth. He has obtained his personages and the framework of his plot neither from the waters nor from the clouds: no, his ride into the country of old romance takes him directly into Nuremberg, which still exists bodily, and he busies himself with factors which have, more or less, nothing to do with legends, but belong to downright history. Some persons, it is true, have asserted that the story unfolded in the Meistersinger is nothing more than an allegory which Wagner holds up, under the figure of the knight, Walther (himself) and of the "brünstig-umworbene" Eva (German music) to his natural antagonists the artists of the old style (Beckmesser, and the Masters-singer) and the public, satirising undiscriedly the Present which does not appreciate him; this sarcasm, it is added, constitutes the real comicality and deep humour of the opera. But, in the interest of the work itself, we place no importance on this supposition, which, by regarding the opera as a mere allegory would degrade it to the lowest level of dramatic writing, since the drama should contain what is real and genuine, and not simply make-believe. We take, rather, what is offered, and, just like the great mass of the public, regard it all as honest money (and so it ought to be). Looking at it in this light, we find the snobbish, little-minded notions of a provincial town in the Middle Ages formed into a highly diverting picture, well adapted to the purposes of a genuine comic opera. But the materials are of themselves far too trivial to fill three acts with humorous scenes in quick succession. The progress of the story is continually brought to a standstill, and then set going again by means of rambling didactic effusions and philosophical outbursts. In order to keep up the comic element, we have no less than two characters, David and Beckmesser, the latter being a perfect caricature, utterly out of drawing, both as regards the writing and the music; now a caricature is fitted only for a farce. But the fact is: Wagner is totally deficient in true, genuine humour. Like his Italian counterpart, Verdi, he can only do things in a sledge-hammer way; light grace and delicate ease are denied both, and this is the reason why they are always noisy and ponderous when they wish to be piquant and elegant.

* From the Berlin Echo.

Taken all in all, Wagner with his far-fetched style, based particularly on character, sharpness of dramatic expression, and the overpowering importance of the orchestra, was the last man in the world capable of giving us, even musically, a diverting picture of petty provincial sayings and doings; for such is his object, and the name Meistersinger is simply a far-fetched means for carrying it out. This "Art-work of the Future," this model that he would set before us, has a decided defect: it is not comic opera which has as good a right to exist, so to speak, as serious opera. The same means and forms will by no means do for both styles, and we may frankly assert that Wagner's Meistersinger will not by Boieldieu, Auber, Donizetti, or Lortzing, from the comic operatic stage; no, not even Lortzing, who was compassionately laughed at by grand gentlemen, and sneeringly called a "small-beer ballad-singer" but who, in his Waffenschmied, has given us a picture which, though outwardly resembling Wagner's Meistersinger, is more graceful, more hearty, more natural, and, above all things, genuinely comic. A humorous creation of art, like a humorous man, works, not with subtle notions, far-fetched jokes, and strangely distorted faces, but, by unsophisticated humour, natural drollness, and ready wit. Anyone who goes to enjoy Wagner's Meistersinger must previously make up his mind not to expect these qualities.

L.

ABOUT OLD MATTERS.

The "Beggars' Opera."

According to Pope, Dean Swift suggested to the poet Gay that a Newgate pastoral would prove an odd, quirky thing. The poet was taken with the idea, but thought he could make it more effective by converting it into a musical comedy. Hence the Beggars' Opera. Dr. Pepusch, Doctor of Music, was engaged to provide the music, and, in so doing, he for the most part adopted the popular ballad airs of the period. We thus find a mixture of quadrilles, Scotch songs, English ditties, and airs, to which latter Thomas Moore wrote verse. At the first representation, on the 25th January, 1728, its success was dubious. There was a strong disposition shown to damn it, but after a time its morals was undoubted. Like other successful pieces, it was difficult to get a theatrical manager to produce it. At last Rich, lessee of Covent Garden, took it up, and was repaid in fame and fortune. Its success led to the well-known saying that "the Beggars' Opera has made Rich gay, and Gay rich." The original Polly—Miss Fenton, afterwards Duchess of Bolton—commenced at fifteen shillings per week, which pittance, on account of her success, was raised to thirty shillings. At first, the Beggars' Opera created much discussion with regard to its moral tendencies. Swift approved of it, and said, "It placed all kinds of vice in the strongest and most odious light." But the immediate effect was to increase the number of highwaymen—this on the authority of Sir John Fielding, the celebrated police magistrate.

The Enraged Musician.

Composer. Did you stay late at Lady Tittup's?

Friend. Yes. Heard Miss Bang play again. I was delighted with her execution.

Composer. Her execution! That would have pleased me; she deserved it for having brutally murdered a piece of mine. [Exeunt.

Punch.

Digitized by Google

SAINT CECILIA.*

St. Cecilia's Day, as it is called, in the month of November, is celebrated, when practicable, in Roman Catholic cities, by select sacred musical performances, because it is thought that this Saint merits more than any other, to be glorified by the professors of the particular art which she herself cultivated and which she caused to be held in honour. Yet it would be a difficult task to show what positive service has procured her this distinction. Tradition has sometimes sprung from a single fact, or else emanated accidentally; but, when there were several distinct facts involved, some one common point was necessary to bind the whole together.

It was not till the fifteenth century St. Cecilia was called the Patroness of Music. The Church had already long possessed a Saint of the same name, but there was nothing in her life relating either to the invention or the cultivation of music. We read in the legend that a Roman maiden, secretly devoted to the Christian religion, was affianced by her parents, who were very strict, to a heathen youth, but, filled with love for the Redeemer, she renounced all sensual love, and, after converting her Intended and his brother to the new doctrine, suffered martyrdom in the persecution of the Christians under the Prætor Almachius. The fundamental idea in this is the renunciation of sensuality, and the union of Love with Death. The year 230 is named as the year of the fair Saint's death; a church dedicated to her existed at Rome as early as 550. It is said to have been built by Pope Urban; to have been restored in 818, by Paschalis I., and to have been adorned with the Saint's tomb. Her body, which, according to report, was found in the catacombs, reposes there in a silver coffin under the altar; a marble statue, by Stefano Maderno, representing her who sleeps below, is placed by the side of the tomb. But neither the statue, nor the pictures in the church so much as hint that it is the patroness of music who is worshipped there. In order to find some reason for so doing, we have to depend entirely upon the legend. From this we learn that, during the celebration of her marriage with the youth, Valerianus, Cecilia, while the solemn music was being played ("cantantibus organis"), sang in her heart to her only lord "in corda sua soli Domino decantabat dicens: fiat cor meum, etc."). From this, Herder concluded that Cecilia had been raised to the dignity of being the patron-saint of music, because she had sung in her heart a song of faith. This supposition, which presupposes a wrong interpretation of the words, contains a very weak argument, namely that, during the solemn marriage music, the maiden prayed and sang, secretly in her heart, to the Lord. Wendt attempted to diminish the absurdity of the matter by a symbolical explanation. He supposed that this particular saint was made patroness of sacred music, because while listening to earthly strains, she bore in her heart harmony consecrated by God, and, though inaudible, glorified the Lord in her song. But the legend itself says nothing about music different in its nature to earthly music, and Cecilia's reputation was not based upon it.

But some persons have gone still further and named St. Cecilia as the inventress of the organ. This, again, arose from the misinterpretation, of the words, "organis cantantibus." Many a tradition has, probably, suffered sadly from misinterpretation, just that, because the name of the instrument (organ) heard at the scene of the marriage, any one should have been led to hit upon an organ played by the hand of St. Cecilia, is something incredibly absurd. Not even the boldest combination of facts would suffice to connect the invention of the organ with St. Cecilia. The organ had not been employed in the service of the Church, when the Emperor Michael sent an instrument of the kind, then used only in profane music, to Charlemagne, who, in order to find a place of safe keeping for it, had it put up in the church at Aix-la-Chapelle. Even in Italy, the use of the organ in religious duties only from quite the end of the 8th century. In his description of the organ at Breslau, page 26. Fischer is, therefore, perfectly right when he says; "Cecilia did not invent, play, or love the organ, for she never knew anything about it."

But, if we are compelled to give up, at once, the fair Saint of the Church as the patroness of music, and if we nowhere find any proof that the Church, marked by an act of canonisation the contrast between mundane and sacred music; and, if, moreover, we meet with no reference to any such patronage in early poetical writings, we may, perhaps, be allowed to make the suggestion that St. Cecilia owned her existence, musically speaking, to Painting, and is, consequently, a Saint casually conferred on Music, but who has, by age and custom, obtained a not low rank a right of citizenship in our art.

Having arrived at this result, we have, properly speaking, come to the end of our proof, and might leave a painter to carry out the induction further. We may, however, be allowed to offer a suggestion as to how the thing might be treated.

The Fine Arts, as permeated by one and the same breath; as based upon one and the same principle; and as having one and the same aim, marked by their very name, stand, even though not blended in an Art-Work of the Future, on a friendly footing with each other, and interchange the subjects to be treated, just as they unite to produce an effect in common. But, however nearly the sense of hearing is allied to that of seeing, and however much musical poutrayal of things may combine with their visibly mimetic poutrayal so as to produce a separate form of art, music does not of itself offer any materials suitable for the painter. Musical subjects lie beyond the limits of plastic art, and though the most celebrated and most skilful painters, such as Domenichino, Guido Reni, etc., chose subjects of this sort, the wonderfully excellent treatment did not compensate for the error of the selection. In paintings of concerts the spectator's ear does not hear the sound, and the pictures become purposeless,* say, in the case of unusual artists, painfully sad (as we write this), several modern paintings, some with, and some without, historical figures, and inscribed, "A Concert," float mentally before us). What method then was left Painting to glorify the sister art, except to create a Saint, listening, as an inspired seer, to the sounds of heavenly harmonies, or (by means of music) giving expressive utterance to her agitated mind Such a view of the subject was as different from that taken by Antiquity, as specifically Christian plastic art, generally, is from the plastic art of classic Paganism. In the one case, plastic art conveyed to us, in its representation of Orpheus, the power of music upon rude beings; in Christian times, when the subjective activity of the mind predominated, the only thing that could be represented was our inward life.

That Painting has been fortunate with this creation, so peculiarly her own, is a fact attested by pictures of St. Cecilia by celebrated masters in dozens, though in saying this, we by no means include the picture which has given its name to one of the rooms in the Berlin Singakademie. Is it, then, surprising that musicians willingly accepted the dainty little Saint thus prepared for them, and quietly bowed before the sceptre thus usurped; nay, that they even struck up inspired hymns, dithyrambics, and cantatas in praise of the said Saint, and attempted to keep her festival as splendidly as possible? These lines are, therefore, by no means intended to bring the gentle oratsure into discredit, or in any way diminish her power; they are simply an attempt to trace her descent, which has hitherto been taken upon trust, unchallenged.

* From the Berlin Echo.

GRUMBLING CURED—GRATIS.

Seeing that this disorder is so very prevalent among young and old in all ranks of society, and presuming that all who suffer from it surely wish to be cured; and believing still further that I can guarantee an immediate cure, even in the most desperate cases, I presume to offer the following remedy, and to set forth some of its advantages which I think give it a prominence over any other already known:—

It is very simple. It does not cost any thing. It is always at hand. Can be applied directly by the patient himself, or herself, as the case may be. If properly applied, it must effect a complete cure. Should the grumbling fit return at some future time, it can be again used with the same certainty of success. The remedy and its application are both expressed in one little word of four letters—Sing! Try it. It is not particular what you sing, provided always that it is right and good and in harmony with your character; nor does the manner signify, so long as it is done heartily, and it may be in the treble, alto, tenor, bass, or any other clef, according to individual preference. If the attack is mild, a few bars in common time, sung piano will usually suffice. If the symptoms are more decided and severe, from twenty to thirty bars, three-four time, forte, and lively, should be tried promptly, repeated after an interval of five minutes if necessary; and where the complaint, from long habit, has become confirmed and chronic, I should prescribe not less than thirty bars, two-four time, Allegretto and fortissimo, on the commencement of every attack. As the patients of this latter class sometimes have a great disinclination to solos, they may try duets, or even choruses, with many voices, when opportunity offers.

Under this course of treatment, if persevered in, the symptoms will, to a certainty, assume a much milder form; in a very short time a radical cure will be effected, and the once habitual grumbler become noted for his cheerfulness and urbanity.—American Paper.

WAIFS.

Madame Arabella Goddard will return to London from Boulogne-sur-Mer immediately.

Herr Joseph Joachim left London for Berlin yesterday.

The arrival of Signor Verdi in Paris is again announced.

Mdlle. Christine Nilsson is expected in London on the 1st of May.

The Cairo opera-season has closed, and the artists are back in Europe.

M. de Vroye, the eminent Belgian flautist, intends coming to London for the season.

The will of Mr. J. W. Walker, organ-builder, of London, has been proved under £25,000.

Mr. Jarrett, acting manager at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, has returned to London from Paris.

Signor Daffiori, an operatic artist, known some years ago in London, died recently, after a long illness.

* This circumstance has given rise to the experiment recently made of adding a musical accompaniment to pictures at public exhibitions, just as to tableaux vivants,

Digitized by Google

Madame Adelaide Ristori, the famous Italian actress, has retired from the profession.

Mdlle. Lewitzky, the young Russian (pupil of M. Wartel), who is about to sing at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, has arrived in London.

The last ten representations of Robert le Diable at the Grand Opéra are said to have brought in 124,827 francs.

By special decree, Herr Eckert, Chapel-master at the Court of Berlin, has been confirmed in his position for life.

A lady equestrian who turns somersaults backwards and forwards on horseback is to appear in England in May, and—in crinoline!

Mdlle. Nilsson will take her benefit at the Grand Opéra on the 30th inst. She gives the proceeds to the Association des Artistes Musiciens et Dramatiques.

Mdlle. Schnelder and the other members of M. Felix's French Opera bouffe troupe have been playing in Orphée aux Enfers at the Liverpool Amphitheatre.

Mr. Barry Sullivan has just completed a successful engagement at Bristol. On Easter-Monday he commences another of twelve nights, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin.

A grand composition, entitled Beethoven, by Abbé Liszt, is announced for performance at the approaching Beethoven fêtes in Weimar. (Let us hope this is a hoax.)

Herr Lienau, of Berlin, has just published a comprehensive biography of C. M. von Weber, with a catalogue of, and critical remarks upon his works. The author is Herr F. W. Jahns.

The Lyceum management seems to be sparing no pains to make Le Petit Faust as great a success in London as it was in Paris. Mr. Macdagan has been engaged to play the part of Faust.

A project for erecting in Paris a vast concert-hall has been started by M. Guy de Charnace, with the primary intention of devoting the building to the performance of choral works on a large scale.

George Dawe and Edward B. Wallace Bishop have been sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment for forging the trade-mark of Messrs. Collard & Collard, the well-known pianoforte manufacturers.

A commemorative concert in honour of the late Moscheles was given on the 20th ult. at the Leipsic Conservatory. Herr Reinecke played, besides other things, the deceased composer's Sonate Mélancolique.

Herr Joachim Raff has finished a new opera, Dame Kobold, which is to be produced at Weimar. Let us hope that Herr Raff is a better hand at operatic music than at music for the orchestra and the chamber.

M. De Beriot, the once famous violinist, better known to the last generation as the husband of Malibran, has recently died, at Louvain, in the 68th year of his age. For years past he had been blind and paralyzed, and lived habitually in Paris, but lately returned to his native town, Louvain, where he was attacked with his fatal illness.

The performances of Handel's Alexander's Feast, in Paris, by the Société Bourgault-Ducoudray, passed of well; but we cannot congratulate Dryden's translator, if this be a fair example of his skill :—

Ce roi si fier, hélas! succombe,
Sans un ami pour lui fermer les yeux.

The new operahouse at Dresden, of which Herr Semper is architect, will be, in some sort, a monument to Herr Wagner. Among other features which accord with Wagnerian principles is an invisible orchestra. The building, designed on an imposing scale, may be expected to cost more than the 400,000 thalers voted for its construction.

Another portion of the original site of the Strand Hotel Company, in Holywell Street and Wych Street, Strand, is being converted into a theatre, and will be completed in a few months. It adjoins the Globe Theatre; the back of the stage, in fact, abuts on that of the Globe. One entrance will be from the Strand by means of a subway under Holywell Street.

Herr Rubinstein has given the first of his Orchestral Concerts in the Salle Herz. In the programme was a new fantasia for piano and orchestra, characterized by, according to the Gazette Musicale, exaggerated dimensions and a variety of styles. Nevertheless, the Gazette calls it a "monumental composition" and "un chef-d'œuvre de sentiment et de facture." How this can be and also that, we should like the French critic to explain.

Our English cousins are about to allow Mdme. Arabella Goddard to leave them for a little while on a professional trip to the Continent. Is it not almost time this Queen of Pianists paid us a visit? We long to hear and see her fair and powerful fingers pinck the mysteries from the hearts of our American Grands, and we should, indeed, be well pleased to see her name added to the worthy list of the interpreters of that noble instrument who have already evoked its beauties, and done harmonious battle with its ivory keys.—New York Musical Bulletin.

We are able to satisfy the curiosity of our correspondent, Mr. Thomas Noon Gadd, by reproducing in extenso the article to which he refers, but of which, he states, he has lost his copy :—

"The performance of 'English Opera' at Astley's Theatre affords an opportunity for seeing the amusements popular across the bridges. The entertainment may in witnessed without adventuring into the labyrnths of Southwark, and it is refreshing to watch the pleasure and excitement which the singing of a ballad affords to about two thousand persons. The audience sit drinking ginger-beer, eating oranges, and calling out for encores till a stranger begins to think that some will suffocate themselves. If a boy pulls his cork out in the middle of a song, there are clamours of 'throw him over.' The majority of ladies in the gallery sit with bare heads and arms, applaud as heartily as the gentlemen, and fight with them for places. The play, or opera, whatever the thing is called, is worth seeing; the actors and actresses walk on and sing a song without reference to any incident gone before or to come after. The good nature of Mr. * * * and Miss * * * is rewarded by vociferous cheering. Altogether, the exhibition is one of the most comic we have seen for some time."

The following sensible remarks, which appeared in the columns of a contemporary some time ago, support a theory to which we have long been wedded :—

"Why is the public unwilling to believe that a singer can be unwell? A singer with a fine voice is likely to have a delicate throat; and singers are susceptible to throat diseases, some of them suffering from every change in the atmosphere. The slightest hoarseness unfits a vocalist for the exercise of his profession. These remarks are suggested by a letter in the * * * * * *, in which a person calling himself 'A Lover of Music' complains of Mr. * * * * * having pleaded illness as an excuse for not singing at the dinner of the Newspaper Press Fund. That Mr. * * * was not too ill to sing on Saturday is proved, according to this writer, by his having sung on Monday at Buckingham Palace. Mr. * * * did not sing on Monday at the Court Concert. The Court Circular publishes his name, but the music set down for him was sung by Signor * * *. As the eyes of Mr. * * *, not his throat, are chiefly affected, 'A Lover of Music' would perhaps not consider this a valid excuse for declining to sing. However, the reason which prevented Mr. * * * from singing for the members of the Newspaper Press Association prevented him from singing for her Majesty."

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

WEEKES & Co.—"The Barden-Bearer," sacred song, by W. Wadsworth.
DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.—"The Weaver," song, by Kate Lucy Ward.

THE VOICE & SINGING
OF
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.
And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,
HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

ASTRINGENT LOZENGES OF THE RED GUM OF AUSTRALIA.—For Relaxed Throat, in Bottles, 2s. MURIATE OF AMMONIA LOZENGES, in Bottles, 2s. Useful for Bronchitis, by loosening the phlegm and preventing violent fits of coughing.
P. & P. W. SQUIRE, Chemists on the Establishment in Ordinary to the Queen Gazetted August 8th, 1837—December 31st, 1867), 277, Oxford Street, London.

Just Published,
"THE WEE PET."
MAZURKA, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
Composed by LOUISE WIESE.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY HERMANN EISOLDT.

"BRIDAL BELLS"

(MORCEAU DE SALON).

For the Pianoforte, by Hermann EISOLDT.

We read in the Dresden Journal:—"Hermann Eisoldt's 'Bridal Bells' was beautifully performed by the splendid Orchestra of Herr Music-Director Trenkler, and met with great applause. The piece being very melodious is sure to become popular." Published, price 4s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Just Published,

"MEMORY" (words by Simeon E. Newton) ... ... 3s.
"GEM OF MY HEART" (words by W. Bitchman, Esq., M.D.) ... ... 3s.
"COME BACK AGAIN, DARLING" (words by William Newton) ... ... 3s.

Composed by WILLIAM NEWTON.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

TWO SONGS BY MARIA HAYES.

No. 1. "I'M WEARY WAITING" ... ... 3s.
„ 2. "INVITATION" (Barcarolle).. ... ... 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"I LOOKED AMONG THE LILY-BELLS,"

BALLAD.

By JACQUES OFFENBACH.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Now ready,

"MEDEA,"

SCENA ED ARIA FOR SOPRANO.

Sung by Madame Rudersdorff at the Gewandhaus Concerts, Leipsic, and by Mdlle. Tietjens, at the Norwich Festival.

Composed by ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MASON & HAMLIN'S GOLD MEDAL CABINET ORGAN. ALWAYS IN TUNE, FOR ALL CLIMATES. Five Thousand Three Hundred and Four Full Reed Organs were Manufactured and Sold in 1869, being Seventeen each working day. Illustrated Books, one stamp.—DERAVIGNE & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

C. D. & H. W. SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGANS.—NEW STYLES.—Six Octave Nine Stop DRAWING-ROOM ORGANS. Ten Stop Chapel Organs, with Patent Knee Swell, Super-Octave Coupler, and Manual Sub-Bass. Always in Tune. Price lists, one stamp.—DERAVIGNE & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s.	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN HERFORD ...	3	0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations) ...	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	4	0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad) ... ... And the Answer to it.	FLORENCE PERCY ...	4	0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	4	0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS,
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

The Silver Trumpets

PLAYED AT

ST. PETER'S, ROME,

DURING THE

RECENT FESTIVALS.

For the Pianoforte . . 3s.
„ „ Duet . 4s.
For the Organ, with Pedal Obbligato . . . 3s.
For the Harmonium . . 3s.

LONDON:

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, NEW BOND STREET, W.

Digitized by Google

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Ilottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissement)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie).	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Le scapate. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Fesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rossajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

SYDNEY SMITH'S

FOUR

New Pieces.

ROBERT LE DIABLE.

Fantaisie Dramatique sur l'Opéra de Meyerbeer.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

BARCAROLLE.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

FAIRY REALMS.

Grand Brilliant Waltz.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.

Paraphrase.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

LONDON

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Printed by HENDERSON, RAIT, and FFOTER, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex, Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, April 16, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 17. SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1870. PRICE { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—MR. MANNS has the pleasure to announce his ANNUAL BENEFIT CONCERT will take place THIS AFTERNOON. Vocalists: Mdlle. Robsart and Signor Mongini (from the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, by kind permission of Mr. Wood—first appearance). Madame Florence Lancia, Mdlle. Augibi (her first appearance), Mr. Vernon Rigby, Signor Trio, Pianoforte, Madame Schumann. Symphony No. 7, in A, Beethoven; Overture, "Oberon" and "Impressario;" Ballet Airs, "Wedding of Comacho," Mendelssohn (first time); Prelude, Sonata No. 6, for violin, to be played by twenty-four violinists, J. S. Bach. Conductor, Mr. MANNS. Band increased to 100 performers.

Admission, Half-a-Crown. Guinea Season Tickets, free; Stalls, Half-a-Crown each, at the Palace, and 2, Exeter Hall. Early application absolutely necessary.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

TO-NIGHT (SATURDAY), April 23rd, will be performed MOZART'S opera, "IL FLAUTO MAGICO." Tamino, Signor Gardoni; Papageno, Mr. Santley; Sarastro, Signor Foli; Monostatos, Mr. Lyall; 1 Due Armati, Signor Rinaldini, Signor Trevero; Sacerdoti, Signor Arcnieri, Signor Castelli; L'Oratore, Signor Ragnoni; Tre Damigelli della Regina, Mdlle. Briani, Madame Corsi, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Tre Geni, Mdlle. Vitzu, Mdlle. Chiesi, Mdlle. Gardoni; Papagena, Madame Mcabelli; Pamina, Madame Sinico; and Astrifiammante, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska. Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

NEXT WEEK.

MONDAY NEXT, April 25th, Gounod's opera, "FAUST." Faust, Signor Gardoni; Mephistopheles, Signor Gassier; Valentine, Mr. Santley; Wagner, Signor Trevero; Marta, Madame Corsi; Siebel, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Marguerite, Mdlle. Robsart (her second appearance).

TUESDAY NEXT, April 26th, Verdi's opera, "RIGOLETTO." Il Duca, Signor Mongini; Rigoletto, Mr. Santley; Sparafucile, Signor Foli; Monterone, Signor Ragnoni; Marullo, Signor Zelioli; Borso, Signor Arnieri; Ceprano, Signor Trevero; La Contessa, Mdlle. Briani; Giovanna, Mdme. Corsi; Maddalena, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini; and Gilda, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.

THURSDAY NEXT, April 28th, Mozart's opera, "LE NOZZE DI FIGARO."

Acting Manager .. .. MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

"THE PRODIGAL'S RETURN," a New Oratorio, by the Rev. R. F. LAWTON, will be performed, for the FIRST TIME, in AID of the Funds of St. Andrew's Convalescent Hospital, Clewer, on TUESDAY, May 10th, 1870. Principal Vocalists—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Conductor—Mr. BARNBY. The Band and Chorus will number 300 performers. Sofa Stalls, £1 1s.; Balcony Stalls, £1 1s.; Reserved Balcony, 15s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d. Tickets at Mr. Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Messrs. Chappell, New Bond Street; Novello, Ewer, & Co., Berners Street; Duff & Stewart, 147, Oxford Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co., 48, Cheapside; Alfred Hays, 4, Royal Exchange Buildings; and Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Instituted 1822.—Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1830.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CHRISTIAN,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

President—THE EARL OF DUDLEY.
Principal—Professor W. STERNDALE BENNETT.

The Easter Term will commence on Monday the 25th inst., and terminate on Saturday the 23rd of July.

Candidates for Admission can be examined at the Institution on Thursdays, at Eleven o'clock.

By order, JOHN GILL, Secretary.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
4, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.—ST. JAMES'S HALL.—MENDELSSOHN'S "ELIJAH."—WEDNESDY NEXT, at Eight. Madame Rudersdorff, Madame F. Cole, Madame Patey, Miss M. Severn, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. J. T. Beale, Herr Carl Stepan. Band and chorus of 300 performers. Conductor, Mr. Barnby. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony and Area (numbered and reserved), 5s.; Admission 3s., 2s., and 1s., at Novello's, 1, Berners Street, and 35, Poultry, the principal Musicsellers, and Austin's, St. James's Hall.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERT, FRIDAY Next, April 29th, St. James's Hall. Songs and Part Songs. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Mdme. Sinico, Miss Stephens, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, Miss Helen d'Alton, Signor Mongini, Signor Bettini, Signor Castelli, Signor Foli, and Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir. Commencing at Eight o'clock. Sofa Stalls, 7s. 6d.; Area Stalls, 5s.; Balcony, 3s.; Area, 2s.; Admission, 1s. Tickets at Cramer & Co.'s, 201, Regent Street, and 43, Moorgate Street, City; all Music Publishers; and Austin's, 28, Piccadilly.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. Conductor, Mr. W. G. CUSINS. MONDAY Evening, April 25th, St. James's Hall. Symphonies (E flat), Schumann (No. 1 in A); Beethoven; Overture (Meisinee), Mendelssohn (Anacreon), Cherubini; Concerto in G, pianoforte, Mdme. Schumann. Vocalists, Mdme. Mcabelli, and Dr. Gunz, by permission of the Directors of the Royal Italian Opera. Stalls, 10s. 6d. and 7s.; tickets 5s. and 2s. 6d. Lamborn Cock and Co., No. 63, New Bond Street; principal libraries and musicsellers; and Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

MISS EDITH KINGSLEY'S FIRST GRAND EVENING CONCERT, under the Patronage of the Right Hon. The Earl and Countess of Malmesbury, will take place at St. George's Hall, WEDNESDAY, April 27th. Principal vocalists—Miss Blanche Cole, Mr. George Perren, Mr. Harley Vinning and Herr Lermes. Instrumentalists—Mr. John Oldshaw, Chevalier Rosovitz, Pianist to His Majesty the King of Portugal, Mr. Charles Malcolm. Conductors, Mr. Louis Emanuel and Mr. Alfred Reed, at the organ by Mr. Lidcock. After which the comedy of "THE HONEYMOON," under the direction of Miss Marie Somerville. Stalls, 5s.; Tickets, 3s., 2s. and 1s.; at Mr. Austin's, St. James's Hall, and at St. George's Hall.

SONGS OF SCOTLAND, HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.—Mr. KENNEDY, the Scottish Vocalist, will give his celebrated Entertainment on the SONGS OF SCOTLAND, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings next, at Eight o'clock, and a Special Morning Representation on Friday next, at 3 p.m., at Three o'clock. The final three Entertainments will be given on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, May 2nd, 4th, and 6th. Pianoforte—Miss Kennedy. Tickets, 5s. and 3s.; Numbered Stalls, 3s.; at all the Musicsellers, and at the Rooms.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD begs to announce that she will give a RECITAL of PIANOFORTE MUSIC, consisting of Selections from the works of CHOPIN and HENSELT, at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square, on Saturday Morning, May 28th, on which occasion she will have the assistance of some Celebrated Vocalists. Full particulars will be duly announced.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD will play "MADAME OURT'S WALTZ," composed by CHOPIN, at her Recital of Pianoforte Music.

INSTRUCTION IN SCIENCE AND ART FOR WOMEN.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S Lectures "ON THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF VOCAL MUSIC" (in continuation of the Course now being delivered), will be given in the Lecture Theatre, South Kensington Museum, on Tuesdays and Fridays, at 11 a.m., commencing on the 26th April. Tickets for the Course of Twelve Lectures, £1 1s.; with Practice, £1 11s. 6d. Single admissions, without Practice, 5s. 6d.

Persons who may wish to attend this Course of Lectures are requested to send their names to the Hon. and Rev. Francis Byng, Treasurer, South Kensington Museum.

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square (where Haydn made his first bow to an English audience).—Ladies and Gentlemen intending to engage these unique Rooms for Concerts, &c., are respectfully invited to make early application, in order to secure the best days. For terms, apply to Mr. Hall, at the Rooms. ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

MR. GEORGE PERREN will sing (by desire) ASCHER'S popular Romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" at Miss Matilda Slater's Evening Concert, May 6th.

Digitized by Google

WILLIAM HUTCHINS CALLCOTT'S

NEW HARMONIUM WORK.

SECULAR AND SACRED MELODIES

ARRANGED FOR THE

HARMONIUM OR CHAMBER ORGAN.

Containing Fifty Admired Subjects, by W. S. Bennett, Beethoven, Balfe, Bishop, Blumenthal, W. H. Callcott, Dr. Calcott, Dr. Crotch, Miss Davis, Himmel, Handel, Horsley, Hullah, Knight, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Schumann, Schubert, Shield, Verdi, Weber, English Melodies, Scotch Melodies, German Melodies, Irish Melodies, Russian Melodies.

"A dwelling-place
For all sweet sounds and harmonies."—WORDSWORTH.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63 and 63, New Bond Street.
Price 10s. 6d. Net.

PIANOFORTE TONING, TUNING, AND REGULATING.

A SITUATION in London wanted by a person of superior abilities, possessing a thorough knowledge of all the different movements in Pianofortes. Highest references from the First Houses.—Apply to Messrs. Henderson, Rait, and Fenton, General Printers, 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, W.

NEW SONG,

"TAKE THIS FORGET-ME-NOT,"

The Words by Miss E. CORNER.

The Music by ADOLPH GOLLMICK.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

MISS EDITH KINGSLEY and MR. GEORGE PERREN will sing CAMPANA'S celebrated Duet, "DIMMI CHE M'AMI," at St. George's Hall, Wednesday, April 27th.

SCHUBERT SOCIETY, BEETHOVEN ROOMS, 27, HARLEY STREET. President, Mr. Benedict; Director, Herr Schuberth. Fourth Season, 1870. Third Concert, TUESDAY, 26th April (Spohr night). Tickets 3s. each, at D. Davison & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street.

MISS AMY STRANGWAYS will sing NESFIELD'S new song, "WHERE I FAIN WOULD BE," at the Third Concert of the Schubert Society.

HERR CARL FORMES will sing his popular song, "IN SHELTERED VALE," at the Third Concert of the Schubert Society, on THURSDAY next.

MISS AMY STRANGWAYS will sing HENRY SMART'S popular song, "WAKE, MARY, WAKE," at Signorina Emily Tate's Concert, on TUESDAY, 26th May.

LA SIGNORINA EMILY TATE will play ASCHER'S popular romance, "ALICE," MENDELSSOHN'S ANDANTE CAPRICCIOSO, and MENDELSSOHN'S "RIVULET," at her concert, at St. George's Hall, May 3rd.

SIGNORINA EMILY TATE has the honour to announce that her THIRD ANNUAL GRAND CONCERT will take place under the Special Patronage of Sir Roderick Murchison, &c., at St. George's Hall, on TUESDAY, 3rd of May, 1870. Full particulars will be duly announced. No. 79, Cook's Road, Kennington Park.

MR. EDWARD MURRAY (Baritone), now engaged with the Drury Lane Italian Opera Company, respectfully requests that all communications may be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co. 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. EMILE BERGER.

MR. EMILE BERGER will return to London for the season on the 23rd May. All letters to be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., Foreign Music Warehouse, 244, Regent Street, W.

HERR CARL FORMES will sing his renowned song, "IN SHELTERED VALE," at St. George's Hall, April 27.

HERR CARL FORMES is now in Town for the season and can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios and Operatic Performances. Address—care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

N.B. "REVIVALS" will consist of Pieces hitherto only existing in Manuscript, or which have been long out of Print. Selected from the Works of Eminent Masters.

Played, for the First Time in London, on Monday last, at the LYCEUM THEATRE,

"LE PETIT FAUST,"

OPÉRA-BOUFFE,

BY

HERVÉ.

All the Vocal Music (with French words), as well as Quadrilles, Waltzes, Fantasias, &c., for the Pianoforte

(EDITIONS OF HEUGEL & CO., PARIS).

Can now be obtained of

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

MISS MATILDA BAXTER will perform ASCHER'S brilliant Fantasia, "ALICE," at her Concert, May 6th.

MISS AMY PERRY will perform ASCHER'S popular Fantasia, "ALICE," at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 14th.

MISS LILY SIMESTER and MR. GEORGE PERREN will sing NICOLAI'S admired duet, "ONE WORD," at the Manor Rooms, Hackney, May 10th.

MISS JULIA ELTON will sing Miss KATE WARD'S new song, "THE WEAVER," at St. James's Hall, April 23rd (This Day).

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S CONCERTS:—Bishop Stortford, May 6th; Miss Amy Perry's, Hanover Square Rooms, 14th; Store Street, June 6th, July 18th; Hanover Square, June 25th. Communications Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

REMOVAL.

MRS. RONEY (Miss Helen Hogarth) begs to announce her REMOVAL from Gloucester Crescent, to No. 6, Chalcot Terrace, Regent's Park Road, N. W.

MR. CHARLES STANTON (Tenor) may be engaged for Concerts, Operettas, and Oratorios. Address, 16, Duke Street, Portland Place, W.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

"Old Drury" has again opened its doors to Italian Opera. On Saturday night the undertaking of Mr. George Wood, with the details of which the musical public has been already for some time made acquainted, was "inaugurated" by a generally excellent performance of the best, if not the most popular work of perhaps the best, and unquestionably the most popular dramatic composer whose star has arisen within the last quarter of a century. But before saying what we have to say about the manner in which Rigoletto was given, a word or two about the preparations for the new enterprise may reasonably be expected.

Considering that barely a fortnight was allowed for the work, what has been done in the way of transformation of the interior is almost unexampled. First, as to the accommodation for the public:—there are four tiers of private boxes, besides a so-called "dress circle;" over the highest tier of boxes are "amphitheatre stalls," with galleries behind and above; the pit boxes, noted for their uncomfortableness in 1868, are now enlarged, and placed on a level with the Rotunda entrance, which, as well as the great staircases north and south, has been restored according to the original design—with corridors, moreover, on either side, inner and outer, a convenience hardly to be overestimated; lastly, the pit is entirely converted into stalls, each stall being a commodious arm-chair. The interior of the theatre has been entirely re-decorated; even the beautiful drop-scene of Mr. Telbin the elder has been cleaned to such good purpose that it looks as though it had been only painted yesterday. The decorations are in white and gold; amber-satin curtains—reminding opera-goers ripe in years of the incrustation with which that most famous of green-rooms, more-over

The other operas performed during the week have been the Barbiere di Siviglia, with Madame Monbelli—her first appearance on the London stage—as Rosina (Tuesday), and Faust, with Mdlle. Reboux as Marguerite—her first appearance in London since M. Gounod's Mirella was brought out at Her Majesty's Theatre (Thursday). Il Flauto Magico is to be given to-night. Next week we are promised, not only the Nozze di Figaro, but two works never before heard on the Italian stage—the Abou Hassan of Weber, and the Ora del Cairo of Mozart. Of the Barbiere and Faust we shall speak in our next number.

QUEEN EUPHROSYNE.

(From the "New York World," April 3.)

My dear Public.—Euphrosyne has given English opera a great deal o English vitality. It is more properly American opera, now that I think of the organization and success, but the distinction is not a music alone. Now that she is about to visit England for a short period the whole continent will miss her; for there is not a pleasant spot on it that she has not made more pleasant with her voice, and which does not cling to the hope that she will re-appear suddenly, full-throated, to remind men of all the sweet things they cannot comprehend. She has gathered laurels from all sources. Ballad has bowed to her, oratorio has owned her supreme, and opera, German, Italian, and English, has succumbed to her imperious sway. Here to-day and gone to-morrow, she has tied the distances together with melody. Space could not daunt her nor more than form. She sang her way over the American deserts and down the golden slope, and left her broad cadences ringing in every American city. No sooner had she taught a hundred New York songsters, half fledged, how to troll a ditty of Claribel's, in Steinway Hall, than we heard of her beforehanding the Milwaukee Philharmonic. The truth is, she was everything and anywhere, from "Five o'clock in the morning" till twelve o'clock at night, and then was always as fresh and radiant as an English squire's wife just mounting for a run with the dogs. Nobody ever saw artist so aided and abetted by nature. She wears the secret talisman which defies fatigue and reaction, in, not on, her breast. Consider the Boston Coliseum. There she defied the immensity of space as she had all along defied the limitations of time. Half Boston felt into the belief that the voice had been made for the house and the festival, like the organ and the drum. New York and the rest of the world found out that the house and the festival had been made for the voice, and would have been useless without it. They remembered Tripler Hall and Jenny Lind.

English opera only served to prove anew the sovereignty. Mozart, Weber, Verdi, were in the hollow of her hand. One hour's notice, and she'd sing you Beethoven for your Philharmonic, or Handel for your Harmonic, and go regularly on with her Desdemona and Amber for the rest of the world. It doesn't so much matter that she could not do so well in Susanna as in Rivian, and was not as good in some things as others had been. The point was that nobody else could have done them all without failing flatly in some. The best point of all is that some of them were perfectly successful. She sang in this sketch to paint the sunrises of the whole season; one burst is enough. Take "Ocean, thou mighty monster," which had helped to make Oberon and Weber understood before English opera glowed on them. It is not so difficult that other voices have not attempted it. But when did the old monster conceive such a regal summons? It was one element questioning another, and the notes had a prolonged clarion call in them as though flung out ever echoing billows. Well, yesterday was the last of her for the present. It seems as though somebody, so to speak, had put the shutters up over Fourteenth Street. An injudicious programme—which, by the way, is the chief curse of the Academy—had stated that Madame Parepa-Rosa would make her last appearance at the matinée. It rained torrents. But Irving Place was packed full of water-proofs. New Euphrosyne touched a moment at Pittsburg and Boston, and, mayhap, running down a day to Galveston to keep music alive there—goes to England. But she comes back. Let the musical men of America prepare for her return. If there be any Beethoven festivals to undertake, any coliseums to fill, any operas to bring out, any sacred music societies to be bolstered, let them appeal directly to headquarters, where music has allied itself to enterprise and shaken off the infirmities of human nature.

NYM CRINKLE.

AMSTERDAM.—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington sang, a short time since, a tone of the Concerts du Parc.

LEIPSIC.—The Municipal Council have decided on the abolition of the poor's-rate levied upon theatrical performances, concerts, etc., after the 1st October next. In order, however, to allow the Bureau de Bienfaisance, the Board of Guardians, as it may be termed, time to supply the place of the nine thousand francs, of which they have been thus deprived, the Council have voted them a sum of four thousand eight hundred francs out of the funds of the Corporation. This sum is supposed to be about what the Bureau would have received during the concluding three months of the present year, supposing the impost had not been abolished before the 1st of January, 1871.

OPERATIC WRITING AT THE PRESENT MOMENT IN RUSSIA.*

THE DEMON:

AN OPERA IN THREE ACTS, BY BORIS SCHERL, FOUNDED ON THE POEM OF THE SAME NAME, BY LERMONTOFF.

In Russia, and more especially in St. Petersburgh, there has sprung up, with modern liberal reforms, a new life that is conducting, with rapid strides, middle-class society to a higher stage of civilization, corresponding to the spirit of the age, which buries itself with art, the mirror of existence, and is preparing for people for new studia of development. It is not by the standard of Western Europe, where the course pursued by history was different, traversing feudalism and its consequences, which was not the case in Russia,—it is not by this standard that Russia and its productions of the moment are to be measured. Russia is not all Europe, and Russia is not all Asia; Russia is a sort of hyphen between two quarters of the globe, between two degrees of civilization. In the society of the civilized nations of Europe, Russia is the youngest member, Germany being the oldest, and most important, the president by seniority. Literature, the mental leader of all political history, was different in Russia to what it was in the rest of Europe; but musical composition is only a literature of tones expressed in musical characters; consequently a different standard to that used in the rest of Europe, a relative standard, must be applied to musical productivity in Russia. Russian literature possesses no house of its own, in which its cradle stands. Russian literature, as represented by Derschawin and Lommonosow, began by imitating the Roman classical writers; it then devoted its attention to the French Academy with its historical models; it is true that it visited Germany, but its visits there did not last so long as those it made to that seductive place, which always exerted an irresistible spell over Russia. Puschkin's noble mind, which perfectly appreciated the ideal, was led from Schiller to Byron because realism is more nearly allied to the intellectual life of Russia than idealism, which exists only in the highest stages of civilization. Wherever, in the course of development pursued by the literary spirit in Russia, just as in Puschkin's verse when it possessed artistic value, deep, subjective melancholy was added to the invariably unpretending realism, there was a poet, and there was poetry, such as that to which in Germany we are justified in applying a high standard. Puschkin, as yet the greatest celebrity of Russian literature, is no poet in the sense of a creator. Where are the individualities he created? Where the shapes of Shakspere, Goethe, and even Schiller?—Like Byron, he is a poet; in his language, in the state of civilization in his country, and the exceptional position occupied by that country in Europe, Puschkin is Byron's equal. It is only in his language, only in Russian prosody that Puschkin is creative, not in the domain of ideas. By his side we must place Gribitz, hitherto the most celebrated Russian composer. In the first rank after Puschkin stand Lermontoff and Gogel. Lermontoff is a Russian Novalis. He is acquainted with the blue and indefinable flower!—Lermontoff is an idealist. He has improved on Puschkin's verse, and is as little of a realist as it is possible for a Russian poet to be. He fell in the first blush of youth in a duel in the Caucasus. His chief work, and the most brilliant proof of his great talent, is his poem, The Demon. With Gogel, realism, which is deeply rooted in the Russian mind, again resumed all its former sway. Since then in the most recent poetic efforts, as well as the daily Russian press, which absorbs all intellectual interests, but which is destructive rather than fructifying and creative, realism is the predominating characteristic of the tendency pursued. Realism is presented in Russian musical productivity by Seroff's operas, both crowned with success, Judith and Rogneda—the realism of Wagner in Germany, the champion of which realism, the profoundly learned cultivator in national Russian, and at the same time independent original music, is M. Alexander Seroff, who may be justly placed side by side with Gogel in what he has done. The mutual relations of the intellect are so intimately connected in the domains of literature and musical composition, that analogies present themselves naturally. Before proceeding, however, to consider Seroff's productions as the most important in Russian composition after Glinka, if we would judge correctly the idealistic tendency of the latest operatic production, namely, The Demon, by Scherl, as opposed to that of realism, we must first cast a retrospective glance on Glinka and others. Before Glinka comes Werstowski. Werstowski was Intendant of the Imperial Theatre at Moscow, an amateur in the simplest sense of the word. It is said that his used to whistle something or other, and that a good chapelmaster, hailing from Germany, used to set or score the melodies thus whistled, and which are by no means deficient in fancy and grace. Werstowski's principal production is Askold's Grave, which, before the time of Glinka, brought the Imperial Theatres at

* From the New Berliner Musikzeitung.

Digitized by Google

Moscow and St. Petersburgh a clear profit of a million roubles. It has, here and there, and to an extent which is not allowable, points of resemblance with Der Freischütz; it is, however, not altogether without merit, though it is wearisome, and more or less an imitation of German models only too well known. It is now forgotten, or cast into the deepest shade by Glinka and Serof. Habent sua fata! To Glinka belongs the merit which will be allowed him in the universal history of opera, of having, in his work, Life for the Czsar, written the only national opera with a political significance. There is no opera, or, indeed, musical work, generally, representing and reproducing two distinctly different nationalities like this masterpiece, which is no mere ephemeral production, but something advancing in a parallel with the spirit of Russia and of Poland. Before the appearance in Paris of the most significant mazurka-literature of that great musical mind, Chopin, Glinka built up upon two mazurka themes, in St. Petersburgh, the charming picture of luxurious Polish Court life, contained in his incomparable ball scene in the Polish camp; while, in the second motive (A flat major), he pourtrayed the tragic result of the Polish invasion of the seventeenth century in Russia. As we are aware, it was Susanin, a peasant, whom the Poles took as their guide, when they wished to snatch the young Czsar from the monastery where he was concealed; we are all aware, too, that it is the Susanin of Glinka's splendid work who leads the Poles into the snow-covered woods of Smolensk, where he is killed, but where the Poles likewise, are destroyed, and the Czsar thus saved. Glinka's mazurka-motive, which depicts with such charm the Polish element; the noble manner in which the style of the Russian national hymn is turned to account for the purpose of representing the Russian element in the opera; and the admirable contrapuntal treatment of the voices, together with the attractive instrumentation and inventive signification of the orchestra in Glinka's work—something no one else has attained. His second opera, Russian and Ludmilla, is so much inferior to the first, that it ought not to be mentioned in the same breath, whatever pains the extreme party may give themselves to place it above the first, just as, incited by mistaken zeal for their national glory, they place Glinka's Epigonus, Dargomischki, on an equality with Glinka. Dargomischki being simply a composer of romances for the piano, who had not raised himself much above this level in his operas, Esmeralda, and Russalka (the Witch of the Dnieper, after Puschkin). Dargomischki was a learned musician, and a wall-trained contrapuntist, but an operatic composer he was not. In opera all styles shake hands; opera demands great invention combined with the mastery over all technical resources. But this is not by themselves are a dead letter. We must mention, also, as belonging to Glinka's time, the great violin virtuoso, General Lwoff, who composed two operas, Bianca and Gualtiero and Undine, which are not deficient in structure and patchy workmanship, but are devoid of invention properly so-called. For this reason, they could not keep their place in the repertory, and are now forgotten. Strictly speaking, with some exceptions, Werstowski, Dargomischki, and Lwoff belong to one and the same group, to those who have attempted rather than succeeded in, the production of original Russian opera.

(To be continued.)

FROM MADRID.

No. II.

Whatever may be said of Spanish amusements, they cannot be called weak. They may be cruel, abominable, profane—what you like, but weak they are not. With a dramatized version of the New Testament at an exceedingly minor theatre every Friday, and with a bull-fight every Sunday, the good folks of Madrid stalk through Lent vigorously, if not with decorum. The real bull-fighting season does not commence till Easter-day; but while waiting for that great ecclesiastical festival we are recreated with a series of what may be called "Spring Meetings." Not that strong bulls are not brought into play, but the principal figures in the sport are young animals, "Novillos." Nor let it be imagined that the young bull is in training. It is a religious duty to kill every bull who enters the arena, and the luckless creatures who acquire fame before Easter Sunday are doomed never to attain their majority. The bull-fight proper I have not yet seen; but the little bull-fights at Madrid are not deficient in strong flavour, perilous to delicate stomachs. You go to the Plaza de Toros, in the immediate vicinity of a triumphal arch erected to the memory of Charles III., whose game is held in the highest veneration, and after complying with certain pecuniary conditions, you find yourself seated in a vast amphitheatre, compared to which the Agricultural Hall, Islington, is a mere handbox.

Let me interrupt myself, to describe a curious custom which prevails generally in the Spanish capital. At the amphitheatre devoted to the national sports, and likewise at the theatres, you meet a "loafer" of the pavement, who offers to sell you a ticket. Similar "loafers" appear in Paris, but you are warned against them, whereas the Spanish vagabond is a fair trader. His function is exactly the same as that of the London librarian from whom our nobility or gentry purchase boxes for the Opera. By a bold stretch of imagination, fancy Mr. Mitchell or Mr. Nunes, bawling about the pavement of the Strand, with a blouse upon his back, and you will have a very correct notion of this Spanish institution.

But to proceed to the bull-fight,—that is to say, the bull-fight small. It commences with a combat between the bulls and an assembly of amateurs, attired in the proper combative costume. Professional buffoons, with grotesque Indian dresses, likewise enter the arena, and protect themselves with towers of wicker-work, from which their heads occasionally protrude. When the infuriated bull knocks over one of these towers, and the mimic leaps escapes with difficulty, the exhibition is considered droll and the spectators shout with laughter. Farce, however, is not considered complete in Spain without a spice of tragedy, and the poor preliminary bull is duly killed and dragged off before serious business commences. Let me not omit to state that in this little fever du rideau the horns of the bull are covered, and he approaches to the condition of a muzzled dog. The commencement of serious business is marked by the erection of a temporary barricade, which divides the arena into two semicircles. In each of these there is a separate bull-fight. The manager, if cruel to the bull, is humane to his audience, and is determined that every one of them shall have a good view of the sport. Casuists may compare his conduct with that of the old English Puritans, who, according to Lord Macaulay, suppressed bear-baiting on account of the pleasure it afforded to the people, but by no means on account of the sufferings of the bear, who, indeed, was shot, as a source of too much enjoyment.

Well, there are two fights simultaneously in the Plaza de Toros, and in each semicircle two bulls with horns unguarded have to be killed before the afternoon's sport is concluded. While the "toredos" on foot tease the bull by trailing brightly-coloured cloaks under his nose, and evade his wrath by leaping over a palisade, the joke seems innocent enough. When the swindler leaping over a palisade, the joke seems innocent enough. When the swindler leaping over a palisade, the joke seems innocent enough. When the swindler

BACH'S *PASSION MUSIC.

THE ST. JOHN PASSION.

e. THE ARIAS.

We now turn to the Arias, which claim no small part of our attention in this work. To the ruling taste of our times they appeal but partially, although we meet in them all the excellencies of Bach's way of composition in rich measure: strictly characteristic melody; earnest declamation, closely following the sound and meaning of the words; harmonic and contrapuntal mastery in the conduct of the accompanying instruments. But the composer's earnestness and the serious destination of these pieces allowed of no concession to the sensuous apprehension of the general public. If in our altered circumstances the judgment of the public is influenced not so much by religious edification, as by the artistic and æsthetic side of such works, then our standpoint is a different one from that which Bach presupposed. A concert audience can follow the flight of the great master in his dramatic treatment of the choruses and recitative; but it is only exceptionally that it will be in a condition to sink into those depths of Christian contemplation, out of which he drew the fountain of his music in the Arias.

How much more must it be so where, as in this case, the purport of the words is purely dogmatical, containing little that is exciting in itself, while at the same time the breadth of the musical treatment tends to lessen the interest of the hearer, who is not able to give himself up to it entirely and follow it with all his faculty of feeling and of apprehension!

Accordingly the alto Aria, "Von den Stricken meiner Sünden" (D minor, 3-4, with accompaniment of two oboes and Basso continuo), as well as the soprano air, "Ich folge dir gleichfalls" &c. (B-flat major, 3-8), in which the flute part, concertante with the voice, accompanied only by the bass, depicts the joyful course of a serene soul purely at one with itself,—will on the whole find little recognition. The same may be presumed of the alto air with quartet accompaniment, "Ach, mein Sinn" (F-sharp minor, 3-4), as well as of the tenor air, treated with most wonderful figuration in the accompanying instruments (2 violins d'amour and bass): "Erwege, wie sein blutgefärbter Rücken" ("See how His blood-stained back"), which in fact with its long-spun melismatic turns lies far remote from present ways of feeling and perception.

This will be less the case with the bass Aria, "Eilt, ihr angefochtnen Seelen" (G minor, 3-8), whose rapid movement hurrying to an appointed goal, four times interrupted by the anxious, eager question of the chorus, "Whither? whither?" rests in the brief reply, "Toward Golgotha" and "to the mount of Crucifixion," only to renew its exhortation that we follow in the footsteps of the Lord.

The composition rises still more in the alto air, "Es ist vollbracht" ("It is finished"), which soars more freely even in the text. Accompanied by the viola di gamba in expressive and melodious solo, it rises in a short strain, breathing deepest sorrow, the last words of the Lord before His departure; then, in the flaming-up of the victorious announcement ("The hero of Juda conquers with might"), it represents the triumph of the Divine Word over death and hell, until the jubilation is again sunk down before the repetition of the mournful words, "It is finished," and relapses into the first lament.

This Aria is followed by the words of the Evangelist: "And He bowed His head, and gave up the ghost." Upon this immediately comes in the bass (D major, 4-4) with the expressively melodious song accompanied only by the organ and the basses, "Mein theurer Heiland lass dich fragen" (Dearest Saviour, we would ask Thee), which is interpreted, with deeply searching effect, by the Chorale which has been repeatedly employed already: before the denial of Peter in the first part, as well as after the Lord's words: "Lo! this is Thy mother." The simplicity of the orchestral treatment and the melodious rhythm of the song contrast in a wonderfully peculiar manner with the earnest harmony of the Chorale, out of which dark, deep background the Aria stands forth in radiant relief. It is the glorification of the Lord that here shines forth upon the world out of the solemn moment of death, and finds its open recognition through the Chorale of the praying congregation, through the Christian Church.

With the introductory chorus began the struggle and the suffering. Here we find the victory, not as in the preceding Aria, still under the suffocating burden of the cross, but in the freedom of its grandeur and its exaltation.

A short Arioso for the tenor (in the St. Matthew Passion Bach marks these little sentences as recitative) leads to the last Aria. This Arioso, in which you feel the agitation of nature after the departure of the Lord still vibrating, is one of the most beautiful pieces of the work. Under the prolonged high tones of two flutes and two oboi di caccia the string quartet moves tremulous in the after-murmur of the storm, while the tenor in expressive recitation sings the beautiful words assigned to him.

And in tender, tearful melody, introduced and followed by flutes and oboi di caccia, partly in concerted, partly in united song, the soprano answers him (C minor, 3-8): "Zerfliesse, mein Herze, in Fluthen der Zähren" ("Melt, my heart, in floods of tears").

The earthly sorrow for the Son of God, whose majesty and greatness, whose world-redeeming significance His death and wondrous signs have first implanted deeply in the soul, flows forth in the tones of this Aria, which is one of the noblest and most deep-felt that Bach ever wrote. Formed as if out of a single thought, and in a peculiarly thin in every conceivable variation, it conducts the hearer to the Cross, upon which the body of the Redeemer hangs, no object of terror, but of the deepest grief, pouring itself forth at His feet in streams of tears.

And so we stand just before the end of a work, which, however much we may admire the astounding grandeur of the Matthew Passion, excites not less our deepest sympathy and veneration for its great creator.

f. THE CHORALES.

Before we pass to the very close, we have yet to turn our attention to that series of masterworks which Bach has incorporated into the Passion Music under the name of Chorales.

The destination of these Chorales has already been pointed out. They were to keep the whole work true to the Christian ground-tone which the Divine service of the day (Good Friday) above all required. They were also to serve to bring the listening congregation into active participation in the service, to make them part and parcel of the action and the pious meditations based upon it. For the Christian Church song belongs to the religious cultus as an artistic element. Where this element is taken up by the whole congregation, it expresses itself in the Chorale, as the universal basis of the Divine service. This appears more in the Passions, than in the Cantatas of Bach as a pervading thought.

This is not the place to justify the way in which the great composer has set his Chorales just as we find them here. As they are, they are in their appropriate place. They are masterworks of a peculiar kind; and by their expressive treatment, entering so fully into the character of the situation, they produce the most striking effect.

The very first Chorale, "O boundless Love," which follows close upon the repetition of the Chorus, "Jesus of Nazareth," is set in such a way that every word calls out the noblest feeling. How incomparably beautiful is the conduct of the voices at the words, "dieser Marterstrasse" ("this street of martyrdom")! What a deep feeling finds expression in the concluding strophe, "And Thou must suffer!" We find again the same pre-eminence, we might my the same predilection, in the treatment of every one of the Chorales which are incorporated into this beautiful work. When, after Christ says: "If I have spoken well, why smitest thou Me?" the Chorale, "Who could so rudely smite Thee?" sets in in the full harmony of its tenderly melodious measure; or when, after the words, "My kingdom is not of this world," rises the firm and solid strain, "An mighty King, through all the ages great," with its wonderfully moving close; when the Chorale, breathing steadfast faith in deepest grief, begins:—

> "Within my heart deep dwelleth > Thy name and cross alone," and dies away so mournfully: "For thou hast bled to death,"—the impression universally will be a powerfully great, an elevating and consoling one. But everywhere, too, is the expression of the words and of the situation mirrored in these Chorales with a fidelity, a lofty, tranquil grandeur, which continually reminds us that it all belongs to a Divine service in the Church, in which we too are permitted to take part.

We might in this connection call attention to one Chorale, just before the closing chorus which completes the picture of the sufferings of Christ, "O hilf, Christe, Gottes Sohn." What a depth of sorrowfulness, what steadfast trust and confidence speak from this harmonious master-work! The words, "durch dein bitter Leiden" and again, "All Untugend meiden," finally the two concluding stanzas lift this little composition to a grandeur and an elevation that place it by the side of the first masterpieces over yet created.

In the Matthew Passion, prominent significance is attached to the Chorale, "O Haupt, voll Blut und Wunden" ("O Head, all bruised and wounded"), which recurs several times in the course of the work. So here the Passion Song, "Jesu's sorrows, pain, and death," is introduced by Bach in three particularly conspicuous places: first, after the denial of Peter; secondly, after the words which Christ upon the cross addresses to His mother; and for the third time, after the words, "It is finished."

Here too,—apart from the inner reasons which Bach had for such repetition of the same choral melody, we see how paramount an end

* From the German of C. H. Bitter.

Digitized by Google

it was with him, and how earnestly he strove for it, to secure the character of unity to the impression made by the whole work.

g. THE CONCLUDING CHORUS.

And so we enter the profound mood of the wonderful concluding chorus, "Rest, ye weary sacred limbs!" Tranquil sorrow trust in the redemption; steadfast faith, speak out of this clear-stamped melody and deep-felt harmony. We stand at the grave of the Lord. The body, wound in linen clothes with spices, is lowered into it. The friends and disciples who have followed Him thither, cast one last look of love upon the dead outward form, in which the Divine Prophet had so long lived among them and taught them, in which He had even now endured the last fearful agony before them. Like prayers for blessings on Him, the tones of tha pious song descends. And when the grave is closed, then there resounds, before the crowd have parted, in firm and solid harmony, the Chorale:—

"Ach Herr, lass dein lieb Engelein
Am letzten End die Seele mein
In Abrahams Schoos tragen," till the tones die away with the words:—

"Herr Jesu Christ, erhöre mich,
Ich will dich preisen ewiglich."

The friends and disciples leave the grave. We too go with them. Consoled, uplifted, full of new strength of faith, we retire from a place where the Gospel and Christ's off-ring for man have been taught us in the noblest manner, interwoven with the loveliest flowers of Art. We have taken part in His sorrows, and feel ourselves purified thereby, brought nearer to the Lord whom we revere.

Such is the form and outline of the work of the great master, which we have sought to expound, both as a whole and in its several parts.

Only a man of the great reach and power of Bach could have resolved to go beyond the lofty grandeur of this work, and create one even greater, even more complete and perfect. His gigantic mind shrank not from a task like that which he had set to himself in the St. Matthew Passion.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Bach's Passion Music.

The Athenæum takes a very practical view of this work, and says:—

"The directors of the Oratorio Concerts resolved to perform Bach's Matthäus-Passions-Musik each season, before the actual revival of that work in Exeter Hall on Wednesday week. We can hardly suppose that their resolution has been in any way shaken. Bach's music was heard with curiosity, received with favour, and, together with the performance, much belauded by the daily press. Nevertheless, we doubt the success of any attempt to resurrect to stay the work. Looking at the Passion apart from the change which has come over music and musical taste since Bach's day, we are quite ready to grant that it ought ever to remain in high favour. But so to look would be very unpractical, if not absurd. Within the last 140 years, the canons of composition and of taste have greatly altered—neither for better or worse we do not say—and the result has been to leave Bach's work high and dry among the curiosities of a past epoch. We admire it, but with no more idea of adopting it than of wearing chain armour. It may strongly be questioned, therefore, whether the success of Mr. Barnby's revival was other than the result of gratified curiosity. Yet more strongly may we doubt whether, after curiosity has been fully gratified, anything like success could be attained. From a modern point of view, the music is antiquated, however scholastic, ingenious, and masterly. The present generation seeks a sign—the sign of sensation; and cares no more for Bach's scholasticism than the admirers of Mr. Thomas Carlyle's English do for the stilted phrases of the Elizabethan euphuists. If, however, we dissociate ourselves from present tastes, and look at Bach's Passion as might a devout Lutheran of the period (or even as might one of the period neither devout nor Lutheran), we see at a glance the great merit of the work. It stands out from among things of its kind as Bach himself stands out from among the musicians of his day. But this will not make it popular. That cannot be done, because music is not subject to capricious changes of fashion. We may go back to the trunk-hose and slashed doublets of our ancestors, but we are not likely to revive a taste for what they thought the perfection of Art. Mr. Barnby deserves great credit for the excellence of the performance he directed. His choir had been admirably drilled, and his soloists—Madame Rudersdorff, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas—were fully equal to their unfamiliar and arduous work. So far all was well; our only doubt is as to what lies beyond: especially as to what the audience will think of the Passion after hearing a Passion-week Messiah.

T. E."

Herr Joachim's "Hungarian Concerto."

With reference to this work the Athenæum says:—

"The second Philharmonic Concert was made noteworthy by a remarkable performance of Herr Joachim's 'Hungarian' Concerto. This concerto is, in some respects, unique. It may claim to be, for example, the perfected work for the violin of the greatest violinist of his age. Herr Joachim laboured at it with zeal and patience; even going so far as to reconstruct the whole, adding where additions seemed necessary, and writing an entirely new score. He thus presented a deliberately-formed notion of what a great work for the violin should be. We fear Herr Joachim made a too favourable estimate of the average capacity of first-class violinists. If not, then he did worse, and wrote with a single eye to his own exceptional powers. A good deal of the concerto is beyond everybody but the composer. It crowds difficulty upon difficulty, till at last there are so many that the listener wearies in his appreciation. To this extent Herr Joachim's work is an impracticable thing. Like the battle-axe of Cœur-de-Lion, it must lie idle save when the owner is at hand to use it. But the concerto is unique on account of its national character; the subjects being modelled upon Hungarian airs, and the whole constructed 'in Ungarischer Weise.' To judge of this requires special knowledge; the result, however, is appreciable by all. A very striking and interesting result it is; not the least noticeable feature being the skill with which great peculiarities in melodic structure are connected with classical form and treatment. Looking at the concerto apart from its difficulty and its pretensions to nationality, we see a good deal that is admirable. The subjects are pleasing—those of the slow movement especially; the orchestra is often happily used; and the plan of the work shows, in many places, successful thought. On the other hand, much appears to be sacrificed in favour of mere display, and this leads to undue extension, which, in turn, leads to weariness. If Herr Joachim would improve his concerto more than he has hitherto done, he must cut it down with a free hand, and remove difficulties which are purposeless, as well as, to the vast majority, inappreciable. The performance generally was excellent; that of the solo astonishing. Herr Joachim never more thoroughly satisfied those who believe him to be the king of fiddlers."

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The last concert of the series took place on Saturday, and had the following as a programme:—

Overture, "Manfred"	...	Schumann.
Aria, "Mi Tradi" (Don Giovanni)—Madame Lemmens ...		Mozart.
Symphony, "The Pastoral"	...	Beethoven.
Air, "In native worth" (Creation)—Mr. Nelson Varley ...		Haydn.
Song, "The Village Chimes"—Madame Lemmens ...	...	Sullivan.
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	...	Wagner.
Duet, "Ye gay and painted fair" (Seasons)—Madame Lemmens and Mr. Nelson Varley		Haydn.
Cantata, "May-day"—Madame Lemmens and the Crystal Palace Choir	...	Macfarren.
Overture, "Zampa"	...	Herold.

Schumann's overture, the power of which can hardly be denied even by those who most question the composer's genius, has often been heard in these concerts. Seldom, however, has it been received with the coldness manifested by Saturday's audience, a coldness we must attribute to a performance by no means up to the mark, because both coarse and ragged. The over-weleome "Pastoral Symphony" fared better, each movement being capitally played and much applauded. Its performance, in short, was worthy the reputation of the Crystal Palace orchestra. We spoke of the Lohengrin prelude when it was given last year, at a Philharmonic concert, and are now, inclined to repeat what was said then. The music does not deserve more than the smallest expenditure of time and trouble. As to the audience, they thought it deserving only of the smallest applause. As to the analyst, he pronounced it a "study of orchestral effect," displaying "a high and unquestionable power of imagination." So it may be, and yet be worthless; for there are studies and studies, and imagination and imaginations. Mr. Macfarren's cantata was fairly well given. As usual, "The Hunt's Up" had to be repeated. The Zampa overture ended the concert brilliantly. Madame Sherrington did not act fairly to Mr. Sullivan's ballad by introducing it on such an occasion. Mr. Nelson Varley sang his song in a style much better than we could have expected. He is evidently learning fast how to use a capital voice to good purpose.

T. E.

GOOD FRIDAY CONCERTS.

At the Crystal Palace on Good Friday the concert consisted of a selection of sacred music, in which Madame Rudersdorff sang the "Inflammatus" and "Let the bright Seraphim"; Mr. Vernon Rigby, "Then shall the righteous," and "Sound an alarm." Madame Carole, Mr. Aynsley Cook, Madame Florence-Lancia, Mr. T. Harper, and Signor Urio also took part in the concert. The other attractions of the Palace found many admirers. The day being delightfully fine brought together 47,317 visitors.—At the Standard Theatre the Messiah was given with success, at least so far as everybody being pleased. The theatre was very fully attended, and Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Drasdil, Messrs. A. Cooke and Wells were at times well received.—

Digitized by Google

The Britannia produced the Creation, with Messrs. V. Rigby, Lewis Thomas, and Mdlle. Carola in the principal parts, Mr. Kingsbury conducted. The house was well attended.—At the Holborn Amphitheatre the Stabat Mater, selections from Eli, the Messiah, and Naaman, with the prayer in Mosaniello, were exceedingly well rendered, the principal vocalists being Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. O. Christian, and Miss Palmer. Mr. Weist Hill conducted.—Mr. E. Strange's concert at the Grecian was fairly supported. Miss Blanche Cole was the principal singer, and gave "Let the bright Seraphim," "Rejoice greatly," and "With verdure clad." Miss Woodcroft, Miss Enriques, and Mr. E. Lloyd were the other singers.—Concerts, morning and evening, took place at St. James's Hall.

FOUR CRYSTAL PALACE SYMPHONIES.

The last four concerts presented as many symphonies, each remarkable in its way. Between two of them a certain analogy exists; the others stand alone, while differing from the former in the sense that "pure" music differs from music with a "programme." The analogy to which we refer is based on the fact that both Hiller's symphony in E minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral" are avowedly illustrations of natural phenomena. Beethoven's work needs not detain us save to point out, once more, what "G." properly calls the "true principles" of programme music—principles Beethoven himself defined, in the heading of his great symphony, as "rather the record of impressions than the actual representation of sounds." Let us be glad to read Mr. "G.'s" analysis that this is "a canon which SHOULD be for ever" what programme music ought to be. At the same time we would remind him how certain modern composers have ignored its limits, and have carried into orchestral music the literalism of "The Battle of Prague." We would remind him, also, that the tendency of modern composition is to the extreme against which Beethoven carefully guarded himself, and that the professors of this heresy are sometimes honoured in the Crystal Palace programmes. One objection, in connection with this matter deserves notice. "G." speaks of Mendelssohn's "Italian" and "Scotch" symphonies, and of his overtures to A Midsummer Night's Dream and Fingal's Cave as "programme music." The term, though allowable when used as "G." uses it, in the Beethoven sense, may convey a false idea, because it is now associated with music which aims at portraying a series of occurrences. That Mendelssohn's works do nothing of this kind, we need not assert. It is necessary, therefore, to hit upon some new term wherewith to describe compositions which occupy a position midway between "pure" and "programme music." How if we were to call them "impression music?" The term would have the high authority already (and, at least, would save glorious productions from the chance of confusion with others which are not glorious). Mr. Manns undertook the analysis of Herr Hiller's symphony, and built a fanciful structure upon the basis of the composer's motto—"Es ist in Ihr, die Stille Wesen." We are by no means disposed to quarrel with him for so doing, since the motto directly invited his labour. Herr Hiller's superscription is either a key to the meaning of the music, or it is not; if not, then the superscription itself is meaningless and absurd. Mr. Manns, however, gave rather too great latitude of interpretation. He remarked, "We anticipate a poetical musical illustration of a combat between Winter and Spring—the Winter and Spring of nature or of the human heart, or of the life of great nations—a struggle for civilization and liberty." Apart from a consideration of the character of the work, we doubt if Herr Hiller intended his motto to bear so wide an application. The chances, at least, are in favour of a reference to the Spring of nature, because each of a dozen obvious sentences would otherwise have served equally as well, if not better, than the one chosen. To this conclusion Mr. Manns evidently came, for he interpreted each movement as a phase in the triumphant advance of the most delightful of seasons. We would answer no further to notice his remarks in detail. They are but the expression of individual feeling upon a matter connected with which there is no authoritative standard, and variance about which is, therefore, perfectly allowable. As regards the merit of Herr Hiller's symphony there can hardly be very diverse opinions. It is charming from first to last. It displays, in union with elegance of style, masterly treatment and classical form—qualities unhappily rare in present-day German music. Herr Hiller's work so far harmonizes with the position he occupies among his compatriots. It might be said of him, as of Abdiel:—

> "Among the faithless, faithful only he;
> Among innumerable false, unmoved,
> Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified."

Whatever future lies before German music, this is certain—that true art will have a witness in Ferdinand Hiller while life remains to him.

The third symphony (second in order of performance, as Beethoven's "Pastoral" was fourth) occupied, when previously given, much of our attention. We have nothing to unsay or to change as regards Schumann's symphony in E flat—the so-called "Rhenish." The faults of this work are mainly concentrated in the fourth and fifth movements, the first of which is obscure and shares the ugliness of the second. On the other hand, the first three movements claim from us almost unqualified admiration. Not to go a second time into details, we will mention briefly that these movements are entitled to rank among the best of their kind, by whomsoever written. Mr. Manns very properly refrained from any attempt to fit Schumann's music with a programme. Apart from a superscription to the "Religioso," and a general remark of a vague character bearing upon the other movements Schumann gave no authority for taking his work out of the category of "pure" music; where, by-the-bye, its admirers may very contentedly leave it.

We come now to the fourth symphony, and do so with pleasure, because it is the work of a young Englishman who bids fair to honour English music. When Mr. F. H. Cowen's symphony in C minor was brought out at St. James's Hall last December, its great merit was promptly recognized, as were, also, the faults natural to, if not inseparable from, a first effort. The young composer lost no time in profiting by the suggestions of experience; and at the Crystal Palace he was ready with a work largely amended, and having an entirely new finale. We recognize the spirit in which the alterations have been made not less than we do their value, which is sufficient to claim for Mr. Cowen's symphony the regard proper to a great thing worthily achieved. The work opens with a short Largo, constructed on a two-bar phrase given out by bass strings in unison. Thus early, indications present themselves (among others a free use of scale passages for the last strings) of Mr. Cowen's sympathy with Beethoven. The Largo ends quietly on the dominant, and leads to an Allegro di molto quasi presto which starts with the unison already-mentioned. This, however, is only by way of exordium, for soon the latter expands the subject into one of four bars, and introduces it as the first theme of the movement. Subsidiary matter, in the form of a vigorous tutti, leads to the second subject in G major, which is as notable for grace and beauty as for the charming method of its scoring. An expansion of the original theme ends the first part of the movement. Throughout the second part we are reminded of Beethoven by the bold and assured handling of the orchestra, by the free march of the basses, and by comparatively small devices like an occasional pause. A well-marked coda stops abruptly on the dominant, that the forpe may be resumed for eight bars; after which the movement comes to a speedy end. The themes of the scherzo (in G major) are piquant, without any leaning towards eccentricity. Moreover, they are tuneful and pleasing. Putting all which things together, some might urge that Mr. Cowen has acted upon the proper idea of a scherzo—that is to say, he is sufficiently light and frolicsome, without indulging in contortions. A placid trio (in E major) distinguished by clever use of syncopation, varies the scherzo agreeably. The Allegretto (in C major) reminds us of Schubert, alike by its character and scoring. In the sentimental expression of its themes, and still more in their peculiar division among the various instruments, the influence of that great master can be detected. Beyond this there is nothing in the movement Mr. Cowen may not claim as original; while, in all respects, it is highly imaginative and beautiful. The opening of the finale shows Mr. Cowen in a humorous mood. He makes the first violins give out a theme to which the seconds answer with another, followed in turn by the violas. This little bit of counterpoint prepares the listener for a fugue, only to deceive him. As though repenting of his first purpose, but not disposed to waste what he has written, the composer hurries on to a tutti, for which the abortive fugue supplies materials. In right spirited fashion are those materials worked, till the entrance of a melodious second subject, mainly divided among the wind instruments, and accompanied by what we may call a figured dominant pedal for a portion of the strings. With these themes and their episodes Mr. Cowen has constructed a movement which ends his symphony in a manner worthy of what has gone before. We have spoken of the work at length because it is such as we have said, and because its composer is one whose efforts deserve all the encouragement it is possible to give them.

F. M. G.

WEIMAR.—The Abbate Franz Liszt is here at present. He intends making a long visit.

BADEN.—Herr Johann Strauss, the well-known waltz-composer, has signed an agreement with the Administration to give a series of twelve concerts. They will take place in August.

BRUSSELS.—We like the inhabitants of this capital extremely; they are a jolly, hospitable, contented, set of people, but our partiality must not make us blind to their defects. In fact, as sincere friends of theirs, we feel bound, if they do anything wrong or stupid, to warn them of the fact. Well—they are going fractic about Lohengrin, of which three performances have absolutely been given in one week. We say no more, save—Verbum sap!

Digitized by Google

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

"Veni; Vidi"—"Why sigh?" you might add, if you happened to be a burlesque writer, and were sitting near me as I pen the opening words of this letter. "Why sigh?" You would sigh, too, in my position. After a long absence from this capital, I return to resume those communications which, I flatter myself, were so welcome in your columns, and the first production I am called upon to notice is Herr Wagner's Meistersinger von Nürnberg, brought out at the Royal Operahouse on the 1st of April, a date, by the way, extremely applicable to the fools who rave about the Music of the Future, and not altogether inapplicable to those managers who pander to the ravings of the fools aforesaid, sacrificing the voices and time of their artists, besides lavishing the pecuniary resources of the establishments under their direction, in getting up such trash. Do you think that people are sincere when they say they admire Herr R. Wagner's music? If you do, I do not.

What Ido think, however, is that a great many Germans—mind I do not say all—allow their patriotism to obtain the mastery over their common sense, and cannot "abide the notion," as Mrs. Gamp might express it, of not having some musical genius, some great composer, to continue the long line of those giants of the art; Haydn, Mozart, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, cum multiis aliis, who have shed such splendour upon their Fatherland. Having no one else, and being very good-natured, easy-going folk, constantly assured—by Herr Wagner himself—that the author-composer of Lohengrin possesses the divinus afflatus to an eminent degree, they indulge in the absurd enthusiasm for the gentleman, which renders them objects of pity—tinctured with a dash of contempt—to the innumerable lovers of true art, both among their own countrymen and foreigners. Will this madness, this infatuation, last? Most certainly not. It is an ephemeral whim, a passing caprice, and the Music of the Future will as surely soon be a thing of the East as bicycles, and chignons, Grecian bends, and Ethiopian melodists.

"On revient toujours
'A ses premières amours;'"

ere long, the misguided individuals will see the error of their ways, and feel heartily ashamed that, justified as they are in boasting that Germany has given birth to some of the most stupendous musical minds the world ever knew, they were contented to worship so long at the shrine of one whom they now designate a Prophet, but whom every man with a spark of feeling for the Beautiful cannot hesitate, a single moment, in designating a false Prophet.

I do not suppose any work ever brought out at the Royal Operahouse had been more carefully prepared than Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg. All the resources of the vast establishment had been applied, for months past, to the task. A host of rehearsals, their name was legion. There were four-and-twenty with full band! In fact, they were so numerous, and taxed so severely the powers of all concerned, that, on several occasions, the usual evening performance could not take place, a circumstance highly gratifying, doubtless, to the managers of the other theatres, whose treasuries benefited by it, but not quite so pleasing to those foreigners or provincials who might have been desirous of visiting the far-famed Berlin Operahouse and found it closed, as tight as the Money Market during a panic, on the only evening they were here. For months, the scene-painters, the costumiers, the machinists, the—in a word; the everybody, had been employed early and late on this offspring of Herr R. Wagner's Muse, or rather Muses, for he is on as good terms with Melpomene and Thalia as with Euterpe, till they must have thought of nothing but Die Meistersinger all day, and dreamt of nothing else all night—till their whole existence must have been as fully festooned with Wagnerian music—well, yes, I suppose I must call it so—with Wagnerian music; Wagnerian poe— well, I suppose, etc.—Wagnerian poetry, and Wagnerian hum— no! I can not style it humour—with Wagnerian attempts at fun and comicality, as Spanish cookery is with garlic. Even the most docile lunatic—no, I mean Wagnerite, will never have the face to assert that, supposing Die Meistersinger should fail to become a stock opera here—a contingency I humbly consider as by no means beyond the bounds of probability—the non-success of the work is attributable to any want of exertion on the part of the management to ensure for it a triumph.

Is it necessary—indeed is it not slightly superfluous—to say that the musical public was in a state of great excitement, and that the Royal Operahouse presented on the night of the first instant a most animated scene? Every place was occupied, and every class represented. Literary men jostled grave jurists; red-hot Wagnerites were elbowed by their Master's peculiar pets: individuals whose swarthy complexions and unmistakably curved noses—not Roman noses—proclaimed them members of the Israelitish persuasion; and musicians, old-fashioned and stupid enough to believe still in Mendelssohn and Bach, stumbled, in their eagerness to reach their seats, over the clanking sabres of local military Dundrearys of the "Yarde" (martial swell Berlinese dialect for "Garde"). And then the ladies! How they forced their way through the swaying crowd, as though dresses could never be spoilt by crushing; how—though living in days when they attach so much importance to capillary attraction, that they must fancy their beauty depends altogether on their tresses, just as Sampson's strength depended on his—they dashed fearlessly into the human Maelstrom, as though back hair could never be rudely torn, by some untoward wrench, from the head of its fair owner.

At length, Herr Eckert, the conductor, made his appearance in the orchestra, and shortly afterwards, looking round to see that the instrumental army under his command were ready, gave the signal, and the opera began. The following was the cast:—Eva, Mdme. Mallinger; Magdalene, Mdlle. Brandt; Stolzing, Herr Samuel Niemann; Sachs, Herr Betz; Pogner, Herr Fricke; Kotheer, Herr Krause; the Schustertichring, Herr Kruger; and Beckmesser, Herr Basse—poor Herr Basse!

And what was the result of all the exertions, of all the labour, of all the expenditure lavished upon Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg? There was some applause, which Herr R. Wagner's admirers, strengthening their mental vision with a microscope, equal in power to that which, at the hands of a mechanic, so disagreeably initiates the spectator into the mysteries of a drop of water, or the structure of the domestic flea—there was, I repeat, some applause, which Herr R. Wagner's admirers will doubtless magnify into a triumph. But—but—but "us far non fa ghirlandy," and the laurels Herr R. Wagner reaped on the 1st inst., are certainly not plentiful enough to weave him a wreath sufficient to obviate the necessity of his purchasing a toupet, supposing him to be bald, and, like Cæsar, desirous of concealing his baldness. The first act went pretty well, I must confess, and Herr Niemann (Stolzing), besides being encored in the last verse of his song, was called on at the end of the act. In the second act, however, it was apparent that the audience were getting rather bored, and they did not receive the interminable dialogue with the same gusto with which the author-composer, who, we know, entertains his own views of comic writing, panned it. At length, they could stand it no longer, and broke out into a nice tumult, laughing, hissing, coughing, and stamping. This increased rather than diminished during the notorious cudgelling scene, often described in your columns, a scene which is of course highly symbolical of something or other in the eyes of the Initiated, but which, in the opinion of the profanum vulgus, of whom I am one, appears more fitted for a travelling circus, or "the spill and pelt" scene in an English pantomime, than for the boards of a national art-institute like the Royal Operahouse, Berlin. The curtain fell at the conclusion of this act amid tremendous uproar. Herr Niemann was again greatly, and deservedly, applauded in the third act, but even his admirable performance could not compensate for the dreary monotony of the piece, and, long before the final fall of the curtain, which happened at half-past ten, a great number of persons had left the house. "In for a penny, in for a pound" being my motto—or one of my mottoes—I stopped to the end. Like an enthusiastic fox-hunter, I determined to be in at the death, in case the piece should not survive the first performance—but that scene of the artists should not. When the last note had been played, there was a call for the latter, and, certainly, if ever artists deserved a call they did. To say they worked like niggers would convey a very feeble idea of the way in which they exerted themselves; they worked very un-like niggers, who are about as lazy a race as any in existence. The orchestra played magnificently; the chorus never exhibited more zeal and correctness—was never lose "chorusay"; the mise-en-scène was admirable, and reflected great credit upon the stage-manager, Herr Hein; the scenery and dresses were excellent, and, in fact, the performance possessed all the elements of an immense operatic victory, except one—rather important elements, though—namely: good music and good words. And so much, at present, for Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.

I intended to have forwarded a short account of the changes that have taken place in the personnel of the Operahouse since I last addressed you, and, also, to describe what is going on generally in musical circles; but my letter is already so long that, with your permission, I will defer the execution of my intention till next week, or the week after. Meanwhile, allow me to say, as sincerely as ever,

VALE.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.—"Medea," scena et aria per soprano, by Alberto Randegger; "Take this Forget-me-Not," song, by Adolph Gollmick.

CRAMER & Co.—"By the way of the Sea," ballad, by H. Sloman, Mus. Doc.

CHAPPELL, PETTER, & GALPIN.—"The History of the Pianoforte," by Edgar Brinsmead.

LONSDALE COCK & Co.—"My Dream," song, by Josephine Williams (R.A.M.)

DUFF & STEWART.—Six Pieces for the Pianoforte, by Johannes Winkelhaus.

ASHDOWN & PARRY.—"Sydney Smith's Method for the Pianoforte;" "I'll twine for thee a wreath of flowers," ballad, by Robert Hilton.

SUGARO.—"Philomel Waltz," by G. Richardson.

Digitized by Google

DEATH.

On April 14th, at Ealing, SOAMMAN, wife of JOHN COOPER, Esq., aged 74, sincerely regretted by many friends.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

With this number of the MUSICAL WORLD subscribers will receive four extra pages, and again, from TIME TO TIME, as expedience may suggest.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1870.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL PROGRAMME.

WE owe it to the importance of the Festival to be held this year in the "hardware capital" (so-called) to give the programme, recently made known, all the attention in our power. We have published it once, and we do so again, by way of text to a brief commentary. The scheme is as follows :—

"Tuesday, the 30th of August:—Morning, Mendelssohn's Elijah; evening, a new cantata, Paradise and the Peri, by J. F. Barnett, and a miscellaneous selection. Wednesday: Morning, Costa's Naaman; evening, a miscellaneous selection, comprising a new Instrumental work by Mr. A. S. Sullivan. Thur-day, 1st of September:—Morning, Handel's Messiah; evening, a new cantata, Nala and Damayanti, by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, and a miscellaneous selection. Friday:—Morning, a new oratorio, St. Peter, by Mr. Benedict; and Mozart's Requiem; evening, Handel's Samson.

"Probably," says the Daily Post, which paper we quote because we agree with it:—

"the first impression produced by a perusal of this copious catalogue is one of surprise at the exceeding familiarity of its leading features. The four largest and best-known works, Elijah, Messiah, Samson, and Naaman, occupy so much of the ground, that little or no room seems to be left for novelty; and that room, we are prone to think, is not always apportioned to the best advantage. Further consideration, however, soon convinces us that the framers of the scheme have shown a more judgment than we at first gave them credit for, and that the Festival of 1870 will really contain as much promising novelty as any of its predecessors. It must not be forgotten, in the first place, that two of the mornings are disposed of in advance, by prescriptive usage, and that Elijah is as unalterable a feature of the opening day, as the Messiah is of the Thursday. Neither in the interests of art nor of money, could these fixtures be advantageously disturbed. There remain, then, only Wednesday and Friday mornings and the four evenings to provide for. Custom and public opinion have devoted the evenings, as a rule, to secular and miscellaneous concerts, and that rule cannot with safety be interfered with, to the extent of more than one evening; so that three sacred or oratoric concerts are really all the great opportunities at the disposal of the Committee. In providing for these requirements, the problem to be studied is how to reconcile, on the one hand, the often conflicting claims of Fame and Profit, and, on the other, the executive needs with the artistic means at disposal; for it is scarcely less important than the engagement of the artists, that they should be employed to advantage. These varied and, to some extent, opposing requirements seem to us to be very satisfactorily met in the apportionment of the Wednesday and Friday mornings, and Friday evening. Apart from its high musical pretensions, Naaman, as the masterpiece of Sir Michael Costa, to whom the Birmingham Festivals are so largely indebted for past and present services, possesses strong claims to a place in the scheme; and even had its merits been less conspicuous, the Committee could not with any grace have omitted it, after Sir Michael's good-natured resumption of the baton he formally relinquished three years ago. Wednesday morning, therefore, is assigned to Naaman the last and best of the works with which its composer has enriched musical art and the Birmingham Festival repertoire."

Under a certain obligation to produce the works spoken of by our contemporary, the directors had but limited room for other things. They resolved, properly enough, to devote proper attention to new compositions; and, hence, the almost exclusive occupation of their remaining space by Messrs. Benedict, Hiller, Sullivan, and Barnett. That the result will justify the course adopted, we have not the smallest doubt. On this head we may again quote our Birmingham contemporary, whose remarks are worthy the reputation he has acquired for just and sound criticism :—

"All who are acquainted with Mr. Benedict's music, and those especially, who had the privilege of hearing his St. Cecilia, at the last Festival, will see in this announcement the promise of a great work, —one not unworthy, perchance, to rank near Mendelssohn's treatment of the companion theme, and second to none of our time in elevation of sentiment, melodic charm, and musical scholarship. With Mr. Benedict's oratorio is bracketed Mozart's sublime Requiem—the song of the swan, and the masterpiece alike of its class and its composer. It is difficult to understand why fifteen years should have been allowed to elapse since this matchless work was heard at a Birmingham Festival. In devoting Friday evening to Samson, the Committee but follow the precedent so successfully led in 1861, when for the first time, the evening previously wasted on a fatiguing and unremunerative ball, was given up to an oratorio of Handel. The performance of Samson on the Wednesday morning of 1861, was one of the most effective of that brilliant meeting; and we have no doubt that on the Friday evening of the current year a Festival, it will prove equally satisfactory. The other evenings, as we have said, are necessarily devoted to secular and miscellaneous concerts; but they will not therefore lack novelty. Tuesday evening will be signalized by the production of a new cantata on the subject of Moore's Lalla Rookh, entitled Paradise and the Peri, by Mr. J. Francis Barnett. On Wednesday, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, who has made great advance in his art since the production of his Kenilworth, in 1864—witness his admirable Prodigal Son, produced at last year's Worcester Festival—will be represented by a new instrumental work—whether overture or symphony, the record saith not. The most decided novelty of the Festival is reserved for Thursday evening, when the veteran composer, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, will, for the first time in his long art career, contribute and conduct in person a new cantata, composed expressly for this Festival. Nala and Damayanti, as the work in question is entitled, is said to be founded on an Indian poem, and will, therefore, be as foreign in colour and subject as it is in title. Altogether, this provisional programme is a promising one."

So say we, and not less promising is the list of artists whose engagements have been made known. The Post might have said much on this head—much, for example, as regards the appearance of so many excellent English artists—Arabella Goddard, Sims Reeves, and Santley at the head of them. On the whole the Birmingham prospects are bright, and the Festival of 1870 is not likely to discredit the most successful of its predecessors.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE musical news from Russia is distinctly of a personal kind. The great Gospodin Rubinstein (says a contemporary), inflated perhaps by the success of his Tower of Babel at Konigsberg, has been misbehaving himself at Moscow, in token of which the president of a tribunal has sentenced him to pay a fine of 25 roubles with the option of a week's imprisonment. Rubinstein is professor of the piano at the Moscow Conservatorium where he practises, it would seem, the brusque mode of tuition which has rendered him so popular as a private teacher with members of the Moscow young ladies. Rubinstein, artistic talent apart, is celebrated for his power of making his pupils cry. His skill, however, in this particular does not seem to be appreciated at the Conservatorium, where the students probably are more for solid instruction than for novel sensations. At all events, a certain Miss Voskresenskaia, accused by Rubinstein of inattention, and called into his awful presence to receive a few words of solemn warning and rebuke, showed by her demeanour that she wished to be spoken to politely. When Rubinstein raised his voice she turned over the leaves of a book instead of listening to him. He then told the perverse girl (in a still louder voice) to "get out;" upon which she "got out," and hurrying home told her father of the language and tone adopted towards her by the stern professor. A peace-justice before whom Gospodin Rubinstein was summoned dismissed the case; but upon being brought before a higher tribunal he was sentenced to the penalty above mentioned. The specific charge made against him was that of "offering insults."

Digitized by Google

MEYERBEER'S Africaine has at length been produced at Dantzic. Speaking of the fact, Herr F. W. Markull observes, in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung: "It has been a long time coming, but—but it has come at last. The same thing happens to all Meyerbeer's operas at provincial theatres. In the first place, there always arises a discussion as to the impossibility of adapting these show-operas to the modest resources of a provincial theatre, and then, though not, perhaps, till years have elapsed, it is found possible, after all, to produce them, with a great mise-en-scène, or without. It is thus that, without exception, all Meyerbeer's great operas have been produced at Dantzig; and if Robert le Diable and Les Huguenots, have become completely established as popular works here, they are, most assuredly, not indebted to it for the splendour of the mise-en-scène. This may be taken as a proof that Meyerbeer's is something more than music relying merely on scenery, and that the speculating upon effects, of which classical rigorists have so frequently accused this master, enabled him to accomplish results such as no other composer of modern times ever achieved in the sphere of opera." At Dantzic, as elsewhere, L'Africaine is a great success.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Signale, writing from Prague, says:—

"It has recently become the fashion, whenever a female Italian vocalist, old and forgotten, closes her eyes in some out-of-the-way corner of the earth, to state that she created the part of Zerlina in Mozart's Don Juan. We find this assertion made in the necrological notice now going the round of the press, of Mdlle. Codecasa, the beautiful Saporiti. Now it is an established fact that the first Zerlina in Prague was Signora Bondini. On the 5th January, 1834, Herr Stepanek, a theatrical manager, related, in the preface to his Bohemian translation of Don Juan, what he had heard from the lips of trustworthy witnesses, concerning the early representations of this opera of operas. He tells us very humorously how Mozart, who, as we are all aware, himself directed the rehearsals at Prague, unexpectedly caught hold of Madame Bondini (Zerlina) who, not loud enough in the finale of the first act to please him, and grasped her so tightly that, in her fright, she gave a scream, which he begged her to repeat at the public performance. Signora Micelli, who sustained the part of Elvira, cast some black looks at Mozart, for taking, in her opinion, the tempo too fast. Mozart remarked this, but paid no attention to it. He punished her by exclaiming, when she had finished, 'Bravo, Micelli!' When, on the dissolution of the Italian operatic company, Don Juan was given for the first time in German, the representative of Zerlina was Mdlle. Müller, afterwards Madame Grünbaum."

THE most pressing offers have been made to Herr Hans Von Bülow to conduct Herr R. Wagner's Walkyre at Munich. No person still in the possession of his right senses will be surprised to learn that Herr Von Bülow has sternly refused. The new Joint-Stock Theatre has been sold by auction a second time. The price was 75,000 florins, and the purchaser, a Herr Hemeter. This entails a loss of more than 600,000 florins upon the first cost. The holders of preference stock will lose fifty per cent; the original shareholders will lose everything.

THE movement for instructing women in science and art goes bravely on at South Kensington, and is now to include music, which accounts for our noticing the affair here. We were by no means sure that music would have attention, because it is just the art most useful and becoming to those whom the South Kensingtonians teach. As things go, we are justified in regarding this as fatal to its claims. But the South Kensingtonians are disposed to violate precedent and be practical; they are also disposed to do thoroughly what they attempt. Hence the engagement of Mr. Arthur Sullivan as teacher, and hence the peculiar course of teaching he will superintend. The ladies are actually to learn something of the theory of music! Shades of departed Minerva's and has it come to this! Can it be that a woman shall know the difference between what is written in the clef of C and that of G! Ah! well, these are times. Moreover, Mr. Sullivan is required to teach his fair pupils how to sing in parts, and to convey much information about musical "colour" and the like. Moreover, and further—but why go on? Let every lady who loves music, who has the time to indulge her love, and the inclination to sacrifice for it the price of a new bonnet, rally round Mr. Sullivan in the Lecture Theatre of the South Kensington Museum on Tuesday next at 11 in the morning. The doubtful can look on for half-a-crown and see how they like Mr. Sullivan, his words and ways.

CARLOTTA PATTI IN AMERICA.

(From the "Macon (Georgia) Telegraph," March 4, 1870.)

Another crowded house greeted Mdlle. Carlotta Patti and her talented company last night at Concert Hall. The audience, as on Wednesday, was composed almost entirely of the elite and refined of the city, and we do not think we ever saw an audience more delighted with an evening's entertainment. There was not a piece in the programme, from first to last, that was not most rapturously applauded and its repetition demanded. To properly appreciate the wonderful, the charming, the almost inspired vocalization of Carlotta Patti, one must hear her sing a second or third time, and at intervals of twenty-four or forty-eight hours. The sweetness and compass of her voice, together with its brilliancy of execution, bewilders one at first, and amid mingled emotions of admiration and enthusiasm one is very apt to form a conception of her vocal powers below what those powers really are. In other words, she intoxicates the senses at first, and until they sober down by reflection and become accustomed, so to speak, to the magic spell, we fail to compensate her genius. Therefore, we liked her singing last night better than on the night before, because we had a higher appreciation of it—were better prepared to love while we listened. And such is more or less the case with every member of this troupe.

"Where's my Music?"

Said the Giant.

"Madame Arabella Goddard is about to leave for the Continent. American journals express a great desire that she would visit the United States."

Mr. Punch seldom interferes with a lady's arrangements, but on the present occasion he begs leave—takes it, in fact—to express a great desire that Madame Arabella Goddard would not visit the United States. As for the Continent, it is too late to grumble; but had we known of her intention, we should have taken the liberty of serving a ne exeat on her. We are not clear that we cannot demand her back, under the Extradition Treaty. Perfection in Art has its duties as well as its rights, and Madame Arabella Goddard's first duty is to Punch. Therefore, in her obedience, is to play Beethoven and Mendelssohn to him in the way his soul loveth? Who is to convert his grand pianoforte from a box of (possible) music into a living and singing thing? He doesn't pause for a reply; for if anybody said anything but "Nobody," it would be bad times for that adventurer. If, however, this trip is merely an affair of a holiday, after a detestable winter, and much artistic work, gloriously done, Mr. Punch will say no more, except that he is rather a ready hand at perpetually telegraphing. But as for the United States—not if the President undertook to send, in return, a receipt for the Alabama claims, and a douceur to Mr. Punch of all that was made by the Erie Ring in the days of the gold-jobbery.

"Godardus, whence the Goddards, was seated in England before Richard the Second," says the learned Mr. Mark Antony Lower; and the sooner Madame Goddard is seated in England before a Broadwood, the better Mr. Punch will be pleased.

Punch.

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

An evening concert took place on Friday week in St. Luke's Schoolroom, Nutford Place, Edgeware Road, for the blind poor of London. The vocalists were Mesdames Marie Stocken, Ethel Brock, Talbot Cherer, and Flora Hilbron, with Messrs. R. Soppitt and Charles James Blahenden. Several excellent selections were given, and deservedly applauded. Mr. Blahenden in his ballad, "Dearer to my soul than art," created a legitimate effect. Messrs. W. Ganz, W. Wilkinson, and Stanislaus, presided at the pianoforte.

Mr. Walter Macfarren's first matinée for the season took place in the Queen's Concert Rooms, on Saturday last. Mr. Macfarren played, with his usual ability, Beethoven's fantasia (Op. 97); Album Blatt (Op. 117), Mendelssohn; and Andante (Op. 82) by the same composer, together with his own Saltarelle-romance, "Parmi les Montagnes," and impromptu, "Mountain Stream." He also, in conjunction with Mr. Lazarus, and Mr. Henry Holmes, played Mozart's trio, in E flat, and with his talented pupil, Miss Linda Scates, Hummel's grand duet, in A flat, for two pianofortes, which was deservedly applauded. His own new sonata, for pianoforte and violin, played by himself and Mr. W. H. Holmes, contributed to the success of the matinée. The vocalists were Miss Edith Wynne and Miss Randal. The former sang two charming sacred songs by Mr. W. Macfarren, and "The first Violet," by Mendelssohn. Miss Randal gave songs by Handel and Schubert with excellent effect.

Under the auspices of Miss Owen (daughter of the Rev. Mr. Owen, rector of St. Jude's, Chelsea), a concert of vocal and instrumental music took place on Wednesday evening, the 20th instant, for the benefit of the St. Jude's National Schools. Great praise is due to the accomplished lady who organised the concert, and induced so many distinguished amateurs to give their aid. Among the vocal gems were "Non piu mesta," sung by Miss Braham, who was encored, and a Spanish song, "La Colasa," by the same lady, who accompanied on the guitar. Goria's "Souvenir de Bellini" was played on the pianoforte by Miss Sagrini, with an expression and brilliancy of execution which brought down a storm of applause. Her style is pure and elegant, remarkable for delicacy and finish, qualities for the display of which those genius matches, "Mira O Norma," and the finale to the second act of La Sonnambula gave ample opportunity. Signor Nappi was encored in Rossini's "La Danza;" and Signor Bianchi accompanied the vocal music. The room was full, and the concert a decided success.

The professional students of the London Academy of Music combined their forces last week to give what may after all be termed an amateur concert, at St. George's Hall. The character of such entertainments need no comment, save that they do not involve the miseries sometimes inflicted by the totally unmusical on any of the learned callings not unfrequent amongst professionals of long standing. Such a concert may be likened to a friendly passage at arms, where the foils are well buttoned, the faces well masked, and the gloves fairly distributed amongst ladies and gentlemen alike. Of a programme comprising exactly three dozen pieces what can be said, except an expression of regret that much of the best was thrown into the second half of an overgrown evening, and that many of the audience were indeed, by sheer fatigue, to leave without hearing that which might have delighted them? Amongst the most promising may be mentioned Miss Matilda Scott, a medallist, who produced a powerful impression in "Ah non giunge." Mr. Desmond Ryan's name is new as that of a vocalist, well known as the name has been for years in all artistic circles. He made nothing short of a hit in Ricci's "Sulla poppa," displaying a fine baritone voice of remarkable register in the trio in E flat of Hummel. Pianoforte by Miss Cinrisie Baker, associate and lady teacher; violin, Herr Ludwig, and violoncello, M. Paque, both professors; we find in our programme the emphatic word, "good," and something decidedly stronger to Miss Weale's "Ah! fors è lui." Those who heard this lady could not feel any doubt of her power to do justice to Verdi. Her clear and sympathetic voice rang through the hall with brilliant effect; and, doubtless, with a little more study, Miss Weale may have a successful future. The concert seemed to give great satisfaction.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The 83rd and last concert of the 12th season (the 350th since the Monday Popular Concerts were instituted) was, as usual, for the benefit of the director, Mr. S. Arthur Chappell; as usual, St. James's Hall was crowded in every part; and, as usual, the programme was of that "miscellaneous" character which happily makes this particular occasion an exceptional one. There were three pianists—Madame Schumann, Mr. Hallé, and Herr Pauer. Madame Schumann and Mr. Hallé each introduced a solo—the lady selecting Chopin's well-known Scherzo in B flat minor, Op. 31; the gentlemen, three of the equally well-known Harpsichord Lessons of Domenico Scarlatti. Herr Pauer, less ambitious, was satisfied to join Signor Piatti in Beethoven's Variations, for pianoforte and violoncello, on "See the conquering hero comes"—in which Handel's primitive melody, it must be admitted, bears away the palm from each and all of ths (for Beethoven) not very interesting variations—twelve in number. The incomparable violoncellist, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Benedict, gave the Romance sans Paroles, in D, which Mendelssohn composed for the celebrated lady violoncellist, Mdlle. Lisa Cristiani—a posthumous publication, as graceful as it is unpretending. An organ solo, in the shape of a chorale with variations, in E flat, by Mr. Henry Smart, an admirable composition, executed with admirable skill by Master Charles Le Jeune, began the first part; and the slow movement from Spohr's sixth violin concerto (in G minor), played by Herr Joachim as only Herr Joachim can play, and accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Zerbini, began the second part of the concert. Master Le Jeune, instead of giving "O, ruddier than the cherry" in response to the loud applause of the audience, would have done more wisely had he restored the three variations which, very unwisely, he had omitted from the work of Mr. Smart. Herr Joachim's performance created, and no wonder, extraordinary enthusiasm. He was twice called back, and in spite of the printed admonition of Mr. Chappell—entreating the audience, in consideration of the length of the programme, not to insist upon encores—the great artist was compelled to play one more piece, his choice this time falling on one of those movements from the solo sonatas of Bach, in the execution of which he is unrivalled. Miss Edith Wynne gave three songs—Cherubini's "Ave Maria" (clarionet obbligato, Mr. Lazarus); Mr. Benedict's "Maiden's Dream" (accompanied by the composer); and Mr. A. S. Sullivan's "Orphens with his lute" (also accompanied by its composer). The concert terminated with Bach's concerto in C major, for three pianofortes—executants, Madame Schumann, Mr. Hallé, and Herr Pauer. But the most interesting feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's magnificent quintet, for strings, in B flat, Op. 87 ("posthumous"), magnificently led by Herr Joachim, who, in MM. L. Ries (second violin), Straus and Zerbini (violas), and Piatti (violoncello), found worthy coadjutors. The Andante Scherzando (in G minor) and Adagio (in D minor) of this quintet were worth the whole concert. It may be remembered by not a few amateurs that the quintet in B flat was the first piece at the first Monday Popular Concert—February 14, 1859, when it was performed by MM. Wieniawski, L. Ries, Doyle, Schreurs, and Piatti. It was as welcome now as then, and sounded just as fresh, although it has been given eleven times since in St. James's Hall.

The season just terminated has been remarkable for the more than usually frequent production of pieces either altogether new or but little familiar to Mr. Chappell's habitual supporters. Most of these were brought forward at the instigation of Herr Joachim, who all through the season has been playing his very best—which means the best of the best; and, to single out one instance from many, whose performance in Beethoven's great quartet, Op. 132, in B flat, one of the most wonderful of the series that used erroneously to be denominated "Posthumous," can never be forgotten by those who were fortunate enough to hear it.

The Monday Popular Concerts are to be resumed in November. Every lover of genuine music must desire their continued success.

PROVINCIAL.

Edinburgh.—The Scotsman of April 16th says:—

"Professor Oakeley played yesterday afternoon on the organ in the Music Class-room the following selection of music, chiefly chosen as being appropriate to the season:—

"Overture, 'Passions,' Haydn. Chorus, 'Behold the Lamb of God'; Air, 'He was despised.' Choruses: 'Surely He hath borne our griefs,' 'And with His stripes we are healed' (Messiah), Handel. Solo and chorus, 'Though all thy friends forsake Thee' (Calvary), Spohr. Choruses: 'Rex tremendæ Majestatis,' 'Dies iræ' (Requiem), Mozart. Armonia Religiosa, or 'Silver Trumpets' (as heard in the dome of St. Peters, Rome). Allegretto, Symphony No. 8, Beethoven. Etude (partly in canon) for Pedal-Flügel, Schumann. Fugue for organ in E flat (a 5 voci), Bach.

"As this is, if we mistake not, the last organ recital for the season, we cannot help expressing our gratification at the great privilege which the lovers of music in Edinburgh have enjoyed from time to time in the opportunities of hearing this magnificent organ played by a performer of Mr. Oakeley's musical knowledge and feeling, and technical skill. Last year, enjoyable as were the organ recitals, one could not but be sensible that the organ was so powerful as to cause a reverberation, which greatly interfered with its effect. This defect has now been completely surmounted, in the first place, by the draping of the hall; and, in the second place, by what is still more important, the erection of a beautiful organ-case—the gift of a munificent benefactor to the cause of music, whose name we would gladly mention, but for his understood desire that it should not be made public. The complete success of the new arrangements was evinced by the fugue that closed yesterday's programme, where he had the full power of the instrument, yet the sound was so clear that the merest tyro in music could have no difficulty in following all the parts. The æsthetic are nowayS inferior to the acoustic merits of the organ-case; and the curtain of green velvet, embroidered with gold lace—the gift of some of the ladies who have been present at the performances—sets it off to the greatest advantage. We are also glad to see a correct representation of the arms of the founder of the Music Chair figuring conspicuously in front of the organ."

Digitized by Google

SLOUGH.—A correspondent writes:—

"Mr. Orlando Christian gave a very successful concert here on Tuesday, April 19th, the Literary Institution being well filled. The artists were Madame Emmeline Cole, Miss Lazarus, R.A.M., and Messrs. Large, Smith, Mellor, Christian, &c., of the Windsor and Eton Choirs. Randegger's trio, 'I Naviganti,' nicely rendered by Madame E. Cole and Messrs. Mellor and Christian, was loudly encored. Wade's 'Love was once a little boy,' given by Madame Cole, and Gounod's fine song, 'The Valley,' sung by Mr. Christian, were both encored; and the glees and part-songs came in for a large share of applause. Miss Lazarus was solo pianist and accompanist."

READING.—The Choral Union performed the Messiah on Monday, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Birch, the principals being Madame E. Cole, Miss Fanny Reeves, Mr. Elliot Galer, and Mr. O. Christian, who sang in their usual artistic manner. The band, led by Mr. John Day, played excellently.

MR. AYRTON AND SUNDAY BANDS.

The "intelligent foreigner" who is always supposed to be "among us, takin' notes," has, probably, got it written down somewhere, that our Government supplies the people with such music as may be heard in the national recreation grounds. He is mistaken as usual, but the mistake is very natural. All over the Continent the Sunday music of military bands is a recognised attraction of the day; and being so cheap a means of pleasure in proportion to its results, a stranger might well suppose that a government having any sympathy for the governed would be quick to use it. But we have our own way of doing things in England—or, rather, the English Government, when the pleasure of the people is concerned, has its own way of not doing things. In all such matters our high officials are devotees of voluntaryism. Their motto is, "If you want a thing done, do it yourself;" and their creed, "God helps those who help themselves." So they look on, and only throw an impediment, now and then, in the way of those who would do the work; taking care beforehand that the direct instruments of impeding shall have no sympathy with the cause.

Everybody knows that the control of the parks and of the bands therein belongs to Acton Smee Ayrton, Esq., M.P. for the Tower Hamlets. The choice of this gentleman for his present post was so curious that it can only be explained by curious considerations. In the first place, Mr. Ayrton was an independent member with a disagreeable and untiring tongue, which it was desirable to silence by the gag of office. Next, he possessed no special qualifications, a fact testified by his own speeches. For these reasons, and these alone, so far as we can see, Acton Smee Ayrton, Esq., was made First Commissioner of Works. It was tolerably certain that, sooner or later, Mr. Ayrton would do something disagreeable. If he could no longer make bitter speeches in the House, in the parks he reigned supreme; and, moreover, could there spread annoyance over a larger area. Hence, when there was talk of disallowing the flowers, some time ago, people called to mind who was First Commissioner and nobody wondered. Nobody wonders now that Mr. Ayrton has thought fit to interfere with the good folk who take the trouble to provide the parks with Sunday bands. The First Commissioner has, it appears, does two distinct things. In the first place he has said to the "Regent, Victoria, and Battersea Parks Sunday Bands Committee, "You shall have nothing at all to do with music in the Regent's Park," and, next, "You shall not play dance music in the places to which your licence is now limited." Very naturally this arbitrary interference roused the committee, and a deputation waited upon Mr. Ayrton last Wednesday week to remonstrate upon the subject. The deputation was introduced by Mr. R. M. Morrell, who is reported to have said "since the band of the Regent's Park had been placed under the control of the proprietor of the chairs in the park the band had been diminished by one-half. The Band Committee of the Sunday League considered that they were the trustees of the public to provide for the efficient performance of music in the parks, and they objected to their being handed over to a mere private speculator. The other point they wished to press on the minister was that, although permission had been given to them to perform music on Sunday in the Victoria and Battersea Parks, yet they were prohibited from performing dance music. They considered it above all necessary that they should perform lively and not dull heavy music, and were at a loss to know what objection there could be to the performance of quadrilles founded upon the national airs. Mr. Morrell pointed out that during fourteen years in which music had been performed in the parks there had been no disorder or any occasion for the interference of the police. It did not follow that because they performed dance music, people danced, although perhaps a few young persons on the outside might."

It appears from this that Mr. Ayrton means to traffic in the Sunday bands, and so "turn an honest penny" for our Liberal Government. We should like to know the conditions of contract between the First Commissioner of Works and the chair proprietor of Regent's Park; how much the latter engages to give the former for the privilege of farming the Sunday bands, and also whether there are any clauses to prevent the chair proprietor from acting upon his own notion of what a band should be. These particulars forthcoming, the public would most likely have in possession a curiosity of state only to be paralleled by the Royal patents of former days. With regard to the dance music question, we must go to Mr. Ayrton himself for light. Here is his reply to the deputation:—"Mr. Ayrton said that he wished to disabuse the deputation of the idea that they were acting as trustees for the people. The only trustee for the people in this matter was himself—he was appointed by law. They, on the other hand, were a self-constituted body of persons who wished to perform music in the parks, and had obtained permission to do so under certain conditions. One of those conditions was that they were not to perform a description of music which was disagreeable to the ordinary visitors of the park, and he was informed that dance music was. Moreover, there was plenty of lively music which was not of that description. Their object should be to elevate and not degrade the national taste. There was no objection to the performance of the national melodies with any variations they pleased, but certainly was never the intention of those composers to degrade them into dance music in the shape of quadrilles, waltzes, or polkas. The custom was commenced by M. Jullien, who, he considered, did a great deal of harm to the national music and greatly vitiated the public taste. However that may be, it was plain that the primary object of the parks was to enable people to walk or ride in them, and they were not to have their feelings outraged because the Sunday League wished to play dance music. With regard to the diminution of the band since the chair proprietor of Regent's Park undertook to provide it, he would make inquiries. So long as the chair proprietor provided a proper band and proper music he was not disposed to take it out of his hands on the assumption that the Sunday Bands Committee were in the performance of a public trust. Mr. Palmer asked whether the right honourable gentleman would undertake to define dance music, because if they played an operatic selection they might be accused of infringing the law. Mr. Ayrton said that dance music was perfectly well known to musicians, and they must have one to conduct their band. They certainly would not be allowed to select all the dances out of operatic selections and perform them under the title of operatic music. In dance music he included the whole category of polkas, waltzes, quadrilles, and all sorts of hurdy-gurdy music, &c. It was quite a mistake to suppose that because the people chose to pay for it they could have anything they liked in the Royal park; and, in point of fact, he had had applications for races, merry-go-rounds, and all sorts of other amusements in the parks, on the plea that the people would pay for them. No doubt, if he put aside part of the parks for cock-fighting, people would be found to pay for it. They would make the park a tea-garden first and a bear-garden afterwards if such applications were granted." We pass over the insolent tone of this speech (not without sorrow that the speaker is an English State official) in order to say, at once, that Mr. Ayrton's objection to dance music is wholly incomprehensible, unless he has been "got at" by the Lord's Day Society. What he say about degrading the national taste is simply absurd, while his hit at poor M. Jullien is positively unjust. We cannot, however, expect Mr. Ayrton to know that there is dance music in Guillaume Tell, in the Africaine, and a dozen other operas which may claim to rank with the classics of art; we cannot expect him to know that all the great composers, from Bach downwards, have written what he calls "hurdy-gurdy music;" neither can we expect him to know that M. Jullien did more to improve the taste of this country than any other man living or dead. Mr. Ayrton has himself confessed his ignorance of art, and therefore blunders are natural to him when dealing with artistic questions. That dance music should be prohibited at all out of regard for a minority who could easily keep their delicate sensibilities out of the reach is bad enough; that it should be prohibited by an official who evidently knows nothing about the matter, adds insult to injury. We hope the Sunday Bands Committee will not let the affair rest, they must teach the "trustee for the people" what the people require of him.

Digitized by Google

THADDEUS EGG.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The activity displayed thus early in the season by the Covent Garden managers is remarkable. We have already noticed the production of four operas, and to these we have now to add a fifth and a sixth—all be it understood, comprised within the history of less than a fortnight.

Guillaume Tell, the last of the four works to which we have referred, was followed by Lucrezia Borgia. But for one incident a line might suffice to inform our readers that Donizetti's well-worn and, in a musical sense, semi-tragic opera had been played last night. With Mdlle. Tietjens in the theatre that notable event was pretty sure to occur in due course. How Mdlle. Tietjens acts and sings the part of Lucrezia has been described so frequently and in such detail that it would be superfluous to say more than that her voice was in perfect order; that she was—what she had not been on the night of Fidelio—complete mistress of her means; and that her performance throughout was admirable. Signor Graziani played the Duke of Ferrara as mysteriously and gave his music as effectively as ever; and Signor Nandin, who, taking into consideration the extent and variety of his repertory, is one of the most generally serviceable tenors on the Italian stage, was the Gennaro. The popular trio, "Guai se il sfuggo un motto"—when the Duke, in the despair of Lucrezia, persuades Gennaro to drink from the goblet steeped in the Borgian poison, uncommonly well sung by the artists we have named, was encored and repeated—having stated which, we are absolved from entering into further particulars.

The novelty of the evening was the first appearance of Mdlle. Carl, a young American, who at Brussels has earned a certain repute as a singer in concerts, &c., and who, in the character of Maffeo Orsini, first raised to significance by Alboni, three-and-twenty years ago, at the Royal Italian Opera, produced a highly favourable impression. The voice of Mdlle. Carl is rather a mezzo-soprano than a contralto; but that she can use it to good purpose was at once made apparent in the opening scene of the "Prologue," by her easy delivery of the air, "Nella fatal di Rimini e memorabil guerra"—which relates how, after being saved from death by Gennaro, Orsini is visited by the apparition of what one of the operatic English versions of Lucrezia Borgia describes as "a gigantic old man, clad in a black robe." However, as might have been expected, it was not until the scene where the famous drinking song, "Il segreto per esser felice," occurs that the success of the new comer was decided. Here Mdlle. Carl exhibited both dramatic spirit and vocal fluency, wisely refraining, by the way, from any attempt at imitating that wonderfully prolonged and wonderfully rounded off-shake on the high "E," just before the last return of the theme, with which Alboni used to move the audience into ecstacies of delight, and nightly win a "double encore." Instead the same no "high shake" in Mdlle. Carl's version of the brindisi (any more than there is in Donizetti's), and no "double encore" resulted; but the air was well and unaffectedly sung, and the "single encore" awarded to the last couplet was hearty and unanimous. In other respects the performance of Lucrezia Borgia, in which Signor Tagliafico's quietly subtle impersonation of Gubetta, the confidential agent of the Duchess, can never be overlooked, was what it rarely fails to be at Covent Garden.

To Lucrezia succeeded the same composer's lively Figlia del Reggimento, which, though originally composed for the Opéra-Comique, is just as popular in Italian as it ever was in French, and, indeed, through the medium of the Italian version, has chiefly been saved from oblivion. The opinion of those who, previously acquainted with Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi's talent, maintain that comic, rather than serious, opera is her forte was in a great measure confirmed on the occasion under notice. Her Maria is a more finished, as well as a more spirited, assumption than her Lucia, and her success was proportionately greater. We can remember impersonations of the devoted Vivandière more characteristically marked; and we have heard the music given with better sustained vivacity; but, eschewing comparisons, we may describe Mdlle. Sessi's general performance as one of far more than average merit. Her voice is powerful as well as flexible to an extent that her first essay had not led us to imagine. About its agreeable quality there could have been no more question than about the fact of its being a pure and legitimate soprano. In the first duet with Sulpizio, Mdlle. Sessi seemed, in a measure, to be feeling her way; but in the subsequent duet with Tonio (Maria's lover), which followed, she was quite at home, and her utterance of the well-known phrase—was marked by an archness thoroughly in keeping, and accompanied by appropriate and significant gesticulation. The military air, "Ciascun lo dice, ciascun lo sa," in which Maria dwells upon the somewhat questionable virtues of her beloved regiment, exhibited both force and character. Best of all, however, was "Convien partir; addio"—in the first finale—when the Vivandière weepingly takes leave of her soldier friends. The feeling with which this touching and beautiful passage was delivered produced such an impression on the audience as could only have been created by true and genuine earnestness, and had Mdlle. Sessi been so inclined she might have repeated it with the unanimous approval of the house. We thought the second act less equally balanced, and were somewhat disappointed with parts of the scene in which, the Marchioness of Berkenfield at the piano, Maria rehearses the old air of Caffariello, terminating with the unexpected cadenza, the throwing away of the music, the horror of the Marchioness, and the marching trio, in which much vocal and dramatic will, that stately lady is compelled by Maria and Sulpizio to take part, to the vocal refrain of the "Bataplan." The trio, nevertheless, was encored as usual, and, as a matter of course, repeated. At the conclusion of the opera, in place of the original finale, Mdlle. Sessi introduced the popular valse, by Hirsh, which Mdlle. Adelina Patti on more than one occasion, has substituted for the original finale of Don Pasquale. The general impression derived from this performance is that Mdlle. Sessi has at present the capacity to shine rather as a singer than as an actress; but that she has undoubted promise, which, backed by youth, has every chance of ripening into excellence, we have no doubt whatever. Nothing could be more encouraging than her reception by the audience. The other parts in the opera were represented by Signor Ciampi (Sulpizio), Signor Lorcen, or Della Rosa, alternis—les deux se disent—(Tonio), and Mdlle. Anese (the Marchioness). The grouping of the soldiers and mise-en-scène generally of the finale to Act 1, embodying the departure of Maria, were as picturesque and effective as of old. The choruses were effectively given almost without exception; and the orchestral accompaniments, under Signor Vianesi's direction, left very little to desire.

"Vedsam, udism, Ascoltiam e guidichiam,"

About the performance of Mozart's Il Flauto Magico at this theatre on Saturday night we can only say at present that, in the character of Astrifiammante, "Queen of Night," Mdlle. Sessi achieved a new success, being encored in her second and most trying air, "Gli angui d'inferno"—transposed, as customary ever since the time of Anna Zerr,* a note lower than the original, which brings it considerably nearer to the pitch designed by Mozart himself), and given by the new singer with remarkable animation. We shall recur to Il Flauto Magico, which was given again on Thursday. On Monday night Guillaume Tell was repeated—a better opera than which, taking into account its gorgeous music, beautiful scenery, picturesque costumes, and general stage effect, as represented at Covent Garden, could hardly have been selected for Easter-Monday. La Figlia del Reggimento was repeated on Tuesday. To-night, Mdlle. Sessi is to appear as the heroine of the Traviata. On Tuesday week Signor Mario will make his first appearance, after a year's absence, as the Duke in Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera.

WAIFS.

The Prince of Wales has promised to preside at the annual dinner of the Royal General Theatrical Fund, on the 16th of May.

M. Arban has been appointed musical director of Cremorne Gardens for the ensuing season.

Mr. Charles Hallé goes to Paris shortly, in order to give one or more pianoforte recitals.

Le Ménestrel says that Herr Wagner has been named Director General of Music at Berlin. We very strongly doubt the statement.

Miss Bateman has arrived at Liverpool from America. She will pass two or three months on the Continent to recruit her health, prior to commencing her provincial engagements in England in October.

* Who used to sing it always in the original keys (D minor and F Major).

Digitized by Google

Les Folies Marigny, the summer theatre in the Champs Elysées, has been purchased from M. Montaubry by M. Ledue.

The average receipts during the eight nights' run of Lohengrin, at Brussels, were 3,570 francs.

M. de Flotow has left Paris for Vienna on "urgent private affairs"—which, we presume, will delay the production of his new opera.

Herr Achenbach has produced Mendelssohn's St. Paul, in a dramatic form, at Düsseldorf.

The report that M. Carvalho has been re-appointed director of the Théâtre Lyrique is premature, to say the least. The Minister of Fine Arts has the whole matter still under consideration.

Mr. Cowen, whose first symphony was received with so much favour at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, is engaged upon a cantata, for voices and orchestra.

M. Kœnig, a well-known singer at the Grand Opera, has just retired from public life. How desirable it is that other well-known singers should perform the same difficult feat, we need not say.

Madame Ristori has settled in Paris, at her old quarters on the Boulevards Malesherbes. She has been reading for the benefit of a charitable institution.

The Delassements-Comiques (Paris) is again changing hands. Its management now devolves upon a triumvirate, composed of MM. Gastehy, A. de Jallais, and Lemonnier.

A series of performances in aid of the funds of the local charities at Manchester has taken place at the Theatre Royal, and on Thursday they were brought to a close. With donations, &c., the charities will, it is expected, be benefited to the extent of nearly £2000.

We observe that on the occasion of his benefit at the Princess's Theatre last week, Mr. Montague played the part of Romeo, being a singular, possibly the only, instance of a Montague representing the young Montague.

A Calvinistic dislike to theatres still lingers in Geneva. The theatre has once more been closed, and the manager retires with serious loss. This is the third manager the theatre has ruined in as many years, despite its receiving a subvention from the municipality.

The Accademia Filarmonica of Rome, which was closed on political grounds some years ago, has been allowed to reconstitute itself under the patronage of Cardinal di Pietro. It has begun its new career with one of Verdi's operas.

There is some prospect of Calcutta being without an opera next year, as there is great discontent with the impresserios. There is a proposition to get a company direct from one of the agents at Milan. It is said Calcutta wants a decent company and decent music.

Herr Wagner's Walkyrie is to be brought out at Munich in May, the King having given express orders to that effect. The Rheingold will be played at the same time, with new machinery and effects. All this, however, assumes that the parties interested can agree upon a chef d'orchestre, which seems not likely.

Mr. Kennedy, the Scotch vocalist, announces a second series of the "Songs of Scotland" at the Hanover Square Rooms, to commence on Monday next. Mr. Kennedy has made use of his American "interviewing" to introduce into his entertainment sketches of characters in the "Far West," including Brigham Young, the Mormon chief, and other characters.

The production of Halévy's Charles the Sixth, at the Théâtre Lyrique, has had a very moderate success. Every effort was made by a well-drilled claque to revive the once popular refrain—

Guerre aux tyrans! Jamais en France—
Jamais l'Anglais ne régnera.

But times have changed since 1843, and the audience simply laughed.

The complimentary banquet offered by the Scandinavian residents in Paris to Mdlle. Nilsson, took place on Wednesday evening before last at the Trois Frères Provençaux. A whole squadron of young beauties of the North formed a cortège for the charming cantatrice, and at the dessert M. Prévost-Paradol pronounced, in a few well-chosen words, a handsome eulogium on Northern hospitality. The principal result of this hospitable meeting was a decision to form a fund of Scandinavian charity. A concert given after Easter will furnish the first instalment.

THE CANDLE SYMPHONY.

It is no rare occurrence to see some of the gravest and the most severe musicians—musicians who, as a rule, are distinguished for their grand inspirations—abandon themselves, in fits of caprice, to the most diverting instances of musical buffoonery. In the midst of an old book comprising different works by Carissimi, in the midst of psalms, and of motets written in the severest style imaginable, the reader is greatly astonished, and even greatly delighted, at coming across such pieces as the "Capuchin's Beard" (Venerabilis barba capucinorum); "An Ass's Will," with an imitation of the testator's melodious voice; the "Lesson in the Rudiments, or the Declension of the pronoun, Hic, Hæc, Hoc;" "The Burlesque Requiem," in which a grave voice slowly pronounces the funereal words, while the soprano sings the following anything but poetic lines:—

"Quand mon mari vient de dehors
Ma reste est d'être battue."

We all know the admirable bit of musical buffoonery written by Mozart to ridicule his set of amateurs at Prague. Berlon, the author of Montano et Stéphanie, published a small collection of canons, in which the most profound science is applied to the treatment of the most comical ideas. Les Héraclites et les Démocrite, a canon, with double chorus, in which one set lament and complain to a sorrowful and devout melody, while the second set sing "la bouteille et son fus divin," is a work of only a few pages, but the hand of a master is as apparent as it would be in a work of greater compass. Who, however, can fancy Haydn, the most learned, the most serious, and the most methodical of composers, with his frilled shirt front, his lace ruffles, and his venerable perruque, seated at his table writing works that give him the right to the title of the prince of burlesque composers? Never, however, was a title more deserved.

Haydn's musical pleasantries are numerous; some are exceedingly strange. The "Ox Minuet" is celebrated. We know that Haydn endeavored to imitate in it the lumbering gait and awkwardness of the patient animal just named. For some time a rivalry existed between Haydn and Steibelt. The latter's symphonies carried off the palm, even in the opinion of the English, from those of the great composer. Haydn was annoyed at this preference thus shown to his rival. One day he had an explanation with his friends on the subject. "Steibelt!" he said, with an accent of the most profound contempt, "I will crush him!"

How shall we make the reader understand in what manner Haydn was resolved to crush Steibelt? We read, in a chronicle of the Middle Ages, that a man who was possessed, and whom the devil would not allow a moment's respite, went to consult a famous exorciser. The latter ordered the poor wretch to seat himself in a butt of water, with only his head above the surface. He then went through the usual forms. The devil was conquered, but, fearing to meet the irritated face of the exorciser, he knocked out the bottom of the butt and fled obstreperously. It was with an explosion of this kind that Haydn determined to crush Steibelt. So, when, in the midst of an admirable piece, in which the master had exhausted all the resources of his genius, the formidable low C of the bassoon was unexpectedly heard, every one was seized with an incontrollable fit of laughter; the imitation was perfect, and Steibelt was dethroned.

The Candle Symphony boasts a rather curious origin. The musicians of some petty German prince or other were very unpunctual at rehearsals; they came late, and frequently blew out their candles and went away before the rehearsal was over. The following is the plan of it:—The first piece is written in a very beautiful style; the andante with the mutes is delicious; the minuet is lively and rapid; next comes the finale, consisting of two movements, the first in duple time, and the second, andante amoroso, in triple time. The last part then commences. From its very beginning, something eccentric, unusual, out-of-the-way, greets, now and then, the ear; a horn disports out of its own proper domain; a clarionet allows sounds to escape from it which appear but little consonant with its mild and melancholy character. Is it possible that Haydn's genius is deserting him, the audience must have thought. Suddenly a horn indulges in a most execrable solo, and then, humiliated by the phrase allotted to it, blows out its candle and slowly steals off. The confusion continues. The clarionet also, puts out its candle, and escapes in its turn. The horn in A, lost up in the very high notes, quietly drops down on the middle A, and imitates its fellows. The double-bass endeavours to hold its own against the storm, and runs furiously up and down the four strings. But, very shortly, utterly worn out and exhausted, the terrible instrument ceases its rumblings and disappears. The violoncello does the same; the finte follows; the tenors and the violins hurry off, and out go their candles. The harmony, so powerful a short time previously, is now nothing more than a vague and confused murmur; it is the distant noise of the sea; the murmuring breeze; a humming-bird flying past; the flight of a gnat; and then nothing at all. The first violin, left by itself, extinguishes the single modest light in the orchestra, makes a very low bow to the spectators, and retires, like a captain who does not abandon the fight till all his soldiers have deserted.

Such is the Candle Symphony.

Digitized by Google

NEW MUSIC.

Sydney Smith's Method for the Pianoforte. [London: Ashdown & Parry.] A PIANOFORTE instruction book written by one of the most popular of pianoforte composers must always be worth attention, and can hardly fail to have a special value. Both results are attained by the work before us. Mr. Smith "begins at the beginning," and after taking his pupil through the first elements of notation (with which is combined a study of the keyboard), he proceeds by an admirable sequence of lessons and exercises to cultivate alike the performing hand and the directing mind. Some of his devices are peculiarly happy—that, for example, which keeps before the student's eye the relative value of the notes to be played. There are other features in the work of unommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible and, therefore, effective.

I'll twine for thee a wreath of flowers. Ballad. Words by LORD BYRON. Music by ROBERT HILTON, of the Cathedral Choir, Salisbury. [London: Ashdown & Parry.]

THIS ballad makes very modest pretensions, but justifies such as it makes. The melody has an easy and graceful flow, and the accompaniment is correct if not novel. All this, however, barely justifies another addition to the huge stock of ballads having no special raison d'etre. Composers should be merciful to their generation, and practice the virtue of reticence.

Philomel. Waltz. Composed by G. RICHARDSON, Musical Director, Globe Theatre. [London: John Shepherd.]

THIS waltz is dedicated to Miss Lydia Foote, who need not be offended at the compliment. It is tuneful, and, therefore, pleasing. Nevertheless, why write waltzes which are merely tuneful and pleasing? The "canterburys" of our drawing-rooms groan beneath the weight of such things,—moreover, hot weather is coming on, and the very suggestion of dancing causes matter to exude.

Has sorrow thy young days shaded? Transcribed for the Pianoforte by JOHANNES WINKELHAUS. [London: Duff & Stewart.]

A morceau de salon of a very familiar type. It is easy and, after its fashion, well made. The more difficult passages are fingered for those who need such help—that is to say, for the majority who elect to play such music.

Cascade de Perles, for Piano. Composed by JOHANNES WINKELHAUS. [London: Duff & Stewart.]

THE name of this piece is significant of its character. A "Cascade de Perles" in music is, of course, a melody surrounded by arpeggios, and modulating into some such key as D flat major, where the arpeggios subside, beginning again when the original key is resumed. All these conditions are duly met by Herr Winkelhaus, the result being a piece calculated to set pianoforte playing maidenhood in a flutter, and for maidenhood is vaccinating, to imperil the supremacy of certain other "Cascades" and "Jets d'Eau" we wot of.

Twilight Thoughts. Nocturne. Composed by Madame OURY. [London: John Blockley.]

THIS piece is numbered Op. 159, which accounts for its being mainly a reproduction of familiar mannerisms. Mdme. Oury's thoughts at twilight run in old grooves.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
OF
ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING. Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.

And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

MR. HARLEY VINNING is prepared to accept Engagements for Oratorios, Concerts, in Town or Country. For terms, address 138, Regent Street.

"LITTLE WILLIE," sung by JULES BENEDICT. This charming new song (by the popular composer of "Rock me to Sleep") is now being sung with distinguished success by Miss EDITH WYNNE. Price 3s., and may be obtained for 19 stamps from the publisher, DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss ANYON, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for Instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Guineas per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

Just Published,
(Sung with great success by Miss Julia Elton),

"THE WEAVER,"
BALLAD,
The Words by EMILY JUDSON.
The Music by KATE LUCY WARD.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."
SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Interzzone, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to
MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,
By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.
London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Just Published,
"MEMORY" (words by GEORGE E. NEWTON) ... ... 3s.
"GEM OF MY HEART" (words by W. HITCHMAN, Esq., M.D.) ... 3s.
"COME BACK AGAIN, DARLING" (words by HARLAN NEWTON) ... 3s.
Composed by WILLIAM NEWTON.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street W.

Just Published,
"I LOOKED AMONG THE LILY-BELLS,"
BALLAD.
By JACQUES OFFENBACH.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MASON & HAMLIN'S GOLD MEDAL CABINET ORGAN. ALWAYS IN TUNE, FOR ALL CLIMATES. Five Thousand Three Hundred and Four Full Sized Organs were Manufactured and Sold in 1869, being Seventeen each working day. Illustrated Books, one stamp.—BRAGINGTON & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

C. D. & H. W. SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGANS.—NEW STYLES.—Six Octave Nine Stop DRAWING-ROOM ORGANS. Ten Stop Chapel Organs, with Patent Knee Swell, Super-Octave Coupler, and Grand Sub-Bass. Always in Tune. Price lists, one stamp.—BRAGINGTON & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.
THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. VON WEBER have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s. d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3 0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3 0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	... ...	3 0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations) ...	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3 0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	4 0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad)	FLORENCE PEACY ...	4 0
And the Answer to it.
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	4 0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS.
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

Digitized by Google

Now Published,

"SUNSHINE,"

MARSHALL HALL BELL'S NEW SONG.

"SUNSHINE" was rapturously encored when sung at the composer's concert by Miss Robertine Henderson, and is published, price 2s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Just Published,

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND AND MASTER, Z. BUCK, ESQ., MUS. DOC.

"FAREWELL,"

SONG,

Sung by Mrs. H. ROBERTS MIERS, the Words by LORD BYRON.

The Music by GEORGE GAFF.

Price 2s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Where may be obtained, Composed by GEORGE GAFF,

"MAIDEN, WRAP THY MANTLE ROUND THEE."

POETRY BY KIRKE WHITE.

Just Published,

TARANTELLE,

POUR LE PIANOFORTE.

Par PAUL SEMLER.

Prix 2s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"O LADY, TWINE NO WREATH FOR ME."

SONG.

The Poetry by SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The Music by W. FRIEDRICH.

Price 2s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"LANDLER WALTZ,"

FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Composed by PAUL SEMLER.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THE WEE PET."

MAZURKA, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Composed by LOUISE WIESE.

Price 2s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY HERMANN EISOLDT.

"BRIDAL BELLS"

(MORCEAU DE SALON),

For the Pianoforte, by Hermann EISOLDT.

We read in the Dresden Journal:—"Hermann Eisoldt's 'Bridal Bells' was beautifully performed by the splendid Orchestra of Herr Music-Director Trenkler, and met with great applause. The piece being very melodious is sure to become popular." Published, price 4s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 2s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Now ready,

"MEDEA,"

SCENA ED ARIA FOR SOPRANO.

Sung by Madame Rudersdorff at the Gewandhaus Concerts, Leipsic, and by Mdlle. Tietjens, at the Norwich Festival.

Composed by ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 24 Regent Street, W.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Just Published,

6 PIECES FOR PIANO,

BY

JOHANNES WINKELHAUS.

The Publishers feel great pleasure in submitting Herr WINKELHAUS'S Six New Pieces to the notice of the Professor and Amateur. To the Professor they will prove a great relief from the monotonous arrangements which have for so long a time taken the place of a better style of music. To the Amateur they will be acceptable as the means of displaying a considerable amount of execution without the labour required for pieces of a difficult character.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN"

(VICTORIA REGINA).

is brilliantly and gracefully arranged, without being trying to a moderately advanced performer, the air is never lost sight of, and the piece is evidently by a composer of taste and experience.

"CASCADE DE PERLES."

A very elegant melody set off by passages which, while full of refinement and beauty, are completely under the hand, and consequently adapted to the means of players who combine taste with good execution.

"APOLLO AND THE NYMPHS."

Recommends itself to our notice for its characteristic simplicity and beauty. It cannot fail to please.

"CASTA DIVA AND MARCH."

(NORMA.)

These delightful subjects have never received better treatment than at the hands of Herr Winkelhaus.

"I PURITANI."

In this transcription, as in the one from Norma, Herr Winkelhaus gives us another proof of his facility in writing passages which are brilliant and effective, without being difficult.

"HAS SORROW THY YOUNG DAYS SHADED."

One of the loveliest of Irish melodies, arranged with consummate skill.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS EACH.

LONDON:

DUFF & STEWART,

147, OXFORD STREET,

(OPPOSITE BOND STREET).

Digitized by Google

Great success at the Lyceum Theatre of

HERVÉ'S

OPÉRA BOUFFE,

"LE PETIT FAUST"

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

	s.	d.
The Opera complete for pianoforte solo	7	0
The Overture-Valse. Arranged by Hervé	6	0
Do. do. (easy arrangement). By H. Valiquet ...	5	0
Polka-Entr'acte. Par Philippe Stutz...	4	6
Deux Petites Fantaisies. By J. L. Battmann ... ... each	5	0
Le Petit Faust, pot-pourri sur les motifs favoris. By F. Brissler ...	7	6
Le Petit Faust, Souvenirs par D. Croisez	5	0
"Les Quatre Saisons." Idylle. Transcription variée. Par C. Hoffmann	5	0
"Les Trois Choeurs." Polka du jardin. Par A. Mey	4	6
"Méphisto." Polka-Mazurka. Par E. Etling	4	6

SIX EASY PIECES.

		s.	d.
No. 1.	Couplets du Guerrier Valentin. Par F. Wachs	2	6
2.	Tyrolienne de Marguerite ... ,, ...	2	6
3.	Couplets du jardin ... ... ,, ...	2	6
4.	Rondo-valse de Méphisto ... ,, ...	2	6
5.	Polka des Trois Choeurs ... ,, ...	2	0
6.	Chanson du Satrape ... ,, ...	2	6

DANCE MUSIC.

	s.	d.
Le Petit Faust Quadrille. By Strauss	4	6
Do. do. Piano Duet	4	6
Do. Deuxième Quadrille. By Arban	4	6
Do. Quadrille. Facile. Par H. Valiquet	4	6
Le Petit Faust Valses. Par Olivier Metra	6	0

FLUTE AND VIOLIN.

	s.	d.
Idylle des Quatre Saisons. Méditation pour Violon et Piano. Par Bernardin	5	0

EDITIONS DE MM. HEUGEL & CIE., PARIS.

LONDON:

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.,

244, REGENT STREET, W.,

Where may be obtained

LE PETIT FAUST,

COMPLETE FOR VOICE AND PIANO (With French Words),

PRICE 12s.

And all the separate Songs, Duets, &c. from same Opera (with French Words).

The Silver Trumpets

PLAYED AT

ST. PETER'S, ROME,

DURING THE

RECENT FESTIVALS.

For the Pianoforte . . 3s.

" " Duet . 4s.

For the Organ, with Pedal Obbligato . . . 3s.

For the Harmonium . . 3s.

LONDON:

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, NEW BOND STREET, W.

Digitized by Google

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	8 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il falletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Margellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaîté (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
2nd Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bortesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissement)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4	0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4	0	...
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4	0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4	0	...
Deh Parla (Romanza)	4	0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4	0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4	0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4	0	...
Vo Danzar (Valser). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5	0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4	0	...
Margellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4	0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4	0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4	0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4	0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

SYDNEY SMITH'S

FOUR

New Pieces.

ROBERT LE DIABLE.

Fantaisie Dramatique sur l'Opéra de Meyerbeer.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

BARCAROLLE.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

FAIRY REALMS.

Grand Brilliant Waltz.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.

Paraphrase.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

LONDON

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s. d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various Kinds	7 6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	3 0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	3 6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonized in various ways, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard. ...	6 0
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7 6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 4s. each, or one vol., boards, 12s. This book, containing 53 Compositions, Includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 59 of his best Pieces. ...	6 6
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 35. Six Books in one vol.	6 0
J. T. STONES ORGAN-BOOK, an Arrangement of 18 Classical Compositions	6 0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

46. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3—Op. 13, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
48. SONATAS, Op. 22—Op. 26—Op. 27, No. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
49. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastorale), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
50. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53—Op. 54 (Aparsionata), and Op. 57.
51. SONATAS, Op. 78—Op. 79 (Caracteristique)—Op. 81—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
52. SONATAS, Op. 106—Op. 109—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Fantasia and Sonata), 2, 3.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Complete in one volume, 5s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complets in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42.) No. 2 (Op. 53.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 120.) No. 4 (Op. 122.) No. 5 (Op. 143.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 141.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, Nos 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS FOR PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 48 to 80 pages, including Overtures.

FIGARO	GRAND DUCHESS
ROBERT LE DIABLE	FIDELIO
DON JUAN	BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA
LUCREZIA BORGIA	SONNAMBULA
DER FREISCHUTZ	BALLO IN MASCHERA
CRISPINO E LA COMARE	TRAVIATA
TROVATORE	MARTHA
NORMA	WILLIAM TELL
DON PASQUALE	CROWN DIAMONDS
FRA DIAVOLO	MASANIELLO
RIGOLETTO	DOMINO NOIR
ZAMPA

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 6s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.

139. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and "Oh voules vous aller ?"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY.
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VOLKSLIEDER for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring." "Soldaten Lied," "True Love," &c.
140. STEPHEN HELLER'S 25 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s.; post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

98. SANTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original compositions, published in no other collection.
17. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BALFE, BARNE, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYDEN BAYLEY, ALEXANDRE LEE, &c.
83. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep," "My Pretty Page," "As it fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Lesson Duet," &c.
76. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
44. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
43. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
93. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET.

Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.

1. TWENTY-FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CREATION, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S FIFTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND BESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS.
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, KUHE, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.

SHILLING BOOKS OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.

113. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
100. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
120. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LAST ROSE, and LILLIE DALE.
117. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete.
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
23. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
99. FRANZ SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS and SIX MOMENS MUSICAUX. All complete.
27. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Fortuni," "Sonnambula," &c.
86. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Musical Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
96. STEPHEN HELLER'S PROMENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
90. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
84. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS.
79. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Parles et Diamans," "Il Corricolo," &c.
33, 34, 35. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.	WALPURGIS NIGHT.
HAYDN'S IMPERIAL MASS.	BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C.
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.	ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.	MOZART'S REQUIEM.
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.	DETTINGEN TE DEUM.
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.	ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE MESSIAH.	THE CREATION.

BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees 2 0

BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 60 Glees	3 0
THE CHORALIST, 96 Part-songs. 2 vols, each	2 0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	1 0
The above Works, for Societies in penny numbers.
THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs	0 6
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 56 Part-songs for village and school use	0 6

LONDON: BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Printed by HENDERSON, RAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, April 23, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 18. SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1870. PRICE { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—It is announced with much pleasure that arrangements have been entered into with the Sacred Harmonic Society for a

GRAND OPENING MUSICAL FESTIVAL,

On SATURDAY, MAY 7th, 1870,

Conductor ... SIR MICHAEL COSTA.

The First Portion of this Great Musical Festival (only possible on the Handel Orchestra at the Crystal Palace) will comprise the First Part of Mendelssohn's Oratorio,

"ELIJAH."

The Second Portion will consist of a Miscellaneous Selection, including the Machinal Anthem, which will be sung at the Coronation of the Performance.

Principal Vocalists.—Madame SINICO, Madame MONBELLI, Madame TREBELLI-BETTINI, Mr. VERNON RIGBY, Mr. SANTLEY.

The Orchestra will comprise the Two Thousand Members of the London Handel Festival Choir, other Choral bodies, the Orchestra of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and that of the Crystal Palace Company, with many other Professors and Amateurs of the first rank, comprising in the whole

UPWARDS OF THREE THOUSAND PERFORMERS.

Admission by Tickets purchased before the day, Five Shillings; by payment on the day, Seven Shillings and Sixpence. Guinea Season Tickets Free. Numbered Stalls, lettered in blocks, as at the Handel Festival, Five Shillings each, at the Palace, and 2, Exeter Hall; also, up to Friday next, with the New May Guinea Season Ticket; may also be had at the Palace, and at 2, Exeter Hall, and of the usual Agents.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

"THE PRODIGAL'S RETURN," a New Oratorio, by the Rev. H. F. LIMPUS, will be performed, for the First Time, in Aid of the Funds of St. Andrew's Convalescent Hospital, Clewer, on TUESDAY, May 10th, 1870. Principal Vocalists—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Conductor—Mr. BARNBY. The Band and Chorus will number 200 performers. Both Stalls, £1 1s.; Balcony Stalls, £1 1s.; Reserved Balcony, 10s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d. Tickets at Mr. Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Messrs. Chappell, New Bond Street; Novello, Ewer, & Co., Berners Street; Duff & Stewart, 147, Oxford Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co., Cheapside; Alfred Hays, 4, Royal Exchange Buildings; and Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LANGHAM PLACE, REGENT STREET.—TUESDAY, May 3rd, 1870.—SIGNORINA EMILY TATE respectfully announces that she will give a GRAND VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL CONCERT at the above Hall, on TUESDAY, MAY 3rd, 1870, under the special patronage of Sir Roderick Murchison, Bart. Signorina Emily Tate has recently had the honour of performing before H.R.H. the Princess of Wales and family, His Majesty the Emperor of Russia and family, Her Imperial Highness the Princess Dagmar, His Highness the Prince Hassan of Egypt, &c. Vocalists: Miss Blanche Reeves, Miss Amy Strangeways, Signora Mocca, Mr. Alfred Bayliss, and Signor Penna. Pianoforte, Signorina Emily Tate; violin, Signorina Ida Rose; violoncello, Herr Schuberth. Conductors—Mr. Francesco Berger, Herr Schuberth, and Signor Deerbelle. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; reserved seats, 5s.; balcony front seats, 3s.; admission One Shilling. Tickets to be had at St. George's Hall; at the principal Musicsellers'; and of Signorina Emily Tate, 79, Cook's Road, Kensington Park. The Concert to commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S SIXTH ANNUAL CONCERT, QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square, WEDNESDAY Evening, May 11th, Half-past Eight. Tickets, Five Shillings. Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Rebecca Jewell, Mr. de Fontainer, Mr. Aynsley Cook, and Mr. Walter Bache will sing Lachner's "Soldaten-Lied" (Faust), "Chorus of Knights" (Lohengrin), "Pilgrims' chorus" (Tannhäuser), Wagner. The Programme will be selected from the compositions of Chopin, Liszt, Deichmann, Wagner, Glinka, Hatton, Berlioz, and Schubert. Tickets at Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street, and at the Rooms.

QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, HANOVER SQUARE.—On SATURDAY Evening, May 7th, at Eight, a GRAND EVENING CONCERT will be given as a Complimentary Benefit to Mr. T. H. Sawers, Professor of Music, composer of "The Spirit of the Shell," etc., who is, and has been for months past, in a helpless state from severe attacks of Rheumatic Fever and Gout. Miss Banks, Miss Dalmaine, Miss Rebecca Jewell, Miss Ferrari, and Miss Marion Severn; Mr. Vernon Rigby and Mr. Wilson. Pianoforte—Herr Pauer and Herr Reinecke. Harpe—Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton (Harpist to Her Majesty the Queen) and Mr. J. Thomas (Pensenciel Gwalia). The Part Songs, etc., will be sung by the Canonbury Vocal Union, conducted by Mr. W. H. Monk (of King's College, London). At the Pianoforte, Mr. H. R. Eyers. Single Tickets, Half-a-Guinea each, or Three for One Guinea. Lamborn Cock & Co., 63 & 23, New Bond Street, and of Mr. Montague Severn, 24, Lyme Street, Camden Town, N.W.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

The Evening (SATURDAY), April 30th, will be performed, for the First Time on the British Stage, Carl Maria Von Weber's Operetta, in one act, "ABU HASSAN." The libretto translated by Signor Marchesi, and the dialogue set to recitative by Signor Arditi, expressly for the Italian Opera, Drury Lane. Hasan, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Omar, Signor Castelli; Il Califo, Signor Ragnar; Mesrur, Signor Trevers; Zaroah, Mdme. Lotti; Zobeide, Mdlle. Briani; and Fatima, Madame Monbelli. To be followed by Mozart's posthumous Opera-Buffa, in two acts, "LODCA DEL CAIRO" (first time in England). The poem adapted by M. Victor Wilder. The Italian translation by Signor Zaffira; the dialogue set to "recitativo-parlante" by Signor Bettesini. Fabrizio, Signor Ganzoni; Don Beltramo, Signor Gassier; Semolo, Signor Rinaldi; Signor Trevers; Le Scianse, Mdlle. Lyall; Giacinta, Madame Corsi; Greta, Madame Sinico; and Isabella, Mdlle. Pauline Lewitsky (her first appearance). Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

NEXT WEEK.

MONDAY NEXT, May 2, "LE NOZZE DI FIGARO." Il Conte, Mr. Santley; Figaro, Signor Gassier; Bartolo, Signor Castelli; Basilio, Mr. Lyall; Antonio, Signor Zoboli; Don Curzio, Signor Rinaldini; Cherubino, Madame Monbelli; Marcellina, Madame Corsi; Susanna, Madame Sinico; and La Contessa, Mdlle. Rebaux. Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

TUESDAY NEXT, May 3, Balfe's Opera, "LA SONNAMBULA." Elvino, Signor Mongini; Il Conte Rodolpho, Signor Verger; Alessio, Signor Zoboli; Un Notaro, Signor Archini; Teresa, Madame Corsi; Lisa, Mdlle. Vinia; and Amina, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.

Acting Manager ... ... MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY of MUSICIANS of GREAT BRITAIN (instituted in 1738, incorporated in 1790), for the Support and Maintenance of Aged and Indigent Musicians, their Widows and Orphans, 12, Hinde Street, Manchester Square, W. Patroness—Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen.—The ANNUAL PERFORMANCE of HANDEL'S Oratorio, the "MESSIAH," will take place on FRIDAY Evening, the 6th of May, 1870, at St. James's Hall, to commence at Eight o'clock. Principal violin—Mr. J. T. Willy. Trumpet—Mr. T. Harper. Organist—Mr. E. J. Hopkins. Conductor—Mr. W. G. Cusins, Master of the Music to Her Majesty the Queen). Balcony Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Balcony, 5s.; Area or Gallery, 2s. 6d. Tickets may be had of all the principal Musicsellers; and of Mr. Austin, Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

SONGS OF SCOTLAND.—LAST THREE NIGHTS.—Hanover Square Rooms.—Mr. KENNEDY, the Scottish Vocalist, will give his celebrated Entertainment on the SONGS OF SCOTLAND, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings next, at Eight o'clock. Tickets, 1s. and 3s.; Numbered Stalls, 2s.; at all the Musicsellers, and at the Rooms.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD begs to announce that she will give a RECITAL of PIANOFORTE MUSIC, consisting of Selections from the works of CHOPIN and HENSELT, at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square, on Saturday Morning, May 28th, on which occasion she will have the assistance of some Celebrated Vocalists. Full particulars will be duly announced.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD will play "MADAME OURY'S WALTZ," composed by Chopin, at her Recital of Pianoforte Music.

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square (where Haydn made his first bow to an English audience).—Ladies and Gentlemen intending to engage these unique Rooms for Concerts, &c., are respectfully invited to make early application, in order to secure the best dates. For terms, apply to Mr. Ball, at the Rooms.

ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

MR. GEORGE PERREN will sing (by desire) ASCHER'S popular Romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" at Miss Malida Baxter's Evening Concert, May 6th.

MADEMOISELLE FLORA CRIVELLI (Pupil of Madame Laura Baxter) is OPEN to an ENGAGEMENT as Principal Soprano in a Choir on Sundays, or with a Church or Chapel. All communications to be addressed to Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

TO PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.—Wanted, a SITUATION in a Pianoforte Establishment, by a Young Lady of good Address. A brilliant Pianist. Address, A. W., 67, Rathbone Place, Oxford Street, London.

MR. GEORGE FORBES will play his "VALSE DE CONCERT," at Clapham on Tuesday, May 3rd. "Striking, melodious, and effective."—Standard.—Daily Review.

MADAME D'ELISE will sing the popular Waltz Aria, "THE NAIADES," at Miss Amy Perry's Concert, at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 16th.

MADAME EMMELINE COLE will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S new Waltz Aria, "THE NAIADES," at Miss Matilda Baxter's Concert, May 6th.

MR. WALTER REEVES will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S popular Serenade, "WAKE, LINDA, WAKE," at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 16th.

MR. FREDERICK CHILDERSTON will sing at Miss Amy Perry's Concert, May 16th, the popular Romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?"

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

LA SIGNORINA EMILY TATE will play ASCHER'S popular romance, "ALICE," MENDELSSOHN'S ANDANTE CAPRICCIOSO, and MASSELOSON'S "RIVULET," at her concert, at St. George's Hall, May 3rd.

MR. EDWARD MURRAY (Baritone), now engaged with the Drury Lane Italian Opera Company, respectfully requests that all communications may be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. EMILE BERGER.

MR. EMILE BERGER will return to London for the season on the 23rd May. All letters to be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., Foreign Music Warehouse, 244, Regent Street, W.

HERR CARL FORMES is now in Town for the season and can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios and Operatic Performances. Address—care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MISS MATILDA BAXTER will perform ASCHER'S brilliant Fantasia, "ALICE," at her Concert, May 6th.

MISS AMY PERRY will perform ASCHER'S popular Fantasia, "ALICE," at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 14th.

MISS LILY SIMESTER and MR. GEORGE PERREN will sing NICOLAI'S admired duet, "ONE WORD," at the Manor Rooms, Hackney, May 16th.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S CONCERTS:—Bishop Stortford, May 5th; Miss Amy Perry's, Hanover Square Rooms, 14th; Store Street, June 4th, July 16th; Hanover Square, June 28th. Commodations Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

REMOVAL.

MRS. RONEY (Miss Helen Hogarth) begs to announce her REMOVAL from Gloucester Crescent, to No. 6, Chalcot Terrace, Regent's Park Road, N.W.

MR. CHARLES STANTON (Tenor) may be engaged for Concerts, Operettas, and Oratorios. Address, 10, Duke Street, Portland Place, W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING is prepared to accept Engagements for Oratorios, Concerts, in Town or Country. For terms, address 123, Regent Street.

ROBERT COCKS & CO.'S NEW MUSIC.—HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANO. 136th edition. 70 large folio pages, 4s. Also 129th edition of Clarke's Catechism of the Rudiments of Music. Free by post for 13 stamps.

NEW COMIC SONG, "THE THREE LITTLE PIGS," By A. S. GATTY. Illustrated title. Free by post for 13 stamps.

THE PIANIST'S LIBRARY. By BRINLEY RICHARDS. 19 Books.
THE STUDENT'S PRACTICE for the PIANOFORTE. By BRINLEY RICHARDS. 31 Books.
THE CLASSICAL PIANIST. By BRINLEY RICHARDS. 36 Books. A Catalogue Thematique may be had of all the three series on application (post free) to Messrs. ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street, London, and all Musicsellers.

Just Published,

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

N.B. "REVIVALS" will consist of Pieces hitherto only existing in Manuscript, or which have been long out of Print. Selected from the Works of Eminent Masters.

WILLIAM HUTCHINS CALLCOTT'S

NEW HARMONIUM WORK.

SECULAR AND SACRED MELODIES

ARRANGED FOR THE

HARMONIUM OR CHAMBER ORGAN.

Containing Fifty Admired Subjects, by W. S. Bennett, Beethoven, Bellini, Bishop, Blumenthal, W. H. Callcott, Dr. Calkcott, Dr. Crotch, Miss Davis, Hummel, Handel, Hornby, Hullah, Knight, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Schumann, Schubert, Shield, Verdi, Weber. English Melodies, Scotch Melodies, German Melodies, Irish Melodies, Russian Melodies.

"A dwelling-place
For all sweet sounds and harmonies."—WORDSWORTH.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 62 and 63, New Bond Street.
Price 10s. 6d. Net.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 30, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"LITTLE WILLIE," by JULES BENEDICT. This charming new song (by the popular composer of "Rock me to Sleep") is now being sung with distinguished success by Miss EDITH WYNNE. Price 3s., and may be obtained for 19 stamps from the publisher, DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

MASON & HAMLIN'S GOLD MEDAL CABINET ORGAN. ALWAYS IN TUNE, FOR ALL CLIMATES. Five Thousand Three Hundred and Four Full Reed Organs were Manufactured and Sold in 1869, being Seventeen each working day. Illustrated Books, one stamp.—BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

C. D. & H. W. SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGANS.—NEW STYLES.—Six Octave Nine Stop DRAWING-ROOM ORGANS. Ten Stop Chapel Organs, with Patent Knee Swell, Super-Octave Coupler, and Manual Sub-Bass. Always in Tune. Price lists, one stamp.—BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

Digitized by Google

BURLESQUE.

Without being in the smallest degree squeamish or prudish in the matter of jokes, it must be urged that the line between admissible and non-admissible subjects for jesting must be drawn somewhere. And if it is to be drawn anywhere, it must surely be drawn at murder. It is, therefore, simply disgusting to learn that some of the French comic papers have been making capital out of the shooting of the unhappy Republican, Noir, manufacturing jeux-de-mots out of that miserable catastrophe. To make jokes on such a tragedy is to trifle with the profoundest emotion of which human nature is capable, and to undermine the whole fabric of social morals. What would be said by that mysterious being, public opinion, in this country, if some London journalist were to print his wretched witticisms on some frightful English blood-shedding, we do not pretend to say. In Paris, the only possible palliation for the offence is to be found in the system of depression to which the whole French intellect has so long been subjected. When for generation after generation the only government of which Frenchmen have had experience has been "a despotism tempered with epigrams," as in Russia it used to be "a despotism tempered with assassinations," it can hardly be a matter of surprise that a good many writers should come to hold that all things in heaven and earth are fit subjects for bitter jesting. As we Englishmen have happily but little experience of this gagging of our lips and stifling of our thoughts, we are perhaps hardly fair judges of the effect of a habit of resorting to jokes as the only weapon to save oneself from the last excesses of unscrupulous tyranny.

As it happens, too, there is just now an urgent call for our looking at home in this very matter of unlicensed jokes. We have not yet come to making puns on the last new horrible crime, or to dramatising the slow poisoning with which some fresh victim of hatred, or jealousy, or avarice is cleared out of a murderer's path. But it requires little penetration to see that the spirit which dictated the Parisian jests about the awful tragedy is very far from being quite dormant in England. Nobody can observe, for instance, the popular mania for stage burlesques, without seeing that the line which ought to mark off certain subjects as forbidden to the joke-maker, is not seldom unscrupulously crossed. The habit of making one's living by turning into a jest every sort of human interest which can yield material for a laugh is utterly perilous and pernicious. There is[a] neither prudishness nor squeamishness in protesting against the habit altogether. The taste for mere stage burlesque is as fatal to the cultivation of true wit and humour as it is debasing to the morals and the intellect. It is one of the laziest and lowest of accomplishments to take what is great, good or tragic, and pervert it into an idiotic caricature. Any fool can burlesque what is terrible, or sacred, or profound; just as any fool can enjoy the monstrosities which pass for humour and vivacity in not a few of the London theatres. A good burlesque—that is a witty travestie on a subject which itself borders on the ridiculous—is a far harder thing to write, and is, for the time, a very pleasant piece of fooling. But these modern sneerings at things which the scoffers are too ignorant or too coarse to understand, are an altogether different affair. And we need have no hesitation in expressing a conviction, that they are degrading at once to those who manufacture them and to those who delight in reading them or in witnessing them.

As a rule it may be taken for granted that all grave realities are unfit for burlesquing. If they are not grave they are, for the most part, either already ridiculous, and therefore cannot be burlesqued, or they are so tame and pointless as to yield no material for laughable treatment. When they are both, they themselves ridiculous they are fit subjects for comedy, either comedy proper or farce. And it is one of the consequences of this detestable passion for burlesquing, that it turns away the popular taste from legitimate comedy and farce. An audience that has its natural love for the ridiculous perpetually fed with stupid songs and coarse "break-downs," is utterly incapacitated for relishing genuine satire or fun of any kind whatsoever. Though they may not yet be so hardened to all sense of decency as to enjoy a joke upon the murders of the day, the burlesque-maniac are steadily proceeding in blunting that sensibility to those delicate distinctions between the little and the great, the coarse and the refined, the noble and the contemptible, upon which real happiness so largely depends. Theatrical burlesque is, in truth very much akin to that very dangerous weapon, ridicule, when used in religious controversy. Satire in theological polemics, unless most carefully separated from the actual feelings and habits of sincere men and women, however absurd are their opinions, is a most fatal instrument for attacking the errors we may wish to expose. It stings and irritates and maddens the very persons who ought to be conciliated. The satirist may enjoy a momentary triumph; but so far from converting people from their mistaken views, it serves only to prejudice them more firmly than ever against ideas which are propagated with so flagrant a disregard of practical charity. Thus, too, in these stages travesties. The moment any subject which is dear to the heart is thus turned into ridicule, either our whole nature revolts against the outrage, or little by little the moral and intellectual sensibilities are deadened. We begin by laughing at the burlesque of what is dear to others, and end by laughing at what ought to be dear or sacred to ourselves.

Moreover, it is not every fictitious subject which is tolerable in burlesque. Would a travestie of *Hamlet or of King Lear be endurable to an Englishman or Englishwoman of any refinement or cultivation? To a person thoroughly disgusted at seeing those terrible tragedies exhibited in a series of idiotic buffooneries, what justification would it be to tell him that such men as Hamlet and Ophelia and Lear and Cordelia never existed? To us they have a real existence of their own, because they are associated with our sense of all that is sweet, and pathetic, and tender, and awful in the intense reality of human life itself. Were it not for the intensity with which our own hearts respond to the pictures that Shakspere drew, there would be nothing out of which the burlesque-maker could contrive his ugly jesting. Where there is no marked individuality there can be no caricature. Nothing is so difficult to the caricaturist as to awaken the slightest interest in a picture of a thoroughly commonplace face, for there is really nothing in such faces which he can lay hold of and exaggerate. Thus the burlesque manufacturer can make nothing of commonplace poems, or legends, or actual events, and so he longs to lay his unhallowed hands on subjects from which the good feelings of mankind still, to a considerable extent, warn him off. Considering what he has already dared to do, we can well understand how his fingers are now itching to seize the materials which are still forbidden him. He has travestied Walter Scott, who after all does not yield much matter for his purpose. If he could but dare to fly at the highest game, what wonders might he not achieve? And if he is permitted much longer, we may be satisfied that he will at least try how far an outraged decency will let him go. We shall have all Shakspere's greatest tragedies and comedies turned into vulgar jests; and the next step will be to copy the shameless Parisian, and make jokes upon the horrible actual crimes.

The old Greek and Roman mythology is, after all, the best of all subjects for stage burlesques. The stories are full of point; the characters are strongly marked; and the religious ideas with which they were once associated have for ages been extinct. How well they yield themselves to travestie was known to a former generation of playgoers, as it is well known to the present generation how stupid they become in incompetent hands. Where is the mythological burlesque of to-day which is comparable to M. Planché's Olympic Revels and Olympic Devils? But then in those days there were actors who could sing and act as well as talk; with them the very silliest absurdities were invested with a certain air of grace. Where are such burlesque songsters now? And if we want a non-mythological and non-theatrical burlesque, have we not a burlesque without a fault in the immortal Pickwick and his companions? The Pickwick Papers are a pure burlesque. From the great Pickwick downwards, saving Sam Weller, everybody that figures therein is more or less of an idiot. There is no comic or farcical representation of life. It is all rollicking absurdity and impossibility from end to end. Little bits of questionable pathos are here and there interpolated, but they do not mar the effect of the whole, which is more or less idiotic, of the very best and funniest kind of idiocy, from the first chapter to the last. There are special touches in Pickwick which stand somewhat in the relation of life which suggested them, in about the very same relation in which M. Planché's Orpheus and Eurydice, and Perseus and Andromeda, and all his gods and goddesses, stand to the old classical stories where these same personages figure as sober, truthful realities.

Is there, however, any prospect that the days of burlesque are numbered? He must be a sanguine speculator who could hope for such a consummation, at least for years to come. This year increasing stupidity seems to bring with it an increasing tendency. Dresses, songs, legs, and breakdowns are still sufficient to float the most execrable cargo of travestie. Dresses, songs, and legs of course we always shall have; together with some sort of boisterous romping of which the breakdown is just now the popular form. But could we not have the dresses, the songs, the legs, and the romps, without the presence of coarse burlesques and stupid plays upon words? The two classes of subjects may be kept separate enough. And if once the very notion of converting some subjects into an exhibition of tomfoolery were vigorously forbidden, we might hope that play-wrights and managers would devote their attention to the devising and preparing some tolerably artistic framework for the exhibition of the essential elements of the pictorial and muscular drama.

X. Y. Z.

LEIPSIC.—The annual performances of J. S. Bach's Matthäus-Passion took place on Good Friday. Herr Julius Rietz conducted, in place of Herr Carl Reinecke, now in London. The vocalists were Mdme. Flinsch, Mdme. Krebs-Michalsel, Herren Wollers and Behr.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord, a novelty here, though produced elsewhere seventeen years ago since—"Ehen fugaces," etc.—was produced at the Stadttheater at the beginning of the month. A great success, of course.—The proposal for building a large opera-house has been laid, strongly recommended by the magistrature, before the Assembly of Town-Delegates. There is every probability of its being favourably received, as sixty-seven of the principal inhabitants have already put their names down for 480,000 of the 596,000 florins, the estimated cost, and the Town possesses funds to make up the remainder.

* More than half a century ago Hamlet Travestied (by Mr. Poole) was a popular piece, and surely Macbeth and the Merchant of Venice (to say nothing of Medea, in which the late Mr. Robson figured so conspicuously) must be within the memory of X. Y. Z.—ED. M. W.

Digitized by Google

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

The manager of this establishment seems resolved not to be out-done in activity. Since Rigoletto, which was given on the opening night, and Lucia di Lammermoor, performed on Monday, three operas have been produced, and two singers of high pretensions have made their first appearance.

Madame Monbelli, for whose début the Barbiere di Siviglia was selected, was favourably known last year at St. James's Hall, the Crystal Palace, and elsewhere as a concert singer; and one of those pieces in which she earned most applause was precisely "Una voce poca fa," the well-known soliloquy of Rossini's wideawake heroine. That Madame Monbelli is a singer of exceptional attainments is unquestionable, and that the florid music given to Rosina should come readily within her means is only what was anticipated. Her appearance, too, is greatly in her favour, and the genuine Spanish costume in which she was attired the other night thoroughly became her. The whole of her music was executed in a manner little short of perfection—the "Una voce," with the somewhat over-wrought embellishments to the second verse of the cabaletta ("ma si me toccano," &c.) in a style with which we were already acquainted, and the duet with Figaro, "Dunque io son," the last movement of which was embellished with equal profuseness (Poor Rossini!—as if he did not write music florid enough) equally well. In the lesson scene Madame Monbelli introduced a Spanish air, "Juanita," composed by Señor Iradier, of no great merit, and not at all effective. But the poorness of the composition was outdoned by the excellence of the singing. To turn to the other side of the picture —Madame Monbelli has, at present, no pretensions whatever to be called an actress; and, if it is her intention to continue permanently on the stage, she must direct her serious thought to this phase of her art. That the Italian lyric stage has, time out of mind, been a model for dramatic singers is an oft-told truth; and, refined a singer as she is, Madame Monbelli can hardly look for general acceptance until she has acquired something also of the mimic art. She was warmly if not enthusiastically received. About the other characters little need be said. Signor Bettini's Almaviva is well known to our London audiences as a careful and musicianly performance. He sings the opening movement of the serenade, "Ecco ridente il cielo," with great taste, and the allegro with remarkable fluency. In the finale to the first act, moreover, where the Count feigns drunkenness in order to deceive Dr. Bartolo, he would be dramatically, no less than vocally, unimpeachable, but for the too frequent application of the flat of his sword to the backs of a number of unoffending individuals—an exhibition of frolicsomeness somewhat at variance with the general idea we have been taught to entertain of an Andalusian nobleman. Signor Castelli, who played Bartolo, was, some years ago, a member of the opera buffa company at the St. James's Theatre. His humour is not pungent, nor does he otherwise excel as a comic actor, but he has a good voice, sings like a musician, and, on the whole, makes an acceptably agreeable character of Rosina's jealous guardian. Signor Gassier's Figaro, now that Ronconi has left us, is perhaps the best—certainly the most active, bustling, and genial—on the Italian stage. Signor Gassier represents the intriguing mimic master, Don Basilio, under the covering of a hat of dimensions more enormous even than ordinary; but it cannot be said of him, as it has been said of one or two other Basilios—coator si prattava nulla—inasmuch as he sings the fine air, "La Calunnia," with wonderful spirit, and is very good in the quintet of the second act, containing the famous sequel, "Buona sera, mio Signore." The performance of Rossini's comic masterpiece, from the overture to the end, in so far as the orchestra and chorus, under Signor Arditi, were concerned, left nothing to be desired.

M. Gounod's Faust was the opera chosen for the first appearance of Mdlle. Reboux—who may be remembered, some years ago, as playing a small part in the same composer's Mireille, at Her Majesty's Theatre, when Mr. Mapleson directed the fortunes of that time-honoured establishment. Since then Mdlle. Reboux has aimed higher, and become a genuine dramatic singer. In fact, this lady excels in the dramatic department of her art just as Madame Monbelli does in the vocal; so that, if the two talents could be combined in one, we should have something like a perfect artist. Mdlle. Reboux's conception of the character of Marguerite is unexceptionable from one end to the other; and every dramatic situation of importance is brought out by her in a singular power. Not to bore our readers with a hundredth description of an opera the extraordinary vogue of which is still, to many, an enigma, we would especially point to the scene of the death of Valentine, and the closing scene of the prison—in both of which Mdlle. Reboux was alike forcible and impressive. Though somewhat too robust in frame to look the ideal Marguerite, all physical disproportions are forgotten in the deep intelligence and intense earnestness of her acting. This earnestness is equally a characteristic of the singing of Mdlle. Reboux; but the voice appears somewhat worn, is not always under control, and, wherever passages of force are demanded, is terribly afflicted with that so-oft cited "vibrato"—which, as we have more than once observed, is not so much what many seem to think, a voice of taste, as an ineradicable defect, the result of a mistaken method long indulged in. But though Mdlle. Reboux's singing was by no means on a par with her acting, it exhibited many fine points. Her least satisfactory achievement was the so-called air des bijoux," which lies too high for her voice—a genuine mezzo soprano. Her most successful efforts were the ballad of the "King of Thule," sung by Marguerite at the spinning wheel, the prayer in the Cathedral, and the last finale, where the closing phrase, delivered each time with increasing force on a higher part of the voice, each time given with remarkable power and intensity. We shall be glad to have another occasion of hearing Mdlle. Reboux, who is evidently too conscientious and aspiring an artist to be summarily judged of after a single experience. Signor Gardoni was Faust—Signor Mario alone excepted, now by far the best Faust on the Italian stage. Never was this excellent and deservedly popular artist singing better than at the present time. His "Salve dimora" (violin obbligato, Herr Straus) was perfect. The Mephistophiles of Signor Gassier, the Valentine of Mr. Santley, and the Siebel of Madame Trebelli-Bettini are too familiar to the opera-going public to require description. In the song about "Gold," and the Serenade to Marguerite, Signor Gassier displayed all his well-known point and spirit; Mr. Santley was as impressive and masterly as ever in the scene of Valentine's death; and Madame Trebelli was compelled to repeat both her songs—which, considering the manner in which they were given, caused no surprise. The new chorus, gathered from Paris, had ample opportunity of distinction in the second, third, and fourth acts of Faust, and the result was eminently satisfactory. The orchestra, by this time, could easily play the opera, from end to end, without book.

Il Flauto Magico was given on Saturday night. The operas performed during the week have been Faust (Monday); Rigoletto (Tuesday); and the Nozze di Figaro (Thursday). Weber's Abou Hassan, followed by Mozart's Ora del Cuore—both for the first time on the Italian stage, and with a new singer, Mdlle. Pauline Lewitzky, in the last-mentioned, are announced for to-night.

The Princess of Trebizonde.

Every drama has its origin in some other drama, tale, or simple anecdote. If Schack is derived from Aschenbrödel, Aschenbrödel possesses in Cinderella, and Cinderella from the story of Rhodopis, whose remarkably small sandal was carried away by an eagle to the King of Egypt, who swore to make the owner his wife. Dramas, the plot of which cannot be traced to one source in particular, are usually composed of materials borrowed from several sources in common. Not that it matters; for, without undervaluing invention, we may say that new combination is equivalent to new creation. The Princess of Trebizonde is an example of a play, novel in itself, in which ideas, situations, and incidents are to be found that have served half a dozen dramatic works of various kinds. There is the burlesque comedy, Les Saltimbanques, for instance, in which Bilboquet, like Cabriolo, his successor, is chief of a company of strolling acrobats. and Zephirine, like Zanetta in the Princess of Trebizonde, inspires a young gentleman with a romantic passion. The Zanetta of the Princess of Trebizonde is first seen by her admirer as a wax figure. The image of the Princess having lost a nose, Zanetta has agreed to replace the mutilated simulacrum; and the Prince, her admirer, is not a little astonished as the lover of Violette to find that his beautiful doll opens and shuts her eyes, performs automatic movements, and utters phrases expressive of affection. The scene in which the supposed wax figure gives signs of animation may be compared to a scene in M. Victor Massé's Galathée. The suddenly enriched mountebank (he has won a prize in the lottery) cultivates his acrobatic tastes in the midst of his new splendour much as the retired ballet-master, represented by Bouffé in a piece of which we forget the name, gives practical proof, under exhilarating circumstances, that he has not forgotten the occupation of his life. Then Dr. Sparadrap, the young Prince's tutor, who is to have a pension and postmastership if his pupil forms no attachment up to the time of marriage, a pension without a postmastership if he escapes with a passing flirtation, and looks without his halfpennies if he takes to "the indiscriminate pursuit of female society," is a sort of Dr. Pangloss. Other resemblances might be pointed out; but though it presents to one original feature of its own, the Princess of Trebizonde is sufficiently original. The materials of which the dramatic work is composed are familiar enough; but they have been combined in a novel manner, and served up with a musical dressing both new and piquant.

Not that we intend to go into ecstasies about M. Offenbach. He has written one work the memory of which will live long after the work itself and, above all, the music of the work, shall have been forgotten. We mean the Grand Duchess of Gerolstein, the tunes of which form the true historico-musical accompaniment to the Paris Exhibition of 1867; as the "Marseillaise" is the musical accompaniment to the first French Revolution; "La Parisienne" to the second; "Mourir pour la patrie" to the third; "Partant pour la Syrie" to the first and second French Empires. The piece, though only a burlesque, possesses as much merit, and of about the same sort, as Kotzebue's Little Town. It presents a picture, in broad caricature, of a petty despotic court, such as Stendhal, with finer brush and more delicate colours, has painted in Les Chartreuse de Parme. Probably no one saw so much fun in it as Count Bismarck, Baron Beust, and Prince Gortchakoff—above all Prince Gortchakoff; and it is in connection with the visit to Paris made by these Ministers and their masters in the Exhibition year of 1867 that the Grand Duchess will be remembered. But thanks to the libretto by MM. Meilhac and Halévy, thanks also to Mlle. Schneider, it is the most remarkable of the Offenbachian productions; and in extracting any one of them as a master of burlesque, we naturally try it by this test:—how much inferior is it to the Grand Duchess?

Digitized by Google

As a piece, then, the Princess of Trebizonde is much inferior to the Grand Duchess, which, among other merits, possesses that of originality at first hand. There are passages in the life of Catherine of Russia which may have suggested it; but the subject, in the literature of imagination, was virgin when MM. Meilhac and Halévy took hold of it. The music of the Princess of Trebizonde contains effective pieces, and some of the airs are lively. Zanetta's rondo, "The lawful wife of Rustifim," and the Page's song have already been made the subject of pianoforte fantasias by Mr. Brinley Richards. Of course, too, the manufacturers of dance music have been at the score, picking out all available motives for waltzes and quadrilles (polkas are out of fashion). There is a new vocal effect in the choral refrain to Zanetta's rondo, which is perhaps intended to be sung to the last degree pianissimo (pppp, like one of the passages in Rossini's Neige Melemelle), but, as a matter of fact, is whispered. A little more and M. Offenbach would be accused of stealing an idea from M. Hervé, whose "mutes of the seraglio," in Les Turcs, have a chorus in which they do not sing at all. The toothache song is another curiosity, though the toothache has long been known as an excruciatingly funny subject.

Why, in conclusion, does the author of the play-bills and of the advertisements in the newspapers describe this opéra bouffe, or burlesque opera, as a "comic opera drama"? "Comedy-drama" means, we believe, a "serious comedy," or one of those works in the mixed style cultivated by M. Sardou, which are comedy at the beginning, drama at the end. M. Sardou, however, being a candidate for Academical honours, takes good care not to call his half-comic, half-serious productions, "comedy-dramas." What he produces is not, from "opera" means, we cannot conceive. A "comic opera-drama" ought to signify a "comedy-drama" set to music. In any case there is, we will not say too much drama, but certainly too much spoken dialogue in the Princess of Trebizonde. The musical pieces are too far apart, the intervals of talk being practically (owing to the slower delivery of our actors) much longer in the English than in the French version. Contrary to the general rule, the adapter, that accomplished scholar, wit, and humorist, Mr. G. L. Kenney, has been quite as successful with his verse as with his prose; the prose of the English piece is very good, but the verse is excellent. For a double reason, then, it is to the singing, even more than to the talking, that this clever burlesque-opera must own its success.

Shaver Silver.

—o—

DE BERIOT.

Charles Auguste de Beriot, born at Louvain, the 20th February, 1802; died at Brussels, the 8th April 1870, was descended from an old and highly distinguished family.* Having been left an orphan when he was nine years old, he found, in M. Tiby,† a professor of music, at Brussels, a guardian and a second father, as well as a master, who exerted himself zealously to develop the boy's aptitude for music. He had attained a certain degree of skill upon the violin, his progress having been so rapid that he was able to perform publicly Viotti's Concerto in A minor (letter H), before he was nine years old, exciting thereby the admiration of his countrymen. Nature had endowed him with a most delicate ear for correctness of intonation, and this was combined in his playing with naturally elegant taste. Being, moreover, of a meditative turn, and finding in those around him no model whom he could imitate, he sought in himself the principle of the beautiful, of which he could have no notion save that due to the spontaneous action of his own individuality. This is, perhaps, the proper place for investigating the causes which gave rise to the report bruited about, that De Beriot was a pupil of Jacotot. This fact, accredited by the author of L'Enseignement universel, and by the declarations of De Beriot himself, needs some little explanation. The general attention of the inhabitants of Belgium had been, for some years, directed to the results, which appeared to have been obtained by Jacotot's method; the progress made by those who practised it was said to be something marvellous in every branch of learning. De Beriot determined to see what advantage he could derive for his purposes from the practice of it. He had some interviews with the inventor, but scarcely learned more than two things, namely: that perseverance triumphs over all obstacles, and that, generally speaking, men are not sincere in their determination to do all they can. The young artist felt the full force of these propositions, which his intelligence perceived how to turn to account. Such is the way in which De Beriot was a pupil of Jacotot. He could not have been so in any other fashion, for it is not sure that Jacotot could have decided whether the violinist played in tune or not. However this may be, a fortunate moral and physical organisation, an education well begun, and the most carefully regulated exertion, were not long before they rendered De Beriot a highly talented artist, who merely wanted to be brought into contact with talented men in other lines, in order to obtain from them to introduce a proper co-ordination in his efforts; and enable him to acquire a character of originality.

De Beriot was nineteen when he quitted his native city and went to Paris, where he arrived about the commencement of the year 1821. The first thing he did was to play before Viotti, then director of the Opera. After listening to him attentively, the celebrated artist said: "You have a fine style; exert yourself to improve it; bear all men of talent; profit by everything, and imitate nothing." This advice seemed to suggest his having no master; but De Beriot thought he ought to take lessons of De Baillet, and, for this purpose, entered the Conservatory. But he was not long before perceiving that his talent possessed a peculiar character of its own, which could with difficulty be modified, except at the price of its originality. He remained, therefore, only a few months in the classes of the Conservatory. He returned to his own private direction, and soon afterwards played, with brilliant success, at a few concerts. His first Airs variés, compositions, full of grace and novelty, were published, and increased his incipient reputation. His way of performing them added an inexpressible charm. All those he published constituted for a long period the usual repertory of a great many violinists.

After shining in Paris, De Beriot proceeded to England, where he found a no less brilliant reception, especially during his subsequent visits. In London and some other cities of Great Britain, he gave concerts at which his fine talent was enthusiastically applauded. Besides being repeatedly engaged at the Philharmonic Concerts, he was engaged moreover for some of the musical festivals given annually in the principal English towns. On his return, already possessing a brilliant reputation, to his own country, he was presented to King William I., who, though caring little for music, felt the necessity of ensuring the independence of a young artist who promised to prove an honour to his country. He bestowed on him, therefore, a pension of 2,000 florins, and the title of first solo violinist in his own private band. The Revolution of 1830 deprived De Beriot of these advantages.*

From the moment that the artist's talent began to show itself, it went on developing itself; on attaining maturity, it was distinguished by a combination of the most precious qualities, namely: a most beautiful tone; invariable correctness, a quality in which Lafont was his only rival; unusual elegance of taste; a personal style; and, finally, a certain charm, in which he was never surpassed, and perhaps never equalled, by anyone. Critics, who never forfeit their rights, formerly reproached De Beriot with combining a slight degree of coldness with his purity; their criticisms were useful to him, for warmth and vigorous bowing became no less remarkable in his playing than correctness and taste. Complaints were also made that, restricting the flight of his talent to composing and executing Airs variés, he confined himself within too narrow limits; he cleared himself, also, from this reproach, by composing concertos which he played at various concerts, and in which he exhibited conception and execution on a grander scale than previously. Having been appointed professor of the violin at the Conservatory of Brussels in 1843, he composed his later concertos for his pupils, showing more than ever the charming ideas and touches, so remarkable for their elegance as for their brilliancy. It has been said that this music, so favourable to the talent of those who execute it, is much less difficult than it appears. I do not know whether this observation is to be considered a criticism, or whether it is not rather an eulogium. Having become the friend of the celebrated Mme. Malibran, De Beriot travelled with her in Italy, England, and Belgium. In 1835, he became her husband.† The numerous opportunities he enjoyed of hearing this inspired lady appears to have exerted the most happy influence on his talent. At Naples, where he played at a concert in the Teatro San Carlo, he achieved a most enormous success, a thing very rare with the Italians, who being passionately devoted to singing, bestowed, at that period, as a nation, very little attention on instrumental music.

Having permanently taken up his abode at Brussels after the death of Madame Malibran-de-Beriot, he did not appear publicly for several years.‡

* By a royal degree of the 16th April, 1853, his claim to belong to the aristocracy was formally acknowledged. His arms were: "D'or à trois têtes de renard de gueules.—Cimier: une tête du renard de l'écu."—Ed. Guide Musical.

† Jean François Tiby, born at Feny (Hainault), the 20th April, 1772; died at Louvain, the 14th December, 1844.—Ibid.

* Which did not prevent his setting to music "La Marche des Belges," "a patriotic song, words by Decuyet, dedicated to the brave defenders of liberty." De Beriot sincerely kept in the same the act of his life, and to which he was indebted for the Iron Cross, that he never wore.—Ed. Guide Musical.

† There was one child by this marriage. It was afflicted de Beriot, a talented pianist, at present established in Paris. By his second marriage, with a sister of Vieuxtemps, De Beriot had one son, an officer in the Belgian army, who died some years since.—Ed. Guide Musical.

‡ Or, more accurately, eighteen months. De Beriot made his re-appearance in public on the 15th December, 1837, at the concert of the Philanthropic Society of Brussels, on which occasion two medals were struck off, one being for the illustrious violinist, and the other for his sister-in-law, Mdlle. Pauline Garcia (Madame Viardot), who then made her debut in a career which she afterwards pursued with such brilliant results. The two subsequently joined in a tour through the Belgian provinces and Germany, and, on the 15th December, 1838, the anniversary of the concert at Brussels, they played at the Théâtre de la Renaissance, Paris.

Digitized by Google

In 1840, however, he made a tour in Germany, stopping some time at Vienna, where he gave concerts. Unfavourable changes in his health, changes recurring at various periods, at length caused him to take the resolution of playing no more in public, though his talent was still in its full power. He no longer played except to his pupils, and some few privileged friends, who still admired the fulness and the charm of his style. Unfortunately, some more serious shocks to his constitution, at an age which is not one for resisting infirmity, obliged him, in 1852, to resign his post as professor. Paralysis of the optic nerve had suddenly deprived him of sight, and the hopes he at first entertained of being cured had not been realized.

De Beriot's principal works are: Nine Concertos; "Airs Variés;" Studies; Sonatas and Duets; Trios; a Cantata, executed at the Brussels Conservatory of Music, in April, 1853; &c.

De Beriot's last work, the most important of the productions he wrote at a ripe age, is his Méthode de violon en trois parties, Paris, 1858, one vol., large 4to. The first part contains the elements and treats of the positions; the second contains the theory of bowing, and its various applications; we find in it also instructions relating to harmonics. The third part treats of style. Each of the parts contains an ample collection of studies to enable the student to carry out the precepts.

De Beriot was a member of the Royal Academy of Belgium, and of the Musical Academy of Rome; Officer of the Order of Leopold; Knight of the Iron Cross; of the Oak Crown, of Holland; of Merit of Saxe-Coburg, &c.

The solemn funeral service was celebrated on Tuesday, the 12th inst., in the parish church of St. Gudule, in the presence of a large crowd of persons, connected mostly with art and literature. The son of the deceased was chief mourner. Among those present on the sad occasion was M. Henri Vieuxtemps, the most illustrious of all the virtuosoes reared in the school of the great master; MM. Fétis, director of the Conservatory; Gustelet; Ch. Regier; the Prince de Chimay; Van Soust; the Chevalier L. de Burbure; the Chevalier van Elewyck; Soubre, director of the Liége Conservatory; and P. Benoît, director of the Antwerp Conservatory; MM. Dupont, Dumon, Blaes, Ad. Samuel, Besselet, Artôt, Duhem, Guélus, B. Fauconier, Mailly, and other distinguished artists, both of Brussels and other places.

FROM CORDOVA.

No. III.

Those students of the old Spanish drama who visit Madrid or Seville in the hopes of seeing a performance of some work of Calderon or Lopez de Vega are likely to be still more disappointed than the foreign Anglo-maniac who comes to England to see Shakspere; for whereas the favourite plays of the "divine Williams" are pretty sure to be played somewhere or other at short intervals, the national Spanish drama seems scarcely to be performed at all. The "Teatro Español" at Madrid, which seems to the Francais at Paris, and is supposed to be appropriated to Spanish "legitimacy," is now very successful with a comparatively modern melodrama, entitled La Aldea de San Lorenzo; but the Italian Opera, at which Madrid has of late been in the habit of vocalist, is of all dramatic establishments the most important. Two houses, the "Teatro de Bufos Arderius," and the "Teatro de las Zarguelas," are devoted to opera bouffe, their repertory being sometimes original and sometimes supplemented by the compositions of Offenbach and Hervé. These theatres are very popular, and poets and musicians of Spain are evidently much busied to supply them with pieces. But the curiosity of the performance is that, however the artists may labour to be comical, the audience never express their satisfaction by hearty laughter. You may hear roars of mirth at a bull fight when a horse is cleverly slaughtered, but less practical jokes do not seem strong enough to move the risible muscles of Iberia. And yet the Spaniards at table or as travelling companions are as vivacious as Frenchmen. The minor theatre (Teatro de las Variedades), which I suppose is ordinarily enlivened with light vaudevilles, is, as I have already stated, occupied with representations of the Passion during Lent; and another theatre (de las Novedades) invites the public by announcing the performance of a drama of real life entitled Treppmann, the various scenes which illustrated the career of that illustrious criminal being carefully enumerated in the advertisements.

At Cordova, as at Madrid and the larger towns, there is a Lenten representation of the Passion; but it is not to be supposed that the plays, though based on the same holy subject, are everywhere the same. At the small Madrid theatre Los Siete Dolores de Maria commences with the Presentation in the Temple, and ends with the Descent from the Cross. The play now given at the principal theatre (Teatro Principal) of Cordova omits the Presentation and the Flight into Egypt, commencing with the Entrance into Jerusalem, and ending with an act representing the Resurrection, which seems to be an addition to the original work. The business-like announcement at the Cordova Theatre of the last performance of the present season, which is to be held to-night, might perhaps surprise some of your readers. I, therefore, translate it literally:—

"At the request of many persons who were not able to obtain places on the evening of Tuesday last to see the religious drama which we have presented during Lent, we depart from our firm resolution not to give any more representations; and, although we thus put ourselves to a heavy inconvenience, inasmuch as the preparations for the season of Easter demand an immediate termination of the spectacle, nevertheless, give this last performance, intending that no one shall be deprived of the enjoyment of so magnificent a work, and thus rendering a just tribute of respect to the illustrious public which honours our Coliseum (Coliseo). Sixteenth performance of the grand and magnificent sacred-biblical-religious drama in four acts and in verse, written by Don Antonio Cumpoomer, with music by Maestro Salarie, entitled "(here comes a woodcut of the Saviour, leaning on the world, with the inscription 'Salvator Mundi') The God Man (El Hombre Dios); or, the Passion and Death of our Lord Jesus Christ, increased with the new scene, entitled 'The Glorious Resurrection.'"

Then comes a list of the subjects of the several acts of which the piece consists. The highest price of admission to the performance is 20 reals (4*f.*) the lowest 1 real (25*c.*).

The fact is remarkable that the Spaniards have no regular "bill of the play," either in the separate form, which is adopted in England, or in the shape of an appendage to a theatrical newspaper, as in France. Consequently, there are no means of obtaining an official knowledge of the name of a single performer. The paper which I have translated is merely intended for distribution in reading-rooms, &c. The names of the plays, as in the political papers of France, with perhaps an enumeration of "effects" as an additional incitement, are all that is given to the Spanish public.

The interior of a second-class carriage on a long journey like that from Madrid to Cordova affords a vivid picture of a somewhat rough kind of Spanish life, illustrated by every variety of attire. The peculiarity of costume is its utter absence of uniformity, and those who fancy that the commonly assumed dress of the Spanish peasant will serve as the type of a crowd, just as a blue frock-coat will serve to typify a French mob, are greatly mistaken. The broad flapping sombrero, which your Andalusian is seen to wear on the stage, may indeed be seen, but is the least common of head-dresses. Much more ordinary is the so-called "Alpine hat," of late so familiar to London and Paris. Coats are to be seen of every colour and of every material. Indeed, the only distinctive article of attire that prevails among the lower class of Spaniards is the broad sash about the waist, and even this varies in colour ad libitum. But it is worthy of remark that, however capriciously the peasant chooses his habiliments, he always contrives to look exceedingly like a brigand, and the little crowds that are met at every country station on the road between Madrid and Cordova are remarkable for the specimens of certain illness and apparent ferocity which they present. The manner in which your luggage is taken care of when you quit the train looks exceedingly risky. You are shown to the omnibus which takes passengers to the specified hotel, and you give up your luggage-ticket, and, perhaps, also the key of your box, to a rough man who emerges from a mass, and who, to all appearance, would do credit to the band of Captain Rolando. A new sensation arises on the way to the hotel, the driver lashing his mules with fury, and his vehicle rushing through narrow streets just wide enough to allow its passage, so that affrighted pedestrians can only save their lives by rushing into the open doors of the houses. When the hotel is reached a considerable time elapses before the arrival of your luggage, and you begin to reflect upon your condition. The only document which can prove your ownership you have surrendered into the hands of a man whom timid folks would be loth to meet in a dark lane, and to whom you suspect it would be but natural if, instead of bearing the trunk to its appointed place, he appropriated it to his own uses. But the trunk arrives safe, after all, and Lavater is ignominiously refuted.

The middle class of Spaniards seem an easy, life-enjoying set, like the similar order of Parisians, without a tinge of that apparent ferocity which so formidably marks their inferiors. They all understand bull-fighting, which they regard as an innocent recreation to which no one could possibly object, and the arrival of Easter, when the sport will begin in earnest, is anticipated with delight. The stormy politics of the day are likewise playfully discussed, and if a little émeute has occurred somewhere, with a loss of half a dozen lives, the event is regarded as rather facetious than otherwise. To the tedium of the journey from Madrid to Cordova an agreeable relief is given by the appearance of a trader at one of the immediate stations, who offers for sale a number of formidable daggers, with crimson sheaths, evidently answering the purpose of the American bowie knife. These are freely bought at the small price of a duro (5*f.*) a piece, and while the purchaser contemplates with satisfaction the broad blade, and tries it on his fingers, a merry soldier perhaps draws his sword, points at one of his fellow-travellers, and flourishes a revolver. But all are in perfect good humour, and the liberality with which cigarettes are given away is amazing.

N. D.

Cordova, April 9.

BADEN.—The Kiosk Concerts, before the Conversationshaus will this year be better than ever; at least, the Administration have done all they can to render them so. Strengthened by a contingent of solo-performers from the Strassburg Conservatory, the Baden Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Könneman, will number 60 members. From the 15th August, it will be reinforced by 14 first-rate soloists, headed by Herr Johann Strauss, from Vienna, and the said Johann Strauss will conduct in place of Herr Könnemann. These 14 soloists will bring the number of the orchestra up to 74. In order that the Promenade Concerts may not be interrupted during the operatic performances at which the above orchestra officiates, Mannsfeld's orchestra from Frankfort-on-the-Maine has been engaged. Thus there will be three orchestras performing, either separately or combined, and, in addition, there will be the Badish Badenish, or Baden (au gré du lecteur) military bands of Rastall and Kalsruhe.

Digitized by Google

AFTERNOON BALLAD CONCERTS.

Mr. John Boosey gave the first of a new series of ballad concerts in St. James's Hall, on Saturday. There have been evening entertainments of the same kind in plenty, and the director has now wisely resolved upon appealing to the large class whose most convenient time for seeking amusement in central London is the afternoon. We have little doubt that success will reward the enterprise, especially as the programmes, judging by that of Saturday, will be carefully compiled, and the selections performed by competent artists. The singers who appeared were Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Elton, Madame Bodda-Pyne, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Chaplin Henry. Miss Wynne was encored in Molloy's "Old Cottage Clock," but declined the compliment. She has hardly less successful in Virginia Gabriel's "Alone," and Aidé's "Little May," each being given with charming grace and expression. Miss Elton appeared to advantage in "The Land of Long Ago;" Mr. Cummings made a legitimate effect in Madame Sainton-Dolby's excellent song, "I am content," as did Mr. Chaplin Henry in Molloy's "Marching Along." Madame Bodda-Pyne obtained a recall for her characteristic rendering of Benedict's "Skylark." The solo pianist was Chevalier de Kontski, who played in brilliant style two of his own pieces—"Souvenir de Faust" and "Stelluza." An encore was demanded for each, but granted only to the latter. A "company of mixed voices," led by Mr. Fielding, varied the proceedings with some excellent part-songs, and Mr. J. L. Hatton was conductor. We may add that, unlike ballad concert programmes in general, those of Mr. Boosey are now long enough without being too long.

PROVINCIAL.

Hereford.—The following is from a correspondent:—

"The Amateur Philharmonic Society of this city gave its first concert at the Shire Hall, on Friday the 22nd, when a well varied programme, well performed, attracted a large audience. The concert began with a selection from Acis and Galatea, the parts of Acis, Galatea, and Polyphemus, being sung by the Rev. J. Hampton, Miss Leighton, and the Rev. W. D. V. Duncombe. The quality of the tenor voice, the style of the soprano, and the vigour of the bass were excellently displayed in the solos, and particularly effective in the trio of all pastoral trios, 'The flocks shall leave the mountains.' The chorus showed evidence of careful training. The second part was miscellaneous, commencing with a part of Beethoven's symphony in C minor, played most creditably. Macfarren's part-song, 'You stole my love,' was sung so well that it was encored and responded to. The largo and rondo from Beethoven's concerto in E flat for the piano were performed by Miss Hogarth in a manner that would have done credit to a professional pianist. Miss Leighton, in the French romance, 'Fleur des Alpes,' elicited an encore, and a similar compliment was paid to a MS. song by Langdon Colborne, sung by Mr. J. Twiss. A part song by Signor Bennett gave the choir another opportunity of distinction, and the concert terminated with the overture to Zampa. The artists from London were Mr. Henry Leslie, conductor; Mr. Henry Blagrove, violin; Mr. Henry W. Goodban, violoncello; and Mr. White, contra basso. Mr. Torrishend Smith must look out for his laurels. Mr. Leslie is a fearful competitor in a city populated like Hereford."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

SCHUMANN—BEETHOVEN—WAGNER.

The subjoined remarks are from that very young but deservedly flourishing illustrated weekly, The Graphic:—

"Schumann's overture to Manfred opened the last Crystal Palace Saturday programme; and was played but indifferently for reasons not obvious. We cannot here discuss the merits and demerits of a work sufficiently well known. Everybody is aware of the diverse opinions it calls forth. Some regard it reverently, as a thing of power and genius; others look on it scornfully as a thing of vain and weak pretence. Meanwhile it is played and people listen in the intervals of their squabbling; which fact contains the germ of a future argument. The Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, it is needless to say, gave unqualified pleasure to the entire audience. About it there are no disputes, and in its presence Schumannaite and anti-Schumannite forget their differences, as might two quarrelsome knights in the presence of the Queen of Beauty. The work was charmingly played, and every movement loudly applauded. We have no love for the prelude of Wagner's Lohengrin. It aims at producing new orchestral effects, and undoubtedly succeeds in its aim; but the effects themselves are such as few can admire. An irreverent listener on his occasion was heard more than once to mutter the word 'cats' while Herr Wagner's music went on. We will not be hard upon him for his rudeness, the provocation being manifest."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

On Friday evening, a concert of vocal and instrumental music took place at Woolwich, under the superintendence of Captain Goodenough, in aid of the funds of the Royal Artillery Regimental Charities, when the following amateurs gave their assistance:—Misses Braham, Santos, Sagrini, and Stevens; Messrs. Tietkins, Lionel Benson, and A. Stevens. Miss Braham, in Rode's air, and Vradier's "Mejicana" (guitar accompaniment), being encored, she gave another Spanish song. In Weiss's "Village Blacksmith," Captain Goodenough was good enough; and Miss Sagrini, in Ascher's "Danse Negre," and "Chant des Naides," for the piano, displayed considerable talent. All these were deservedly applauded by a large audience.

The Brixton Choral Society gave a performance of Elijah last Monday at the Angell Town institution, for the benefit of their conductor, Mr. William Lemare. The hall was crowded; and the manner in which the arduous choral music in the oratorio was rendered was, in a very high degree, creditable to so youthful a society. The solo music was undertaken by Madame Florence Lancia, Miss Adelaide Newton, Mrs. Lucas, Mr. George Perren, Mr. G. T. Carter, and Mr. Renwick, from the mention of whose names it will be gathered that there was no cause for complaint in this direction. Mdme. Lancia gave a very expressive reading of "Hear ye, Israel;" Miss Newton was no less effective in "O rest in the Lord," an encore for which she declined. Mr. Renwick was very warmly applauded for his emphatic delivery of "Is not His word like a fire?" The tenor music in the first part was sung by Mr. Carter, and that in the second by Mr. Perren, each of whom received a good many plaudits. Mr. John Harrison played the pianoforte, and Mr. F. H. Lemare, the harmonium accompaniments.—W. H. P.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This society's third concert took place on Monday, in St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Cusins. The programme was as follows:—

Part I.—Symphony in E flat (first time) Schumann; Preislied (Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg), Dr. Gunz, Wagner; Concerto in G for Pianoforte, Madame Schumann, Beethoven; Aria, "Vel che sapete" (Nozze di Figaro) Madame Monbelli, Mozart; Overture (Midsummer), Mendelssohn.

Part II.—Symphony (No. 7) in A, Beethoven; Cavatina, "Bel raggio" (Semiramide), Madame Monbelli, Rossini; Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini.

Schumann's symphony has been played repeatedly at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere, with a result on the whole favourable to its pretensions. That it will ever take the high rank claimed for it by the partisans who are ready to swear by the name of its composer we do not believe. The fourth and fifth movements stand in the way. At each performance the audience tacitly reject all that follows the slow movement. Their interest, lively up to that point, flags, and the end of the symphony is a visible relief. There is nothing to wonder at in this, even though Mr. Macfarren, the society's analyser, talks of "deeply solemn harmony" and "singular melodiousness." The characteristics he points out are far from plain; indeed, the common eye sees something very like their opposite. We agree, however, with Mr. Macfarren in his estimate of Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto as a "truly perfect work, whose beauty is incessant, and whose interest is unbroken." Madame Schumann's performance was distinguished by even more than customary energy, especially in the andante (presumably her own), the labour of playing which necessitated exertion of an unwonted kind. It is needless to say that every movement was loudly applauded, and that, at the close, Madame Schumann was recalled. Mendelssohn's beautiful overture was much better played than we anticipated, the difficult wind parts being rendered in a manner nearly approaching perfection. How much pleasure was given, under these circumstances, those who know the overture can imagine. "One of my best," wrote Beethoven, when negotiating the sale of his symphony in A; and his opinion, contrary to the often-cited precedents furnished by Milton among poets and Handel among musicians, has been ratified by the public. We may spare ourselves comment upon the wealth of beauty revealed in this masterpiece. What amateur does not know all that can be said in its praise, and what can be said in its praise that has not been printed a thousand times? We have heard better performances; though, in justice to the Philharmonic orchestra, it must be said that the work had a spirited and intelligent if not a finished reading. Cherubini's overture to Anacreon fitly closed the concert.

Madame Monbelli sang in her usual charming style, and was applauded as only those are whose success is unqualified. Dr. Gunz's air, may be very well in its proper place—the Meistersinger and the "future." Nevertheless, Dr. Gunz sang well, and was called back by the Wagnerites present.

Digitized by Google

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S
Beethoven Recitals.
1870.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ has the honour to announce that his TENTH SERIES of PIANOFORTE RECITALS will take place on the following Afternoons:—

Friday, May 6,	Friday, June 3,
Friday, May 13,	Friday, June 10,
Friday, May 20,	Friday, June 17,
Friday, May 27,	Friday, June 24,

To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely.

The present year being the Centenary of the birth of Beethoven, who came into the world, at Bonn, on the Rhine, December 17, 1770, Mr. Hallé considers it becoming and appropriate to devote his forthcoming series of Recitals exclusively to the music of that illustrious composer. The sonatas for pianoforte solo offer as complete an epitome of Beethoven's artistic life as do the string quartets, or the orchestral symphonies. The progress of a great genius, from its early budding to its ripe maturity, could not be more completely illustrated than in these truly wonderful compositions—a striking characteristic of which is that no two of them resemble each other, or have anything in comm n beyond their unsurpassed excellence. Mr. Hallé will have the honour of playing, with two exceptions, all the pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven, in strictly chronological order—commencing with the three sonatas, Op. 2 (dedicated to Haydn), and ending with the sonatas in E major, A flat major, and C minor, Opa. 109, 110, 111. The exceptions referred to are the sonatas in G major and G minor, Op. 49, the comparatively trifling character of which unfits them for public performance. For these Mr. Hallé will substitute the Andante in F major, originally intended for the grand sonata in C, Op. 53 (dedicated to Count Waldstein), and the 32 Variations on an Original Theme, in C minor.

The programmes will, as on previous occasions, consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, p.m.

Mr. Hallé will be assisted at all the Recitals by

HERR STOCKHAUSEN,

who will sing four of Schubert's collection of songs entitled "The Fair Maid of the Mill," at each of the five first concerts, accompanied by Mr. Hallé.

Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the sonatas will, as on previous occasions, accompany the programmes.

THE FIRST RECITAL
WILL TAKE PLACE ON
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 6TH, 1870,
To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

PART I.

SONATA, Op. 2, No. 1 .. .. Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Das Wandern" (Wandering) } —Herr Stockhausen .. Schubert.
{ "Wohin" (Whither) }
SONATA, Op. 2, No. 3 .. .. Beethoven.

PART II.

SONATA, Op. 2, No. 2 .. .. Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Halt" (Stop) } .. .. Schubert.
{ "Danksagung an den Bach" (Thanksgiving to the Brook) }
Herr Stockhausen.
GRAND SONATA, Op. 7 .. .. Beethoven.

Prices of Admission (for the Series)—Sofa Stalls (numbered and reserved), £2 2s.; Balcony, £1.

For One Recital—Sofa Stalls, 7s.; Balcony, 3s.; Area, 1s.

Subscriptions received at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co.'s, 48, Cheapside; Hays, 4, Exchange Buildings; Austin's Ticket Office, 28, Piccadilly; and by Mr. Charles Hallé, 11, Mansfield Street, Cavendish Square.

MARRIAGE.

On the 23rd April, at St. Paul's, Lorrimore Square, by the Rev John Going, vicar, JOHN FREDERICK PAUL, eldest son of OTTO ERNEST CRISCHOW, Esq., of Stettin, Prussia, to CONSTANCE SUSANNA, eldest daughter of ROBERT UNDER SHOW, Esq., of 10, Manor Road, Lorrimore Square. No cards.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1870.

OUR FAITH IN MUSIC.

"WE walk by faith and not by sight," wrote St. Paul, who, nevertheless, saw much—we have it on the word of a gentleman and a scholar—denied to ordinary folk. But St. Paul wisely laid down religious dogmas meant to last. He knew there would come an age far remote from that of miracles, when the supernatural could only exist upon the basis of a feeling described as "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." We have not to discuss here whether it is right or wrong to be as little children on questions of religion. As a matter of fact, the great majority find it convenient to believe what is told them, and would hardly thank any one for disturbing their quiet and comfortable trust. Let it be remembered, however, that even in religion there is a distinction between faith and credulity. The Bereans—a people of whom Bible readers would otherwise never have heard—saw this distinction, and acted accordingly; enquiring into the new doctrines preached to them, and getting a good word from the preachers (honest men) for their sensible behaviour.* We are not, then, even in matters essentially the objects of faith, to open our ears to all that is told us. "Prove all things," said a high authority, "and hold fast that which is good."

If in religion, still more outside is the practice of taking things upon trust to be avoided. A word of caution with regard to musical credulity, in particular, may be of use just now; and the utterance of that word is our chief object. For provocation, we have only to turn to the last Philharmonic programme, wherein the annotator, Mr. G. A. Macfarren, lays down two propositions of exceeding danger. Here are his words:—

"Every original thinker has some forms of expression peculiar to himself, which are unintelligible to his hearers until familiarity has withdrawn the veil of their novelty. Faith is the only medium through which the works of such a man can at first be estimated. The faith that was denied to Beethoven, denied to Mozart before him, is at present withheld from some of his successors, who, if not his equals, prove their kindred powers by their kindred earnestness."

Let us see what this remarkable utterance contains:—

I. An original thinker is more or less unintelligible;—therefore, he who is unintelligible, is, presumably, an original thinker.

II. The writings of a man who is unintelligible are proper objects of faith—i.e., we must believe in the existence of merits not to be perceived.

III. Anybody with kindred powers to those of Beethoven should be trusted as Beethoven ought to have been trusted.

IV. The existence of kindred powers is shown by kindred earnestness.

Here are two pairs of propositions, each pair involving an absurdity so obvious as to need no pointing out. Admit the first, and we shall all be bowing humbly before the utterers of "dark sayings"—most humbly before him whose sayings are darkest. Admit the second, and we immediately find ourselves in presence of a thousand Beethovens—because to be Beethoven one has only to have Beethoven's earnestness. We may say, therefore, of Mr. Macfarren's propositions that they upset themselves and render any comment on our part superfluous. But the whole matter is instructive, as showing how thoroughly wrong are those who would apply the case of Beethoven to the rhapsodies of "Young Germany." In point of fact, they have only a remote contingency to rest upon;—Beethoven was unintelli-

* The Bereans were an obscure sect of seceders from the Scotch Kirk, who rejected all natural religion, and held unbelief in the plenary inspiration of Scripture to be the unpardonable sin.

Digitized by Google

gible; so is "Young Germany";—Beethoven was a great master; so may be "Young Germany." But admitting as much, we have to point out a difference which removes this contingency to the farthest possible point. The man who wrote the "Choral Symphony" wrote also the Symphonies in C and D; and he who wrote the "Posthumous Quartets" wrote also the six dedicated to Lobkewitz. From one extreme to the other Beethoven travelled by well-marked stages; and, arriving at the last, he had some right to demand our faith. What has "Young Germany" done of like kind? Where are its claims upon our belief? Echo answers, "Where;" and this is all the answer we are likely to get. "Young Germany" rushes forward with the unintelligible, and assumes to begin where Beethoven left off. No, Mr. Macfarren; we decline to play the childish game of "Open your mouth and shut your eyes, and see what Young Germany sends you."

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

OUR contemporary the Choir, and other journals, speak of the approaching performance in Paris of Herr Rubinstein's "new symphony, The Ocean." That the work in question was played years since at the Hanover Square Rooms is evidently not among things generally known.

THE death is announced of the Rev. W. H. Havergal, whose labours in the cause of congregational psalmody made his name well known both in England and America. Mr. Havergal was, for 14 years, rector of St. Nicholas, Worcester, during which time he enjoyed the respect and affection of all with whom he came in contact. Failing health compelled him to withdraw from public labour, and, for some time, he resided at Leamington, where he died. Mr. Havergal will be remembered as the author of several works on psalmody, and as the composer of not a few tunes held in general esteem. To the last he took a lively interest in the progress of sacred music, and may be said to have laid down his pen only with his life.

AMONG the thousands who thronged Westminster Abbey on Sunday evening, at the first "special service," it is impossible to say how many were gratified and how many startled, but it is certain that a portion of them felt outraged by the phenomenon of sound issuing from a brazen instrument concealed among the pipes of the organ. It is almost incredible, but nevertheless true, that during the performances of the "Easter Hymn" and "Hallelujah" the tones of the organ were broken in upon by the brayings of a cornet-à-piston. It is difficult to believe that Mr. Turle has so little faith in himself and in his organ as to require the latter to be supplemented by a "popular" wind instrument. We are sorry to nip in the bud this attempt of the Westminster Chapter to emulate the effects of a music-hall; but as the result was a failure, we may be spared a second desecration.

IN his "analytical and historical programme" for the last concert of the Philharmonic Society Mr. Macfarren takes up a spear that can only be likened to that of Don Quixote, and rides a hobby only to be compared with Don Quixote's famous "Rozinante" (we will not insult Sancho Panza's Dapple), on behalf of the whole army of new German mystics militant, who build their hopes in the future on the ground that Weber, Spohr, and others did not appreciate Beethoven as he should have been appreciated, while the general public did. Apart from the fact that the general public didn't, we would suggest that times have changed. Moreover, the story of Beethoven's being not understood by certain musicians of his time being put forward, as an excuse for the arrogant pretensions of late composers who ape Beethoven without a spark of his genius, is simply absurd. For the man who cannot see the difference between Schumann (we name no other) and Beethoven, we are sorry.

ENGLISH opera being extinct (save for one specimen occasionally shown under glass at Sydenham) we may now safely call opera in London an exotic. It comes to us from foreign climes, lives awhile under more or less artificial conditions, and then dies to be renewed by fresh importations. It has its varying seasons. Now it flourishes and waxes strong; anon it languishes and becomes weak. The present is a season of apparent flourishing and waxing strong. Opera has come upon us like the April heat, and may be classed among phenomena. We have serious opera at Covent Garden; serious opera at Drury Lane; opéra bouffe at the Lyceum; opéra bouffe at the Gaiety; and an immediate prospect of opéra bouffe at the St. James's. This is pretty well for a town which, during many months in the year, cannot support even a revival of Acis and Galatea. But the preponderance of opéra bouffe over its serious rival signifies movement, because a while ago the opera, genus Offenbach, had not been transplanted to where the people "take their pleasure sadly;" and now we have it rampant. Is not the divinity of Offenbachism—we mean Mdlle. Schneider—making triumphal progress through the provinces, and among people the last to be corrupted or improved (which the reader pleases) by change? With regard to this movement we may reasonably ask "Whither?" Only let not those who symphonise with it put any such question to the Muse of serious opera. Imagine the feelings with which that haughty and beautiful lady—confident of her claims upon public affection, if not conscious of the smirches upon her classic robes—regards the rivalry of the pert French minx, who comes in scant attire, with saucy tongue and significant gesture! It is the old story of the lawful wife and the unlawful Anonyma in a new form. Will the Anonyma of opera chain "the town" to the wheels of her pony carriage and drive through "society," mistress of the situation?

TO-DAY is to witness the first performance in Paris of Mr. Benedict's St. Cecilia, under the composer's own direction. The cause, as our readers know, is good; Mdlle. Nilsson having, beforehand, devoted the proceeds to a charitable object, which Mr. Benedict also has at heart. Note, in proof, the following Mr. Benedict addressed to Baron Taylor, President of the Association des Artistes Musiciens:—

"TO THE PRESIDENT,—A great honour is about to be paid to my little oratorio, The Legend of St. Cecilia, an English poem, by Mr. H. F. Chorley, translated into French by M. Tagliafico. The orchestra and chorus of the Grand Opéra are to assist at the first or well performance of Mdlle. Nilsson, fixed to take place on Saturday, the 30th of April: the solos to be supported by MM. Faure, Colin, Madame Gueymard, and Mdlle. Nilsson.

"I feel deeply and recognize as a composer the honour France does to my work. I am also anxious to join with Mdlle. Nilsson in her liberality in offering the proceeds of her benefit to your charitable relief fund for the 'Association des Artistes Musiciens Français,' in presenting the copyright and engraved plates of my score of the Legend of St. Cecilia. Perhaps your Philharmonic and Orpheonist Societies will take some interest in repeating this little oratorio after the splendid performance which it is sure to have at the Grand Opéra.

"With every sentiment of esteem, I remain, Mr. President, yours, &c., "JULES BENEDICT.

"London, April 14, 1870."

THE irreconcilable members of the Hanover aristocracy have, since the incorporation of the Kingdom with Prussia, hitherto been in the habit of displaying their sympathies with the dethroned dynasty by pointedly stopping away themselves, and not allowing others to occupy the boxes they rent by the year, at the Festival Performance given in celebration of the birthday of the monarch de facto. They have just received a notice from the Intendant informing them that a continuance of this conduct will result in their boxes being taken from them and let to others of less ex-royalist proclivities.

"MODEL performances" of Herr R. Wagner's Rienzi, Fliegender Holländer, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, and Meistersinger are, to be given in June, at Weimar, immediately after the Beethoven Festival got up by the General Musical Association of Germany. A Beethoven Festival followed by "model performances"—whatever they may be—of Herr R. Wagner's lucubrations! Among the artists to be engaged expressly for the occasion rumour mentions Mesdames Mallinger, Brandt, Herren Niemann and Betz. It is also said that the Abbate Franz Liszt, to do honour "to his son-in-law in spe"—as a German paper terms the Prophet of Lucerne—will conduct one of the said "model performances."

Digitized by Google

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

At the second performance of Il Flauto Magico Mdlle. Sessi maintained her position, singing both the trying airs allotted to the "Queen of Night" with remarkable ability. They, perhaps, in places, slightly overtax her means, but there is an indomitable energy about this young artist, which seems to show that no impediment which perseverance can surmount will be allowed to stand in her way. She has already won the sympathies of the operatic public, and, it must be admitted, on thoroughly legitimate grounds. About the rest of the performance of Mozart's now happily familiar opera, as played at Covent Garden Theatre, little need be said. That Dr. Gunz possesses all the traditions of Tamino was proved some years ago, when he first assumed the character at Her Majesty's Theatre. One word about the Pamina of Mdlle. Tietjens would be superfluous; nor could the imposing music of the High Priest, Sarastro, have been given to a singer with a voice more rich and sympathetic than that of Signor Bagagiolo. Another novelty in the distribution of parts, however, demands special mention—we refer to the Papageno of Signor Cotogni. Although the comic humour of this ready and clever artist is not superabundant—and in this respect he can no more aspire to be a Ronconi than he can aspire to be Shicknedder, Mozart's original Papageno, and author of the libretto—he may justly be complimented on the admirable manner in which he sings the music throughout. Signor Cotogni has evidently studied it con amore, as though, instead of an Italian, he had been a true born Teuton. Mdlle. Olma, who made her first appearance in London as Papagena, has a pretty light soprano voice, with which she sings neat enough, and probably will, be done; but, at present, she is inexperienced and has everything to learn. The parts of the three good genii and the three attendants on the "Queen of Night," to whom Mozart has assigned so much that is of importance in the concerted music, are more than adequately sustained, especially the latter, by Mdlles. Bauermeister, Madigan, and Scalchi. Mr. Crellin, who plays Monostatos, chief of the Slaves, is another new-comer, about whose capabilities we are unable, as yet, to offer an opinion. Other small parts are well filled by Signori Capponi, Marino, and Fallar. Not the least difficulty in an efficient representation of Il Flauto Magico is the unusual number of minor characters which have more or less to do with the concerted music; and that these are nearly in every instance in the hands of one or more less competent singers speaks well for the strength of the Covent Garden company. How the orchestra plays the overture and all the picturesque and fanciful accompaniments it is unnecessary to say, while the great improvement in the chorus noticed so often last year is just as noticeable now.

On Saturday night Mdlle. Sessi appeared in a fourth character—La Traviata—and again gave excellent proofs of the versatility of her talent. Our readers must be pretty well tired of descriptions of this notorious opera, for the sins of which, in a moral sense, some remarkably pretty music, and a very ingenious and admirable finale (Act 2), do not by any means atone. They need stand under no apprehension. All we have to say is a word or two about Mdlle. Sessi's performance of Violetta. We may observe, en passant, that Violetta is about the easiest part with which to make a tolerable figure in the entire repertory of modern opera. She, nevertheless, makes more than a tolerable figure; and in one or two situations may be said to hold her own against some of her most renowned predecessors. Her general view of the character approaches more nearly to that quiet unobtrusive view adopted by the late Madame Bosio and others than to the, at times, obtrusively "realistic" view of Mdlle. Piccolomini—who, in 1856, under Mr. Lumley's management, first made the English public familiar with the beauties of La Traviata. Mdlle. Sessi coughs occasionally, but not over much; nor does she continually endeavour to make the audience aware of the fact that Violetta is under the melancholy affliction of phthisis. Although short in stature, she is somewhat too robust to look the "creatura" to the life. But in the last scene it is difficult to regard her as "moribund," notwithstanding her stage "make-up," which is all that the most fastidious could desire. She, at the same time, throws herself heart and soul into the character, and here and there—as, for example, in the scene with Giorgio Germont, by whom Violetta is persuaded to renounce Alfredo for ever, and that in which her immaculate lover casts the money he has won from the Baron Douphol (her temporary protector!) at her feet, as remuneration for her past love—she exhibits far more dramatic talent than we had given her credit for. But Mdlle. Sessi sings the music even better than she acts. There were brilliant points in the first duet with Alfredo, and still more brilliant points in the cavatina, more especially in the cabaletta—

> "Sempre libera degg'io > Trasvolar di gioia in gioa"

—where Violetta, throwing off the illusion described so pathetically in the first movement, "Ah forse è lui," vows the remainder of her life to gaiety and pleasure. But best of all, in our opinion, is the plaintive air of the last scene, "Addio del passato bei sogni ridenti," in which Violetta, having lost, as she imagines, the affections of Alfredo, looks to death for consolation. This was given with such genuine feeling as to merit heartier applause than it obtained. On the whole the new Violetta may be regarded as a success; and when it is remembered that such singers as Madame Bosio and Madame Patti (to name no others) have played the same character on the same boards, this is saying no little. Mdlle. Sessi was repeatedly and warmly applauded, besides being several times called forward. The part of Alfredo was sustained by the versatile Signor Nandin, to whom everything—from Vasco di Gama, in the Africaine, downwards—seems to come easy, and who in the music of Verdi is just as much at home as in the music of Meyerbeer; that of the elder Germont, with his supercilentious air, "Di Provenza il mare" (encored, of course), was represented by Signor Graziani as only Signor Graziani can represent it. Mdlle. Locatelli rende a charming Flora Bervoix; and Signor Taglialico a most uncompromising Baron Douphol, just as ready to shoot Alfredo Germont as to lose money to him at cards, and showing, with real dramatic truth, an innate contempt for, perhaps, the most contemptible personage ever depicted in novel or drama. In these subtle distinctions Signor Taglialico, considering the rank now assigned to him, stands alone. A man who gives life and meaning to comparatively subordinate personages as this gentleman does is rare. It is scarcely necessary to add that the decorations and "mise-en-scène" of the Traviata are what they have never failed to be at Covent Garden, or that the orchestra and chorus, under Signor Vianesi, were all that could be wished.

The operas performed during the week have been Guillaume Tell (Monday); Il Flauto Magico—owing to the indisposition of Signor Mario (Tuesday); and La Traviata (Thursday). Cherubini's magnificent Medea, with Mdlle. Tietjens, naturally, as the heroine, is to be given to-night—for the first time at Covent Garden.

MR. MANNS'S BENEFIT CONCERT.

"Benefits" are sometimes given on very small provocation. They are, not unfrequently, routine affairs, in which the slightest possible sympathy exists between the person complimented and those who compliment. The benefit concert given in Mr. Manns's name at the Crystal Palace on Saturday had no connection whatever with this class. Between the Crystal Palace conductor and the Crystal Palace audience there is a more than ordinary tie. Each is indebted to the other for favour received or pleasure conferred; and both have at heart a common interest. Saturday's proceedings were, therefore, exactly what they pretended to be, while the one thing withheld from us may hope, made the "benefit" something more than a benefit in name. Even those who, like ourselves, frequently differ from Mr. Manns on questions of musical faith and practice will be glad of this result. On the whole, he is undoubtedly doing much for music. If proof were wanting, it would be found in the list of works performed during the past winter. The list in question begins with twenty symphonies, of which seven are by Beethoven; Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Schumann contributing two each. Following the symphonies, come fifty-two overtures and orchestral pieces, the composers most largely drawn upon being Mendelssohn (10), Beethoven (6), Weber (5), Mozart (4), and Schubert (4). Answering imperial selections are those opposite to the works of these masters others by Berlioz, Raff, Reinecke, Rubenstein, and Wagner, which have been presented, let us hope, that the public may, by a knowledge of that which is weak, incline to that which is strong. The concertos and other instrumental solos number twenty-three; Beethoven and Mendelssohn again heading the list, followed closely by Bach and Weber, Ries and Piatti bringing up the rear. The catalogue ends with eight vocal works of importance, to which Beethoven and Mendelssohn, yet again, most largely contribute. Of these one hundred and three works, twenty one were played for the first time at the Crystal Palace, the number being made up thus:—Four Symphonies, by Mozart, Bennett, Hiller, and Cowen respectively; eight overtures, &c.; seven instrumental solos; Rosential solos number twenty-three; Beethoven and Mendelssohn again heading the list, followed closely by Bach and Weber, Ries and Piatti bringing up the rear. The catalogue ends with eight vocal works of importance, to which Beethoven and Mendelssohn, yet again, most largely contribute. Of these one hundred and three works, twenty one were played for the first time at the Crystal Palace, the number being made up thus:—Four Symphonies, by Mozart, Bennett, Hiller, and Cowen respectively; eight overtures, &c.; seven instrumental solos; Rosential solos Mose Sobieski, and Sullivan's Prodigal Son. The names just mentioned show that regard has been paid to native talent, and, fairly considered, the entire list must give satisfaction. Anyhow, there is no denying that in the department of orchestral music it stands alone, and claims the highest honours of successful labour. "The Saturday Concerts"—so runs a note at the end of the catalogue—"will recommence on the first Saturday in October next." To lovers of classical music it would be hard to make a more grateful announcement.

In drawing up his programme Mr. Manns was careful to aim at the gratification of varied tastes as far as consistent with his general plan. For the popular taste he provided a selection of vocal music ranging from songs by Schumann downwards. Mdlle. Reboux sang Rode's air with variations and Arditi's valse, "L'Estasi" (both utterly unsuited to her voice and style); Madame Florence Lancia gave "Ardon gl' incensi;" Mr. Vernon Rigby was heard in "Come, ye children," from Sullivan's Prodigal Son, and two of Schumann's songs (scored for orchestra by Mr. Manns); Signor Urio contributed Mercadante's "Bella adorata;" and Signor Mongini, "M'apparì" (encored) and "La donna è mobile." The orchestral music requires more notice. In the first place it was played by an augmented band of 100 performers, and played to perfection. Rarely has such an orchestra been brought together; still more rarely has it been used to such purpose. Next, the works chosen were in great part admirable, wholly interesting. Mozart's overture to Der Schauspiel Director led the way, and was dashed off in a style harmonizing with its agreeable and spirited character. The entire opera—a "Comedy with Music" Mozart himself called it—was written with special regard for particular circumstances and particular voices. The whole is therefore obsolete; the overture alone remaining. Nobody fears for this relic, at least till the "future" comes which is to bring the apotheosis of Herr Wagner. Then, not only the overture to Der Schauspiel Director, but also much other music will have a place on the upper shelves of dusty libraries. Beethoven's seventh symphony, so often played under Mr. Manns as to be among the works with which his audience are most familiar, calls for neither description nor criticism. In justice, however, we must dwell for a moment upon a performance of more than usual merit. The orchestra rendered the symphony with the precision of a machine, plus the artistic insight which can discern and the artistic power which can express the composer's idea. No more remarkable effort has been made during the season.

Digitized by Google

Weber's Concertstück in F minor, played by Madame Schumann, was a contribution to the popular element in the programme. Everybody knows this much used—often ill-used—work, and a recall for the artist was the certain result, especially as Madame Schumann exhibited all her distinctive qualifications. Bach's violin prelude in E major was given in peculiar and questionable form. Fate has made grim sport of this work. Bach himself adapted it as an organ solo with orchestral accompaniments leading to his anthem, "Wir danken dir, Gott." This was played at the Crystal Palace three years ago, with the solo relegated to the violin. On Saturday the prelude appeared as arranged for a number of violins with new and entirely different accompaniment by Herr Stör. How next, we may ask, will the unfortunate work be treated? By way of comfort, the programme assures us that "nothing can subdue the astonishing vigour and entrain of the original." From this comfort may undoubtedly be derived; nevertheless, we can hardly agree with the policy of playing tricks upon great works simply because their greatness cannot be hidden. Herr Stör's version of Bach, though executed with much spirit, produced little effect. Some ballet music (No. 3) from Mendelssohn's Wedding of Camacho, played for the first time in England, was agreeably interesting, and the concert fitly ended with a masterly performance of Weber's overture to Oberon.

P. M. G.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S LECTURES ON MUSIC.

In pursuance of the scheme of instruction in science and art for women, which has for some months been working successfully at the South Kensington Museum, under the direction of a committee of ladies, with the Hon. and Rev. Francis Byng as secretary, Mr. Arthur Sullivan commenced the other morning, in the Lecture Theatre of the Museum, a course of twelve lectures on the theory and practice of vocal music, to be continued on successive Tuesdays and Fridays. The object of these lectures is to give some idea, in a concise and comprehensive manner, of the requirements for the practical study of vocal music, with special reference to choral singing. It is intended that the future lectures of this course shall be interspersed with examples of part-songs, to be sung by ladies attending the course. . . . A pathetic description of the agonies suffered by persons with an educated taste at an ordinary musical party, Mr. Sullivan remarked that, though the study of music was no longer proscribed, as it was by Lord Chesterfield, under a social ban, yet in vocal music we were far behind our ancestors. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth it was part of the ordinary education of every lady and gentleman to be able to sing a madrigal or roundelay to notes. In the present generation vocal music had not kept pace with instrumental; indeed, singing, as an art, threatened to die out. The public were to blame in the matter; for so long as singers found that with a good voice, including of course a few ringing high notes, or one or two exceptionally low ones, they could command money and fame, they said it was not worth their while to devote themselves to study and hard work. When the public should demand of a singer this cultivation, as they did now of a pianist or violinist, and would be satisfied with nothing else, then singing would become a fine art again. After an explanation of the different "intervals" in music, Mr. Sullivan remarked that harmony, like many useful and beautiful things, sprang from the monks, whose creation it was, and not a revival of something forgotten or lost. The old Greek music died out; there was no heart in it, but for a time its clumsy nomenclature was retained. Afterwards came the cold unimpassioned solemn Gregorian chants. There was not much heart in these either, but they strangely moved one by their very absence of passion. They were in keeping with the long still aisles in which they were sung, and with the austere lives of the men who sang them. The solemn church song or hymn, which was first sung in one voice only, or in octaves was indeed the basis of music. It was sung without rhythm or time (in canto fermo). The monks soon found that certain different sounds sung at the same time had a new and pleasant effect, and they set to work on scientific principles, to develop the science of "counterpoint"—the grammar of part-writing. Mr. Sullivan concluded his introductory lecture by observing that much of the latter part of his discourse was advice to composers rather than singers; but, he added, "to know the cause of an evil is very often to know its cure; and if you come upon a difficult passage to sing, and are able to analyze it, and know exactly what constitutes its difficulty, you will the more easily be able to overcome it. Besides, I have already explained to you that my desire is to sharpen your critical faculties, and make you form a discriminating and appreciative audience. It is better to be a good listener than an indifferent performer. The one assists and advances art; the other retards it." There was a large and attentive audience, almost exclusively composed of ladies.

MUSIC IN PASSION WEEK.

By an invariably late contributor.

The concerts of Passion Week always take their cue from the week itself. Time was when, throughout the six days, theatres were closed, or else given up to orrories, a species of entertainment in connection with which it was the right thing to quote Addison (or Marvell)—

> What though in solemn silence all
> Roll round the dark terrestrial ball

—and from which we were supposed to come as from a sermon, whereof Addison (or Marvell) is also apropos—

> In reason's ear they all rejoice,
> And utter forth a glorious voice,
> For ever singing as they shine—
> The hand that made us is divine.

Orreries are gone, but music remains; not that of the spheres, we grant, yet music not bad in its way. The advance of latitudinarianism has not disturbed the dominion of religious art over the most religious week of the year, and just as much as ever oratorios hold their own. On personal grounds, no musical critic will regret this state of things. Passion Week is to him a holy week, in the sense that it brings relief from toil. When the Messiah and kindred works are to the fore, he can shut up his note-book and retire. Who wants to be told anything about music as familiar to all as the marriage service to "sweet seventeen," or who is anxious to know how this popular soprano gave "I know that my Redeemer liveth," or that well-known bass declaimed "Why do the nations?" Even if the case were otherwise, at least as regards the music, who could say anything that has not been said a thousand times? For these reasons we shall pass over the Messiah performances of last week. Taking all London into consideration, from Exeter Hall with its 700 executants to outlying school-rooms, where scratch companies give the sacred oratorio "for a charitable purpose," those performances were legion, and an exhaustive list would not be less surprising than instructive. At all events, it would prove the extraordinary popularity of Handel's masterpiece—a popularity so great as to be one of the curiosities of art.

But Passion Week did not leave us quite destitute of topics. Two series of classical concerts ended respectively on the first and last of the six days, and will only be resumed when the winter approaches. Unconsciously, it would appear, human arrangements help Nature in her grand work of compensation. "The time of the singing of birds has come, and the voice of the nightingale is heard in the land." We are all glad of it, and look forward to the enjoyment of nature's music with keen anticipation. Whereupon, the

Digitized by Google

"Monday Populars," and the "Crystal Palace Saturdays" retire, as the aurora disappears from the Arctic sky when the long Arctic day sets in. True, we shall have music still with us, but for the most part, of the bee or the bird order, and therefore quite appropriate to the time. The little toiler which has its representatives in the givers of benefit concerts, whose season is close at hand. These, with their keen eyes for eligible families—probable ticket buyers—and their sensitive appreciation of every opening for an extended "connection," will soon swarm forth. Their long dreary concerts will again be attended by languid ladies, and the artists who are always giving their services on such occasions, will again practise "boloing" from the feeble rustle of silks which does duty for applause. Happily, there will come bird music also. The "nightingales" and other songsters of passage may be expected to warble their strains amid the sunshine of the Crystal Palace transept—strains the value of which rests upon their fitness for the time and place. On the whole we cannot complain of these arrangements. Some among us may regret that classical music ever gives way to that which is ephemeral, but the change works well.

> Gathers honey all the day
> From every opening flower,

April 23, 1870. T. E.

THE SONGS OF SCOTLAND.

Mr. Kennedy, the famous exponent of Scottish Songs, gave the first of seven entertainments at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Monday last, to a large and appreciative audience. He was assisted by Miss Kennedy, whose performance of a selection of reels and strathspeys varied the proceedings in a most agreeable manner. Mr. Kennedy's first part contained such popular ballads as "Caller Herrin'," "Auld Robin Gray" "Green Grow the Rashes O," and "Wha wad na fecht for Charlie;" while the second was not less distinguished by the presence of "My Nannie O," "Johnny Cope," and "Auld Lang Syne." To say how these songs and others were given is entirely superfluous. Enough that the audience waxed enthusiastic, and applauded the singer with might and main. Between the parts Mr. Kennedy recited Wilson's "Watty and Meg" with excellent effect. The entertainment will be repeated on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday in next week.

SUNDAY MUSIC IN THE PARKS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—By the reports and articles on our interview with the Chief Commissioner of Works, the public would infer that the Band Committee had all along been prohibited from playing "dance music" as one of the conditions on which we held the management. While we have been in communication with every Chief Commissioner since 1856, it was not until Mr. Ayrton's letter, April 11, that any conditions, prohibitions, or complaints from frequenters of the parks were ever breathed to us. In taking the place of the military bands, our programmes were framed as closely as possible on theirs, and fourteen years' experience has confirmed the good judgment of alternating marches and selections with quadrilles, bringing together the national melodies. Of these (the salt to the programme) the people are to be deprived, in favour of, as Mr. Ayrton suggests, any other light and cheerful music not "dance." The transference of Regent's Park band from the committee to a private individual had occasioned interviews with Mr. Layard while Chief Commissioner, whose word was given to reconsider it. On Mr. Ayrton taking office this fact was communicated to him, a correspondence followed, and previous to our deputation a memorial signed by the committees of the three parks forwarded. We did not give ourselves the title of "trustees of the people," but set forth that the band committees were appointed at public meetings held in all parts of London on the stoppage of the military bands, and that the several Governments have since recognized the functions of the executive.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, R. M. MORRELL, Hon. Sec.

National Sunday League, 256, High Holborn,
April 15.

THE Festival at Bonn, on the Rhine, in celebration of the centenary of the birth of Beethoven, is to be held on the 11th, 12th, and 13th of September—conductor, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller. The orchestral rehearsals commence on the 9th of September.

MR. W. D. HALL, from St. John the Divine's, Fairfield, has been appointed organist to the Church and Schools for the Blind, Liverpool; and Mr. James J. Monk (College of Organists), from St. John's Waterloo, has been appointed organist to St. Philip's, Liverpool.

WAIFS.

Mr. Gye has returned from Paris.

Mr. W. R. S. Ralston, whose assiduous and successful cultivation of Russian literature is well known, proposes to give, at four in the afternoon of Wednesday, the 4th of May, the first of what we hope may be a long series of "Recitals" derived from Russian legends and tales. No charitable institution is to be benefited; no money to be taken at the doors; admission on presentation of card at the doors of St. George's Hall, Regent Street. Zum zu Tsaria!

Madame Adelina Patti is to make her first appearance this season, with Signor Mario, in the Barbiere, on Thursday. Mdlle. Pauline Lucca appears on the Tuesday following (in Faust).

M. T. Lotto, the violinist, has arrived in London—it may be presumed for the musical spring and summer season. He was last heard, years since, at the Monday Popular Concerts.

No less a personage than M. Offenbach himself was present during the first performance of the Princess of Trebizonde, at the Gaiety Theatre.

Mr. Oberthur's overture, Ruberzahl, has been arranged for military band by Mr. Kappy, bandmaster of the Royal Marines (Chatham division), and will be performed at the commencement at the South Kensington Museum, May 4th. The overture has also recently been played at one of the "Musician's Concerts" in Nuremberg, where at the same time the author played his concertino for harp and orchestra.

"Aristocratic composers (says the Choir) are coming to the front on the Continent. To the names of the Comtesse de Grandval and the Baroness de Maistre must now be added that of the Comtesse Perricre-Villeneuve, whose first opera was performed at her hotel last week by some of the chief artists in Paris. The work, entitled La Dryade, was listened to by a distinguished circle, including M. Perrin, M. Carvalho, and M. Victor Massé. The orchestra of the Theatre Italian and the chorus of the Conservatoire were engaged for the occasion."

The production of two versions of Frou-Frou and legal proceedings before the Vice-Chancellor have rendered that "comedy-drama" familiar in every mouth. The St. James's version is not authorized by MM. Meilhac and Halévy; the Olympic has been prepared under their sanction. The splendid dresses which now take the place once occupied by upholstery, as the foundation of managerial hopes, are in both cases all that could be desired; the scenery at the St. James's, however, is old and faded—that of the Olympic bright and for the occasion. How many more Frou-Frous shall we expect?

REVIEWS.

We have received the following letter from the gentleman who undertakes the duty of reviewing new music in our columns:—

"To the Editor of the 'Musical World.'

"SIR,—I have unwittingly done an injustice to Madame Oury. The 'Twilight' piece to which my remarks applied was by ———*. But, in the hurry of writing, another by Mdme. Oury being before me, I put the saddle on the wrong horse, which, a glance at the two title pages would have saved me from doing. About Madame Oury's new nocturne I wrote quite in another strain—as by this time you must know. I am sure you will print this, in justice to Madame Oury, and to YOUR REVIEWER."

* It is only fair to give the author of the other "Twilight" piece the benefit of the accident, by not publishing his name. Our reviewer will have the opportunity of taking his revenge. Another time he will carefully inspect title pages.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

DEAR SIR,—I read with satisfaction a small paragraph in your impression of last week relative to the performance of L'Africaine at Dantzic. Until Meyerbeer is better understood the prejudice will continue to exist that the merit of his operas chiefly depends on the subject and mise-en-scène. Take for instance the Huguenots; in the great duet between Valentine and Marcel, the septet in the duel scene, the "complot," the magnificent duet between Valentine and Raoul—is the music depending on scenic effects?—if so, where are they? It is, on the contrary, in my humble opinion, the gorgeous display of scenery, etc., etc, that prevents the full appreciation of the corresponding splendid music. A master like Meyerbeer, who has always chosen grand noble subjects for his operas, must have been possessed of extensive musical means and genius to cope with such exacting subjects.

Let us hope that the promised performance of L'Africaine at Covent Garden will be met this time with a little more due appreciation than hitherto. Hoping you will excuse this little intrusion, I remain, dear Sir, your obedient servant, O. L.

London, 26*th April*, 1870.

Digitized by Google

May.

(From "Life Lyrics," by ELIZA F. MORRIS.)

Come let us dance and sing,
'Tis the merry, merry spring;
See, the earth in joy and gladness is smiling everywhere:
Now the fields put on their green,
And they glitter in the sheen
Of the bright and pleasant sunbeams that sparkle through the air.

There's music in the breeze,
As it sighs among the trees,
And sets the buds awaking from their long, long wintry sleep;
And in the little rill,
As it dances down the hill,
And seems to laugh for gladness at every bounding leap.

There's beauty all around,
On the blossom-spangled ground,
Where the buttercups and cowslips in golden clusters lie;
And in the changeful hue
Of the silver and the blue,
As they float in graceful fancies across the clear, broad sky.

There's gladness in the song
Of the little joyous throng,
That fill the woods with music in the charming month of May;
And in the noisy shout
As the children trip about,
And dance beneath the garland with a merry roundelay.

Hark! how the echoes sing
With the melodies of spring;
The cawing, warbling, bleating, how they charm the listening ear!
Come, and let us all be gay;
Let us sing and dance and play;
'Tis the month of joy and beauty—the birth-day of the year.

BONN.—Thanks to the exertions, and, likewise, the munificence of Herr Kullmann, a member of the Town-Council here, the Mozart Library, formerly belonging to the late Professor Otto Jahn, has been secured for the Royal Library, Berlin. The local public consider the prices fetched very satisfactory. The 489 lots (historical documents, constituting the first day's sale, went for 625 thalers. The highest prices were obtained by Burney's History (a fine copy), 28 thalers; Mattheson's Ehrenpforte (a exceedingly rare), 31 thalers; and Winters' Evangelischer Kirchengesang, 26 thalers. The manuscripts, on the other hand, went for comparatively little. The 263 copies of Beethoven's Letters fetched 15 thalers; Haydn's Letters, 16 thalers; the valuable Mozart Correspondence, 29 thalers; and the copy of Mozart's Biography, corrected by Sonnleithner, and enriched with additional matter, 12 thalers.—The programme for the grand Beethoven Festival, at the end of August, or the beginning of September, is now definitely arranged, at least as far as regards the principal works, which will be as follow:—Missa Solemnis; C minor Symphony; Eroica, Ninth Symphony; Overture No. 3 to Leonore; E flat major Concerto, for Pianoforte; Violin Concerto; and overtures to Egmont and Coriolanus. As already announced, Herr Ferdinand Hiller will be the chief conductor. The second conductor will be Herr Wasielewski.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

HARMONY & Co.—"Violet Bloom," Idyllo, by T. Oesten; "Feuer Klange," "Les Adieux," and "Castles Tanz," waltzes, by Joseph Gung'l; "Fantasia," quadrilles and waltzes, by P. Hertel; and "Am Schönen Rhein," waltzes, by Keler Bela.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.

And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

MDLLE. FLORA CRIVELLI will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S waltz-aria, "THE NAIADES," at the Eyre Arms, May 11th, for the benefit of the Kilburn Literary Institution.

MR. ALFRED BAYLIS will sing "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" on Tuesday next, at St. George's Hall; and with Signora Moora and Mr. F. Penna, "I NAVIGANTI."

"ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" This popular romance will be sung at Blackheath Assembly Rooms on the 11th of May, by Mr. Alfred Baylis; and on the 17th he will also sing it at his first Matinée, to be given at his Residence, 18, Lower Seymour Street, Portman Square, W.

MISS LILY SIMESTER, MR. GEORGE PERREN, and MR. FOX, will sing RAPHAEL'S popular trio, "I NAVIGANTI," at Miss Lily Sinester's Concert, Manor Rooms, Hackney, Tuesday, 10th May.

MISS LILY SIMESTER will sing BENEDICT'S new song, "LITTLE WILLIE," at the Vestry Hall, Cranbrook, May 5th.

MRS. ALFRED J. SUTTON and MR. MONTEM SMITH will sing A. J. SUTTON'S duet, "VOICES," at West Brownwich, on Tuesday next, May 3rd.

MR. J. H. SUTCLIFFE will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S new serenade, "WAKE, LINDA, WAKE," at the Eyre Arms, May 11th, and Hanover Square Rooms, May 25th.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ, MR. ALFRED BAYLIS, and Mr. H. VINNING, will sing "I NAVIGANTI," at Black heath (Mr. A. Baylis's Concert), on the 11th of May.

TO MUSICSELLERS.—A Young Lady requires a Situation, can play the Piano, and thoroughly understands the business. For References, apply to present Employer, J. F., Music Warehouse, 7, London Street, Greenwich.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. VON WEBER have been submitted by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s.	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3	0
THE EVENING SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	... ...	3	0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	4	0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad)	FLORENCE PEACT ...	4	0
And the Answer to it.
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	4	0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."
SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to
MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,
By BERNARD FARRETORTILLER.
London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani Labiache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

A STRINGENT LOZENGES OF THE RED GUM OF AUSTRALIA.—For Relaxed Throat, in Bottles, 2s. MURIATE OF AMMONIA LOZENGES, in Bottles, 2s. Useful for Bronchitis, by loosening the phlegm and preventing violent fits of coughing.
P. & P. W. SQUIRE, Chemists on the Establishment in Ordinary to the Queen Gazetted August 8th, 1837—December 31st, 1867), 277, Oxford Street, London.

Digitized by Google

Now Published,

"SUNSHINE,"

MARSHALL HALL BELL'S NEW SONG.

"Sunshine" was rapturously encored when sung at the composer's concert by Miss Robertine Henderson, and is published, price 3s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Just Published,

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND AND MASTER, Z. BUCK, ESQ., MUS. DOC.

"FAREWELL,"

SONG.

Sung by Mrs. H. ROBERTS MEERS, the Words by LORD BYRON.

The Music by GEORGE GAFF.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Where may be obtained, Composed by GEORGE GAFF,

"MAIDEN, WRAP THY MANTLE ROUND THEE."

POETRY BY KIRKE WHITE.

Just Published,

TARANTELLE,

POUR LE PIANOFORTE.

Par PAUL SEMLER.

Prix 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"O LADY, TWINE NO WREATH FOR ME."

SONG.

The Poetry by SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The Music by W. FRIEDRICH.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"LANDLER WALTZ,"

FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Composed by PAUL SEMLER.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THE WEE PET."

MAZURKA, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Composed by LOUISE WIESE.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY HERMANN EISOLDT.

"BRIDAL BELLS"

(MORCEAU DE SALON),

For the Pianoforte, by Hermann EISOLDT.

We read in the Dresden Journal:—" Hermann Eisoldt's 'Bridal Bells' was beautifully performed by the splendid Orchestra of Herr Music-Director Trenkler, and met with great applause. The piece being very melodious is sure to become popular." Published, price 4s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Now ready,

"MEDEA,"

SCENA ED ARIA FOR SOPRANO.

Sung by Madame Rudersdorff at the Gewandhaus Concerts, Leipsic, and by Mdlle Thiljon, at the Norwich Festival.

Composed by ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 24 Regent Street, W.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Just Published,

6 PIECES FOR PIANO,

BY

JOHANNES WINKELHAUS.

The Publishers feel great pleasure in submitting Herr WINKELHAUS'S Six New Pieces to the notice of the Professor and Amateur. To the Professor they will prove a great relief from the monotonous arrangements which have for so long a time taken the place of a better style of music. To the Amateur they will be acceptable as the means of displaying a considerable amount of execution without the labour required for pieces of a difficult character.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN"

(VICTORIA REGINA).

Is brilliantly and gracefully arranged, without being trying to a moderately advanced performer, the air is never lost sight of, and the piece is evidently by a composer of taste and experience.

"CASCADE DE PERLES."

A very elegant melody set off by passages which, while full of refinement and beauty, are completely under the hand, and consequently adapted to the means of players who combine taste with good execution.

"APOLLO AND THE NYMPHS."

Recommends itself to our notice for its characteristic simplicity and beauty. It cannot fail to please.

"CASTA DIVA AND MARCH."

(NORMA.)

These delightful subjects have never received better treatment than at the hands of Herr Winkelhaus.

"I PURITANI."

In this transcription, as in the one from Norma, Herr Winkelhaus gives us another proof of his facility in writing passages which are brilliant and effective, without being difficult.

"HAS SORROW THY YOUNG DAYS SHADED."

One of the loveliest of Irish melodies, arranged with consummate skill.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS EACH.

LONDON:

DUFF & STEWART,

147, OXFORD STREET,

(OPPOSITE BOND STREET).

Digitized by Google

Great success at the Lyceum Theatre of

HERVÉ'S

OPÉRA BOUFFE,

"LE PETIT FAUST"

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

	s.	d.
The Opera complete for pianoforte solo	7	0
The Overture-Valse. Arranged by Herré	6	0
Do. do. (easy arrangement). By H. Valiquet ...	5	0
Polka-Entr'acte. Par Philippe Stutz...	4	6
Deux Petites Fantaisies. By J. L. Battmann ... ... each	5	0
Le Petit Faust, pot-pourri sur les motifs favoris. By F. Brisaler ...	7	6
Le Petit Faust, Souvenirs par D. Croisez	5	0
"Les Quatre Saisons." Idylle. Transcription variée. Par C. Hoffmann	5	0
"Les Trois Chœurs." Polka du Jardin. Par A. Mey	4	6
"Méphisto." Polka-Mazurka. Par E. Ettling	4	6

SIX EASY PIECES.

No. 1. Couplets du Guerrier Valentin. Par F. Wachs	2	6
2. Tyrolienne de Marguerite ... ,, ...	2	6
3. Couplets du jardin ... ... ,, ...	2	6
4. Rondo-valse de Méphisto ... ,, ...	2	0
5. Polka des Trois Chœurs ... ,, ...	2	0
6. Chanson du Satrape ... ,, ...	2	6

DANCE MUSIC.

Le Petit Faust Quadrille. By Strauss	4	6
Do. do. Piano Duet	4	6
Do. Deuxième Quadrille. By Arban	4	6
Do. Quadrille. Facile. Par H. Valiquet	4	6
Le Petit Faust Valses. Par Olivier Metra	6	0

PIANO AND VIOLIN.

Idylle des Quatre Saisons. Méditation pour Violon et Piano. Par Bernardin	5	0

EDITIONS DE HEUGEL & CIE., PARIS.

LONDON:

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.,

244, REGENT STREET, W.,

Where may be obtained

LE PETIT FAUST,

COMPLETE FOR VOICE AND PIANO (With French Words),

PRICE 12s.

And all the separate Songs, Duets, &c. from same Opera (with French Words).

Now Ready,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."
—Musical World, April 23.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

CHAPPELL'S
Organ Journal

CONSISTING OF

FAVOURITE MOVEMENTS SELECTED FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS,

ARRANGED FOR

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY THE

MOST EMINENT ORGANISTS.

	COMPOSER.	ARRANGER.
No. 1. SANCTUS from "Mass"	Rossini	Dr. Spark.
2. DOMINE DEUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
3. GRATIAS AGIMUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
4. CRUCIFIXUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
5. ADAGIO NON TROPPO	Mendelssohn	G. Cooper.
6. ANDANTE from String Quartett	Mozart	Geo. R. Griffiths.

(To be continued.)

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS EACH.

THE

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO:

A SELECTION OF

Opening and Concluding Voluntaries

BY THE

MOST CELEBRATED COMPOSERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

ADAPTED CHIEFLY FOR THE USE OF AMATEURS BY

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Each Number contains from 7 to 12 favourite Voluntaries, including one arranged expressly with Pedal Obbligato.

Nos. 1 to 24 are now ready, price 3*s. each; or in four Volumes, each containing Six Numbers, and bound in Cloth, price* 12*s. each.*

A THEMATIC LIST OF CONTENTS

MAY BE HAD ON APPLICATION TO

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Botteini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Beamais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosaio (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Printed by HENDERSON, HAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, April 30, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48.—No. 19. SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1870. Price { 4d. Unstamped. / 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—NEW SEASON.—1870-71.—

The Directors of the Crystal Palace Company and the Committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society have to announce a

GRAND OPENING MUSICAL FESTIVAL,

THIS DAY (Saturday), Commencing at Three o'clock,

Conductor ..... SIR MICHAEL COSTA.

The First Portion of this Great Musical Festival (only possible on the Handel Orchestra at the Crystal Palace) will comprise the First Part of Mendelssohn's

"ELIJAH."

The Second Portion will consist of a Miscellaneous Selection, including the National Anthem, which will be sung at the conclusion of the Performance; Sir Michael Costa's Triumphal Choral March from "Naaman;" Mendelssohn's "O Hills, O Vales;" Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra," with various Italian Solos by the principal artists.

Principal Vocalists:—Madame SINICO, Madame MORELLI; Madame TREBELLI-BETTINI, Signor BETTINI, Signor GASSIER, Mr. VERNON RIGBY, and Mr. SANTLEY.

The Orchestra will comprise the Two Thousand Members of the London Handel Festival Choir, other Choral bodies, the Orchestra of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and that of the Crystal Palace Company, with many other Performers and Amateurs of the first rank, completing in the whole

UPWARDS OF THREE THOUSAND PERFORMERS.

Admission Seven Shillings and Sixpence. Guinea Season Tickets Five, Numbered Stalls, lettered in blocks, as at the Handel Festival, Five Shillings; Reserved Seats, Half-a-Crown; and Transferable Stalls for this Festival and the Eight Grand Summer Concerts, One Guinea, at the Crystal Palace, and 2, Exeter Hall. Admission Tickets, and the New Guinea Season Ticket, dating from the 1st of May, may also be had at the Palace; at Exeter Hall, and usual Agencies.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON.

The Evening (SATURDAY), May 7, will be performed Donizetti's Opera, "LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR." Lucia, Signor Mongini; Arturo, M. Verger (his first appearance); Arturo, Signor Rinaldini; Raimondo, Signor Foli; Normanno, Signor Archieri; Alice, Madame Corsi; and Lucia, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her first appearance this season). Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

NEXT WEEK.

MONDAY NEXT, May 9, Gounod's Opera, "FAUST." Faust, Signor Gardoni; Mephistopheles, Signor Gassier; Valentine, Mr. Santley; Wagner, Signor Trevere; Siebel, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Marta, Madame Corsi; and Margherita, Mdlle. Rebaux.

SECOND APPEARANCE OF MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON.

TUESDAY NEXT, May 10, Meyerbeer's Opera, "ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO." Roberto, Signor Mongini; Bambalio, Signor Gardoni; Bertrano, Signor Foli; Alberti, Signor Ragney; Un Araldo, Signor Rinaldini; Cavaliere, Signor Archieri, Signor Castelli; Signor Zoboli, Signor Trevere; Isabella, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; Elena, Mdlle. Phretti; and Alice, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her second appearance this season; and her first appearance in the part of Alice in England).

Production of "ABU HASSAN" and "LOCA DEL CAIRO."

THURSDAY NEXT, May 12, will be performed (for the first time on the Italian stage) Carl Maria Von Weber's Operetta, in one act, "ABU HASSAN." The libretto translated by Signor Marchetti. The dialogue set to recitative by Signor Arditi, expressly for the Italian Opera, Drury Lane. Hassan, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Omar, Signor Castelli; Il Califo, Signor Ragney; Mesrur, Signor Trevere; Zemroud, Madame Corsi; Zobeide, Mdlle. Bruni; and Fatima, Madame Rimbelli. To be followed by Mozart's posthumous Opera-buffa, in two acts, "LOCA DEL CAIRO" (first time in England). The poem adapted by M. Verger. The Italian translation by Signor Zedfira. The dialogue set to "recitativo-parlante" by Signor Bulfredi. Fatelzia, Signor Gardoni; Don Berlarmo, Signor Gassier; Pacquale, Signor Trevere; Lo Schiavo, Mr. Lyall; Ginevra, Madame Corsi; Oretta, Madame Sinico; and Isabella, Mdlle. Pauline Lewitsky (her first appearance).

MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON.

SATURDAY, May 14, Meyerbeer's Opera, ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO. Alice, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her second appearance in the part of Alice in England.

Acting Manager ..... MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON'S First Appearance this Season, at ST. JAMES'S HALL, on WEDNESDAY MORNING NEXT, May 11th, at MR. LESLIE'S CONCERT, commencing at Half-past Two. Sofa Stalls, 21s.; Area Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony Stalls, 15s. and 10s. 6d.; Balcony and Area, unreserved, 5s.; Gallery, 2s. 6d.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

"THE PRODIGAL'S RETURN," a New Oratorio, by the Rev. H. F. LIMPUS, will be performed, for the First Time, in Aid of the Funds of St. Andrew's Convalescent Hospital, Cliewer, on TUESDAY, May 10th, 1870. Principal Vocalists—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The Band and Chorus will be complete. The Band and Chorus will number 300 performers. Sofa Stalls, £1 1s.; Balcony Stalls, £1 1s.; Reserved Balcony, 10s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d. Tickets at Mr. Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Messrs. Chappell, New Bond Street; Novello, Ewer, & Co., Berners Street; Duff & Stewart, 147, Oxford Street; Keith, Prowse & Co., 48, Cheapside; Allcroft & Boys, 4, Royal Exchange Buildings; and Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.—ST. JAMES'S HALL.—

WEDNESDAY NEXT, May 11th, at Eight, J. BARNBY'S New Sacred Cantata, "REBEKAH," and HANDEL'S "ALEXANDER'S FEAST." Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Band and Chorus of 300. Conductor—Mr. BARNBY. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony and Area (numbered and reserved), 5s.; Admission, 2s., 3s., 1s. (All Nonvible.). Hewers Street, and 38, Poultry, the principal Musicsellers, and Austin's, St. James's Hall.

MR. ALFRED GILBERT and MADAME GILBERT'S THIRD CHAMBER CONCERT, at 9, Conduit Street, May 11th. Vocalist—Madame Gilbert, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. Frasse Reilly. Instrumentalists—Mr. Henry Holmes, Signor Pezze, and Mr. Alfred Gilbert. Conductor—Mr. LAND. Tickets, 5s., of Mr. Alfred Gilbert, The Woodlands, 99, Maida Vale.

MISS ELIZABETH PHILPS EVENING CONCERT, will take place at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, on FRIDAY NEXT, May 13th, on which occasion she will be assisted by Madame Rudersdorff, Mdlle. Carola, Miss Poole, Miss Alice Fairman, and Mdme. Patey; Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. Patey; Misses Alice Mangold, Mary Carr Richardson, Signor Caracas, MM. Benedict and Randegger, Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Family Tickets, to admit Three, One Guinea; Unreserved Seats, 5s.; to be had of Miss Philps, 47, Gloucester Crescent, Regent's Park, and all Musicsellers.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERT, WEDNESDAY NEXT, May 11th, ST. JAMES'S HALL.—ROSSINI'S "STABAT MATER," and Miscellaneous Selection. Mdlle. Nilsson, Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, and Madame Arabella Goddard; Signor Mongini, Signor Bettini, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir. Full Band. Organist—Mr. John C. Ward. Conductor—Mr. HENRY LESLIE.

MISS AMY PERRY'S GRAND MORNING CONCERT at HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, on SATURDAY, MAY 14, under the direction of Mr. LAMBORNE COCKTELL, R.A.M. Mdlle. Alexandrina Dwight, Marie d'Ellen Ratcliffe, and Miss AMY PERRY. Messrs. Sautelle (late partner-baritone of the Grand Opera, New York), W. C. Bell, T. Chilcrertone, Walter Reeves, and C. J. Bishenden.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD begs to announce that she will give a RECITAL OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC, consisting of Selections from the works of CHOPIN and HERZ, at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square, on Saturday Morning, May 28th, at Eleven o'clock precisely. She will have the assistance of some Celebrated Vocalists. Full particulars will be duly announced.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD will play "MADAME OURY'S WALTZ," composed by CHOPIN, at her Recital of Pianoforte Music.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD (Soprano) has arrived in London and is open to Engagements for Operas, Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

REMOVAL.

MADAME RABY BARNETT begs to announce her REMOVAL to 21, Aberdeen Place, Maida Hill, where all communications respecting Concerts, Lessons, &c., can be Addressed.

MADAME D'ELISE will sing the popular Waltz Aria, "THE NAIADES," at Miss AMY PERRY'S Concert, at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 14th.

MR. WALTER REEVES will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S popular Serenade, "WAKE, LINDA, WAKE," at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 14th.

Digitized by Google

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square (where Haydn made his first bow to an English audience).—Ladies and Gentlemen intending to engage these unique Rooms for Concerts, &c., are respectfully invited to make early application, in order to secure the best days. For terms, apply to Mr. Hall, at the Rooms. ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

TO PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.—Wanted, a SITUATION in a Pianoforte Establishment, by a Young Lady of good Address. A brilliant Pianist. Address, A. W., 49, Rathbone Place, Oxford Street, London.

MR. FREDERICK CHILDERSTON will sing at Miss Amy Ferry's Concert, May 14th, the popular Romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?"

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

MR. EDWARD MURRAY (Baritone), now engaged with the Drury Lane Italian Opera Company, respectfully requests that all communications may be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co. 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. EMILE BERGER.

MR. EMILE BERGER will return to London for the season on the 23rd May. All letters to be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., Foreign Music Warehouse, 244, Regent Street, W.

HERR CARL FORMES is now in Town for the season and can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios and Operatic Performances. Address—care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MISS AMY PERRY will perform ASCHER'S popular Fantasia, "ALICE," at the Hanover Square Rooms, May 14th.

MISS LILY SIMESTER and Mr. GEORGE PERREN will sing NICOLAI'S admired duet, "ONE WORD," at the Manor Rooms, Hackney, May 10th.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S CONCERTS:—Miss Amy Perry's, Hanover Square Rooms, May 14th; Store Street, June 4th, July 16th; Hanover Square, June 25th. Communications Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

REMOVAL.

MRS. RONEY (Miss Helen Hogarth) begs to announce her REMOVAL from Gloucester Crescent, to No. 6, Chalcot Terrace, Regent's Park Road, N.W.

MR. CHARLES STANTON (Tenor) may be engaged for Concerts, Operettas, and Oratorios. Address, 16, Duke Street, Portland Place, W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING is prepared to accept Engagements for Oratorios, Concerts, in Town or Country. For terms, address 125, Regent Street.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for Instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 30, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"LITTLE WILLIE," by JULES BENEDICT. This charming new song (by the popular composer of "Rock me to Sleep") is now being sung with distinguished success by Miss EDITH WYNNE. Price 3s., and may be obtained, for 19 stamps from the publisher, DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street; sent free by post for 12 stamps each.

MASON & HAMLIN'S GOLD MEDAL CABINET ORGAN. ALWAYS IN TUNE, FOR ALL CLIMATES. Five Thousand Three Hundred and Four Full Reed Organs were Manufactured and Sold in 1869, being Seventeen each working day. Illustrated Books, one stamp.—DEBENHAM & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGANS.—NEW STYLES.—Six Octave Nine Stop DRAWING-ROOM ORGANS. Ten Stop Chapel Organs, with Patent Knee Swell, Super-Octave Coupler, and Manual Sub-Bass. Always in Tune. Price lists, one stamp.—DEBENHAM & SONS, Wholesale Agents, 309, Regent Street.

"ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" This popular romance will be sung at Blackheath Assembly Rooms on the 11th of May, by Mr. Alfred Hayles; and on the 17th he will also sing it at his first Matinée, to be given at his Residence, 18, Lower Seymour Street, Portman Square, W.

Just Published,

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

N.B. "REVIVALS" will consist of Pieces hitherto only existing in Manuscript, or which have been long out of Print. Selected from the Works of Eminent Masters.

MISS LILY SIMESTER, Mr. GEORGE PERREN, and Mr. FOX, will sing RANDEGGER'S popular trio, "I NAVIGANTI," at Miss Lily Simester's Concert, Manor Rooms, Hackney, Tuesday, 10th May.

MR. J. H. SUTCLIFFE will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S new serenade, "WAKE, LINDA, WAKE," at the Eyre Arms, May 11th, and Hanover Square Rooms, May 25th.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ, Mr. ALFRED BAYLIS, and Mr. H. VINNING, will sing "I NAVIGANTI," at Blackheath (Mr. A. Bayle's Concert), on the 11th of May.

TO MUSICSELLERS.—A Young Lady requires a Situation, can play the Piano, and thoroughly understands the business. For References, apply to present Employer, J. F., Music Warehouse, 7, London Street, Greenwich.

Published This Day,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"BELLA QUAL ROSEA AURORA,"

MELODIA.

Composta da GIOVANNI MARAVIGLIA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

To be ready Next Week,

"THE BELSIZE GALOP,"

By EDOUARD SCHUBERTH.

Played with distinguished success, and rapturously encored, at the Belsize Conservative Association Ball, Willis's Rooms, on Tuesday evening, will be published next week by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,

PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.

LYON & HALL,

WARWICK MANSION.

Digitized by Google

FROM SEVILLE.

No. IV.

The Holy Week at Seville, of course, formally commences on Palm Sunday (yesterday), but the attractive exhibitions which render this romantic city especially celebrated throughout the country will not begin till Wednesday. In the meantime I may describe the Biblical drama which is now drawing to its close at the principal theatre. The performance is on a much more magnificent scale than at Madrid, where the "Seven Dolours of the Virgin" were, as I said, represented at a very minor theatre. At Seville everything is large and imposing. Here the "mystery" still flourishes, while at Madrid it looks like the relic of another age. The entry of the Messiah into Jerusalem, through a crowd bearing palm-branches, while similar honours are paid by a throng assembled on the arch through which he enters; the Last Supper, which is arranged after the precedent of the celebrated picture by Leonardo da Vinci, the vessels on the table being filled with an incense which perfumes the entire theatre; the Crucifixion, at which the guards are mounted on real horses,—are most impressive spectacles, and do the greatest credit to the stage manager, who has but indifferent scenery at his command. In illustration of this last remark, I may state that the heads of the Jewish priesthood held their solemn meetings in an Egyptian temple liberally stocked with idols. This arrangement does not arise from a bigoted attempt to charge the Jews with idolatry, but from the scantiness of decorative material. One would have thought that a drama which reached its 86th representation yesterday was worth painting for throughout, but the Spaniards are evidently economical about the front scenes.

But the poverty of the scenery is in a great measure counterbalanced by the excellence of the costumes. The traditional colours and personal appearance of the Biblical figures are carefully preserved, and any intelligent charity boy could recognise at a glance all the characters of the sacred story. Peter is portly, John is young and somewhat effeminate, and Judas has the noted red hair. The group round Mary immediately after the death of her Redeemer could scarcely be surpassed. In the Seville play there is, however, a display of realism which is not to be found in the less pretending work, and which is not unfrequently revolting. Mr. Thackeray remarked that Hogarth never did things by halves, and that consequently when the rescued woman was shown in the Seven Stages of Cruelty her throat was cut to the vertebræ. In the same spirit the bodily sufferings, which are somewhat softened down at Madrid, are represented with frightful accuracy at Seville. The Redeemer is scourged in both, but while on one stage only the upper part of his person is shown, and the lashes are but lightly bestowed, on the other he is made nearly nude, and the flagellation is most vigorous. So again, while the Cross-bearing Christ at Madrid is not a very repulsive object, in Seville he becomes indescribably shocking through the close copy of the "bloody sweat." Of course, to the ordinary Englishman both exhibitions would be equally horrible, and perhaps some of my readers are displeased that I do not accompany my whole description of these sacred festivities with an execration obbligato, or slur over details. But if I adopted the former course I should never get on at all, and if I chose the latter I should convey no information. Spanish recreations are no more to be painted in squarelle than revolutions are to be effected with rose-water. Though they belong to the present I must treat the Biblical plays of Spain as an antiquary treats the Chester mysteries of the past.

In return to the drama. There is this interesting difference between the plays at the minor theatre at Madrid, and those at the large theatre at Seville, that whereas the former is to a large extent based on traditions which are to be found in the Scriptures, there is in the latter very little trace of legend or apocrypha, the New Testament being followed about as closely as the reigns of the Plantagenet Kings are followed in the "histories" of Shakspere. The crowning of the cock on Peter's third denial of his Master, and the washing of the disciples' feet, are not forgotten at Seville; but we see nothing of Saint Veronica, nor does the penitent thief appear in the early history of the Holy Family. Query—could this absorption into Spanish tradition and consequently strict adherence to Scripture render the Seville play more acceptable than that at Madrid to the non-conforming congregation of one of our Bethels or Ebenezers? While, however, the author or contriver of the Seville play carefully follows the Scriptural original, he allows himself a few accessories or "effects," which tell very well with the audience. By means of an opening in one of the flats the Virgin is smitten with grief through the appearance of a number of figures, each bearing an instrument of the Passion, but in soon afterwards ensconced in ghostly fashion, when the flat reopens and discovers the persecutors of her Son, enveloped in infernal flames. The prayer in the Garden, "Father, let this cup pass away," &c., is illustrated by a mechanical contrivance. The olive tree against which the Redeemer is praying gradually opens, and shows in the midst of the foliage an angel bearing in one hand a cup and in the other a cross.

Great importance is attached in the Seville play to the suicide of Judas Iscariot, who, with the rest of the apostles, is almost overlooked in the "Siete Dolores." An elaborate set-scene, with a moveable cataract, which, perhaps, to Spanish eyes seems an accurate imitation of real water, is provided for the occasion, and over this inclines the tree whereon the despairing traitor hangs himself in the presence of the audience. The selected branch breaks, Judas falls into the water, the stage becomes illumined with red fire, and a number of devils, very like those who carry off Don Giovanni, dance about to express their satisfaction. The sublimity of the awful scene is somewhat marred by the circumstance that the curtain no sooner descends than it rises again, in order that Judas may bow his acknowledgments to a highly appreciative public. On the evening when I witnessed the performance, he was the only person who was thus specially honoured. His part, indeed, is, for an actor, the best in the piece, and was exceedingly well played with, I grieve to add, something like a sense of comic humour. A modicum of the Terentian Davus or Geta, as represented by a very clever "Westminster," seemed to infuse itself into the character of the Scriptural traitor, and the brutal independence which marked his white career, and which contrasted strongly with the reverence of his fellow disciples, is evidently intended to be amusing. All this is very horrible, but—so it is.

N. D.

Seville, April 11.

No. V.

The annual festival of Seville is now over, not to re-commence till the Holy Week of next year. For the last fortnight the charges at the hotels have been nearly doubled, and every day we have had two tables d'hôte at different hours. This morning there is a general decline. Our table d'hôte is at a medium hour (5.30); the bill is ruled by the ordinary tariff, and you find yourself considered, not as an intruder, but as a welcome guest.

The festival may be conveniently divided into two acts, one sacred, the other profane. The former commences on Holy Wednesday, when the Gospel narrative of the Passion is read in the Cathedral, with a pyrotechnic illustration and the first religious procession. The process is continued through Thursday and Good Friday, that of the latter day being the most important. On Saturday the narrative of the Passion, read in the Cathedral, is accompanied not only by fireworks, but by cannon. Here ends the religious act. The profane act commences with the bullfight on Easter Day, which is repeated on the following Monday and Tuesday. On Easter Sunday begins the Seville Fair, which lasts three days, and on the following Thursday and Friday come the horse races, these being the result of an Anglomania wherewith the good bullfighting Spaniards have been infected, much against their will, by the officers of Gibraltar.

The Seville Fair is an institution altogether unique. Its commercial object is the sale of horses and cattle; but its social use is its great peculiarity. A whole street of stalls is rented for the three days by the most opulent families of the town (nobility not excluded), who send their furniture to their temporary residences, and there live from six o'clock in the morning to a late hour at night, receiving and paying visits. Larger booths, belonging to the clubs of Seville, are appropriated to balls of the most respectable kind, only moderated by means of personal introduction. Besides the fashionable quarter, there is an inferior street of stalls hired by those who do not belong to the "Upper Ten." Also, there are stalls for the sale of cheap delicacies and gimcracks. And the national luxury at the Seville Fair is a sort of pancake, in the form of a ring, made exclusively by gipsies, and called a "bonuelo." When I was a lad, and St. Bartlemy marked a day in the people's calendar, a man who entered Smithfield during the period dedicated to the Saint, and did not buy "a penn'orth of gingerbread nuts," was a person to be shunned. Such will be the "bonuelo" at the Seville Fair. You are bound in honour to eat it, and you must eat it fresh. The gipsy who rules the stall keeps no stock on hand, save in the form of a colossal dish, wherein is contained the raw material of the delicacy in made. You order a pound or half-a-pound, the preparation begins, and when it is completed a huge dish is presented by a female gipsy, who, as Mr. T. Carlyle said of Dante, is the noursuliest figure you ever saw in your life. Strange creatures, these gipsies of Andalusia. I need not tell my readers that they hold a sort of semi-social position, and form an important part of the population, the women being always distinguished by their long hair tied into a knot at the back of the head. Some of them may be also marked for their singularly handsome faces, although their style of beauty is rather repulsive than attractive. The servant (or mistress) of the booth, who brought my dish of bonuelos, was undoubtedly handsome, but about as inviting as Clytemnestra.

Of all the dismal things to be seen in Andalusia give me the horse-race. Were it not that an inkling of patriotism prompted me to record that my countrymen had the best of the fight, I could pass it over entirely. The course, on the bank of the Guadalquiver, is in a most picturesque position, and as a course is unexceptionable; but the want of those appendages that contribute so essentially to the enjoyment of the Derby produces a feeling of desolation. No one brings his well-stored hamper; there is nothing to eat, nothing to drink; but there is a sun that blazes exceedingly. Let me comfort myself—there is one caterer for refreshments, who is always present everywhere—at the bull-fight, at the fair, at the horse-race. This is the vendor of "aguas y panales," who is constantly visible, hustly advertising his cheap commodity with his huge lungs. The water (agua) he carries on his shoulder in a vessel that might have been borne by Rebecca, and from his hand depends a glass case, containing the "panales,"—a ghost of a "méringue," which converts the pure element into "eau sucré." But the pure element is warm, and not refreshing.

The melancholy feature of the Spanish horse-race is the utter apathy of the spectators as to the proceedings on the course. The élite of Seville society attends and yawns. The ladies are superbly dressed, and sit in their bad places in the grand stand with a resignation that would do credit to Sir Lawrence, inasmuch as they, like him, are visibly broiled; but they care little about the contest. A vague patriotism inspires a desire that the Spaniard may beat the Englishman; but as for details, they vanish into a blank, like the central part of a map of Africa. An army composed of officers without soldiers is a proverbially weak exhibition. Just such an exhibition is presented by the spectators of this Seville horse-race. They form an aristocratic crowd, with which the populace has no sympathy whatever. The Britons, who hates "roughs" in his own land, longs to behold a specimen of his species in a large gathering. Imagine the gallery of Drury Lane Theatre closed on Boxing-day, and imagine the feelings of Mr. F. B. Chatterton on the occasion. The gentlefolks of Spain go to the races, thinking that, in the language of Mr. Sothern, it is the "right thing for a fellar to do," but their enjoyment is small. The populace dislike and avoid them. They love and, to a certain measure, understand their bull-fights, but the respective speed of horses fails to interest them. And, after all, when the excitement of the "Corrida de Toros" is compared with that of the horse-race—but no, the vision of the society against cruelty rises before me, and I pull up short. N. D.

Digitized by Google

Seville, April 23.

F. S. Dwight, of Boston, across Liszt's "Dante."

A symphony by Liszt, intended to give expression in music to some of the strange and wonderful scenes written to by Dante in his great poem, was played on Saturday evening, at the Philharmonic Concert. The enterprise shown by the directors of the Philharmonic Society to give these modern productions is commendable. It is easy to say that the symphonies of the old masters are better and more enjoyable, but all musically-inclined persons are anxious to know what the modern men are about, and the wilder and more extravagant the music they write, the greater naturally is the curiosity to hear it. The music of Liszt to Dante's Hell and Purgatory is, to our thinking, the worst that the composers of this school can do. We are thankful to believe that in this symphony they have run their course to its very end and exhausted their powers of perversion. Having lived through that hour of agony during which this symphony lasted, and escaped with reason not overthrown, we can safely bid defiance to Liszt, Wagner, and their fellow madmen of the school of the future. The principle on which that monstrosity was constructed is clear enough evidently to find out precisely what effects the best composers had made use of to produce lovely and satisfying results, and to reverse them. It was like playing one of Beethoven's symphonies backward. In the first place it was necessary that the whole composition should be written in such a key as the next place, so far as possible, it was to set time at defiance. In other words, the accent was to be thrown on such unexpected parts of the beat that the musicians should seem to be playing in one time and the conductor to direct another. The tortures of the damned were to be illustrated, and this most genial theme gave Liszt a famous excuse for unheard of bedevilment of his orchestra. Shrieks from the trumpets, cries of shrill anguish from the piccolos, groans of distress from the bass tuba, throbs of pain from the kettle drums, screams of sharp torture from the clashing cymbals, yells of demoniac rage from the trombones, sighs and sobs from the softer wind instruments, were all heard at once in a wild carnival of discord, and as a climax to this orchestral fury the violins were sent wailing and complaining in chromatic intervals from the top to the bottom of the musical scale till it seemed as though Beelzebub, prince of devils, must have stood at the composer's right hand while he scored this work The admirers of Liszt answer such suggestions of discord by the reply that the truer this statement is the more the genius of the author is demonstrated, for the horrors of the nether world were exactly what he intended to paint, and the more hideous the result the better the picture. The wonder is that Liszt's familiar spirit did not inspire him to compose for each class of instruments in a separate key. The effect of demoniac confusion and horror at which he aimed would then certainly have been attained, and his audience sent howling with anguish out of the house. Even now it is not too late, and Mr. Bergmann, when he next performs this work, might have all the violin parts written, say in the key of C, the second violins in C sharp major, the violas in D minor, the double basses and violoncellos in E flat, and so on through the major and minor scales. The doors might then be closed on the audience, the orchestra led down to their seats, and all the clergymen in the city invited to witness the result. The picture of the infernal regions that would then be presented would, beyond a doubt, strike terror in the heart of the stoutest sinner. In fact, we know of nothing better calculated to call the obdurate to repentance than this work of Liszt's, for if any person could fully be brought to realize that his punishment hereafter would consist in being compelled for ever to listen to the symphony that we heard for an hour on Saturday night, there is, we venture to say, no man living bold enough to contemplate unmoved such a doom, or who would not at once take measures to be rescued from so terrible a fate.

PESTH.—Professor Volkmann has composed an overture to Richard II. It is to be performed at the Grand local Musical Festival this year.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The operas performed last week were Guillaume Tell, the Flauto Magico, the Traviata, and Medea, a preponderance of music accepted as "classical" over music that can never become "classical" encouraging to those who believe that art, musical or otherwise, can only be genuine when it is the result of serious and conscientious labour. Of Guillaume Tell we have already spoken, as also of Il Flauto Magico—substituted on Tuesday night for Un Ballo in Maschera, which had been announced, but in consequence of Signor Mario's indisposition was withdrawn from the bills. Mdlle. Sessa's extremely intelligent performance of the heroine of the Traviata has also been described; so that all we have to say is a word or two about Medea, which, though revived, some years ago, at Her Majesty's Theatre, was now heard for the first time at Covent Garden. About the plot of Medea, and the sublime music of Cherubini, enough has already been written. That the Florentine musician, whom Schumann was wont to compare with Michael Angelo, could meet the Greek tragic poet on equal grounds, has been more than once maintained; and at the present time no one capable of understanding both would be inclined to dispute the fact. Amid the frivolous stuff to which, in a great measure, frequenters of the Italian Opera—why, it would be difficult to explain—seem most disposed to listen with eager ears, it is a real delight to all those who look upon art more earnestly and lovingly, to find that at least once or twice in a season the most earnest and magnificent "opera seria" in existence—for such is unquestionably the Medea of Cherubini—can find an appreciative audience. No one who cares for what is loftiest and noblest in dramatic music should lose the opportunity of hearing this truly great work—great in its design, great in its development, and great, as may be concluded from the premises, in its climax.

Medea was, as our opera-going readers have been made aware, admirably done at Her Majesty's Theatre, where it was introduced for the first time in this country, and, so far as we can gather, for the first time in the Italian language,* under the direction of Signor Arditi, who set the dialogue to accompanied recitative expressly for the occasion. It is under also admirably done at the Royal Italian Opera, under the direction of Signor Vianesi, a conductor thoroughly well up to his work, who, in wisely availing himself of the recitatives of his predecessor, has, nevertheless, if memory does not deceive us, made certain curtailments and alterations, which, whether improvements or the contrary, are a matter of taste.

The cast of Medea at Covent Garden is generally excellent; but the fact that the Medea of Her Majesty's Theatre is the Medea now would of itself be almost enough to satisfy the admirers of Cherubini's music. In this one part Mdlle. Tietjens shines so pre-eminently, both as a singer and as an actress, that she might, like the famous Mdlle. Scio of Cherubini's time, have built a part for herself alone. We need not again dwell upon her performance in detail. Enough that, at Covent Garden, she is in every respect the same Medea so unanimously lauded when the opera used to be a feature of the season at the Lyceum Theatre in the Haymarket. Her music was in splendid order on Saturday night, and she never acted the part more nobly or gave the music to greater perfection. Dr. Gunz was Jason; and probably no tenor now on the stage is better competent to give that part the correct colouring, whether dramatically or vocally. The chorus of Scria, Medea's confident, was assigned to Mdlle. Scalchi; and that of Dirce, daughter of Creon, and the new spouse of Jason, who excites the wrath and vengeance of the "Colchian Sorceress," to Mdlle. Baumeister. Both were competently filled. Creon, the angry monarch of Corinth, was represented by Signor Bagagiolo, whose fine bass voice gave weight to the music, but who made no attempt to invest the personage with dramatic significance. Mdlles. Lowelli and Bilgan were very efficient in the small parts of Lamia and Clyte. The general execution of the music, under Signor Vianesi's direction was singularly good—orchestra and chorus, from the overture to the last finale (not forgetting the gloomy and impressive storm which constitutes the orchestral prelude to the third act), being almost irreproachable. The house was crowded, and the opera was received with real enthusiasm. At the end of each act Mdlle. Tietjens was called forward. It was pleasant to find so hearty a reception accorded to so grand a work.

The operas performed during the week were:—the Figlia del Reggimento, followed by the second and third acts of Masaniello (Monday); Medea (Tuesday); and Don Pasquale, with Mdlle. Sessi as Norina (Thursday); to-night we are promised Il Barbiere, for the first appearance of Madame Patti and Signor Mario.

BERGAMO.—An unpublished mass by Donizetti was to be executed shortly in the basilica of Santa Maria. It was given by the composer, when dying, to Signor Dolci, who has just bequeathed it to the charitable community attached to the above church.

* Cherubini's Medea must not be confounded with that far inferior opera by Simone Mayr, in which Pasta won so many of her laurels.

Digitized by Google

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

"MEDEA."

The Sunday Times thus noticed the performance of Cherubini's masterpiece on Saturday last:—

"Medea was played at Covent Garden as announced; and, moreover, was played admirably from first to last. Great care had evidently been taken with the ensemble, and the entire opera went with remarkable smoothness. Mdlle. Tietjens was again a capital representative of the terrible wife of Jason, and repeated on a new stage the triumphs gained on that of the 'old house.' We need not discuss the details of her performance. Enough that it alike justified and explained her monopoly of the part. She was enthusiastically applauded and several times recalled. Herr Gunz was an artistic Jason, looking the character well, and singing in a manner open to but little reproach. The Creon of Signor Bagagiolo was somewhat tame, but the Dirce of Mdlle. Lauenstein and the Neris of Mdlle. Scalchi gave much satisfaction. What an effect the glorious music made upon all who had hearts to feel, and the brains to comprehend its height and depth, the amateur can imagine. Hearing it, Trovatas and Lucias were thought of as one thinks of trash-rich stars at noonday with this difference—tenth-rate stars we know to be suns. Traviatas and Lucias we know to be as small as they look."

The following is part of a long article on the same subject which appeared in the Daily Telegraph:—

"'True art is imperishable,' wrote Beethoven to Cherubini, in a letter which the Italian composer said he never received—which, at any rate, he never answered—and the true artist feels sincere pleasure in grand works of genius, and that in what establishments may be, and a new composition of yours; in fact, I take greater interest in it than in my own; in short, I love and honour you.' A justification of these emphatic words was presented at Covent Garden on Saturday, by the performance of Cherubini's sublime Medea, hearing which it was impossible to believe in the mutability of mere compliment. The author of Fidelio might well appreciate the author of Medea, since the two works have much in common—a common grandeur, for example, and now, unhappily, the common fate of occasional revival au pis-aller. We cannot assume that either is put upon the stage for its own sake. The general public cares little for them; and only when circumstances make valuable the support of a classical minority are these matchless works forthcoming. We have reason, therefore, to be grateful to circumstance for that which, otherwise, we might have vainly desired. 'It is a great loss to art,' said Beethoven, in the letter already quoted, 'not to possess any fresh production of your genius for the theatre.' Who will deny that every performance of Medea is a great gain, to be thankfully accepted, no matter what the circumstances under which it is given?

"Opera-goers do not need to be told that Medea forms one of the splendid series of revivals which distinguished Mr. Mapleson's management of Her Majesty's Theatre; nor is it necessary to remind them of its fine performance under the direction of Signor Arditi, whose added recitatives are not unworthy to be associated with Cherubini's music. In after-time, perhaps, when Medea shall have taken its rightful place, the Haymarket revival will be more highly esteemed than at present. It was devoted to those who had eyes to see in what a great dramatic genius was the surly Florentina composer, and what a store of wealth he laid up for the better days when dramatic music of the highest class shall be esteemed as it deserves. How this work was received when first brought out at the Salle Feydeau, in 1797, let the following tame criticism from Le Censeur prove:—'The music, by Cherubini, is often melodious, and sometimes forcible; but we find reminiscences and imitations of the manner of Méhul.' Another eulogy of Italian art (in this case more German than Italian) may have dictated the remarks which, however, a Frenchman—none other than Méhul himself—quickly repudiated. 'O, Censeur,' said the gifted composer, 'thou knowest not this great artist. I know him, and admire him because I know him. I say, and will prove to all Europe, that the author of Démophon, of Lodoiska, of Elisa, and of Medea has no need to imitate in order to be by turns elegant, expressive, graceful, and tragic; to be, in fine, that Cherubini whom some persons call a copyist, while they forget not to imitate him, badly, on every occasion.' Beethoven and Méhul both knew Medea, and so did Mendelssohn, whose definition of Cherubini as a 'splendid old man' is so often quoted; but it is time to show that the masterpiece of the Florentine has had its adverse critics. Mr. H. F. Chorley considers it as suffering from the individual nature of Cherubini, 'to which sweetness (as distinguished from dryness) seems to have been sparingly given.' Without stopping to ask the precise meaning of terms more intelligible when applied to champagne, we go on to say that the same authority takes about the 'dryness and insufficient interest' of Dirce's air, the 'weakness' of that of Jason, the 'bit-by-bit settings of single words' in Medea's passionate address to her husband, and much other of a like sort. Hence the worship of Medea by classicists is not an ignorant worship. Mr. Chorley has pointed out deformity in the idol. We doubt, nevertheless, whether much consciousness of deformity existed in the minds of Saturday's audience. The opera was played in capital style from first to last, and the grandeur of the music produced its full effect. We take Mr. Chorley's word that there are spots on the face of this sun of the lyric drama; but, as nobody went provided with smoked glass, nobody was affected by them."

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Under this heading we read in the Sunday Times:—

"At the third concert, given in St. James's Hall on Monday, the symphonies played were Schumann's No. 3 in E flat, and Beethoven's No. 7 in A. We have had, on several occasions, to discuss the merits of the former, and need not recapitulate our opinions concerning it. What the audience thought of the work may not only be guessed by the applause bestowed in large measure on the first three movements; and in less measure on the fourth and fifth. That there was any falling off cannot be attributed to Mr. Macfarren, the writer of the annotated programme, who lectured his readers with enthusiasm on the merits of what they heard. We doubt the propriety of such a course; at all events when the music in hand forms a subject of strong contention. An anti-Schumannite at last Monday's concert would probably have felt annoyance at purchasing a programme, and finding a lecture. Beethoven's symphony we can pass with the simple statement that it was not perfectly played. The music, however, is such that even an imperfect rendering confers pleasure in no ordinary degree. Mendelssohn's Melusine, and Cherubini's Anacreon were the overtures, both of which had a capital rendering. Though in very different styles, these two works are masterpieces of skill and invention. No amount of pains can be thrown away upon their preparation. Madame Schumann gave Beethoven's concerto in G with her wonted effect. Stimulated, perhaps, by the hearty reception awarded her, she played with uncommon energy, and laboured hard to bring out all the profound meaning of the music. In this respect she evidently satisfied the majority present, who applauded her with heartiness which could only come of real or fancied conviction that a great thing had been done. The orchestral accompaniments were satisfactory, and Mr. Cusins conducted the work, as he did the entire concert, with care and discretion. The vocalists were Madame Monbelli and Dr. Gunz. Madame Monbelli sang 'Bel raggio' in excellent style, and Dr. Gunz laboured zealously at an exhausting air from Wagner's Meistersinger. For the energy with which he strove against Herr Wagner's oppressive accompaniment he was applauded and recalled."

On the same subject the Athenæum discourses thus:—

"At the Philharmonic Society's third concert on Monday, the symphonies were Schumann's in E flat ('Rheinish') and Beethoven's in A (No. 7). The first was played better than the second, for reasons sufficiently obvious—it was the less familiar, and took up most of the one rehearsal, which is all our historical society can afford. But the day ever come when the production of a great work shall be a matter of loving care, and not a mere question of how to make it pass muster? The overtures were Mendelssohn's Melusine and Cherubini's Anacreon, the first of which gave unqualified satisfaction. Some such result the compiler of the annotated programme must have assumed, as he thought unnecessary even a portion of the elaborate puffery with which Schumann's work was supported. Madame Schumann played Beethoven's concerto in G in a style not likely to be forgotten by the audience. Her task was a hard one, but the wrestling of the distinguished German pianist prevailed; she overcame the concerto, and was summoned back to be congratulated upon her victory. Madame Monbelli and Dr Gunz were the vocalists, the latter introducing a 'Prieslied' from Wagner's Meistersinger with some effect. Madame Monbelli made a great success with 'Bel raggio.'"

MR. MANN'S CONCERT.

With reference to this event, the Sunday Times says:—

The programme opened with Mozart's overture to the little opera, Die Schauspiel Director, which alone survives of all the numbers in the work. It has frequently been performed, and, though of a light Italian style, is held in high esteem. But Mozart could hardly write other than immortal music. Beethoven's symphony in A (No 7) was magnificently played by the augmented band of 100 performers. Rarely have the beauties so profusely scattered throughout this work been more worthily revealed, and rarely has any performance made so great a sensation How long and how loud was the applause that followed each movement may be imagined. Madame Schumann's rendering of Weber's Concertstück was distinguished by energy in an uncommon degree. For the sake of a great name and a famous past, we wish it were possible to say that Madame Schumann played faultlessly. This, however, cannot be done, Madame Schumann is nevertheless an artist, and her artistic qualities cannot be obscured even by failing powers. It was possible, therefore, to sympathize fully with the applause and recall which rewarded her performance. We must withhold approvals altogether from Bach's violin prelude in E minor, as dressed up for reunion lovers by a German music director named Herr Stör. This gentleman, whose bump of veneration would probably escape the sensitive fingures of the best phrenologist, has arranged the prelude for a number of violins, with an orchestral accompaniment entirely his own. This is enough for us, without discussing the merits of Herr Stör's work. Let us hope that the German music-director will find something better to do in future. Mr. Mann ought, also, to come under censure for adapting his countryman's hash. A novelty was the ballet-music to Mendelssohn's Wedding of Camacho which could not fail to interest, apart from the grace of the music, as it was played in public for the first time. By little and little, in the course of long years, we shall know all that the composer did—a desirable thing even though not all should prove worthy his fame. The orchestral selection ended with the overture to Oberon."

Digitized by Google

THE MUSIC OF EASTER AND HOLY WEEK.

(From the "Choir," April 30.)

The recurrence of the Easter Festival, and of the preceding days so full of solemn memories, has served once more to bring out into strong contrast the diverse methods adopted by churchmen to celebrate the sorrows of the Holy Week, and the joys of the Feast which comes at its close. That there has been a considerable increase in the number of churches where both the ritual and the music have been coloured by the associations of these great seasons is a matter for intense satisfaction, not only on account of the corresponding devotion kindled among congregations, but because such a fact may be accepted as a sign of the growing tendency to utilise the arts as the handmaidens of religion. But while the proportion of services which have been thus distinguished by some semblance at least of harmony between the teaching of the clergy and that which is poured into the ear of the worshipper or meets his eye, there is still a very large number of places where, as far as sound and colour are concerned, the year passes by with its fasts and feasts alike unnoticed, while the world outside loses no opportunity of turning to the best account the natural sympathies which crave for variety and abhor monotony. That such should be the case is only another proof of the blindness of our teachers. To ignore the seven gateways of knowledge, whether in things human or divine, and to attempt to reach the mind or soul by one, or at the best by a few, only of the means so unmistakably provided for this very object, is indeed an act of egregious folly against which our modern renaissance is a standing protest, and yet those who, by a liberal education, and some acquaintance, at least, with the history of art, ancient and modern, might be supposed to have been proof against the temptation to commit the error, are in too many cases the first to fall into it. It is, indeed, only on the assumption that all secondary means, such as music and ritual, using the latter word in its widest sense as inclusive of every form of art decoration, are either useless or injurious that we can account for this blind indifference to their powers which characterizes so many of the clergy, and places before the people a series of services varying little if at all in their surroundings from one year's end to the other. How otherwise can the phenomenon be explained that in many churches throughout England, there has not been the slightest effort on the part of those in authority to mark, by any appeal to the eye or ear, the great events which have just been commemorated? How else can we explain the anomaly that while in almost every other church in Christendom the opposite has been the rule, while in Paris scarcely a consecrated building has been without its signs of woe and joy, while Lutherans have their Passion music and Roman Catholics their solemn offices so admirably fitting in with the teaching of their Church, we in England have been practically left without those aids to devotion which in many cases are essential and in nearly all desirable as a means of reaching the heart? That they can be made use of by the most faithful sons of the English Church without doing violence in the slightest degree to her authority, or acting in opposition to the spirit of adherence to primitive tradition we firmly believe, in fact it may be said that in those instances where such an endeavour to utilize art is consistently made we may expect to find the nearest approach to Prayer Book rule. That such a system has its dangers is of course perfectly true, and that over-decoration and an undue use of music may be the result of an attempt thus to bring the teaching of the services into unison with the lessons from the pulpit when irresolute hands and weak heads are at the helm is undeniable, but to allow this to prevent the pursuit of what is in itself legitimate and desirable would be merely a symptom of that same lack of self-control which necessitates the use of pledges and other restraints, and is therefore unworthy of this consideration. It is nevertheless extensively acted on and requires a consistent and at the same time a careful course of conduct on the part of those who are able to reason and act on sounder principles in order to convince men who, to escape the danger of one extreme, fly into the other.

But while many of the clergy thus make no attempt to act on any canons but those summed up in the formula that "what is is right," others show an equal want of appreciation of the powers of music and decorative art by an entire exclusion of both at positential seasons, such as Good Friday. To thrust music aside at a time when its noblest parts should come into play is of course an absurdity, it is in fact to assert that the divine art is only capable of expressing joy,—a monstrous perversion of the truth, betraying also an utter ignorance of the greatest masterpieces of our noblest composers. And yet such a proceeding can be easily accounted for. Feeling that the whole tone of the services should be cast as it were in a minor key, men proceed to the opposite extreme and not only banish the organ, which, if the choir where competent to sing without its support, might be a judicious proceeding, but they go so far in some places as to relegate the whole service to the parson and clerk duet, or the cacophonic mumble of the congregation in the colloquial tone of voice. Thus the passage from the sublime to the ridiculous is spanned at once, and that which might be so full of holy influence is reduced to a miserable jargon, expressive of nothing, and calculated only to weary instead of to impress the mind with feelings suited to the time and place. It is, we think, well worthy of consideration whether this total exclusion of music from the services on Good Friday may not have had much to do with the too common desecration of that solemn day, and whether the increasing reverence which is being shown to it is not largely owing to the growth of a wiser appreciation on the part of some of our clergy of the capability of the choral service to suit itself to times of penitence and mourning as well as to the jubilance of Easter and Christmas. At any rate, judging from results, there can be no question which method is better calculated to draw people to church, and this, after all, is the great object. In this, then, as in all else, "the golden mean the Church's praise and glory is," and wise are those who endeavour to reach it. For a man with the Prayer Book in his hand, so full of its ever varying key-notes sounding forth to those who are willing to listen, to neglect those signs of light and shade is indeed a fatal mistake, and we gladly hail every sign of the dawn of a better day. That it is at hand we do not doubt, and there is in the chants, the hymn tunes, the anthem, the organ voluntary, and far more in the choral celebration and processional hymn an unfailing provision for all legitimate developments of this musical expression which we desiderate. Until it is more general we believe one of the greatest and most important means of enabling the Church to fulfil her mission will be neglected, and we therefore regard every step in the right direction with satisfaction.

THE PIANOFORTE—ITS HISTORY.*

An instrument so universal, and holding so prominent a place in our homes and concert rooms, as the pianoforte, deserves to have its history written. Hence the valuable little work before us requires no apology for its existence, but rather may count upon a welcome from all who are interested in music. As Mr. Brinsmead goes back to the earliest time, his field of operations is a wide one. It is, however, judiciously occupied. Such records as we possess of ancient stringed instruments are condensed and put together in a lucid manner, preparatory to a fuller account of the modern piano and its allies, from the Clavicytherium through the Clavichord, Virginal, Spinet, and Harpsichord. Mr. Brinsmead has done this latter and more important part of his work in admirable style. He writes clearly and succinctly; bringing, moreover, great practical knowledge to descriptions where it is of the utmost value. Engravings are plentiful throughout the volume, and add much to its value. We need not quote from Mr. Brinsmead's work, nor even give an outline of its contents, because everybody interested in the piano will read it for themselves.

VIENNA.—According to report, Herr Herbeck has resigned his post as conductor of the Society of the Friends of Music, after having held it, with the best results to the Society, for years. This step was not wholly unexpected, as, since his appointment at the Imperial Operahouse, he had more duties than he could possibly get through.

WEIMAR.—At the approaching Beethoven Festival, Professor Riedel, from Leipsic, will conduct the Missa Solemnis, Beethoven's last and Professor Müller-Hartung will conduct Beethoven, a Festival Cantata, by the Abbate Franz Liszt, who, then, suddenly changing his character, like Harpagon's coachman, in L'Avare, will cease to be the composer and appear as the conductor, in which capacity he will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

DRESDEN.—The King of Saxony has conferred the cross of chevalier of the Albert Order upon Herr G. A. Heinze, of the Court Theatre, for the latter's oratorio, Sancta Cäcilia. His Majesty has, also, bestowed on Mdme. Kainz-Prause, of the Royal Operahouse, the title of "Kammersängerin." In England, where people go in for "solid pudding," to speak metaphorically, it is probable that no very high value would be attached to either of the above marks of royal satisfaction, especially the latter. But German taste differs from English taste. Mdme. "Königlich-Sächsische Kammersängerin" Kainz-Prause is, doubtless, as proud of her new title as the wife of the chief Magistrate of London is pleased with the delicious words, "Your Ladyship." These, however, are available like return tickets on a railway, only for a limited period, whereas once a "Kammersängerin" always a "Kammersängerin."

* The History of the Pianoforte, with an Account of Ancient Music and Musical Instruments. By Edgar Brinsmead. Cassell, Petter, & Galpin.

Digitized by Google

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

The operas during last week were Faust, Rigoletto, and Le Nozze di Figaro. Owing to the illness of one of the principal singers cast for Weber's Abu Hassan and Mozart's Gen del Cairo—which were to have been given, for the first time on the Italian stage, in London or elsewhere, on Saturday night—Rigoletto was again performed.

About the Flauto Magico, produced at this house as at the other, little need be said. The chief parts are sustained in the great majority of instances by artists whose excellence in them has long been recognized. The Queen of Night of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska has a weird charm about it which places it apart from all other impersonations of the character and her execution of the two great airs, more especially of the last, "Gli angui d'inferno," has probably not been equalled since the time of Madame Anna Zerr, who, in spite of the elevated diapason that has now for very many years obtained, used to sing both of them in Mozart's original keys. Signor Gardoni's Tamino is one of the best imaginable, and his singing of that Orphean melody, "O cara immagine," is irreproachable. Mr. Santley's Papageno improves year by year as a life-like dramatic impersonation; while, on the other hand, if Mozart could have heard his exquisitely tuneful music thus sung (which, with Schikaneder, the first Papageno, was not likely), he might possibly have been moved to compose an opera expressly for our English baritone. Signor Foli imparts all the requisite gravity to the impressive music of the high priest, Sarastro; Mdlle. Monbelli makes a charming and sprightly Papagena, in the duet with Papageno, surprising by a display of stage vivacity for which her Rosina had not prepared us; and Mr. C. Lyall, in the grotesque personage of Monostatos, chief of the black slaves, exhibits a comic humour very rare in those who, whom minor parts in opera are ordinarily allotted. Madame Sinico, who now assumes the character of Pamina for the first time in London, acquits herself like the studied musician and intelligent actress she is, while all the subordinate parts, including the three good genii, the three attendants on the Queen of Night, &c., are competently represented. The orchestra, under Signor Arditi, is effective throughout; and the new chorus, remarkable for that unison and freshness of voices that compose it, finds ample opportunity in Mozart's picturesque and varied music for effective display.

The Flauto was very shortly followed by the Nozze di Figaro. Assuredly Mozart and "classical" opera are, at the present period, so much in the ascendant that amateurs of the opera who can be tempted by no other attraction must dread the advent of Patti, Mario, Nilsson, Lucca, and the "stars" in general—who, being self-luminous, lend their light, instead of borrowing it from others, and who find in the medium of which they condescend to shine, Le Nozze might be dismissed as briefly as Il Flauto, but for the fact that there were two or three novelties in the cast of the dramatis personæ. About the Susanna of Madame Sinico, the Count Almaviva of Mr. Santley, the Figaro of Signor Gassier, and the Basilio of Mr. Lyall, there is nothing new to be said. Each is admirable in its way, but each is too familiar to the operatic public to stand in any need of description. The part of the Countess Almaviva, who, while always lamenting past happiness, is never backward at joining in a little intrigue, was supported by Mdlle. Roboux, who acted it with lady-like dignity and graceful intelligence, and except in the quick movements of "Dove sono," sang the music effectively throughout. Her "Porgi amor" was full of true and unaffected expression. The amorous, seducing, and mischievous page, Cherubino, was impersonated by Madame Monbelli, who again was more to be commended for her refined and artistic singing than for her histrionic delineation of the part. Nothing could be more musically perfect than this accomplished lady's delivery of "Voi che sapete," which, and no wonder, she was compelled to sing twice. Moreover, the voice of Madame Monbelli is the voice for which Mozart wrote his music—a manifest advantage. Signor Castelli made a very good Don Bartolo, singing with great spirit the fine air, "La vendetta," which clearly inspired Rossini while writing the scarcely less striking "La calunnia;" and Signor Zoboli was a character-istically drunken "gardener." The parts of Marcellina and Don Curzio were fairly sustained by Madame Corsi and Signor Binaldini. The execution of the opera generally, from the overture to the end, was almost all that could be wished. What the chorus had to do was thoroughly well done, and we have again to thank Signor Arditi for restoring the quaint fandango, which gives needful variety and helps to complete the design of the finale to the scene where Count and Countess Almaviva preside at the festivities in honour of the wedding of Figaro with Susanna. The other encore of the evening was, as usual, "Crudel! perche"—the duet between the Count and Susanna (Mr. Santley and Madame Sinico).

A line or two must suffice to record that, on Tuesday night, Bellini's charming pastoral (and best opera), La Sonnambula, was performed, with an efficient cast of the dramatis personæ, and a result in every way satisfactory. The Amina of the evening was Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, one of the most consummate representatives of that very engaging operatic heroine now upon the stage. When the gifted Hungarian lady first played Amina—at Her Majesty's Theatre, some five years ago, during the season which introduced her to the London public—the merits of her impersonation were ungrudgingly and unanimously admitted. But since that period she has progressed, both as an actress and as a singer. We may say, indeed, with justice, that Mdlle. di Murska has never sung so uniformly well as she is singing now. Her acting and general demeanour on the boards were from the first remarkable for intelligence; and the rare faculty of being able to throw herself entirely into the character assigned to her was evident in all she attempted, whether as Lucia, Linda, Dinorah, or Isabella. Though Mdlle. di Murska, the singer, could hardly be mistaken, Mdlle. di Murska, the actress, was only recognized as the personage she assumed. It has been said that she principally excels in the delineation of parts the culminating point of histrionic interest in which is mental derangement—as Lucia, Linda, and Dinorah being fairly cited as examples. In a measure this is true; but that she is also capable of giving poetical embodiment to characters with which mental derangement has nothing to do is unanswerably shown by her Amina. Somnambulism is not madness; and Mdlle. di Murska can sing under the semblance of sleep just as impressively as, with deranged costume and dishevelled hair, she can sing under the semblance of madness—aye, and act as well. We are not going to describe her Amina again. The task would be superfluous. Enough that from "Care Compagne," with its brilliant sequel, "Come per me sereno" (Act ii, to "Ah! non credea mirarti," with its still more brilliant cavatina, "Ah, non giunge"—both of which were given with a fluency, taste, and expression that left nothing to desire—her efforts were thoroughly successful, that she was applauded again and again, and recalled after every act.

Mdlle. di Murska was well supported by Signor Mongini (Elvino), Signor Foli (Rodolfo), Mdlle. Vinta, a young and promising English artist, favourably known in our concert-rooms (Lisa), Madame Corsi (Teresa), and Signor Zoboli (Alessio).

Signor Arditi conducted—a guarantee that the general performance, wherever orchestra and chorus are concerned, would be effective. The attraction of La Sonnambula seems to be perennial; the house was the best of the season.

The other operas this week have been Le Nozze di Figaro (Monday), and the Sonnambula, (Thursday)—the two German operas having again been postponed, in consequence of the continued illness of Signor Gardoni. Meanwhile, it is understood that Robert le Diable is in preparation for Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, as Alice—a part which the popular Swedish songstress has recently been playing in Paris, but which she has never before essayed in London.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.

Elijah was performed under Mr. Joseph Barnby's direction, in St. James's Hall last Wednesday week, and, as a matter of course, attracted a large audience. The masterpiece of Mendelssohn, like the shief d'œuvre of Handel, never fails to assert its hold on the public mind, and the more frequent its hearing the more absolute does that assertion become. Who, knowing the work, would have the case otherwise? The performance was, on the whole, good; both band and chorus doing their work in excellent style. More than usual effect was made by the latter in those numbers which, like "He watching over Israel," gave scope for the good training of the voices to display itself. The principal soloists were Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Patey, Mr. Shaw (in place of Mr. Vernon Rigby, absent through illness), and Herr Stepan. We need not say a word in Madame Rudersdorff's praise, though we could say many. Her rendering of the soprano music in Elijah long since reached the highest point of excellence, and in that position it is generally acknowledged and appreciated. We must, nevertheless, point out again the perfection she displays in the scene of Elijah's greatest miracle. More intense expression could hardly be desired. Madame Patey was, as usual, excellent, and there was a strong disposition to encore "O rest in the Lord." As Mr. Mason essayed the tenor music at a few minutes' notice it would be unfair to criticise his efforts, or to speak of them in any other spirit than that of commendation. Herr Stepan had much to do as Elijah, and did it in his best manner. His voice may not be so fresh as it once was, and his pronnciation of English may appeal sometimes to the risible muscles, but, generally, he leaves no doubt of the fact that as artist is in presence.

At the next concert Mr. Barnby's new cantata, Rebekah, will be produced. We have reason to believe that the music will enhance its composer's reputation in no small degree.

ATHENS.—The Greek National Hymn, a new composition by Herr von Adellarg, was recently performed for the first time in the presence of the King. We trust that the dying groans of the travellers so foully murdered lately have been introduced among its strains.

Digitized by Google

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S
Beethoven Recitals.
1870.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ has the honour to announce that his TENTH SERIES of PIANOFORTE RECITALS will take place on the following Afternoons:—

Friday, May 13,	Friday, June 10,
Friday, May 20,	Friday, June 17,
Friday, May 27,	Friday, June 24,
Friday, June 3,

To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely.

The present year being the Centenary of the birth of Beethoven, who came into the world, at Bonn, on the Rhine, December 17, 1770, Mr. Hallé considers it becoming and appropriate to devote his forthcoming series of Recitals exclusively to the music of that illustrious composer.

The programmes will, as on previous occasions, consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, p.m.

Mr. Hallé will be assisted at all the Recitals by

HERR STOCKHAUSEN,

who will sing four of Schubert's collection of songs entitled "The Fair Maid of the Mill," at each of the five first concerts, accompanied by Mr. Hallé.

Descriptive, analytical and historical, of the sonatas will, as on previous occasions, accompany the programmes.

THE SECOND RECITAL
WILL TAKE PLACE ON
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 13TH, 1870,
To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

PART I.

SONATA, in C minor, No. 1, Op. 10 .. .. Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Das Wandern" (Wandering) } —Herr Stockhausen .. Schubert.
{ "Wohin" (Whither) }
SONATA, No. 3, Op. 12 .. .. Beethoven.

PART II.

SONATA, No. 3, Op. 10 .. .. Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Halt" (Stop) } .. Schubert.
{ "Danksagung an den Bach" (Thanksgiving to the Brook) } —Herr Stockhausen.
SONATA PATHETIQUE, Op. 13 .. .. Beethoven.

Prices of Admission (for the Series)—Sofa Stalls (numbered and reserved), £2 2s.; Balcony, £1.

For One Recital—Sofa Stalls, 7s.; Balcony, 5s.; Area, 1s.

Subscriptions received at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co.'s, 48, Cheapside; Hays, 4, Exchange Buildings; Austin's Ticket Office, 28, Piccadilly; and by Mr. Charles Hallé, 11, Mansfield Street, Cavendish Square.

DEATH.

On the 21st April, at her residence, Meyderwell, Tralee, at an advanced age, Mrs. Simpson, formerly a popular music teacher in that town.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Kisadhienne (Waterford).—We can hardly give a general answer to your question, because the circumstances vary. You had better enquire with regard to particular cases.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

To Advertisers.—The Office of the Musical World is at Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1870.

O, BRAVE NOR'-EASTER.

LEST this heading should cause a moment's misapprehension we hasten to disclaim the slightest sympathy with nor'easters. So far there are people who would have not the slightest sympathy with us. The fashion among them is to love everything that comes either from the dexter or the sinister side of the North Pole; and if we might believe their words, there is nothing under heaven so heavenly as buffeting with a stiff current of air from the arctic regions. Of this sect Charles Kingsley is the prophet (see his address to the nor'-easter passim); but the sect itself is only a branch of one much larger. We live in times when craving for sensation has led to the preaching of the gospel of uncomfortableness. The shortest road to heaven was once thought to be through thorns, briars, bogs, morasses, quags, and swamps. Hence there was a wonderful mortification of the poor body, and the land swarmed with saints more or less like him of the pillar. The body, now, is exalted into an object of worship, and not made the scape-goat of the soul. But none the less is it mortified. According to some preachers it should be treated as thoroughly invulnerable, and as equal to any demands made upon it. The heroes of these preachers are the most uncomfortable because most unnatural persons we know. It is impossible to hear about them without shame of face that we have not attained to an equal contempt of the ordinary conditions of life. The embodiment of corporeal divinity can jump from a bridge twenty feet high, fish four young ladies out of the water, change his clothes at the usual time, and use no more than the customary number of pocket handkerchiefs next day. A doctor he looks upon as a superior kind of "vet," with whom he cannot possibly have anything to do; and as he never dies (marrying happily at the close of his three-volume career), we presume that he is translated to some "happy hunting grounds," where the swamps are especially swampy, and the chase is never ended. One cannot look at these modern Achilles's (heel not excepted) without furious envy;—hence their uncomfortableness. Imagine a man with vivid reminiscences of catarrh seeing another "come up smiling" after a deadly bout with a nor'-easter! The sight cannot be endured by generous souls, who, forthwith, do a number of stupidly emulative things, and end by resorting to mustard-plasters and hot water. Hence it is becoming a sign of weakness to wear a great-coat when the thermometer is below 30°; to ride inside an omnibus when the rain has thoroughly damped the outside cushions, and, generally, to do anything assuming the heirship of flesh to any climatic ills whatever. All this, we need scarcely say, is vanity and vexation of, body, if not of spirit. If "no man, by taking thought, can add one cubit unto his stature," neither can any man, by bravado, make himself pachydermatous enough to keep out the subtle influences of a nor'-easter. Don Quixote charged the windmill and came to grief; defy a nor'-easter and you are laid up by the heels yet more effectually.

Apropos is all the foregoing of certain operatic phenomena just now visible. The winds of an English May (most charming of months in poetry) have had their legitimate effect on more than one artist, to the upsetting of managerial schemes, and the disappointment of expectant auditors. We wish to bespeak a little consideration for managers and artists in such cases. With regard to them, public instinct is always uncharitable. The first impulse is to disbelieve the story told, and the next, to be angry because it is true. Nevertheless, artistic humanity is liable to catarrh, and hoarseness is no respecter of persons. Bear this in mind, good public, even such of you as affect to ignore the weakness of flesh and blood. Bearing it in mind, be charitable, and accept whatever is the result with resignation.

Mr. Benedict returned from Paris on Monday, after the successful production of his St. Cecilia, with Mdlle. Christine Nilsson as the fair and suffering saint. On Tuesday Mr. Benedict directed the concert of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society. The activity of this genuine artist is indomitable.

Digitized by Google

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE Italian Government have christened a new ship "Il Gioachino Rossini." Our Board of Admiralty, who, judging from the catalogue of birds, beasts, fishes, and reptiles in the Navy List have exhausted available titles, might take a hint. Mr. Childers, striking out a new course in naval nomenclature, might baptise the next ironclad as "the Sterndale Bennett."

ON the 18th June, 1821, Weber's opera of Der Freischütz was produced at Berlin for the first time on any stage. On the 4th August, in the following year, it was brought out at Hesse-Darmstadt. The disputes to which it gave rise among musical theoreticians have long been forgotten, and the work, which, as far back as 1858, had been performed more than three hundred times in Berlin, has now become a thorough German-folk's opera. On the 19th April it was performed in Darmstadt for the hundredth time. The management evinced their reverential feeling by doing all they could in the way of new scenery, dresses, etc., to render the performance as complete as possible.

WE take the following from the letter of the Times Paris correspondent, May 2:—

"Nilsson's benefit, generously transferred by her to the needy and suffering of the profession she in every way adorns, came off last night with very great éclat. Although the prices were high, the great Opera-house was crowded. It had been reported the Emperor and Empress would go, and it is a pity they did not. The event of the evening was Benedict's Legend of St. Cecilia, which came first after the overture. The principal part in that fine cantata was taken by Nilsson. She sang her best—that is to say, as few have ever sung before her—and did full justice to the very beautiful music. One could have wished her better supported. Faure sang out of tune, and as for the tenor, Collin, he is really not up to the mark, and one feels surprised to see him occupying the place he does on the first lyric stage in France. The chorus-se, which are, perhaps, the finest things in the cantata, were well sung. Benedict's excellent music was listened to with great and respectful attention, but the applause at its close was less enthusiastic than it would have been in some other capitals I could name. The opera of Faust, and the fourth act of Hamlet concluded the evening's performance. The receipts are stated this morning at 19,468 francs, besides tha Emperor's 1,000 francs, and 800 francs from M. Maurice Richard, the Minister of Fine Arts, who, having lately married a lady with a dowry of three millions, added these little liberalities. Mdlle. Nilsson sings to-morrow in Hamlet, for the last time in Paris, and shortly leaves for America. After her triumphant campaign and its charitable finale, it is not too much to say that she will depart laden with praise and blessings."

IF the law of international copyright between England and France should be revised it will be just to include in the Act some precise definition of the word "translation." At present that word is interpreted differently in England and in France. In France La Fiylia del Reggimento is looked upon as a translation of La Fille du Régiment; L'Elisire d'Amore as a translation of Le Philtre; yet in both Italianized versions the names of characters and localities, as well as the language of the dialogue, become Italian. The Théâtre Italien was recently obliged to purchase from the Opéra Comique the right of performing an Italian version of La Fille du Régiment. The Opéra Comique, desirous of performing L'Elisir d'Amore, cannot do so without permission of the Grand Opéra, to whose répertoire Le Philtre belongs; indeed, that permission withheld, a new libretto in the French language is being written to Donizetti's music. Thus we may infer that a Gallicized version of an English dramatic work would be in France a translation; whereas an Anglicized version of a French work is not so in England. Some modification is needed of that condition in the International Copyright Act which, to secure protection, requires the publication, within a stipulated time, of a translation which Vice-Chancellor James says must be "complete and literal" of the work to be protected. This is a condition which, as Vice-Chancellor James interprets it, had never been complied with. Most published translations of French works are incomplete, none literal. How could complete translations of Michelet's recent books, half sentimental, half physiological; of Les Misérables, and L'Homme qui rit, be published in England? The published translations of the works named have been purposely left incomplete. Therefore, according to Vice-Chancellor James's ruling, no copyright can be claimed; nor, in practice, would it have been possible to secure copyright, inasmuch as the works in question contain passages which no English publisher would allow to appear in an edition bearing his name.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE St. Cecilia Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Hargitt, gave a "members' concert" on Monday evening week, at the Gratton Hall, Fitzroy Square, when Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, and a miscellaneous selection, were performed. The solos in the former were sung by Mdme. Laura Baxter, Miss Burgess, and Miss Flora Crivelli, pupil of Mdme. Baxter. The chorus was efficient. Mr. Theophilus Jones presided at the pianoforte.

SIGNORINA EMILY TATE, on Tuesday, gave her evening concert at St. George's Hall, under the patronage of Sir Roderick Murchison. She played several solos, by Litolff, Beethoven, Thalberg, Mozart, Ascher, &c., in all of which she produced an effect pleasing to her friends, who loudly applauded her. Her best effort was in Ascher's "Alice," which was received with much favour. The bénéficiaire was assisted by Madama Blanche Reeves, Miss A. Strangways, Mdlle. Lina Mocca, with Messrs. Alfred Baylis and Frederic Penna. The three latter artists gave Randegger's trio, "I Navigandi," with much spirit and effect. A duet by Lidia, "La Giovinezza," by Messrs. Baylis and Penna, pleased uncommonly, as did Beethoven's "Adelaide," sung most artistically by Mr. Alfred Baylis, who was ably seconded in the accompaniment by Mr. Francesco Berger. Mdlle. Lina Mocca sang two Italian cavatinas; and Signora Do Bona played two brilliant solos on the violin, and Herr Schuberth the same on the violoncello, in their usual style. Mr. Francesco Berger, Herr Schuberth, and Signor Deostella were the conductors.

MISS EDITH KINGSLEY'S first evening concert, connected with which was a dramatic performance, took place in St. George's Hall on Wednesday week. Mr. G. Perren sang with great taste and expression Barker's ballad, "The Irish Emigrant," and a song of his own, "When each bell," being recalled after the former and narrowly escaping an encore in the latter. The Mdlles. Siedle sang two duets. Miss Blanche Cole gave Rode's air with variations, and a cavatina by Stanislaus, "Fairy Breeze," with good effect. The singing of Donizetti's cavatina, "Regnava nel Silenzio," by Mdlle. Julie Lucas, was warmly applauded. The concert-giver herself contributed Rockstro's song, "A year ago," and Thomas's Welsh air, "The Ash Grove," with harp accompaniment by Mr. John Cheshire, receiving and deserving hearty applause after each. Molloy's song, "The Vagabond," was given with much spirit by Mr. Harley Vinning. The pianists were Mr. Charles Malcolm and Herr Bosovitz. The former played a fantasia on Lucia di Lammermoor, the latter a piece of his own, entitled "Une Sirene." Mr. John Chester's grand fantasia on Martha was received with much favour. The concert was followed by The Honeymoon; the principal characters by Messrs. Robinson, Brighton, Dalton, Hamilton, King, Ellis; Miss Marie Somerville, Miss Beasle Mari, and Miss Merrick. The general mounting of the piece was in every respect creditable, and the performance was well received.

THE third concert of the Schubert Society took place on Thursday, 28th April. The first part was devoted to vocal and instrumental compositions by Spohr, including "Love thee" (Mr. Stedman); "The nightingale was in her bower" (Miss Oxley); duet, "Segui, oh cara," Faust (Miss Strangways and Mons. Waldeck); solo violin (Herr Ludwig), solo violoncello (Herr Schuberth), &c. The second part opened with Rubinstein's grand trio (Op. 52), exceedingly well played by Herr Schrattenholz (pianoforte), Herr Ludwig, and Herr Schuberth. The other instrumental pieces were solo guitar, Madame R. Sidney Pratten (encored); duet for violin and pianoforte, Schuberth, a charming composition; solo pianoforte, Fantasia, Liszt (Mr. Malcolm); solo violoncello, Andante religioso, Golterman (Herr Schuberth); and six ancient German waltzes, collected and re-arranged by M. Schrattenholz. These beautiful old melodies were composed in the 16th and 17th centuries. Nos. 2 and 5 were the most applauded. The vocal pieces included, for the first time, Neufeld's ballad, "Where I felt would be," sung with taste by Miss Amy Strangways; "Pilgrim of love" (Mr. Stedman); "Le printemps," Gounod (Miss. Waldeck); "L'Estasi," Arditi (Miss Oxley); and Schuberth's "Beauteous moon." The rooms were as usual crowded. The next vocal réunion will take place on the 12th inst., and the next concert on the 20th, when Mr. Benedict's vocal and instrumental compositions will form the first part.

AT Vienna, Gluck's Orphée has been produced with marked and encouraging success. When shall we hear the work in England?

Digitized by Google

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The new season commences to-day with a grand musical festival under the management of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The orchestra will number upwards of three thousand performers. Madame Sinico, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Bettini, Signor Gassier, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley, are the principal vocalists. The festival will be conducted by Sir Michael Costa, and the performances will include the first portion of Elijah, and a miscellaneous selection, including the overture to La Gazza Ladra, Mendelssohn's "O Hills, O Vales," Sir Michael Costa's March from Naaman, solos by the principal vocalists, concluding with the National Anthem. The attractions announced this summer are more varied and numerous than ever. The principal features will be eight summer concerts, at which artists engaged at the Royal Italian Opera, Drury Lane, will assist. Two grand Flower Shows will be held on Saturdays, May 21 and June 11, to both of which will be added new features. The Rose Show will be held on Saturday, June 25th, and a magnificent display of some thousands of roses in pots will be made by Mr. W. Paul, from May 28 to June 4. The fireworks, with illumination of fountains will re-commence at the beginning of June, when several novelties will be introduced by Mr. C. T. Brock. Poultry, cage birds, and pigeon shows will also be held later in the season. The Saturday Concerts will be resumed in October under the direction of Mr. Manns. The operatic and dramatic performances will be shortly resumed, when several new works will be played. Other new features will consist of a drill review of school-boys on the 21st June; a great show of dogs on the 21st, 22nd, 23rd, and 24th June; and an exhibition of artistic decorations and furniture. Although only a few of the season's attractions have been named, they fully warrant the management in vaunting the season ticket—extending, as it does, over a clear twelve months—as the best guinea's worth in the world of entertainment.

FROU-FROU IN CHANCERY.

The cases of Wood v. Chart and others, and Wood v. Wood, was heard in the Vice-Chancellor's Court on Wednesday week, before Vice-Chancellor James.—In the former of these suits the bill was filed by Mr. Wood (of the firm of Cramer, Beale, & Wood) against the lessee of the Brighton Theatre (Mr. Chart), Miss Beatrice Binder, and Mr. Horace Wigan, for an infringement of his copyright in the well-known play of Frou-Frou. The second suit was against Mrs. John Wood, lessee of the St. James's Theatre. The cases were identical, and were brought on together. The bill states that the play was originally written in French by MM. Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy, and these gentlemen shortly afterwards assigned to the plaintiff the sole right of production in Great Britain and Ireland, either in English or French. An English translation (by Mr. Sutherland Edwards) was published in the Musical World shortly afterwards; and this version was sanctioned by the authors and published with their approval, in conformity with the requirements of the International Copyright Act, 1852.—The Vice-Chancellor, after giving judgment on Friday, said that with regard to the main point the plaintiff had to make out his title upon the terms of the convention and of the Act of Parliament. The Act required that, in order to give copyright to a foreign author, a copy of the original work must be deposited, and then that "the translation sanctioned by the author, or a part thereof, must be published in the British dominions not later than one year after the registration and deposit in the United Kingdom of the original work, and the whole of such translation must be published within three years of such registration and deposit." Thus it appeared that the whole work must be translated and published within three years and the whole or a part published within one year. Then with regard to dramatic pieces, it is provided that "the translation sanctioned by the author must be published within three calendar months of the registration of the original work." Now, in the first place, it was evident that what was necessary to be published was a translation not anything in the world which the author might choose to sanction as a translation. But the plaintiff in this instance had gone out of the way to make a pitfall for himself. The original play being in French, he had published in England a comedy called Like to Like, being an English version of MM. Meilhac and Halévy's comedy of Frou-Frou. He had changed the names of the characters from French to English; he had transferred the scenes to England, he had made adaptations which were necessary, in order to constitute it an English and not a French comedy. The first two acts appeared to be exactly what had been referred to as "an imitation or adaptation for the English stage." The names were changed from French to English, the characters were to some extent transferred to corresponding English characters, the manners were made to differ from English manners, and everything had been left out which was thought to be unsuitable to the English stage. But that was not what was meant or wanted when a translation was spoken of. There could have been no difficulty in the world for the plaintiff to have obtained the full benefit of the Act, if he had employed Mr. Sutherland Edwards to do that which, no doubt, he was perfectly capable of doing, namely, to make a literal translation of the work. If such a translation had been published in this country, it would have been quite open to the plaintiff to have represented the play here, with such abbreviations, excisions, alterations or adaptations as he might think fit, and his Honour had no doubt if the plaintiff had taken such a step, nobody could without his leave have acted anything like a play so nearly corresponding to Frou-Frou as Mr. Edwards's translation was. But as the plaintiff had failed to comply with the first condition that was necessary in order to entitle him to relief, the bill in the first suit must be dismissed with costs; and in the second there would be no order except that the plaintiff pay the defendant the costs of the motion.

PROVINCIAL.

CHESTER.—The subjoined is from a correspondent:—

"The Choral Society gave a performance in the Corn Hall on the evening of April 27th, consisting of selections from St. Paul and the Creation, with Madame Rita, Messrs. W. H. Cummings and O. Christian as principals, and band and chorus of 70 performers, under the direction of Mr. F. S. Cockton. Mr. Pyne, of Gloucester Cathedral, was pianist. Madame Rita, who possesses a high soprano voice, was several times recalled; Mr. Christian was encored in 'Rolling in foaming billows;' and Mr. Cummings was compelled to repeat in 'In native worth.' The concert was well patronized, and the manner in which the choruses were given reflected credit alike on the members of the society and their conductor."

READING.—A correspondent from this town writes as follows about a recent performance of the Messiah, in the Assembly Rooms, by the Reading Choral Union:—

"The performance was creditable, although some choruses were not so well sung as they ought to have been by so good a body of singers. The solo singers were Madame Emmeline Cole and Miss Fanny Reeves; Messrs. Elliot Galer and Orlando Christian. Madame Emmeline Cole in the recitatives, 'There were Shepherds,' and 'Lo, the Angels,' elicited loud applause, and her voice, no less than her musical proficiency, was much admired. 'Rejoice greatly' and 'Come unto Him' (encored), were excellent performances; and 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' perhaps most excellent of all. Madame Cole has made a genuine impression here. Mr. Orlando Christian's best efforts were 'Why do the nations,' and in the recitative, 'The trumpet shall sound.' Mr. Day was leader of the band, and Mr. W. H. Birch conducted."

NEWPORT (ISLE OF WIGHT).—The St. Thomas's Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Nutter, has given Elijah in a style honourable to all concerned. It was the last concert of the season, and will be remembered as one of the best performances of the society. The principal vocalists were Madame Jewell, Miss R. Jewell, Mrs. Kent, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The Hampshire Advertiser writes as follows about the performance:—

"Mdme. Jewell, the soprano of the evening, we seldom heard to more advantage. In the duet with Mr. Lewis Thomas, in the first part, 'Help me, man of God,' there was scope for much good and careful singing, and most notably were these characteristics present in the whole of it; but perhaps her 'Hear ye, Israel' was her happiest effort; it was so, certainly, if applause was any criterion of comparative worth, which we defer to acknowledge as an absolute rule. In the duets with Miss R. Jewell, and in the quartets, the admirable qualities of her voice were in no way hidden, and her share in the lovely 'Cast thy burden' is a thing to remember and sigh for. Miss R. Jewell's share in the performance was, as usual, careful, unassuming, finished, and successful. We shall not easily forget her most exquisite rendering of the air, 'Rest in the Lord,' which was the most applauded of anything in the evening. Mr. Lewis Thomas has not paid us many visits as yet; we wish he may do so, however, for his singing of the whole of the share of Elijah was simply scholarly and grand. We wish to notice only one thing more, in the vocal line at least, and that is the most perfect singing of the terzetto, in the second part, 'Lift thine eyes,' most carefully and beautifully sung by Madame A. Jewell, Miss R. Jewell, and Mrs. Kent."

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The annual benefit for the Invalids took place recently in the Imperial Theatre, which was crammed to the ceiling. The Emperor and the Imperial Family were present. The number of executants amounted to 1130, namely: 100 singers from the Imperial chapel, 10 instrumental soloists, 600 trumpeters, 60 drummers, and 370 chorus-singers from the regiments of Guards.

BRUSSELS.—The career of Lohengrin is now terminated. The next novelty is a three-act comic opera, entitled Florentin, which was announced for production last week. The composer, M. Emile Pichot, is no novice, having already produced various other comic operas, among which may be mentioned Dans les Gardes Françaises, et La Pomme d'Eve.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY MUSIC IN THE PARKS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I trust the article in your paper two weeks since upon the interference of the First Commissioner with regard to the bands in the parks on Sundays will not be the last word you have to say on the subject; for the people in London are powerless against official despotism. We depend upon the press more than ever for the protection of our liberties. For the sake of gaining political support one of the two parties that have hitherto carried on the government of the country is ever ready to surrender a principle. Judging by the self-assertion displayed in Mr. Ayrton's reply to the deputation, he assumes that because he has been appointed to office by the prerogatives of the Sovereign that the rights of the people have been transferred to him personally, as far as concerns his particular charge. He thinks he is master, not servant. The late party officials have of late years arrogated absolute power, and all in the name of the people, because a portion of the people may once in seven years elect certain individuals to the House of Commons. The reply would tend to prove that if competitive examinations are necessary for subordinate situations, such trials are more requisite for men who offer themselves for positions where they now exercise the prerogatives of sovereignty. What guarantee have we for the fitness of these party rulers? Is it not absurd that while, as in every business and profession, the servants of the country are obliged to undergo an examination, the servants who hold the highest appointments, and can injure the country most by incapacity, are subjected to none at all. Our members of Parliament and ministers, our ambassadors and governors of colonies, are the only national servants whose fitness is taken upon trust. They are appointed by the House of Commons, the members of which, again, are chosen not on account of proved ability, but simply by weight of purse and length of tongue. I am a voter, but at the last election had only the liberty of choosing one of two candidates, of whom antecedently I could know nothing. I had no proofs of their fitness. The speeches they delivered showed no signs of ability; there was, however, no resource for me but to vote for one, or to abstain from voting. I voted for the one who appeared the most reasonable, but never intended to make him sovereign lord and master in any department of the State. If Mr. Ayrton had said he was appointed trustee of the public by his political party, he would have been correct; but he said he was appointed by law; and he was speaking nonsense, for what has law or even the people to do with his appointment? His assumption of authority was sheer ignorance. With regard to his decree that "dance" music shall not be played—many popular airs, sung now to comic words, were originally solemn church chants; as for instance, "The fine old English gentleman;" and many hymn melodies are German and Swedish popular songs. But it is difficult to prove whether a melody was originally composed for church or street, for mourning or merriment. We have heard of the organ-grinder who bespoke an organ arranged for such English melodies as played very slow, passed for hymns, and played quick passed for jigs. The Rev. Roland Hill saw no reason why the devil should have all the lively tunes, and recommended his congregation to strike up a hymn to the tune of "My cottage near a wood," quick time, which they did, and found it no pleasing that many Dissenting congregations have adopted it in their chapels; and Mr. Ayrton might hear at any Dissenting chapel holy words sung to the tune of "Champagne Charlie." "We'll be free and easy still," and others. This is in fact pretty well known to most persons—if not to Mr. Ayrton. Now, if these music-hall tunes can be sung in Dissenting chapels, why not in the parks? Where is the moral logic of prohibition in park and not in chapel? If Mr. Ayrton's admirers, when they hear the band play some air which they imagine to be a dance, will only think good words to it, they may at once transform it into a hymn, just as Dissenters in chapel, by singing good words to "Champagne Charlie" transform that song. I hope you will not let this matter drop. I am sure the majority of the people feel as I do on the subject, and endorse all you say.—Yours, &c.,

No HYPOCRITE.

CARLOTTA PATTI AS ASTRAFIAMMANTE.

Die Zauberflöte was played at the New York Academy of Music lately, and the Herald thus speaks of Mdlle. Carlotta Patti's Queen of Night:—

"Last night the Academy of Music was crowded from parquet to dome with one of the largest audiences ever assembled within its walls. Every seat was sold at an early hour yesterday and hundreds were compelled either to stand during the performance or go home. The attraction was the first appearance of Mdlle. Carlotta Patti in opera. The Queen of Night, whom she represented, has but little need of acting in the two scenes in which she appears, and therefore is adapted to Mdlle. Patti. In the first scene the fair cantatrice surprised those who heard her previously in her bird-like warblings alone, by her impassioned address to Tamino, signalized by a broad, distinct, and expressive tone and rendition of the words. In the scene with her daughter she flung forth those wonderful staccato passages, in all of which she seems to hold a patent, and a shower of vocal pearls in the roulades in the finale. Her phenomenal voice seemed to revel amid the labyrinth of orchestration with which Mozart envelops the passionate mother and rival of Sarastro. The effect on the audience was electric, and the applause spontaneous and deafening."

WAIFS.

Herr Maurice Strakosch has returned to London from Paris.

A Life and Works of Meyerbeer has been published in Berlin by Herr Mendel.

Dea, a new opera by M. Cohen, was produced at the Opéra Comique on Saturday last.

The Théâtre-Dejaset is to be re-opened with a new operetta by Signor Bottesini.

A new edition of Dr. White's Irish poem, Comala, with musical illustrations, is about to appear.

An unpublished mass by Donizetti was to be performed on Thursday last at the church of St. Mary, Bergamo.

Graun's Passion was performed at the Berlin Academy of Music on Good Friday. The King and Court attended.

Signor Verdi has left Paris for Busseto. Report says that he has engaged to write a work for the Opéra Comique.

Mr. Max Strakosch is said to have the management of Mdlle. Nilsson's approaching tour through the United States.

The death is announced of M. Alexandre Basset, formerly director of the Opéra Comique, and of the journal La Patrie.

The new management of Cremorne Gardens has appointed M. Arban, of Paris, musical conductor for the ensuing season.

Mr. Ignace Gibsone the pianist and composer has announced three pianoforte recitals, of his own composition, at St. George's Hall.

Somebody has opened French opera at Madrid, with doubtful prospects of success. Mignon is among the works to be performed.

It has been decided to perform Eymont, Fidelio, and the Choral Symphony at the Vienna celebration of the Beethoven centenary.

A huge musical pic-nic is to take place on Boston Common in June next. Armies of singers are to sing, and much speechifying is to take place.

The members of the St. Cecilia Choral Society have presented Mr. C. J. Hargitt, their conductor, with a gold-mounted baton, as a token of esteem.

The terms offered by M. Carvalho with reference to the Théâtre Lyrique having been refused, that gentleman has withdrawn his candidature.

Died at Berlin, on the 14th inst., at the age of eighty-one, Herr Adam Bader, a tenor whose reputation is chiefly associated with Spontini's operas.

The cantata for voices and orchestra upon which Mr. F. H. Cowen is now engaged will be called The Rose-Maiden, and is adapted from a German legend.

Madame Marie Sass had a row with her manager on the occasion of her last Milan performance. She insisted on being paid beforehand, and got the money.

A chief workman in the piano-making firm of Herz & Co., Paris, has been named a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, on account of distinguished services.

It is now stated that M. de Flotow's L'Ombre will not be performed this year. Of course, Parisian wit has made the most of a work with such a name repeatedly failing to see the light.

Said General Moltke after the second act of Wagner's Meistersinger: "It is as bad as this in the Chamber of Deputies; but there it is possible to move the adjournment of the debate."

Dr. Guns was to leave for the Continent on Wednesday. Tant pis. We shall hear no more of Medea this year; and our operatic enjoyment will be confined to the warblings of prima donnas.

L'Art Musical says that on her return from America, Mdlle. Nilsson will sing during one season at St. Petersburgh, and after that retire from public life. We hope L'Art Musical is wrong, but fear it is right.

An oil painting by Ernesto Diaz, of Naples, representing the visit of Lisa to her father, Nicholas dei Lapi, the day before his execution, is announced for sale at Messrs. Robinson, Son, & Fisher's rooms, next week.

The English operatic performances, under the direction of Mr. Charles James Bishenden, announced to commence this month at St. George's Hall, Regent Street, are postponed, owing to the severe illness of the principal singer.

Madame Patti played at the Opéra Comique in the second act of La Fiylia, according to a special arrangement between the managers of that house and M. Bagier of the Italiens. The receipts amounted nearly to 15,000 francs.

Digitized by Google

M. Camille Stamaty, pupil of Kalkbrenner and master of the late Herr Gottschalk, died recently, aged fifty-nine. Among his best known works for the piano are "Souvenirs des Concerts du Conservatoire" and "Etudes Caractéristiques sur l'Obéron."

M. Maurice Richard's commencement of Inquiry into the Conservatoire does not appear to be wholly satisfactory. Considerable stress is laid upon the fact that out of twenty-eight members, only eight are musicians, the twenty being journalists and functionaries. It is needless to say that musicians expect very little from their labours.

La France Musicale gives a list of twenty-four composers who are attacked by Herr Wagner in his new brochure, Ueber das Dirigiren, and concludes by saying, "Le massacre est complet; il ne reste plus debout que Richard Wagner; il a tombé tous les autres."

Le Ménestrel, in announcing that Herr Litolff, "le grand symphoniste," is writing an opera bouffe for the Folies Dramatiques, suggests a prize for successful vaccination against the Offenbachian epidemic. "Oh allons-nous?" asks our contemporary, in dismay.

The Creation will be performed, for the only time this season, on Friday, the 20th inst., at St. James's Hall, by the National Choral Society—conductor, Mr. G. W. Martin; when Miss Louisa Pyne will sing in this oratorio for the last time. Mr. George Perren and Mr. Santley are also engaged.

The choir of St. Peter's, Canterbury, was vested in surplices on Easter Sunday, and there were full choral services in the church. Ten or twelve years ago (says the Choir) there was only a hand organ in this edifice, and the clerk used to leave his desk during service and proceed to the gallery at appointed times to turn the handle.

At a conversazione in the South Kensington Museum, on Wednesday, the 4th inst., an attractive selection of music was performed by the band of the Grenadier Guards of the Royal Marines (Chatham Division). The first piece in the programme of the Royal Marines was Herr Oberthür's brilliant overture, Rübezahl, which was greatly admired.

"Unless, before three months elapse, Sir John Pakington and those who support him provide £10,000 to meet the £10,000 offered by Earl Dudley for the Restoration of Worcester Cathedral and for the Clergy Orphans' and Widows' Fund, the Dean and Chapter will, we believe, accept Lord Dudley's original offer of £10,000 and discontinue the holding of the Festivals within the Cathedral." So, at least, says the Choir.

We take another gem from the wonderful store-house of American musical criticism, it is a New Orleans paper which speaks:—

"The Richings Troupe gave Gounod's opera of Faust last night. Drama of grief and the avenging Nemesis which tells the story of man's outreach after hidden knowledge of unconquerable longings, and woman's suffering as the inevitable and universal penalty of innocence and inability to battle against the wiles of seduction and the persuasions of passion. It is man, the type of thought in man, the demon of suggestion and opportunity, and the victim on the altar of natural affection and self-sacrifice.

"Gounod's music is worthy of the theme—simplicity and the colourlessness of perfect innocence mere harmony. The boy Siebel's youthful trust in woman's purity; the devilish sneer and hatred—all good out of absolute malice and preference of evil; the deep agony of despair, the perfect faith of love, and the returning confidence in Heaven's mercy and forgiveness, are all portrayed, and speak to the soul in this many-hued and profoundly sympathetic work. True music appeals to the heart of such as have grace to feel its tender breathings or its thunder tones."

MUSIC IN BRUSSELS.

(From a Philocomphonic Correspondent.)

BRUSSELS, 25th April.

In my last I only gave a very poor account of Lohengrin which obtained and enjoys an increasing success here.

Very few can, or will, appreciate Wagner's Music. Those who do, find it sublime, and refuse to admit the talents and genius of Meyerbeer, Rossini, and even Mozart and Beethoven, for them Wagner is the King of Composers and the God of Genius, and no one can approach this mysterious being.

The anti-Wagnerian thinks the opposite of all this; for him all that bears the name of Wagner must be bad, and he gives his opinion often without having heard what he condemns; and those who admire, and those who dislike Wagner's Music have often no better motives to give than that it is their opinion—very poor reasons to authorize criticisms.

I therefore refrained from giving a hasty judgement. For my own part I cannot admit that Wagner possess the stamp genius of Meyerbeer or Rossini neither can I deny that he possesses very great talents.

Melody he knows nothing about; but on the other hand he abuses recitative! except in some parts of the rôle of Elsa which are very beautiful, as also the final chorus of the 1st act and the nuptial march—the rest is too artificial; he has great conception but little genius, and he cannot give interesting parts to artists, as he is far from judging scenic effects.

I consider therefore that Wagner ought never to have written for the stage; and if he had confined himself to orchestral music no one would have dared to criticise him for it is there where lies his talent; it is there where he gives proof of musical knowledge.

When you hear any of his orchestral works, listen to the fulness of sound hitherto unknown, the continued action of each instrument—the admirable work which stamps Wagner as the greatest musician of the age (!!)

Lohengrin will be given this evening for the 16th time, and Mdlle. Sternberg, whom I have mentioned in my former article, is still the same indefatigable artiste who is revealed to us in the full eclat of her talent.

It is said that M. Perrin intends to bring out Lohengrin in Paris; and in that case to engage Mdlle. Sternberg for the part of Elsa.

Mignon was given with unanimous succès for Mdlle. Nordet, who was charming in this part, which she plays with much feeling and simplicity—her voice is sweet and very sympathic, and to see her in this part is a picture for painters to envy.

As to M. Blum, our tenor, I can only say, he plays more with his legs than with his arms or his voice.

The next week will take place the first representation of The Florentin, an unpublished comic opera by Pilchot of Paris, of which a favourable opinion is predicted let us hope that it is well formed. H. S.

NEW MUSIC.

Bella qual rosea Aurora. Melodia. Composta da GIOVANNI MARAVIGLIA. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THE melody of this song runs on with tune. Italian freedom and grace, qualities which are well supplemented by unaffectedness, and an absence of all effort to create sensation by meretricious means. The structure of the accompaniment is simple, and, in its way, as good as that of the melody. To all who want an italian aria at once pleasing and easy, this may be confidently recommended.

The Weaver. Ballad. Written by EMILY JUDSON. Composed by KATE LUCY WARD. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

WHILE keeping strictly to the simplicity and unpretendingness of the ballad, the composer here displays considerable feeling and taste. Miss Ward's music presents no salient points on which to hang remarks, nor should it do so; but aptly expresses the ideas of the verses, which is exactly the province of ballad tunes. Miss Judson's words flow smoothly.

Blythe as a Bird. Song. Written by the KNIGHT OF MORAR. Music by HANNAH R. BINFIELD. [Reading: Binfield.]

A SEMI-RELIGIOUS song well adopted for a contralto voice, and written with considerable success. The composer has managed to be sentimental without being mawkish; and to achieve pathos without a twaddle. Few songs by lady writers have given us equal satisfaction of late.

Lay me beneath the grass. Song. Words by E. D. CROSS. Music by Mrs. J. HOLMAN ANDREWS. [London: Bossey & Co.]

THE title of this song indicates something very pathetic if not monrnful, and indicates truthfully. Some may object that the composer has written monotonously as regards melody and rhythm, but we opine that this effect has been well studied and thoughtfully worked out. The monotony resembles that of a funeral bell, and the impression made is as mournful as the shadow of a funeral cortege. Through it, however, there runs a tinge of sweetness, like the band of white round a coffin pall. The song is adapted for a contralto voice.

Casta Diva, and morch from "Norma." Transcribed for the Piano by JOHANNES WINKELHAUS. [London: Duff & Stewart.]

WE have here a transcription eminently playable and thoroughly well done. Due regard is paid to the original theme, in the sense of abstaining from putting it to torture, and brilliant effect is secured by passages which lie so well under the hand as to present the minimum of difficulty. The transcription may be safely recommended even to moderate executants.

God save the Queen. Transcribed for the piano by JOHANNES WINKELHAUS. [London: Duff & Stewart.]

FAR more elaborate than the preceding work is adapted to performers more advanced, by whom it will be welcomed as an excellent thing of its kind.

Digitized by Google

THE VOICE & SINGING

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.

And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

HAS maintained its high character for a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani Labloche, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

Just Published, price 3s., illustrated,

HISTORY OF THE PIANOFORTE, by EDGAR BAUMBACH. "A serviceable and pleasant History of the Pianoforte, with an account of ancient music and musical instruments . . . It traces especially the use and development of stringed instruments from the times of old Egypt and Assyria to our own, and is furnished with well executed and judicious illustrations."—Daily Telegraph. "The subject is well handled in a popular form."—The Graphic. "The chapters on tuning and repairs are likely to be of great use to our country cousins."—Fun.

CASSELL, PETTER, & GALPIN, London & New York.

Shortly will be Published,

A HANDBOOK TO BEETHOVEN'S NINE SYMPHONIES, for AMATEURS. By GEORGE GROVE, Secretary to the Crystal Palace Company.

MACMILLAN & Co., London.

MOZART'S "L'OCA DEL CAIRO."

The Favourite Airs arranged by

W. HUTCHINS CALLCOTT.

SOLOS, 3s.; DUETS, 6s.

Also all the Favourite Songs, &c., with Italian Words (Copyright).

LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street, and CRAMER & Co., 201, Regent Street.

BY SPECIAL DESIRE.—PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. Conductor, Mr. W. G. CUSINS. MONDAY, May 9, Eight o'clock, ST. JAMES'S HALL. Symphonies in D (Haydn), and Pastorale (Beethoven); Overtures, Oberon (Weber), Siege of Corinth (Rossini); Concerto in A minor, Pianoforte, Mdme. Arabella Goddard (Schumann). Vocalists, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska. Stalls, 10s. 6d. Tickets, 7s., 5s. and 3s. 6d. Lamborn Cock and Co., No. 63, New Bond Street; Austin's Ticket Office; Chappell's; Mitchell's; R. Ollivier's; Keith, Prowse's; and A. Hay's.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."

SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.

Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,

By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s.	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3	0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations) ...	ITALIAN WORDS ...	4	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	4	0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad)	FLORENCE PERCY ...	4	0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	And the Answer to it. WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	4	0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Just Published,

6 PIECES FOR PIANO,

BY

JOHANNES WINKELHAUS.

The Publishers feel great pleasure in submitting Herr WINKELHAUS'S SIX NEW Pieces to the notice of the Professor and Amateur. To the Professor they will prove a great relief from the monotonous arrangements which have for so long a time taken the place of a better style of music. To the Amateur they will be acceptable as the means of displaying a considerable amount of execution without the labour required for pieces of a difficult character.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN"

(VICTORIA REGINA).

Is brilliantly and gracefully arranged, without being trying to a moderately advanced performer, the air is never lost sight of, and the piece is evidently by a composer of taste and experience.

"CASCADE DE PERLES."

A very elegant melody set off by passages which, while full of refinement and beauty, are completely under the hand, and consequently adapted to the means of players who combine taste with good execution.

"APOLLO AND THE NYMPHS."

Recommends itself to our notice for its characteristic simplicity and beauty. It cannot fail to please.

"CASTA DIVA AND MARCH."

(NORMA.)

These delightful subjects have never received better treatment than at the hands of Herr Winkelhaus.

"I PURITANI."

In this transcription, as in the one from Norma, Herr Winkelhaus gives us another proof of his facility in writing passages which are brilliant and effective, without being difficult.

"HAS SORROW THY YOUNG DAYS SHADED."

One of the loveliest of Irish melodies, arranged with consummate skill.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS EACH.

LONDON:

DUFF & STEWART,

147, OXFORD STREET,

(OPPOSITE BOND STREET.)

Digitized by Google

CHAPPELL'S
Organ Journal

CONSISTING OF

FAVOURITE MOVEMENTS SELECTED FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS,

ARRANGED FOR

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY THE

MOST EMINENT ORGANISTS.

		COMPOSER.	ARRANGER.
No. 1.	SANCTUS from "Mass"	Rossini	Dr. Spark.
2.	DOMINE DEUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
3.	GRATIAS AGIMUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
4.	CRUCIFIXUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
5.	ADAGIO NON TROPPO	Mendelssohn	G. Cooper.
6.	ANDANTE from String Quartett	Mozart	Geo. R. Griffiths.

(To be continued.)

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS EACH.

THE

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO:

A SELECTION OF

Opening and Concluding Voluntaries

BY THE

MOST CELEBRATED COMPOSERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

ADAPTED CHIEFLY FOR THE USE OF AMATEURS BY

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Each Number contains from 7 to 12 favourite Voluntaries, including one arranged expressly with Pedal Obbligato.

Nos. 1 to 24 are now ready, price 3s. each; or in four Volumes, each containing Six Numbers, and bound in Cloth, price 12s. each.

A THEMATIC LIST OF CONTENTS

MAY BE HAD ON APPLICATION TO

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	SOLO.	DUET.
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Margellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Le Mid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Beanuis). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèrn (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valser). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Margellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosaje (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cologni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s. d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various kinds	7 6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	5 0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	2 6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonized in various ways, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard. ...	5 0
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7 6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 4s. each, or one vol., boards, 12s. This book, containing 53 Compositions, includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 50 of his best Pieces. ...	6 6
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 35. Six Books in one vol.	6 0
J. T. STONES ORGAN-BOOK, an arrangement of 16 Classical Compositions	6 0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

46. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3—Op. 12, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
48. SONATAS, Op. 22—Op. 26—Op. 27, Nos. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
49. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastorale), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
50. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53—Op. 54 (Aparassionata), and Op. 57.
51. SONATAS, Op. 78—Op. 79 (Characteristique)—Op. 81—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
52. SONATAS, Op. 106—Op. 109—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Fantasia and Sonata), 2, 3.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Complete in one volume, 5s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complete in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42.) No. 2 (Op. 53.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 120.) No. 4 (Op. 122.) No. 5 (Op. 143.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 147.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, Nos. 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS FOR PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 48 to 80 pages, including Overtures.

FIDELIO	GRAND DUCHESS
ROBERT LE DIABLE	FIDELIO
DON JUAN	BARBIERE DI SIVIOLIA
LUCREZIA BORGIA	SONNAMBULA
DER FREISCHUTZ	BALLO IN MASCHERA
CRISPINO E LA COMARE	TRAVIATA
TROYATORE	MARTHA
NORMA	WILLIAM TELL
DON PASQUALE	CROWN DIAMONDS
FRA DIAVOLO	MASANIELLO
RIGOLETTO	DOMINO NOIR
ZAMFA

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 4s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.

138. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and "Oh voilez vous aller?"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY.
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VOLKSLIEDER for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring." "Schlusien Lied." "True Love," &c.
140. STEPHEN HELLER'S 24 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s.; post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

98. SANTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original compositions, published in no other collection.
97. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BAYLY, BARKER, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYDEN BAYLEY, ALEXANDER LEE, &c.
93. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep." "My Pretty Page." "As it fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Lesson Duet," &c.
76. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
44. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
43. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
92. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET.

Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.

1. TWENTY-FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CREATION, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S FIFTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND HESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS.
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, KUHE, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM,

SHILLING BOOKS OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.

115. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
100. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
120. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LAST ROSE, and LILLIE DALE.
117. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete.
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
72. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
99. FRANZ SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS, and SIX MOMENS MUSICAUX. All complete.
127. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Puritani," "Somnambula," &c.
96. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Musical Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
85. STEPHEN HELLER'S PHANTASIES IN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
90. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
84. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS.
79. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Peries et Dianeaux," "Il Corricolo," &c.
33, 34, 35. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.	WALPURGIS NIGHT.
HAYDN'S IMPERIAL MASS.	BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C.
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.	ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.	MOZART'S REQUIEM
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.	DETTINGEN TE DEUM.
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.	ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE MESSIAH.	THE CREATION.

BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees ... ... s. d. 2 0

BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 60 Glees	...	...	2 6
THE GLORIANA, 26 Part-songs. In 2 vols, each	...	...	1 0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	...	...	1 0

The above Works, for Societies in penny numbers.

THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs	...	6 0
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 36 Part-songs for village and school use		6 0

LONDON: BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Digitized by Google

Now Ready,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."
—Musical World, April 23.

LONDON

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Great success at the Lyceum Theatre of

HERVÉ'S

OPÉRA BOUFFE,

"LE PETIT FAUST"

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

	s.	d.
The Opera complete for pianoforte solo	7	0
The Overture-Valse. Arranged by Hervé	6	0
Do. do. (easy arrangement). By H. Valiquet ...	5	0
Polka-Entr'acte. Par Philippe Stutz...	4	6
Deux Petites Fantaisies. By J. L. Battmann ... ... each	5	0
Le Petit Faust, pot-pourri sur les motifs favoris. By F. Brissler ...	7	6
Le Petit Faust, Souvenirs par D. Croisez	5	0
"Les Quatre Saisons." Idylle. Transcription variée. Par C. Hoffmann	5	0
"Les Trois Chœurs." Polka du jardin. Par A. Mey	4	6
"Méphisto." Polka-Mazurka. Par E. Etling	4	6

SIX EASY PIECES.

					s.	d.
No. 1.	Couplets du Guerrier Valentin.	Par V. Wachs	...	...	2	6
2.	Tyrolienne de Marguerite	... ,,	...	...	2	6
3.	Couplets du jardin	... ,,	...	...	2	6
4.	Rondo-valse de Méphisto	... ,,	...	...	2	0
5.	Polka des Trois Chœurs	... ,,	...	...	2	0
6.	Chanson du Satrape	... ,,	...	...	2	6

DANCE MUSIC.

					s.	d.
Le Petit Faust Quadrille.	By Strauss	...	...	...	4	6
Do.	do. Piano Duet	...	...	...	4	6
Do.	Deuxième Quadrille. By Arban	...	...	...	4	6
Do.	Quadrille. Facile. Par H. Valiquet...		...	...	4	6
Le Petit Faust Valses.	Par Olivier Metra ...	...	...	...	6	0

PIANO AND VIOLIN.

							s.	d.
Idylle des Quatre Saisons. Méditation pour Violon et Piano. Par Bernardin	...	...	...	...	...	...	5	0

EDITIONS DE HEUGEL & CIE., PARIS.

LONDON :

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.,

244, REGENT STREET, W.,

Where may be obtained

LE PETIT FAUST,

COMPLETE FOR VOICE AND PIANO (With French Words),

PRICE 12s.

And all the separate Songs, Duets, &c. from same Opera (with French Words).

Printed by HENDERSON, RAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, May 7, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL; NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 20. SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1870. Price { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—FIRST GRAND SUMMER CONCERT and FASHIONABLE AFTERNOON PROMENADE THIS DAY.—Madame Monbelli, Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Rebeux, Mdlle. Louise Carl, Signori Bettini, Ragnet, and Zoboli, and Mr. Santley. Solo violin, Monsieur Lotto. Full chorus of the Italian Opera, Drury Lane. Conductor—Signor Arditi. Concert at Three.

Admission 1s. Guinea Season Tickets free. Serial Stalls for the Eight Concerts, One Guinea; and Single Stalls 2s. 6d.; at the Palace, and 9, Exeter Hall.

"A more agreeable manner of spending an afternoon can hardly be imagined than is now provided every Saturday."—See Critique.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

Second appearance of

MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON.

This Evening (SATURDAY), May 14, will be performed Meyerbeer's Opera, "ROBERT IL DIAVOLO." Roberto, Signor Mongini; Rambaldo, Signor Gardoni; Bertrano, Signor Foli; Un Prete, Signor Gassier; Alberti, Signor Ragnet; Un Araldo, Signor Rinaldini; Cavalieri, Signor Archiati, Signor Castelli, Signor Zoboli, Signor Trevers; Elena, Mdlle. Fiorini (her first appearance in London); Isabella, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; and Alice, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her second appearance this season, and her first appearance in the part of Alice in England. Conductor, Signor Arditi.

On MONDAY NEXT, May 16, Flotow's Opera, "MARTHA." Lionello, Signor Bettini; Lord Tristano, Signor Rinaldini; Plunkett, Mr. Santley; Un Sheriffo, Mr. Lyall; Un Servitore, Signor Archiati; Nancy, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Martha, Madame Volpi (her first appearance).

TUESDAY, May 17, "ROBERT IL DIAVOLO" will be repeated.

Acting Manager .. .. MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

SATURDAY, May 14, Donizetti's Opera, "LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO." Maria, Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi (her fourth appearance in that character). After which the two principal Acts of Auber's popular Opera, "MASANIELLO."

EXTRA NIGHT—On MONDAY NEXT, May 16, Gounod's Opera, "FAUST E MARGHERITA." Madame Pauline Lucca.

On TUESDAY NEXT, May 17 (first time this season), Flotow's Opera, "MARTHA," Lady Enrichetta, Madame Adelina Patti.

EXTRA NIGHT — On THURSDAY NEXT, May 19 (first time this season), Ambroise Thomas's Opera, "HAMLET." Ophelia, Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi (her first appearance in that character); Hamlet, Signor Graziani (his first appearance in that character); the King, Signor Ragnetti; and the Queen, Mdlle. Tietjens (who has kindly consented to sing the part).

EXTRA NIGHT—On SATURDAY NEXT, May 20, Rossini's Opera, "IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA." Rosina, Madame Adelina Patti; and Almaviva, Signor Mario.

On SATURDAY, May 21 (first time these two years), Meyerbeer's Grand Opera, "L'AFRICAINE." Selika, Madame Pauline Lucca.

The Opera commences at half-past eight.

The Box Office under the portico of the theatre is open from Ten to Five.

Pit Tickets, 7s.; Amphitheatre Stalls, 10s. 6d. and 5s.; Amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

ST. JAMES'S HALL,

REGENT STREET.

MR. AUSTIN has the honour to announce that his ANNUAL EVENING CONCERT will take place on FRIDAY, May 27th, 1870. To commence at Eight o'clock. Artists—Mdlle. Tietjens and Mdlle. Sessi; Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Fennell, and Madame Sainton-Dolby; Signor Graziani and Mr. Sims Reeves (his First Appearance at an Evening Concert on his return from Italy). Clarionet—Mr. Lazarus. Pianoforte, Miss Kate Roberts. The St. Cecilia Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Hargitt. Conductor—Mr. BENEDICT. Both Halls, 10s. 6d.; Family Ticket (to admit Five) £2 2s.; Area Stalls, 5s.; Balcony Stalls, 3s.; Balcony, 2s.; Area, 2s.; Admission, One Shilling. Tickets to be had of Mr. Austin, St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, and of all Musicsellers.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—"CREATION."—Mr. SANTLEY, FRIDAY Week, 20th May.

THE "CREATION," ST. JAMES'S HALL, FRIDAY, May 20th, NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY. Conductor—Mr. G. W. MARTIN. Vocalists—Madame Bodda Pyne (her Last Appearance in this Oratorio), Miss Arabella Smyth, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. Santley. Organist—Mr. J. G. Boardman. Tickets, 10s. 6d., 5s., 3s., 2s., 1s., at Nos. 14 and 15, Exeter Hall; the principal Musicsellers; and Austin's Ticket Office. Mr. Martin's Shilling Edition of the "Creation" (the complete work), post free, 14 stamps.—14 and 15, Exeter Hall.

GLASGOW CITY HALL.—SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.—Conducted by the Directors of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union. Mr. James Airlie, Secretary; Mr. H. A. Lamberti, Organist; Mr. Emile Berger, Solo Pianist and Conductor. The Seventeenth Season commences next September, and will extend over the succeeding Eight Months, to make arrangements for which Mr. Airlie will visit London on Thursday, 19th inst., for a fortnight, and may be communicated with at Angus's House, 23, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars.

JAMES AIRLIE, Secretary.

MR. RIDLEY PRENTICE'S MORNING CONCERT will take place at St. George's Hall, on WEDNESDAY, May 18th, commencing at Three o'clock. Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Armytage; Messrs. Lazarus, Barret, C. Harper, Hutchins, Standidge, and Ridley Prentice. Tickets, 5s., 3s., and 1s.; at 9, Argyll Park Gardens, Brixton; and at the Hall, &c.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD begs to announce that she will give a MORNING CONCERT at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square, on SATURDAY, May 28th, to commence at Three o'clock, on which occasion she will be assisted by the following eminent vocalists:—Madame Monbelli, Miss Elizabeth Philp, Signor Foli, and Signor Gardoni. Instrumentalists—Madame Alice Mangold and Herr Van Biene. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea and Five Shillings, to be had of Mdme. Mangold, 34, Leighton Grove, N.W., and at the Rooms.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—MR. HENRY LESLIE'S SECOND GRAND CONCERT, WEDNESDAY Morning, May 25th, HANDEL'S "MESSIAH." Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir. Pianoforte, Signor Mr. John C. Ward. Conductor—Mr. HENRY LESLIE. Sofa Stalls, 21s.; Area Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony Stalls, 10s. and 5s. 6d.; Area, 5s.; Gallery, 2s. 6d. Commence at Half-past Two. Tickets at Cramer & Co.'s, 201, Regent Street, and 43, Moorgate Street; all Music publishers; and Austin's Office, 28, Piccadilly.

MR. SIMS REEVES. The First Appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves, after his return from Italy, will take place at Mr. Henry Leslie's Grand Concert, on Wednesday, May 25th, at St. James's Hall. HANDEL'S Oratorio, "THE MESSIAH."

MR. IGNACE GIBSONE has the honour to announce that he will give THREE PIANOFORTE RECITALS at St. George's Hall, May 26th, June 8th, and 22nd. Tickets and full particulars to be obtained of Messrs. Addison & Parry, Hanover Square; and Hutchings & Romer, 9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

MDLLE. BONDY begs to announce that her ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT will take place on SATURDAY, May 21st, at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS. Commence at Three o'clock. Vocalists—Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. W. H. Cummings. Instrumentalists—Violin, Herr Joachim; Violoncello, Mons. Paque; Pianoforte, Mdlle. Bondy. Conductor—Mr. W. GANZ. Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Seats, 5s. Tickets at Miss Bondy's, 17, South Molton Street, Hanover Square, and at the Rooms.

MISS EMMA BUSBY'S MORNING CONCERT, HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, TUESDAY, May 17th, at Three o'clock. Mdme. Florence Lancia, Mdlle. Angelina Salvi, Mr. Carrodus, Signor Pezze, Miss Emma Busby. Conductors—Mr. Daubert and Mr. J. Gallicott. Tickets, at the Music-rooms, the Rooms, and of Miss E. Busby, 33, Harley Place, W.

MDLLE. CLARA DORIA will sing at Miss Amy Perry's Concert, To Day, at Three, at Hanover Square Rooms, the scena, "CARA COMPANIA," and GARVILLE'S favourite ballad, "AWAY FROM DEAR ERIN," and with Mdlle. Rosamonde Doria, FRANCESCO BERGER'S new duet, "LOVE AND PEACE," accompanied by the composer. The Students of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell's Academy will appear for the first time in London after their successful tour in the Provinces under the direction of Mr. Cottell.

Digitized by Google

MISS JULIA SEARLE will sing WELLINGTON GUERNEY'S waltz aria, "THE NAIADES," at the Walworth Institution, on the 23rd of May.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP" at Mr. Alfred Hayle's First Matinée, 26th May.

MR. J. H. SUTCLIFFE will sing on the 17th inst. at the Bradford Mechanics' Institute, WELLINGTON GUERNEY'S serenade, "WAKE, LINDA, WAKE," and the principal bass in one of Professor Sterndale Bennett's cantatas, "THE MAY QUEEN."

THE LONDON GLEE and MADRIGAL UNION (Established 1858). Miss J. Wells, Miss Eyles, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Coates, Mr. Lawler, and Mr. Land (Director), will commence their TWELFTH ANNUAL SERIES of THURSDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS, at ST. JAMES'S HALL, on the 19th May, at Three. Solo pianist—Mr. Sydney Smith. Subscription, Stall for Series of Five Concerts (transferable), One Guinea; at Mr. Austin's Office, St. James's Hall, Piccadilly; and at Mr. Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street. Tickets, 5s., 3s., 2s.

MDME. MONTSERRAT has the honour to announce to her Friends and Pupils that she has REMOVED to 10, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W., where she requests all communications may be addressed.

SIGNOR GUSTAVE GARCIA begs to announce his arrival in Town for the Season. Address, 9, Mortimer Road, Greville Road, St. John's Wood.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing DUGGAN'S great baritone song, "SAMSON," at his principal Engagements—St. George's Hall, 18th; Penge, 19th; City, 20th; Hanover Square, 25th; St. George's Hall, June 8th. Address, 38, Old Bond Street.

MERCHANT TAILORS' HALL, CITY.

MR. GEORGE PERREN will (by desire) sing ASCHER'S romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" at the Festival given on the 25th inst. in the new Hall. Mr. Lawler, Musical Director.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD will play "MADAME OURY'S WALTZ," composed by CHOPIN, at her Recital of Pianoforte Music.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD (Soprano) has arrived in London and is open to Engagements for Operas, Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square (where Haydn made his first bow to an English audience).—Ladies and Gentlemen intending to engage these unique Rooms for Concerts, &c., are respectfully invited to make early application, in order to secure the best days. For terms, apply to Mr. Hall, at the Rooms.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

MR. EDWARD MURRAY (Baritone), now engaged with the Drury Lane Italian Opera Company, respectfully requests that all communications may be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co. 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. EMILE BERGER.

MR. EMILE BERGER will return to London for the season on the 23rd May. All letters to be addressed to him, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., Foreign Music Warehouse, 244, Regent Street, W.

HERR CARL FORMES is now in Town for the season and can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios and Operatic Performances. Address—care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S CONCERTS:—Miss Amy Perry's, Hanover Square Rooms, THIS DAY, May 14th; Store Street, June 4th, July 16th; Hanover Square, June 25th. Communications addressed Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

MR. CHARLES STANTON (Tenor) may be engaged for Concerts, Operettas, and Oratorios. Address, 10, Duke Street, Portland Place, W.

MISS JULIA ELTON will sing KATE WARD'S admired song, "THE WEAVER," on May 26th, at Windsor; and May 30th, at Mr. Labee's Concert, Hanover Square Rooms.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

Just Published,

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

N.B. "REVIVALS" will consist of Pieces hitherto only existing in Manuscript, or which have been long out of Print. Selected from the Works of Eminent Masters.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for Instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

NEW SONG BY CIRO PINSUTI.

"I HEARD A VOICE." The words by LOUISA GRAY. Mr. Cummings will sing this song at Madame Pursi's Concert, May 26th. London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

MOZART'S "L'OCA DEL CAIRO."

The Favourite Airs arranged by

W. HUTCHINS CALLCOTT.

SOLOS, 4s.; DUETS, 6s.

Also all the Favourite Songs, &c., with Italian Words (Copyright).

LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street, and CRAMER & Co., 201, Regent Street.

Shortly will be Published,

A HANDBOOK TO BEETHOVEN'S NINE SYMPHONIES, for AMATEURS. By GEORGE GROVE, Secretary to the Crystal Palace Company.

MACMILLAN & Co., London.

"LITTLE WILLIE," by JULES BENEDICT. This charming new song (by the popular composer of "Rock me to Sleep") is now being sung with distinguished success by Miss EMMA WYBRA. Price 3s., and may be obtained for 18 stamps from the publisher, DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ADDRESS," sung by Miss ANTON, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

Published This Day,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"A SUMMER SONG,"

NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

By HENRY WALTON.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

MUSICAL LETTERS.*

By Dr. F. Hiller.

New Series. III.

Some time since, Richard, the Wagnerite, hurled, from his high and holy see in Switzerland, an anathema against the Jews; in his latest bull it is the higher and lower musical clergy who, for their boundless depravity, are laid under interdict. There are, it is true, plenty of heretics among them who do not believe in the infallibility which their great prosecutor claimed for himself immediately he had left the Gymnasium. The schism which, in consequence, has been in course of development for a period of years, will not, however, be productive of any serious dangers either to Church or State.

The ball in question, Ueber das Dirigiren (On Conducting), affords any reader not concerned in the matter the diversion of a sort of Dante-like walk through hell—innumerable sinners suffer the most terrible of all punishments, such punishments, indeed, as even Dante himself never beheld: they are annihilated, struck out utterly from the book of the living. For who could ever live and work on, if Wagner had once pronounced his condemnation?

Joking apart. Wagner has published another pamphlet, bristling with examples of incorrectness and of injustice. Stupid young louts, on whom any one may impose, if he unites with a little cleverness a great deal of impertinence (p. 67) will regard it with amazement. More sensible people will say that it contains a certain amount of truth. But when a man runs everything down, he must, in this imperfect world of ours, be sometimes right. I know nothing so beautiful as to be without its weak points—not even woman—not even Wagnerian music is free from them.

The train of thought (?) in the pamphlet is somewhat as follows:—Conducting has hitherto been left "to be carried out by routine, and to be judged by ignorance." (No examples are adduced—we might mention Spontini, Weber, Spohr, or Mendelssohn.) The manner in which music is presented to the public is not, however, a matter of indifference, since, naturally, it is only by means of a good performance that the public can derive a correct impression of a musical work. (Very naturally!) According to Wagner, everything connected with this matter is in a very bad state in Germany, a result attributable "most of all to the prejudicial qualities of the conductors." The old German Capellmeister "properly so-called," were "sure, strict, and more especially gruff, but respected." These gentlemen were, however, as far as regards training of the orchestra "for complicated modern orchestral music, unfitted for their task, and did not do what they should have done towards properly re-enforcing the orchestra, especially in the quartet." But they had "a sufficient justification in the unworthy mode of instrumentation, followed by Italian operatic composers, whose works were more highly esteemed than those of any one else, even by the Intendants of the large theatres, in consequence of the creditable taste of their respective Courts." Succeeding conductors did not, however, do any better. How should they? They generally reached their "good posts" (?) by simply moving up, "by shoves," or, sometimes, by "the protection of some princess's waiting-woman, etc." They necessarily were "altogether destitute of merit in consequence of their unworthy servility towards their ignorant chief, and their lazy musicians, but this was the very thing by which they raised themselves into universal favour." In more recent times (Heaven only knows how many more recent and most recent times there are, according to Wagner) conductors, also, were "berufen."†

"These are our Music-Bankers of the present day, who have sprung from the school of Mendelssohn, or been recommended to the world by his patronage." Such individuals possess intelligence, good tone, and have, moreover, done something for the "elegant style of performance." "But the first thing in which these gentlemen are deficient, is that energy which can be given only by self-confidence reposing upon strength really their own. For, in this case unfortunately, everything: vocation, talent, education, nay, faith, love, and hope, is artificial." To these more modern conductors belong, strange to say, above all, Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn themselves, who did not do as much as they ought to have done in Berlin. "Why did their strength desert them? It would seem, because they really possessed no strength. Then how must matters stand with their shadowy imitators?"

Wagner declines to enter minutely, for the present, into what has been effected by conductors who busy themselves with opera, "because the latter—and they derive a mournful right to act as they do from the miserable manner in which this branch of art is cultivated in German theatres—is regarded as an obnoxious daily task to be performed with sighs." He takes his instances from the concert-room where he never experienced any save unsatisfactory impressions. It was "from the singing of Schrader-Devrient" that he "derived his best notions with regard to the tempo of Beethoven's music, and the style in which it ought to be played." Another sublime revelation was vouchsafed him by the performance of the Ninth Symphony in Paris. The tempo, in the fullest acceptation of the word, is for him "the foundation on which a good performance is based, but who recognizes the fact?" Wagner has, it appears, suffered the most mournful treatment as regards his own music, and the various instances of this are narrated in the most exhaustive manner. Thus, though the prelude to Die Meistersinger, when he himself conducted it, entranced a small number of friends at Leipsic, it was destined under Reinecke's conducting-stick, to be hissed at the Gewandhaus. The time of this piece, together with the overture to Der Freischütz, and a few observations upon the mode of performing the Symphonies of Beethoven, and even (mirabile dictu) of Mozart and Haydn, are the vehicle by which he explains his views on conducting, the said views consisting principally in the opinion that an Adagio must be sung with a deal of tone; that an Allegro must have fire infused in it; and that a tempo intended to be quiet must not be scampered through—and culminating in the assertion that the correct manner of performing modern works (Weber's overtures, for instance) "does not consist in a stubborn adherence to the time, but in doing justice to the separate parts, which frequently contrast with each other."

"Dragging," Wagner goes on to say, "is not the characteristic of the elegant conductor, but scampering through and hurrying a piece is." This again results from the influence of Mendelssohn.

> "Si Calm a tué son frère,
> C'est la faute de Voltaire."

Poor, poor Mendelssohn! Wagner is unable to stomach him, and we can easily understand why. But what can we say to the following? "Referring to conducting, he told me personally, on several occasions," Wagner states, "that too slow a tempo was worse than any other, and that he himself always recommended that the tempo should be taken a little too fast; that a really good performance, however, was always something unusual; but that the conductor could deceive his audience by only taking care that not much of the performance was heard, and this was best effected by not remaining long over it, but getting quickly through it." Any person who had only a superficial acquaintance with Mendelssohn, can imagine the way in which he advanced jokes of this sort. We can imagine, also, his look, when Wagner, with his ceaseless flow of language, talked to him about the right tempo of one of Beethoven's menuets; and when Wagner "seemed as though he was looking into a perfect abyss of superficiality, on a complete void" he perceived only the mere shadow of the impression which the composer of Rienzi must have produced on the composer of the Midsummer Night's Dream. I myself, unfortunately, had but few opportunities of becoming acquainted with Mendelssohn as a conductor. But the supremely conscientious artistic carefulness which was inherent in him, and which grew to be a sort of religion, is apparent in the smallest of his songs. If, now and then, he took the tempo quicker than others would have considered appropriate, his fiery temperament probably caused him to do so. Certain pianoforte pieces, one of his own, he played at a demoniacally rapid rate, but correctly and beautifully notwithstanding—and so, most assuredly, he expected from his orchestra only what it could completely master, and what he himself felt was true and right.

It is not to be denied that, in certain particulars, relating more especially to the mode of performing Beethoven's Symphonies, Wagner is correct in his assertions, but he is mistaken in believing that we must have recourse to the oracle at Lucerne, to learn these things. The bombastic fustian, in which he frequently envelopes the simplest observations, is inappreciable, while his self-glorification frequently becomes downright ridiculous. "Perhaps I am the only conductor," he exclaims, "who has ventured on reading the adagio, properly so called, of the third movement in the Ninth Symphony with due regard to its pure character as well as other things." Perhaps others, my respected Herr Wagner, venture to do the same thing, and perhaps they succeed in the attempt.

* From the Koinische Zeitung.

† Berufen signifies "invited, summoned;" also, "having a call, a vocation." In which sense Herr Wagner employs the word, I leave the reader to decide. The effort of doing so will afford him much amusement, if he is fond of riddles.—Translator.

Digitized by Google

Despite all the "ignorance and insipidity of the musicians into whose hands the destiny of musical matters in Germany, and the utter indifference of German art-officials have allowed the conduct of high German musical interests to lapse, and who now feel secure in their places and dignity," there are some "really beaming as martyrs of pure classical music." These Wagner proceeds to subject to a somewhat strict investigation. In the case of some he finds "squint-eyed envy united with helplessness;" in that of others, "honest, intellectual narrowness, becoming dishonest from anger only." In the modern camp there is "a great deal to be commanded, and a great deal that should not be observed." We find in it "Gebildetheit," but no "education," and consequently a want of "true intellectual freedom," which held even Mendelssohn "for the earnest contemplator, beyond the pale of what belongs to our German art." (!!) "These elegant musical leaders interdict themselves from giving the reins to their 'Gebildetheit,' because they know it could lead as far as Offenbachian scandal," and a deal more nonsense of the same kind."

(To be continued.)

FROM SEVILLE.

No. VI.

One of the oddest amusements in this odd city is the ball of national dances, given about once a week, in a singularly bare, ugly room, which is, however, the only public ball-room in Seville. The patrons of the diversion do not themselves dance, but go to witness the performance of professional artists. Having paid your price of admission, which amounts to one duro, you take one of the chairs, with which the room is skirted, and some of which are occupied by the dancers, who are not separated from their patrons. But these dancers are to be divided into two classes, entirely different in race and manners from each other. The first class consists of the Spanish artists, who are attired in the fancy costumes so frequently seen on the English stage, and whose performance is altogether of the idealized theatrical kind. Three ladies and one gentleman compose an average troupe, the ladies willingly receiving the homage of any spark of the town who may take his seat beside them and enjoy the pleasure of their conversation during the intervals between the dances. But I am told that these polite attentions should not be carried too far, inasmuch as a very strong flirtation might possibly be resented by some serious admirer, who would express his feelings with a knife. The freedom of manners prevalent among the Spanish dances, distinctively so called, does not extend to the gipsies, who form the other class of artists, and sit in a row on the opposite side of the room. With these not only is flirtation prohibited, but a visitor taking his seat among them is considered guilty of a serious offence, and his removal is immediately ordered by the master of the ceremonies. The appearance of the two classes is, moreover, as diverse as possible. While the Spaniards, with their short petticoats, look like ballet-girls, as, indeed, they are, the gipsies, with their dress covering their ankles, look like very common servants-of-all-work in work-a-day attire. In fact, while their competitors are costumed for the occasion, the gipsies wear their ordinary clothes.

How slow ought we to be in leaping from premisses to conclusions! From what I have just stated, many of my readers will infer that the dances of the Spanish artists are somewhat free, while those of the gipsies are marked by a plebeian decorum. The reverse is the case. The Spaniard who shows her legs executes one of those innocent coquettish dances with which all Europe is familiar, and in which gallantries with the fan, cloak, and hat are conspicuous; while the gipsy, who scarcely shows the point of her shoe, indulges in a strange indecency of gesticulation, which renders her the favourite of the more lax spectator. Indeed, when there are any foreign ladies among the visitors she is warned by the master of the ceremonies to tone down her most characteristic movements. The gipsy performances are, I am told, the native dances of the Spanish peasantry, altogether unadorned; whereas those of the costumed belles are, as I have already said, theatrical. Another distinction:—the Spanish dances are accompanied by two wretched fiddles, played with the noblest disregard for tune; but the gipsies scorn instrumental accompaniments, and are kept to time by their seated comrades, who clap their hands and utter a discordant chant.

But the most alarming part of the ceremony belongs to Spaniards and gipsies alike. When the evening is somewhat advanced, a dancer, suddenly deviating from her normal course, sets violently to some selected gentleman, staring full in his face, and stamping furiously on the ground, leaving him in doubt, if he is a stranger, whether he is about to receive a chaste salute or to be torn to pieces. Perhaps she relieves his mind by bounding off to another person, whom she treats with similar distinction; but, at all events, she ends the ceremony by plucking a handkerchief from her bosom and flinging it into the lap of some one of the male spectators. The honoured gentleman is bound to retain the pledge of transient predilection till the dance is over and the dancer is seated. He must then cautiously walk up to the disinterested beauty and gravely return her handkerchief, having previously inclosed therein at least a duro, which procures him the favour of a smile. A smaller sum would be deemed offensive. Indeed, the obligatory donation is one of the young lady's chief sources of revenue, and as nearly all the dancers go through the ceremony in turn, the spectator who has calculated on an outlay of 5*f.* for his evening's not very brilliant entertainment must not deem himself too unlucky if he gets off at the cost of 15*f.* The observer of human nature may find worse opportunities for his favourite study than at these balls. A man of advanced gallantry shouts loudly to some black-eyed gipsy, or Andalusian, and, placing his hat on the ground, invites her to select him from the rest of the company. The more economical spectator in shy of the lady's advances, and retires to look away from her when he finds that he is likely to become the unwilling object of her choice. Perhaps the lovely being detects his disposition and picks him out in playful malice. In that case, with a suppressed sigh for the sacrifice of his duro, he affects to look pleased at the honour bestowed upon him. I have said that the gipsy dances at the ball verge on the improper; but there is no verging in the case of a can-can danced on the stage of a little theatre at Seville, appropriated to the sarsuela (opéra bouffe). Certain persons and things have no chance to lose, and among these an average Englishman would naturally place the notorious Parisian dance, lately made popular in England. But really the French can-can, as executed on the French stage, is a thoroughly chaste performance, a perfect minuet de la cour, compared to the form which it has assumed at the little Spanish theatre. I will not say that words would fail to describe it; but I can safely affirm that the words necessary for the description would require a deeper plunge into the idiom of our noble tongue than I care to take. In the genuine article there is something playful and piquant and the eccentricities of the Spanish gipsy are at least unsophisticated; but the Sevilian adaptation of the French can-can is a deliberate perpetration of unmitigated bestiality that could scarcely be matched in the civilized world. And yet it seems to give no offence. Tolerably respectable women and children are to be found among the audience of the sarsuela, and on the night when I was there the dance was not only rapturously encored, but one young gentleman was so highly delighted that, in the absence of a bouquet, he flung his hat to the principal danseuse.

Seville, April 25. N. D.

THE PAREPA-OPERA AT CHICAGO.

(From the "Chicago Tribune," April 23.)

Everything seems to draw in connection with the present opera season. Hitherto, although Hersee has been a universal favourite, it has been her bad fortune to play to small houses on the alternate nights, but last night the Operahouse was full again as usual. It was a handsome tribute to this pleasant little singer and piquant little actress. She, indeed, has a winning way which has at last succeeded in drawing a crowded house, even under the overshadowing wings of the great Parepa herself. The opera was Balfe's Rose of Castile now given for the first time by the Parepa troupe but familiarized to opera-goers through former visits of Kellogg-Strakosch-Hidings-Bernard. Indeed Messrs. Campbell and Castle were in their old rôles of Don Pedro, the conspirator, and Manuel the muleteer. Hersee, herself, had the rôle of Elvira, the Queen. It would be as idle to expect Hersee to put on queenly dignity and state as it would be to expect the same qualities of a canary bird, but for all that she was very charming. In the disguise of the peasant maid, however, she fulfilled all the dramatic requirements of her character, and was artless, naïve, and fresh. The music is well adapted to her quality and quantity of voice, and she gave it admirably in every number, and sometimes with deliciously fresh and clear displays of fioriture. The aria, "I am but a simple peasant maid," was her best effort, and the changes were made in it with such a charming musical and dramatical contrast, that, of the close it elicited very hearty applause. Mr. Campbell was rather stiff and heavy in Don Pedro, and did not seem to sing with his usual effect except in his ballad, "Though fortune darkly o'er me frowns," of which, like the "Heart bowed down," he makes a specialty. Castle lacked dash and spirit as Manuel, but sang very smoothly and was in excellent voice, which served him well in the "Muleteer's song." Mr. Seguin was the Don Florio, and if he could have sung as well as he acted it, would have made it the great success of the evening. As a piece of low comedy acting it was admirable; but as music it was wretched, while De Nalla's Don Sallust was dreary in both respects. Neither of these gentlemen, in their singing, tended to improve the ensembles, while the fact that the orchestra was at times very uncertain made the concerted effects still worse. As a whole the opera did not make a success of enthusiasm, which may be accounted for by the fact that it is at best only a series of ballads strung together with speaking parts, and that it came so soon after the magnificent music of Oberon. The season closes to-day with the Bohemian Girl, Campbell, Northbon, and Hersee in the cast; and Il Trovatore this evening with the cast of last season. The sale for the evening performance is already immense.

LEIPSIC.—Dinorah has been revived. Madame Peschka-Leutner was greatly applauded in the part of the heroine.

* Perhaps the German neologism "Gebildetheit" may be rendered by a somewhat similar barbarism: "Educatedness" in English—and perhaps it may not. I again leave the matter entirely in the hands of the riddle-loving reader.—Translator.

Digitized by Google

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The event, or what in the language of the Turf would be called the "double event," of last week came off on Saturday night, when Madame Adelina Patti made her first appearance this season, and Signor Mario returned to us after a year's absence. That the house was crowded to the roof will as easily be credited as that the audience was one of the most brilliant ever assembled within the walls of Covent Garden. The opera, too, was Rossini's comic masterpiece, the never-tiring Barbiere di Siviglia, in which the two distinguished artists have so often appeared together, and the characters they sustain in which are so well calculated to exhibit to advantage the qualities that have won them fame.

Count Almaviva, we need scarcely say, appears in the first scene of the opera, serenading Rosina at the near approach of dawn; and when the great popular favourite, wearing the traditional Spanish costume that still so admirably becomes him, was once again recognized, the entire house broke out into applause and cheers which were repeated again and again, till Signor Mario must have been tired of bowing. Remembering that for a quarter of a century and more this gentleman has held indisputably the first rank among dramatic tenors, and in the course of his long and honourable career has shown no less versatility than talent, excelling in every school, shining alike in serious opera, melodramatic opera, and opera buffa, becoming as he progressed one of the most consummate of actors as, almost from the first, he had been one of the most consummate of singers, this unusually hearty reception, after his brief absence, will be considered natural enough. That Signor Mario was in some degree moved by it seemed evident in the familiar but always graceful cavatina, "Ecco ridente il cielo," and its florid pendent, "Oh sorte!"—his execution of which was hesitating in the opening movement and feeble in the sequel. Perhaps the journey from Russia, not to speak of the winter and spring sojourn in Russia, may have had something to do with this. Let us hope so. All lovers of the genuine Italian opera must hope so; but let them not hope that the voice of their idol can, under any circumstances, be ever again what it has been, or they will hope in vain. The wonder is, at his time of life, after such long and arduous service, and especially after years of wear and tear in the terrible operas of Meyerbeer, most ruthless of voice-destroyers, that Signor Mario should have any available notes left at command. His middle tones still retain a great deal of their manly beauty; but the highest notes have betrayed him, and he is compelled to use subterfuge after subterfuge to master the phrases in which they are of consequence. Despite all this, in "recitativo-parlante," so essential to comic opera, and in the articulation of florid passages, "mezza voce," he still remains without a peer. Examples of the first were sown broadcast over the opera; of the last the most striking instance was in the quick movement of the duet with Figaro ("A che d'amore la fiamma lo sento"), his delivery of which was inimitable. Judged as a piece of acting, also, the entire part which Mario is still the Almaviva of Almavivas. Full of spirit, fun, and humour, from end to end, it is at the same time always gentlemanly and always natural. What we have yet a right to expect from him in his capacity as vocalist will be shown at the season advances; but as an accomplished and versatile actor we may always feel sure—a compensation in these days for many drawbacks.

How Madame Adelina Patti, the heroine of the evening, was welcomed may readily be imagined. That her first appearance is invariably a "gala night" at the Royal Italian Opera has been stated more than once; and Saturday was merely another instance in point. About her performance of Rosina it would be difficult to say anything that has not been said over and over again. What the audience counted upon might be gathered from the unanimous applause that acknowledged the appearance of Rosina at the balcony window of Dr. Bartolo's house. Never was a favourite artist of the public greeted with more hearty spontaneity; and rarely has a favourite artist more amply rewarded such a greeting than did Madame Patti in the scene immediately following, when the imprisoned ward of Dr. Bartolo, through the medium of the famous "Una voce poco fa," with its no less famous sequel, "Io sono docile," the model of brilliant "cabaletta," tells of her love for the supposed Lindoro, and of the manner in which she hopes to bring it to a successful issue. This was both sung and acted to the highest degree of perfection. The significance imparted to every significant word, the expression given not merely to every significant phrase, but to every significant accent, the "jioriture" (we have no English equivalent) with which both the superb bravura movement, forming the introduction, and its livelier sequel, wherein the ultimate plans of Rosina are set forth, were embellished, preserving the characteristic features of the melody while elaborating it in a manner that might have surprised, though it certainly would not have displeased, the composer himself—proverbially indifferent to such matters in so far as his own music was concerned—were, one and all, calculated to win the admiration of connoisseurs and raise the enthusiasm of the audience. Add to this, apart from the mere vocal execution, the thoroughly dramatic reading of this, in its way, incomparable vocal soliloquy invested it with twofold interest. It has been truly said of Madame Patti, that her delivery of this soliloquy is singing and speaking blended, in such wise as to make the hearer believe that music is her natural language, and that what she has to say would naturally best be understood if she were only to sing it. But it is hardly necessary to speak further about a performance so universally known to opera-goers. The duet with the "professore," "Dunque io son," in which the apparently ingenuous Rosina shows herself quite a match for the worldly factotum in the science of intrigue, was not less admirable in its way than the cavatina; and the remainder of the opera was to match. In the lesson-scene Madame Patti introduced the cavatina from Linda di Chamouni, "Il sace di quest' anima"—perhaps not a greater anachronism than the bolero from Les Vêpres Siciliennes of former years; and being encored, she gave, as a matter of course, the English ballad, "Home, sweet home," in English as pure as her Italian, and moreover, in a manner so unaffected and touching that, to judge by their applause, the audience would have willingly heard that again also. In short, Madame Patti's first performance this season was what it has been for many seasons past—a triumphant success.

Of the Dr. Bartolo of Signor Ciampi and the Figaro of Signor Cotogni we have nothing new to say. The former is sui generis, unique; the latter exhibits more bustle and animation than humour—though, at the same time, he is unquestionably clever. Signor Tagliafico is now the best Don Basilio on the stage; and Mdlle. Bauermeister gives Bertha's quaint song, "Il vecchietto cerca moglie," with unaccustomed point and spirit. Although Signor Vianesi conducted in the orchestra, we have heard the overture much better played. The rest was unimpeachable.

The other operas during last week were the Figlia del Reggimento, followed by the second and third acts of Masaniello (on Monday); Medea (Tuesday); and Don Pasquale, with Mdlle. Sessi as Norina (Thursday). About the Norina of Mdlle. Sessi, which we found hardly equal to her previous assumptions, something may be said on a future occasion. The Ernesto of Signor Naudin, the Don Pasquale of Signor Ciampi, and the Malatesta of Signor Cotogni require no further description. A Mario, a Labiache, and a Tamburini are not now to be had for the asking; and we must take what we can get—cum grano salis. But we cannot approve the mutilation of a great opera like Masaniello, however beautifully it is put upon the stage, as unquestionably it is by Mr. A. Harris at Covent Garden, however well the principal characters may be sustained by Signor Naudin (Masaniello), Signor Graziani (Pietro), &c. Of whatever admirable the music may be given by orchestra and chorus—more especially after the important part of the evening has been taken up by such productions as La Figlia and Don Pasquale, which, no doubt, excellent in their way, are, compared with Masaniello, but small matters. Surely Auber's masterpiece, supported as the lavish resources of Covent Garden allow of its being represented, both scenically and musically, might be given entire, once or twice in a season.

The operas performed during the current week have been Don Giovanni, with Madame Patti as Zerlina (Monday); Faust e Margherita, for the first appearance of Mdlle. Pauline Lucca (Tuesday); the Sonnambula, with Madame Patti as Amina (Thursday); and La Favorita, for Mdlle. Lucca and Signor Mario (Friday). Of these we shall speak next week. The programme of to-night comprises the Figlia, with the second and third acts of Masaniello.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

A performance of Don Giovanni on Monday attracted a full house. We will not say that it actually disappointed anybody, because in the Donna Anna of Mdlle. Tietjens, the Zerlina of Madame Patti, and, to a certain extent, the Masetto of Signor Tagliafico, there was merit enough to outweigh many defects. Nevertheless the defects were serious. Signor Graziani, for example, by no means came up to the popular idea of the libertine Don. Luckily success in the Don's special pursuit does not rest wholly upon polished manners and a gallant bearing. A Giovanni like that of Signor Graziani is, therefore, possible, which is nearly all we can say in its favour. The music was sung in the artist's best style. A little more fluent enunciation would have improved it. "Finche dal vino," and a little more familiarity with the text would have done the same good office for other portions of the opera, notably the trio in the second scene of the second act. "Deh vieni alla finestra" was carefully given, and met with an encore. Herr Wachtel's Don Ottavio compared rather than contrasted with Signor Graziani's Don Giovanni. He, also, knew his music but imperfectly, and the occasions are rare when a more complete failure is made of "Dalla sua pace." At the next performance it may be well to give the opera, so far as the appendix air is concerned, in its original form. Signor Ciampi infused into his Leporello a large allowance of doubtful humour. It is unfortunate for this artist that the word doubtful applies to what he does. If once his acting could be recognised as funny, Signor Ciampi would be the first of buffoos, for he has brought certain characteristics to the highest point of development. Those characteristics we cannot help noting; the humour of them escapes us. Madame Vanzini sang well throughout, but failed to invest the part of Donna Elvira with any special significance. Signor Casboni was an inadequate Commendatore. So well known a Donna Anna as that of Mdlle. Tietjens—coming now to those features in the performance which can be praised unreservedly—needs no extended remarks. It was the vigorous and characteristic impersonation every opera-goer knows by heart. Nnt less excellent in its way was the Zerlina of Madame Patti. We should not be doing the appreciative justice to the character Madame Patti gives the village beauty. There are Zerlinas and Zerlinas, and it must be said for that of the favourite prima donna that nothing of the charm arising out of excellent singing and finished acting is wanting. As a matter of course "La ci darem," "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai carino" had to be repeated. Signor Vianesi conducted, and his readiness of resource helped a performance which now and then greatly needed it.

Digitized by Google

After an absence of two years, Madame Pauline Lucca has returned to the stage associated with not a few of her successes. Her performance as Marguerite (Faust) on Tuesday night acted as a forcible reminder of how ill she can be spared from parts long ago made emphatically her own. Madame Lucca, though by no means a perfect artist, has the rare gift of independent thought, and its resulting originality of action. She takes her own view of things, and acts up to it in her own way, not troubling herself with considerations of precedent and example. We hardly need discuss the value of this at a time when, in operatic matters, the tendency is towards cut and dry forms, and when pervading mediocrity sheets itself under the cloak of routine procedure. An artist strongly individual must be welcome, even though his individuality sometimes takes a form we may not approve. Opera-goers are familiar with Madame Lucca's special merits, and can count off upon their fingers the parts which most forcibly exhibit them. Among the latter, Marguerite holds a distinguished place, as much by reason of its bold conception as of its skilful development. Though a German herself, we cannot admit that Madame Lucca presents the ideal of Goethe's German maiden. The poet's Marguerite has the coldness and purity of marble, and her fall devastates the exercise of every fiendish art. Madame Lucca's Marguerite is flesh and blood, animated by strong passions and moved by irresistible impulse. But, as we had occasion to say very recently, it is well for an artist to be guided, when the course is at all possible, by natural temperament rather than by an external model. Witnessing Madame Lucca's performance, it is necessary to forget the original Marguerite; that done, we can appreciate a forcible and consistent character, which, though highly elaborated, is always true to nature. The fair artist had, of course, a warm reception, and her efforts from first to last delighted a large audience, if we may judge by frequent recalls, and still more frequent applause. There is no need to discuss details for the twentieth time, yet we can hardly pass over without remark Madame Lucca's touching performance in the church scene. As the penitent Marguerite, distracted by fear, and struggling against the despair which the fiend encourages, Madame Lucca is inimitable. Nothing more powerful in its simple truth and pathos has been seen of late on any stage. If we say little of Madame Lucca's singing, it is because there is little to be said. All the old merits and defects were apparent, in form and degree with which most people are acquainted. The "Jewel Song" obtained its usual encore. Madame Scalchi did good service as Siebel, singing both her airs with much taste, and having to repeat the pretty address to the flowers. The Faust of Signor Mario was as careful and finished a study as ever. No matter where the character appeared—in the market, the garden, or the dungeon—it satisfied even hypercritical taste. Signor Mario was himself in better voice than on the night of his first appearance, and occasionally reminded his audience of that vocal power which, in its entirety, has gone for ever. It is needless to say that his artistic phrasing remains what it was in the old days—a model of its kind. Valentine was represented by Signor Graziani in his ordinary style; and M. Petit again reproduced his French Mephisto—a creature compounded of devil and posture-master in equal proportions. The conductor was Signor Vianesi, and the band and chorus did well.

THADDEUS EGG.

JENNY LIND RESTAURANT.

Visitors to Norwich during the Grand Musical Festival are informed that the centrally in the Market is situated the locally celebrated Restaurant, dedicated to the generous queen of song, Jenny Lind, who is justly reverenced in Norwich as the Founder of a Charity bearing her name. Refreshments of all kinds are supplied—everything of the best, and everything at moderate charges. A room for ladies.

MISS ELENA ANGÈLE'S OPERETTA ENTERTAINMENT

(From a Stray Contributor.)

On Saturday evening, at the Gallery of Illustration, I had the pleasure of hearing Signor Randegger's operetta, The Rival Beauties. The libretto, by J. P. Wooler equals in merit that gentleman's former writings. The plot is simple, but well sustained, and the dialogue is pointed and sparkling, while the verses are rhythmical, and fitted for light and elegant music.

Stephen Lynn, a miller (Mr. Maybrick), possesses a pleasant cottage and a useful mill, together with a charming daughter (Miss Edith Wynne), who is engaged to be married to one Tom Delcraine (Mr. G. F. Marler), a smuggler. The engagement, however, appears to be disagreeable to Alice, whose ideas are somewhat unsettled through the advent of her foster sister, Lady Edith Carleton (Miss Angèle), who has fled from home and taken refuge at the mill; the cause being an arrangement by which she is to be married to Sir Percy Ringwood, whom she has never seen, he being detained in France on account of some rebellious act which, as he states, not he but his late grandfather either did or failed to do. Sir Percy, whose funds appear to be rather deficient, is, by his marriage with Lady Edith, to replenish his coffers, and by the powerful influence of her ladyship's father, to get a reversal of his attainder. Lady Edith objects to be thus bartered, and runs away to the mill, where she is seen dressed as a peasant girl. Sir Percy arrives at the mill, on his way to claim the bride; and Lady Edith, finding that he is in possession of the fact that one of the two girls to whom he is introduced is a lady from London, and that from various causes he suspects that this lady is the Lady Edith, persuades Alice to assume her richest dress, and to be introduced by the miller and by the powerful influence of her ladyship's father, to get a reversal of his attainder. Lady Edith objects to be thus bartered, and runs away to the mill, where she is seen dressed as a peasant girl. Sir Percy arrives at the mill, on his way to claim the bride; and Lady Edith, finding that he is in possession of the fact that one of the two girls to whom he is introduced is a lady from London, and that from various causes he suspects that this lady is the Lady Edith, persuades Alice to assume her richest dress, and to be introduced by the miller and by the powerful influence of her ladyship's father, to get a reversal of his attainder. The "honest" miller, as he is termed, and his daughter, finding that Sir Percy really believes Alice to be his lady love, resolve to carry on the deception so as to get him to marry her, and thus leave the real Lady Edith in the lurch. They accordingly take away her jewels and papers, and when she, discovering their purpose, endeavours to expose their baseness, she is foiled. Tom Delcraine is threatened by the miller with exposure, as to his smuggling, unless he declares that Lady Edith is his daughter—which he does very unwillingly. Lady Edith, however, persuades Tom to aid her in changing the aspect of affairs; and this is soon accomplished. While Sir Percy and Alice are engaged in sweet converse, Delcraine, disguised as an officer of the Court of Chancery, appears, and takes possession of the fictitious Lady Edith, as a runaway ward of the Court. Sir Percy endeavours to effect a rescue, but is confronted by Lady Edith, disguised as a Captain of the Guard, who orders him to surrender as a rebel; and his attempt to protect himself is stopped by the blunderbusses of two of Delcraine's smugglers, in soldiers' regimentals. Alice, alarmed, admits everything, and calls upon the faithful Tom, who appears in his true habiliments, to save her from being hanged for stealing Lady Edith's jewels—which he will only do provided she consents to be instantly married to him. The little matter is accomplished; Lady Edith casts off her disguise; and all ends happily.

This story gives opportunities for amusing contretemps and situations; and roars of laughter prove their success. But, after all, the piece depends on Signor Randegger's music. It was a relief to listen to such strains. Vulgarity and common place were absent, while skilful accompaniment, good melody, and excellent part-writing were present. In the first act Mr. Cummings gained an encore for a very pretty ballad, a similar honour being accorded to Miss Wynne in an equally melodious song, and to an unaccompanied quintet of unusual merit. In the second act Miss Wynne was encored in a "Dream" song; and a charmingly playful quartet, admirably sung, received the same compliment. One song struck me as exceedingly tuneful and characteristic—a gipsy song, with a highly characteristic accompaniment.

All the performers did their work well. Miss Angèle sang with that pleasing and distinct pronunciation of the words for which she is known; while Miss Wynne not only sang to perfection but acted just as well. Both the singing and acting of Mr. Cummings were exceedingly effective. There was a crowded and brilliant audience.

H. L.

Last month five musical instruments were unearthed at Pompeii. They are in excellent state of preservation, and somewhat like our clarionet; the lower half of the instrument is silver, the upper half and mouthpiece are ivory.

WEIMAR.—Compositions by Friedrich Kiel, Gustav Weber, Dräseke, and J. S. Svenden, will occupy places in the programme of the approaching Beethoven Festival. Herr Nohl, moreover, will deliver a discourse on Beethoven; and Herr Porges, one on the Missa Solemnis. "Why?" asks the Berlin Echo. "A printed pamphlet would answer all the purpose."

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

A BALLAD CONCERT was given at Barnsbury Hall, by Mr. Henry Hallam, on Friday evening, the 29th ult., previous to his departure for America. Mr. H. H. was assisted by Miss McQuire, Messrs. C. Heywood, Stedman, G. Clayton, J. Evans, Walter Reeves, and H. Raven (vocalists); Mrs. Clayton (pianist); and Mr. Edward Jeffs (flautist). The hall was well attended, and Mr. Hallam was applauded after each of his performances. These included "Love's Request," by Herr Reichardt; a duet with Miss McQuire, "Home to our Mountains" (encored); Benedict's duet, "The moon has raised her lamp above," with Mr. Walter Reeves and Miss Virginia Gabriel's "Remembered," which being re-demanded, Mr. Hallam gave "Forget me not" (apropos of his departure). The other vocalists succeeded well, several pieces being asked for again. The instrumental pieces were good, especially a solo on the piano, entitled "Irish Diamonds" (played by Mrs. Clayton), the composition of Mr. Willie Pape; and a solo on the flute on an air from Nicolai's Il Templario ("Ah! quel guardo non celar;" played by Mr. Edward Jeffs in capital style. Part-songs were sung by Messrs. Clayton, Hallam, Heywood, and Evans. The concert gave general satisfaction.

On Wednesday evening a concert was given for the benefit of the Letter-Carriers' Library, in the Walworth Concert Hall, which was crowded by a very appreciative audience. The vocalists were Miss B. Reeves, Madame Bishop, Messrs. Bunstall, Dyson, and Charles Bishenden. A new pastoral operetta, Robin Hood, was given with great credit. The choruses were sung with much effect by the members of the South London Harmonic Society, assisted by an efficient band, led by Mr. Home. The second portion of the concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection. Mr. Bishenden's rendering of a new ballad, "Dearer to my soul than art," was specially admired. Mr. Williams conducted, and Mr. Sinkoe was at the pianoforte.

An evening concert, given by Mr. Alfred Baylis and Mr. H. Vinning took place on Wednesday, in the Alexandra Hall, Blackheath, and' notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, a good audience attended. The concert opened with "This magic wave scarf," sung by Miss Katherine Poyntz and Messrs. Baylis and Vinning. The same vocalists also gave Randegger's "I Naviganti," and Verdi's "Il sol quest anima." Miss Poyntz sang with much effect a song of Bishop's, and Miss Meadows was heard to advantage in an air from Faust. The Misses Liedel, in duets by Clement White and Schira, appeared to the highest advantage. Mr. Alfred Baylis sang Ascher's popular "Alice, where art thou?" and a song by Baylis, both of which he was loudly applauded and encored. Mr. Vinning in Schubert's "Appeal," and a song by Molloy, gained loud applause. Mr. Boscovitz played two solos of his own composition with much effect. Mr. Stanislaus was the conductor.

CRYSTAL PALACE

In accordance with a custom now for some years prevalent, the opening of a new season at the Crystal Palace was celebrated (on Saturday afternoon) by a musical performance on a scale of exceptional grandeur. The scene of the performance was, as usual, the great Handel Orchestra, and the conductor was the "conductor of conductors," the greatest controller of large musical masses our age has known—Sir Michael Costa. The feature of the programme was the magnificent first part of Mendelssohn's Elijah, for the adequate performance of which a choral and instrumental orchestra had been provided upwards of 3,000 strong; so that the Handel Orchestra presented much the same appearance as it is wont to present at the Handel Festivals. The chorus was made up from the London division of the Handel Festival Choir, the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and of the Crystal Palace Choir, combined with professional and amateur singers from London and other parts of England. The musical arrangements were under the always able and always zealous superintendence of the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society—a society which, if it had done no more than popularize among us the noble works of Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn, would be entitled to the gratitude of the whole musical community in this country. About Mendelssohn's immortal masterpiece we shall not be expected to say one word; but what we feel bound to say is that on the present occasion its performance was infinitely superior to that which was attempted, under similar conditions, some years ago, at the Crystal Palace. So fine was the execution, indeed, from the impressive overture to the overpowering chorus, "Thanks be to God," that we are almost encouraged in a belief that the day is not far distant when, with the Sacred Harmonic Society to direct the undertaking, and Sir Michael Costa to conduct the performance, Elijah, the whole Elijah, and nothing but Elijah may be given in the Handel Orchestra of the Crystal Palace with scarcely less extraordinary results than have attended those mighty inspirations of Handel, hitherto, and not without good reason, regarded as paramount. The difficulty lies in the more intricate and delicate instrumentation which Mendelssohn—the Handel of modern times—has, in consonance with the spirit of his age, employed in his great oratorio. But, with farther ingenious devices, even this may be overcome. We all remember the first Handel Festival, and can compare it with the last. What was achieved between 1857 and 1868 is notorious, and we have no hesitation in leaving to the same hands the task of contriving as much in another direction. Mr. Bowley, the Crystal Palace "general manager," is a master in his way, and no colossal musical entertainment confided to his care has failed of success. At all events, the general execution of the first and grandest section of Mendelssohn's Elijah on Saturday afternoon was, everything taken into consideration, one of the finest we can call to mind. We have no space to enter into minute particulars; but when we add that it was difficult to know which was the most finished and striking performance, that of the calm and melodious chorus, "Blessed are the men who fear Him," or that of the stupendous "Thanks be to God!"—the glorious peroration to Part I.—it may well be understood that the impression created was something beyond the common, and, under the exceptional conditions, something astonishing. In good truth, despite the vast number of singers, we have never heard the choruses of Elijah given with more admirable precision. Of course Sir Michael Costa had no little to do with this; but, luckily, the singers and players under his direction pretty well know the oratorio by heart—certainly not a bad musical sign of the times. The principal solos were assigned to those well-known artists, Madame Sinico (soprano), Madame Trebelli-Bettini (contralto), Mr. Vernon Rigby (tenor), and Mr. Santley (bass); Mrs. Sidney Smith, Miss Marion Severn, Messrs. Carter, C. Henry, and Smythson, taking subordinate parts, and joining in the melodious double-quartet, "And He shall give His angels charge," which, all things considered, was singularly well done.

The second part comprised the following miscellaneous selection:—

Overture, La Gazza Ladra		Rossini.
Rondo, "Pensa alla patria," L'Italiana in Algeri—Madame Trebelli-Bettini		Rossini.
Part song, "Farewell to the Forest"		Mendelssohn.
Cavatina, "Una voce poco fa," Il Barbiere di Siviglia—Madame Monbelli		Rossini.
March and Chorus, "With sheathed swords," Nauman—Madame Trebelli-Bettini		Costa.
Duet, "Venti scudi," L'Elisir d'Amore—Signor Bettini and Signor Bagger		Donizetti.
Chorus, "God save the Queen."

—the effective and varied character of which may speak for itself. One of the features of the day was the splendid performance by the orchestra of Rossini's picturesque and spirited overture, which was enthusiastically applauded. Altogether, this "inaugurative concert" was a worthy beginning to a new musical season at the Crystal Palace. A series of eight performances, for which the chief artists of the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, are engaged, is announced—the first to take place this afternoon, under the direction (during the temporary absence of Mr. Manns) of Signor Arditi.

A NEW KIND OF IMPOSTOR.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I think it right to warn members of the musical profession against a lady who has, to my knowledge, in the course of the last few days, called upon several artists and, representing that she was offering them engagements for concerts or for schools, borrowed small sums of money on the pretence of not having sufficient about her to pay for her cab. In each case the next and the last thing heard of her was an application from the cabman himself to the lender to be paid the amount of his fare, the lady in question having given him the slip without paying him.

Hoping that the publication of this may have the effect of putting others upon their guard, I am, yours truly,

R. DORIA.

84, Gower Street, May 6th.

Digitized by Google

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S
Beethoven Recitals.

1870.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ has the honour to announce that his TENTH SERIES of PIANOFORTE RECITALS will take place on the following Afternoons:—

Friday, May 6	Friday, June 10.
Friday, May 27.	Friday, June 17.
Friday, June 3.	Friday, June 24.

To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely.

The present year being the Centenary of the birth of Beethoven, who came into the world, at Bonn, on the Rhine, December 17, 1770, Mr. Hallé considers it becoming and appropriate to devote his forthcoming series of Recitals exclusively to the music of that illustrious composer.

The programmes will, as on previous occasions, consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance in two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, p.m.

Mr. Hallé will be assisted at all the Recitals by

HERR STOCKHAUSEN,

who will sing four of Schubert's collection of songs entitled "The Fair Maid of the Mill," at each of the five first concerts, accompanied by Mr. Hallé.

Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the sonatas will, as on previous occasions, accompany the programmes.

THE THIRD RECITAL
WILL TAKE PLACE ON
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 20TH, 1870,
To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

PART I.

SONATA, Op. 14, No. 1	.. ..	Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Am Feierabend" (The Hour of Rest) / "Der Neugierige" (The Question) }	—Herr STOCKHAUSEN	Schubert.
SONATA, Op. 14 No. 2	.. ..	Beethoven.

PART II.

GRAND SONATA, Op. 22	.. ..	Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Ungeduld" (Impatience) / "Morgengruss" (Morning Greeting) }	—Herr STOCKHAUSEN	Schubert.
GRAND SONATA, Op. 26	.. ..	Beethoven.

Prices of Admission (for the Series)—Sofa Stalls (numbered and reserved), £2 2s.; Balcony, £1.

For One Recital—Sofa Stalls, 7s.; Balcony, 3s.; Area, 1s.

Subscriptions received at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co.'s, 48, Cheapside; Hays, 4, Exchange Buildings; Austin's Ticket Office, 28, Piccadilly; and by Mr. Charles Hallé, 11, Mansfield Street, Cavendish Square.

DEATHS.

On May 10, at 12, Bedford Square, FRANCES MARGARET, widow of Sir GEORGE T. SMART—aged 67.

Suddenly, on Friday week, at Brighton, Mr. T. W. WHITE—aged 44,—Organist, Choir Master, and Conductor of the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society. He was an earnest and accomplished musician, and a pupil of Dr. Bucks, of Norwich.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1870.

A WEEK OF MUSIC.

CONCERT-GIVERS have had, lately, good reason to complain of a slack market. Weeks ago we referred to the thin audiences which responded even to their most attractive invitations; and since that time, there has been little, if any, change for the better. An enquiry into causes may be useful, but we do not propose to make it here. It must be pointed out, however, that no disappointment affects the elastic spirits of the sufferers. They continue giving concerts with a faith in ultimate success it is impossible not to admire. In a little time, if things go on as at present, concert-givers will rival opera impresarios in sublime hopefulness. "All men think all men mortal but themselves." The parallel of this is not hard to find in connection with music.

The present week deserves a notable place in the history of the season. It has been surfeited with music, as though concert-givers had resolved upon bringing all their force to bear upon it. In proof, let us just run through the record—beginning with the operas.

At Covent Garden on Monday, Don Giovanni was performed, with Mdme. Patti as Zerlina, and Mdlle. Tietjens as Donna Anna. On Tuesday, Mdme. Pauline Lucca appeared, as Marguerite in Faust. On Thursday the opera was La Sonnambula, with Mdme. Patti as the heroine; on Friday La Favorita was given; and for to-night La Figlia del Reggimento is announced. Adding to these five performances the four given at Drury Lane, we have to mention Faust on Monday, with Mdlle. Reboux as Marguerite; Lucia on Tuesday, serving for the first and welcome appearance of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson; and on Thursday Mozart's L'Oca del Cairo and Weber's Abon Hassan. It will be remembered that these novelties were set down for performance two weeks ago, and that they were twice postponed—as though the Fates were determined upon doing their part towards the musical congestion under which the week now closing has laboured. Of course the operas are none the less welcome because deferred; it would have proved better for them, nevertheless, had they come at some other time. Finally, as regards the lyric drama, we have to state that Robert le Diable is announced for to-night, with Mdlle. Nilsson as Alice—first time in England. Here, then, are nine operas, a number which should leave small margin for concerts. Concerts, however, have followed each other in quick succession, as though their rivals counted for nothing. Let us pass them in review.

On Monday the Philharmonic Society gave its fourth concert, whereat were played two symphonies (Haydn in D, and Beethoven in F, "Pastoral") two overtures (Oberon, and Le Siège de Corinth), with Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

On Tuesday The Prodigal's Return, a new oratorio by the Rev. H. F. Limpus, Minor Canon of St. George's Chapel, first saw the light in St. James's Hall. We may have to speak about this work in detail, and criticism in a mere enumeration would be out of place. Enough that the music leaves one in no doubt as to the source whence Mr. Limpus obtained his inspiration. Handel is the composer's model, and, considering what models find most favour just now, we congratulate him on his choice.

On Wednesday, Rebekah, a scriptural idyll in two scenes, the work of Mr. Joseph Barnby was brought out in St. James's Hall, along with Handel's Alexander's Feast. Here, again, we have to resist a temptation to be critical. It must, nevertheless, be said that Mr. Barnby did not go to Handel for his inspiration, and that the music was well performed and well received. Also on Wednesday took place the annual concert of Mr. Walter Bache, a gentleman who is in the forefront of English adherents to the spasmodic modern school, and who very consistently fills his programmes with the spasms of modern composers. Much of a doubtful, or rather not doubtful, sort was done on the present occasion; and we sincerely hope that those present were able to bear up cheerfully against it. Also, on Wednesday, Mr. Henry Leslie gave the first concert of his "summer series," and should have had the co-operation of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. Unhappily, that favourite artist was too ill to appear; but her place was taken by Madame Sinico. Rossini's Stabat Mater, and a selection vocal and instrumental—including Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto, in G minor, magnificently performed by Madame Arabella Goddard and the orchestra—was presented to a large and fashionable audience.

Digitized by Google

On Thursday there was no concert of importance, and on Friday nothing of more moment than certain "benefits" took place. The week ends this afternoon with the first Crystal Palace summer concert.

If the above list can be beaten by that of any six days yet to come, we should be thankful for timely notice, so as to be able to be out of the way.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE following letter was addressed to Mr. Benedict, by the Committee of the Paris Société des Artistes Musiciens, after the performance of his St. Cecilia at the Grand Opéra:—

À MONSIEUR BENEDICT.

MONSIEUR,—C'est avec un vif sentiment de reconnaissance que le comité de l'Association des Artistes Musiciens répond à la lettre que vous avez bien voulu adresser à son président. Le comité accepte avec autant de joie que de gratitude l'offre à la fois si généreuse et si gracieuse que vous faites à notre société. Il appartenait au digne élève de Weber, à celui qui continue si heureusement les traditions de ce grand homme, au compositeur dont chaque pas dans la carrière a été marqué par un succès, de démontrer que la bienfaisance est une qualité commune à tous les artistes, et qu'à ce point de vue surtout l'art n'a pas de pays. Notre association ne peut que se féliciter d'avoir pu attirer sur elle la sympathie et la libéralité d'un esprit aussi éminent que le vôtre, et nous sommes certains d'être ses fidèles interprètes en vous exprimant ici toute notre reconnaissance. Veuillez agréer, monsieur, l'assurance de notre plus parfaite considération.

Paris, le 28 Avril, 1870. LES MEMBRES DU COMITÉ.

M. ABOUT has some reflections about singers at the Paris Conservatory which are worth quoting:—"If"—he says—"a young man possesses natural capabilities, if he has a tolerably good strong voice, managers instantly sniff him out as a prey to be seized. The young man himself simply looks forward to the moment when, provided with his ut de poitrine, he shall be free, rich, and popular. As for studying, the idea is ridiculous! Why should anyone learn to read music, to hold a note, to acquire a good and sure method? What is the use? 'Just coach me up in five or six parts, in as many grand operas—that is all I want for the moment'—says the young man.—' Yes—but at a future time,' some one suggests.—'Oh, when a future time comes I will see what is to be done.' And, furnished with this very light stock of musical luggage, off he goes through the great works of the masters. Criticism, listening with astonishment, never fails to exclaim—' What, in the name of goodness, do they teach at the Conservatory? It really is not worth while for the State to spend millions merely to enable a cooper or a mason to give out with vehemence an exceptional note.'"

THE old, old story is being enacted over again at Leipsic, apropos of that genuine national composer, Lortzing, as it has been with so many before him. While he was alive no one, except a friend or two in similar circumstances, seemed to care one jot about him, and he spent his life struggling hopelessly with poverty. Now that he has been dead some years, certain of his countrymen suddenly discover that they ought to prove how highly they esteemed him; so the inhabitants of this thriving city have determined to name after him the street leading from the Zöllnerbrücke to the Humboldt Strasse. What a pity they did not think of doing this while he was alive, and presenting him with a modest flat rent-free in one of the houses. The boon would have been very acceptable to the composer—a fact which could not have failed to prove gratifying to his enthusiastic compatriots. But then the latter would have had to pay the rent!

THE precise period when Herr R. Wagner's Walkiire will be produced at Munich is still undecided, though there were rehearsals of some of the scenery in the presence of the King, during Easter week. The difficulty of finding a conductor is still the cause of the delay. Even in circles exceedingly favourable to Wagner, Herr Porges, the gentleman he proposed, is said to have declared that he should never dare to conduct the work. It is utterly impossible to recall Herr Richter, and, in this dilemma, Herr R. Wagner has notified to his Bavarian Majesty his own willingness to conduct, provided that the Intendant, the Baron von Perfall is first dismissed from his post. Herr Wagner makes this gentleman's dismissal a sine qud non. Matters are thus at a dead-lock, and no one appears to see his way out of it. It is strange that all concerned should have overlooked the one course which could be pursued with ease and at no expense—not to produce Die Walküre at all.

WE have heard of singers "electrifying" their audience. It appears that to do this with effect they ought first to be electrified themselves. Dr. Poggioli, the physician attached to the Théâtre Italien, addressed a letter some time since to M. Bagier, in which he maintained that for fatigue, hoarseness, sore-throat, and other ailments, there is no remedy comparable to electricity. Five pupils of the Conservatoire had been treated by him, three for hoarseness and loss of voice, two for some malady affecting the larynx. He electrified them, and all were cured. That there might be no mistake as to the efficacy of the process, Dr. Poggioli made his patients sing before subjecting them to it, and immediately afterwards. The difference was marvellous. After being electrified "their respiration was better and deeper, their voices were stronger, fuller, and more pure." Two of the pupils belonged to Delle-Sedie's class; and Delle-Sedie was so satisfied that he caused himself to be electrified one night when, called upon to play Rigoletto, he found himself too hoarse to make the attempt. Electricity, however, soon set him to rights, and he went through the part triumphantly. Dr. Poggioli could mention several singers who had obtained "unexpected success" through the effects of electricity; and we could furnish Dr. Poggioli with the names of several singers to whom the application of a little electricity would do no harm. Whether he had been over-electrified or not does not appear; but soon after his performance of Rigoletto, Delle-Sedie lost his temper, quarrelled with M. Bagier, and broke his engagement.

A NEW edition (dite de luxe) of Beaumarchais has just appeared. The editors, Messrs. D'Heilly and de Manecast, have availed themselves of every source of information, contrasting the original manuscripts with the acting editions—the study with the finished picture. The second volume contains a hitherto unpublished drama in three acts, L'Ami de la Maison, forming part of seven volumes of MSS. left in London by Beaumarchais on his becoming in this country a solution of his doubts on the sex of the Chevalier D'Eon, whom he believed to be a chevalière. These MSS. were in the hands of Messrs. Duiau, of Soho Square, who, in 1826, in vain attempted to dispose of them for 300 francs. In 1863 M. Ed. Fournier, commissioned by the Société de l'Académie Française, obtained them for 500 francs. Scarcely was the bargain completed when M. Dulau received an offer of £1,000 from an English amateur. L'Ami de la Maison deserves mention, as almost identical in its plot with M. de Girardin's play, Le Supplice d'une Femme. It is remarkable that, a century after Beaumarchais, Girardin and Dumas Fils should have had no inspiration so strongly similar to that of their predecessor, in L'Ami de la Maison.

BRUSSELS.—The new three-act opera, Le Florentin, was produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie last week for the first time on any stage. The book, by M. de Saint-Georges, was written for the "opera-comique" competition in Paris, when M. Lenepveu gained the prize but his opera has not yet been produced Meanwhile, M. Pichon, as we have stated, brought out in this small capital his setting of the words. But, alas! the result was anything but flattering to the composer or agreeable to the manager. Produced on Friday, on Sunday the work had disappeared from the bills. On Monday, the management felt inclined to give it another trial, it appears, but M. de Saint-Georges sent a message to forbid his libretto being performed, so that there is an end to M. Pichon's version of Le Florentin, unless—acting on the idea first broached by Mendelssohn, and plagiarised by the small fry who can, at least, imitate a man's title if they cannot rival his genius—he favours the public with an Oper ohne Worte.

Digitized by Google

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

When Mdlle. Christine Nilsson first appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre, three years ago, she could say without exaggeration, "I came, sang, and conquered." C'est le premier pas qui coûte; and as to the result of subsequent appearances there never has been the smallest doubt. Every amateur of opera knows how the fair and gracious young Swede at once took the town by storm, and how, from that time to the present, she has held her position against all rivals. Mdlle. Nilsson is now regarded in the light of a necessity. Were the musical public called upon to vote Yes or No to the question whether she could be spared, the affirmatives, we take it, would appear conspicuous by their absence. Her coming, therefore, is an event of note and importance. If rumour speaks truly, a special interest attaches to the series of representations commenced on Tuesday. The French musical papers—no mean authorities—assert that Mdlle. Nilsson will spend the next season in America, and the next following in Russia; after which she will retire from public life. We hope this story is false, but it may be true; and, if so, we are seeing and hearing the last of one of the most charming artists that ever adorned the lyric stage. But "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," and our present business is not to discuss Mdlle. Nilsson's going, but her coming. She would have appeared in Lucia on Saturday had not a postponement been made necessary by hoarseness. On Tuesday the fair artist was sufficiently recovered to sing, and, we may add, to go through a reception, sufficiently trying, however pleasant. Mdlle. Nilsson's entrance in the familiar scene of Donizetti's heroine was the signal for that loud and long applause which leaves its object in no doubt of the warm feelings that have prompted it. The welcome accorded was, in fact, one of the heartiest ever given to a public favourite; and, as becomes stimulated to a special effort, Mdlle. Nilsson sang and acted in a manner rarely surpassed. At the beginning of her career in England she could claim a foremost place among vocalists, while, as an actress, there was room for improvement. That improvement has ever since been steadily going on; to what extent, Tuesday's performance made agreeably plain. Throughout the very dramatic second act, Mdlle. Nilsson was all that could be desired; the interview of Lucia with Enrico and the climax of the contract scene enabling her to display resources for which she had scarcely obtained credit. In the latter, Mdlle. Nilsson roused her audience to enthusiasm by perfectly legitimate means. Tomention only one point out of many which must have attracted admiring notice, nothing could be more true to nature, or more eloquent in its meaning, than the action of tearing off the bridal wreath, and mutely signifying that in heart Lucia was still devoted to her returned and wrathful lover. Briefly let us say that Mdlle. Nilsson made the most exacting part of the opera the occasion of her greatest triumph. There is little necessity for dwelling upon the merits of Mdlle. Nilsson's singing. Her pure and sympathetic voice is as beautiful as ever it was; and the facility with which she uses it has, if anything, increased. "Regnava nel silenzio," with the subsequent duet, was quite enough to prove this; and more was not to afford an earnest of how the "mad music" of the third act would be rendered. Few, however, could have anticipated the actual success obtained—a success unique even in connection with airs expressly adapted for show. Mdlle. Nilsson was often recalled during the performance, and at its close no doubt could be entertained that she had once more taken heat hold upon public favour. With the exception of Enrico, the other characters were represented in a familiar manner, Signor Foli being Raimondo, and Signor Mongini Edgardo. The schemiog brother of Lucia had a zealous interpreter in Signor Verger, whose good voice and intelligent acting will make him as welcome on the stage as he has been in the concert-room. Signor Rinaldini was that rare apparition, a competent Arturo; the band and chorus, under Signor Arditi, did their work excellently. THADDEUS EGG.

PROVINCIAL.

BISHOP-STORTFORD.—The following is from a correspondent:—

"Miss Amy Perry, the pianist, gave an evening concert on Thursday, 5th inst., in the Assembly Rooms, and before a full audience. Miss Perry played Beethoven's sonata in A flat, Op. 26; Auber's fantasia on "Alice, where art thou?" and a fantasia by Leybach, on a German theme; in all of which she was loudly applauded. Master W. Parker, a young violinist, from the Royal Academy, performed a solo by De Beriot; Mdlle. Elise sang Benedict's "Rock me to sleep;" and Miss A. Dwight, a song by Bevignani. Mr. F. Childerstone sang "Alice, where art thou?" Mr. J. H. Sutcliffe gave Costa's "My soul to God, my heart to thee;" Mr. C. J. Blahenden, a song by Shield, and a new ballad, "Dearer to my soul than art." Mr. S. Lansdowne Cottell accompanied the whole of the music on the pianoforte."

SIGNOR PADILLA, who lately married Mdlle. Désirée Artôt, is engaged at the French Opera.

THE PRODIGAL SON AT GLASGOW.

(From the "Glasgow Daily Herald," May 7th.)

Mr. Sullivan's name is already well known and esteemed by all lovers of good music in Glasgow. Our young English composer has entered on a career singularly auspicious and successful. Already he has written works which have placed him in the foremost rank of living composers. In noticing the production of his Tempest music during the late orchestral concert season, we took occasion to mention that Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan was elected to the first Mendelssohn scholarship, which conferred upon him the privilege of receiving in Leipsic the highest musical education. The chief result of his studies there was his Tempest music, which he brought to England with him while quite a youth. This companion picture to Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, was for the first time performed in Scotland three years ago, and we believe only then with stage accessories, in Dunlop Street Theatre Royal. It was again performed at the Orchestral Concerts last season, when Mrs. Stirling read the text illustrating it. From the time of writing the Tempest music till the production of his latest work—The Prodigal Son—Mr. Sullivan has not been idle. He has composed, in particular, a symphony, a cantata entitled Kenilworth, many fugitive pieces, and an amusing adaptation of Box and Cox, in the form of an operetta, containing much charmiog music—light, sparkling, and serio-comic.*

The Prodigal Son was first performed at the Worcester Musical Festival on the 8th September last, since which time it has been performed in London and many places in England. Mr. Sullivan, in selecting and arranging the words for his oratorio, has made of it a didactic work, which, from the shortness of the story, is obviously the best course. The composer, in a few introductory remarks, printed at the beginning of the work, explains his idea of the Prodigal himself as a young man at first not naturally depraved, but possessing a restless desire to see the world outside, and afterwards gradually led into excesses to which, in all likelihood, he originally had the greatest and most heartfelt repugnance. We cannot here enter into a minute description of the music number by number. For the most part it breathes a thoughtful and devotional spirit. Mr. Sullivan possesses, in an eminent degree, the power of giving expression in music to sacred and contrite feelings. The wonderfully-powerful scena, "How many hired servants," forms a page of sacred music the equal of which has seldom been written. In its unusual simplicity lies its greatest strength. No cunning of the art of composition is here resorted to—it contains nothing but pure devotional and suggestive expression. We cannot concur in the exception which has been taken to the introduction of the much-discussed "Revel" chorus—"Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." In an artistic point of view it greatly enhances the contrasting features of the work; but, furthermore, we consider its introduction correct, even when regarded from a religious stand-point. Mr. Sullivan, in this movement, has put forth his greatest strength. The composer's art is powerfully and ingeniously shown, whilst the general treatment is alike novel and admirable. The reckless jollity of the revellers is depicted by music restless and boisterous. There is no expression of calm, peaceful hope in the future; the revellers feel that they must endeavour to be happy to-day, for "to-morrow we die." There is not even "a feast of reason and a flow of soul," but a fear of death that must be drowned by eating and drinking. The whole work exhibits what Mr. Sullivan is now well known to possess—the gift of real melody, combined with a thorough command of instrumentation. To this young composer the country hopefully looks for efforts even greater than he has yet made, great though these have already been.

The oratorio was produced for the first time in Scotland on Thursday evening at the Queen's Park Church. It was certainly a bold step on the part of Mr. Donaldson and his little choir to undertake such an important novelty. Those concerned must have confidently felt their power, their success fully atoning for this boldness. The execution was, on the whole, thoroughly enjoyable and successful. This is saying much when we remember that the work was performed entirely by amateurs. Where so much was creditable, it is almost invidious to particularize. On account, however, of the large share of the work devolving upon the solo tenor voice, we may point out how admirably the gentleman who undertook this important task gave the music, especially in the great scene, "How many hired servants," perhaps the most artistically-executed number of the whole evening. The singer made one or two deviations from the printed score; these, however, have been approved of by the composer. Mr. Berger, as pianist, and Mr. Charles Ferguson, as organist, discharged their duties carefully and satisfactorily. Mr. Donaldson, as conductor, and all concerned, must be congratulated on the success of the concert, which was attended to overflowing. The want of the orchestral accompaniments deteriorated much from the effect of the performance. Mr. Sullivan's instrumentation is always so perfect, and in most cases so essential, that it is somewhat dangerous to attempt any of his works without it. It says much for the intrinsic merit of the music when, even without this, so much pleasure was given.

* To these might have been added the burlesque-opera (libretto by Mr. Burnand), entitled La Contrabandista—produced at St. George's Hall.—ED. M. W.

Digitized by Google

We are glad to learn that the Glasgow Choral Union has arranged to produce The Prodigal Son, with full orchestral accompaniments, in November next, when the composer has kindly consented to conduct in person. The directors of that society expect also to secure the services of Mr. Sims Reeves, for whom the tenor part was expressly written. This, we doubt not, will prove one of the most attractive musical festivals of next season.

PRESBYTERS AND ORGANS.

The sittings of the English Presbyterian Synod were held the week before last, and on Thursday the Synod proceeded to consider the vexed question of instrumental music in churches belonging to the denomination. In consequence of the special interest generally felt in this subject the attendance was very large, and it included many ladies. Mr. C. Lewis, an elder, introduced the question by proposing the following:—

"The Synod having taken into consideration the overtures of the Presbyteries of Berwick, Lancashire, and London, on the subject of the use of instrumental music in public worship, and having regard to the unsatisfactory position in which the question has been left by the previous deliverances of Synods, and being of opinion that the church ought not, by any general resolution, to fetter the action of sessions and congregations in this matter, hereby rescinds the several resolutions of Synod passed on the subject in the years 1856, 1857, 1858, 1861, and 1862, but urges congregations to continue their efforts for the better cultivation of vocal praise, and enjoins Presbyteries to take order that the substantial prosperity and harmony of congregations be regarded."

He said, what he asked the Synod to do was to declare in favour of liberty, and he denied that there was any Scriptural authority for a contrary course in reference to instrumental music. It might have been necessary in the Reformation times to protest against the use of such music, but it could not be needful for them to shackle themselves now. The real objection to his proposal was that instrumental music was an innovation, and many considered that quite sufficient. In what department of life had there not been innovation? Where would they be now if there had not been innovation both in Church and State—innovation in science and art, in agriculture and commerce, in laws, and in everything else? The use of hymns in churches was an innovation. He asked the Synod to adopt his proposal—first, because there was that which he advocated was in itself Scriptural; secondly, because it would be beneficial in the service of God by praise; and thirdly, because it would remove a substantial hindrance to the prosperity of the Church. The Rev. R. H. Lundie, in seconding the motion, disclaimed any wish to see organs introduced into all Presbyterian Churches, as he believed that the finest music was, after all, that of the human voice, when properly cultivated, an illustration of which he had witnessed in the Sistine Chapel, at Rome, when the music was entirely vocal; but he seconded the resolution because he was in favour of Christian liberty with regard to music, and he hoped the majority of the Synod would vindicate the liberty of the congregations. Mr. Alexander Gillespie, an elder, in supporting the resolution, expressed regret at the inconsistent deliverances of the Synod on the question, and urged the necessity of such a decision as would finally settle the question. The Rev. G. Wallace moved an amendment, referring the matter to a committee for consideration, in connection with the whole subject of the laws and usages of the Church and the present practice of the congregations in regard to public worship, and also in connection with its bearings on the relations of that Church with other Presbyterian Churches; and enjoining congregations for the present year to maintain the basis settled by the Synod's last act of legislation. He doubted whether instrumental music was conducive to the real worship of God. If the letter of the Holy Scripture were not opposed to the use, the spirit of it was, and he deprecated a departure in that matter from the usage of their ancestors. In urging the importance of congregational harmony the speaker created considerable merriment by saying that he thought every member of a congregation who did not join the singing ought to give some reason why he or she did not sing. The Rev. Mr. Johnstone, of Warrington, having seconded the amendment, the Rev. W. Raitt moved another amendment, enacting that instrumental music should at once cease in all the congregations, and enjoining all the Presbyteries to use diligence to secure that result; and in expressing his views he remarked that when he left a quiet Scotch manse some time ago, he never dreamed that he was going to join an organ-playing community in England. He should rather expect the blessing of God in connection with the use of the bagpipes—played with all the intelligent energy and natural enthusiasm of the Highlanders—than in connection with the use of mechanical contrivances played by professional musicians. After the amendment had been seconded the Rev. T. Alexander, of Chelsea, insisted that the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian religion shut out the use not merely of organ, but of all other forms of instrumental music. Up to almost yesterday there was not a scrap of such innovations in this country outside the Church of England. As to the cry of congregational liberty, he warned the Synod against yielding to it, for in such matters the appetite for liberty "grew by what it fed upon." The discussion was then adjourned till the next sitting.

In the evening it was renewed. After some further debate Mr. Raitt's amendment was withdrawn. A show of hands was then taken as between Mr. Wallace's amendment and Mr. Alexander, and the latter was negatived. After this there was a division upon Mr. Lewis's motion and Mr. Wallace's amendment, when the numbers were—for the motion, 121; for the amendment, 49; majority for the motion, 72. The result was, therefore, pro tanto, a triumph for the Presbyterian party in favour of the use of instrumental music in public worship.

A REVIEWER'S WAIL.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I write in the name of the public, and not upon my isolated opinion, but upon the concurring opinions of many, and I say—Do you believe anyone accepts the ——letter of your Reviewer? I have studied a week to see whether the many expressions of opinion I have heard would find vent.

* * * * * * * *

My wail is this—What we want in the journalism of the present day is manliness; a manliness which is above favouritism, monetary or clique interests, and which has the power and ability to see when a thing is good, or bad, and say so; not with fulsome praise, nor with withering, ruinous, and killing censure. Charity and mercy in all things—but praise where praise is due, even though our own friends' fame may be a little shaded thereby.

I have admired much in the character of your journal or I should not have been so long a persistent subscriber; so you must take my remarks lovingly.

One word more—I entirely agreed with the writer, "P. M. G.," in the Musical World, of the 23rd ult., as to the over-painting of Mr. Manns' analysis of Hiller's symphony. Do, in mercy, offer some check to the growth of this presumed faculty for pretended soul-reading. I am quite sure that not one of the most imaginative, poetic, and talented composers, whose writings have come down to us, neither in the study previous to his composition, nor in the process of writing down his composition thought or conceived in his brain, mind, or soul, or other supposed and undefined medium through which music is developed, half nor one hundredth part of the imaginative and highly-painted nonsense one receives at the hands of reviewers and sundry persons, whose passion or profit it may be to "write" these sensational "paintings" of their soul-readings of departed geniuses.—Muchly and truly yours,

Mail 11th, 1870. (In another School.) ASCRUM REVIEWER.

[We have shown this letter to our Reviewer, who as it happens is the very "P. M. G." enlogized by "Another Reviewer;" and his answer was similar to that of the late Duke of Wellington in reply to a threatening letter from the late Harriet Wilson—"Print and be d——d." We print but hope the other thing.—ED. M. W.]

THE PRODIGAL'S RETURN.

A concert was given in St. James's Hall, on Tuesday evening in aid of the funds of St. Andrew's Convalescent Hospital, Clewer, when a new oratorio, The Prodigal's Return, composed by the Rev. H. F. Limpus, Minor Canon of St. George's Chapel Royal, Windsor, was produced. The work is written in imitation of Handel—than whom certainly no grander model could be found, and the composer has evidently studied largely and diligently in that direction. An efficient band and chorus assisted, and the solo singers were Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington and Patey; Mr. Vernon Rigby and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The work was favourably received, and the composer called for at the close. We shall give further particulars in our next.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The artists engaged for the Musical Festival at Whitsuntide are Mdlle. Orgeni, Mdme. Joachim, Herr Vogl (from Munich), Herr Bletzacher (from Hanover), and, last, not least, Herr Joachim. The programme is settled as follows:—First day: Sinfonia Eroica and Missa Solemnis, Beethoven (in the second work Herr Joachim will play the violin obbligato in the "Benedictus"). Second day: "Leonore" Overture—Beethoven; and Deborah—Handel. Third day: a miscellaneous concert, in which one of the pieces will be Beethoven's Violin Concerto, performed, of course, by Herr Joachim.

Digitized by Google

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.*

The immortal Joh. Seb. Bach left as an inheritance to the musical world ten sons, all of them more or less great artists and celebrated composers. His eldest and favourite son, Wilhelm Friedemann, was the only one who had the desire, till his melancholy death, to emulate his distinguished father. Wilhelm Friedemann was born in 1710 at Weimar, and died in 1784 at Berlin. Instructed by his father, he developed in earlier years his great abilities and talents as a performer on the piano and organ, and also in the theory of music, to such a degree that everybody admired him, and Father Bach himself, who was not so easily satisfied, looked forward to the highest results of his favourite son. His compositions were vigorous and profound, and he executed his musical inspirations on both instruments with a mastery which took everyone by surprise. His diligence in the sciences, also, which he pursued at the "Thomas-Schule" at Leipsic were cherished by his tutors with great expectations. After leaving the college he studied the law and mathematics —the latter science he preferred, and adhered to it under all circumstances to the end of his life. In 1733 he received a vocation as organist at the Church of St. Sophia at Dresden. In 1747 he was appointed director of music and organist at the church of St. Mary at Halle, on the Saale. After this appointment he was known and called "The Head of Halle," "Der Hallesche Bach." But this, also, proved no place of abiding for him; he resigned it in 1767, and returned to Leipsic without an engagement. His life at this period became a restless and fugitive one. Notwithstanding he was nominated Chapelmaster to the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, he never obtained an active appointment at the Court. Living as a private individual, sometimes at Brunswick, Göttingen, and Berlin, he died at the last named town, on the 1st of July, 1784, in poverty and total debility.

In looking at his character we cannot be surprised to learn his sad fate. All distress he brought upon himself by his rudeness of mind, his inflexible and artistic pride, his prodigious absence of mind, and his peevish and quarrelsome disposition. Given to drinking, he violated as a civil citizen all order, and broke those privileges very often. With all these defects the greatest genius could not prosper. His father's unassuming and modest mind turned in him to pride, and instead of improving his talent with efficacy he relapsed, and when inspiration failed he tried to replace it by strong drink. Altogether he presented the picture of a modern proletarian artist; and highly endowed as he was, yet the grand hopes and great expectations his father and brothers cherished in him, alas, perished. His contemporaries have acknowledged him to have been one of the greatest organ performers and fugnists, and also one of the profoundest literati in the science of music in Germany. His excellent brother, Philipp Emanuel, asserts of him that only he alone was able to replace his father, Joh. Seb. Bach—the highest praise that could be bestowed upon him; but nevertheless he was despised by the public in general, entirely through his own faults. From his earliest days he gave signs of absence of mind, which he would have been excused for in later years, under the plea of being absorbed in his art, if he would have restricted himself, which he never made any attempt to do. The consequence was the circulation of a great number of very amusing anecdotes, which, however turned out very seriously for him. During my residence in Berlin to study under Professor Zeltzer, who was personally acquainted with the brothers Wilh. Friedemann and Phil. Emanuel Bach, the professor often spoke of their fine compositions and exquisite performances on the piano and the organ, to which he has listened, and when in good humour related traits of Wilh. Friedemann's absence of mind. Some of the following anecdotes I relate as told by Professor Zeltzer:—Friedemann being obliged to go out on business, and expecting during his absence the visit of a friend, wrote with chalk in large letters on his door that he would be at home at such and such a time. Returning earlier than he anticipated he knocked at his door, read his own handwriting, and went away to abide the fixed time. He called in the evening on his friend, Joh. Fried. Agricola, and not finding him at home sat down and ate his supper, which stood on the table, and put the knives and forks afterwards in his pockets. His friend coming home later, and seeing his repast gone said to him that he hoped he had enjoyed the supper. He seriously denied it till convinced through the knives and forks peeping out of his pocket. As organist in Halle he very often forgot to go to church, and when his landlady reminded him that it was time, as the church bells were already ringing a long time, he went, entered the church at one door and left it by another to go home again to resume his fantasias on the piano. Once on Whitsunday he made up his mind not to be behindhand with his duties, and went early to church and seated himself in one of the pews, with the keys of the organ in his pocket. In the meantime the congregation assembled, but he remained there sitting long after the church was filled, and everyone was expecting the organ prelude; at last the congregation became impatient, looking up to the organ; he did the same, and tossing up his head exclaimed, "I wonder who will play the organ to-day." Sometimes, when in good spirits, he played on the organ very long during Divine service, and once, being reprimanded for it by the elders of the church, threw up his appointment, preferring to live in the greatest poverty. Leaving Leipsic with a small bundle under his arm, containing all he possessed, he fell in with a merry company of strolling musicians from Prague, and became one of the party. Near Brunswick they made a call upon a rich proprietor of an estate, who was a lover of music and an admirer of Ph. Em. Bach. The major dome told them to perform in their best style as his master had a celebrated artist as a visitor. Having played some pieces, Friedemann sat himself at the piano and played magnificently. At once a voice called out, "this must be my brother Friedemann or the devil." The brothers embraced, and Friedemann cried like a child for joy that his brother had recognized him by his playing. Notwithstanding the high estimation he held his brother Emanuel in, they disagreed, Friedemann's morose behaviour estranging from him his best and sincerest friends. Both brothers remained strangers till death. His brother Christian, called "the Bach of London" ("Der Londoner Bach"), hated and despised him. Stubbornness and drunkenness made his great and superior abilities unserviceable. When drunk he did nothing at all, and when sober he disliked composing, and preferred to extemporize on the piano, or to indulge in useless and sophistic disquisitions. This is the reason that only a small number of his works are known. Those published are—a sonata in F flat major, Halle, 1739; Sei Sonate per Cembalo—the first in D major, Dresden, 1745. The other five remained unpublished. He advertised many of his compositions, but the public, who did not like him, gave no support to his undertakings. Other works composed by him are—a Treatise on the Harmonic Chord; 14 Polonaises; 8 Fughettes; Music to the Advent Season; 5 Concertos for the Piano; 4 Fugues for the Organ with two Man. and Ped.; two Sonatas for two Pianoforte Concertante; Music for Whitsuntide; Lasset uns obliegen. with Hautboys, Trompets, and Cimbales. His published and unpublished works are exceedingly scarce, and the musical public is greatly indebted to Mr. J. D. Davison for his spirited undertaking, in having edited, under the title, "Revivals," two beautiful fantasias of Wilh. Friedemann Bach, works which speak for themselves, and which will not only advance the refinement of the divine art of music, but also restore our great ancient masters to the stage they must occupy if the better taste for music should predominate. Mr. Duncan Davison has published them in a superior and elegant style, giving homage to the great composer. Lastly, we cannot bestow enough praise upon Madame Goddard, our unrivalled English performer on the piano, for the rendering and conception she has devoted to these two compositions, worthy her interpretation, which will give her the satisfaction of being the first to bring this distinguished composer (after having been so long a time nearly forgotten) again before the public.

April, 1870. Dr. Ferdinand Rahlfs.

* Sketches of Composers and Musical Writers of the Earlier Centuries.—No. II.

WAIFS.

Charleston, S. C., has just dedicated a new Academy of Music.

A German band recently played "Up in a Balloon" at a funeral in New York.

A Boston organist recently imitated a storm, at a concert at Tremont Temple. The illusion was so complete that one of the auditors raised an umbrella.

Boston has appropriated 32,000 dols. to have music taught in the public schools.

A Maine lady desires her daughter to "play the fashionable melody she got in Boston last week."

Madame Viardot has accepted an invitation from the Grand Duke to give a series of performances at Weimar.

Owing to domestic affliction Mr. Goldberg will pass the season in Vienna with his family, instead of remaining in London.

A music-seller was lately overpowered by a fastidious young lady, who wanted to purchase "Mr. Hood's song of an under-garment."

Mr. J. F. Barnett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner, is announced for performance, with full orchestra and chorus, at Cambridge, Oxford, and Cheltenham.

At Trinity Church, New York, the organist treated Prince Arthur to "God Save the Queen." The lesson for the day was "Put not your trust in Princes," etc.—which the choir-boys intoned with ill-suppressed mirth.

A new cantata, written by Mr. F. Enoch, and composed by Mr. Ignace Gibsone, for solo female voices and chorus, entitled The Elfin Knight, will be produced, for the first time, at Mr. Gibsone's third pianoforte recital, at St. George's Hall.

The Glasgow Choral Union has arranged to produce Mr. Sullivan's oratorio, with full orchestral accompaniments, in November next, the composer to conduct in person. The directors expect also to secure the services of Mr. Sims Reeves, for whom the tenor part was expressly written.

The Rev. C. T. Procter, vicar of Richmond, who would not allow a fire escape to be placed in the churchyard in consequence of its being consecrated ground, has since refused to allow the choir-boys of the parish church to sing at a concert in aid of the Richmond Infirmary, on the ground that they might be required to sing secular music.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Henry Smart has composed a new Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis for the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, which will be performed on the 18th inst.

The London Glee and Madrigal Union, under the direction of Mr. Land, announces their twelfth annual series of concerts to commence on the 19th inst., at St. James's Hall. We need not add a word to this statement; but for our own personal gratification, we will say that concerts more enjoyable, and, in their way, more useful, the London season cannot produce.

The last rêve at the Théâtre Déjazet was deprived of one of its best scenes—a duet between a cocotte and a monkey. No one objected to the cocotte; but the monkey was a reflection upon "Jocko," the ape brought by the Empress from Egypt. The monkey has passed the censorship; but the inspector of theatres cut him out at last rehearsal, on the ground that this pari "contained personal allusions."

Mr. German Reed has secured the services of Mr. Corney Grain, the vocal and pianoforte humorist, whose refined delineations have been received with great relish in private circles. Mr. Grain will appear on Monday in a musical sketch written by himself, entitled The School Feast. Ages Ago, now approaching its 160th representation, will be almost immediately withdrawn, to make way for a new entertainment by Mr. W. S. Gilbert.

A French paper gives the following account of the origin of the expression, "To make a complete fiasco." A German seeing a glass-blower at his occupation, and thinking nothing could be easier than glassblowing, commenced operations by blowing vigorously, but only produced a spear-shaped balloon or little flask (fiasco). The second attempt had a similar result, and so on—fiasco after fiasco. Hence the expression not unfrequently used describing the result of our private and public undertakings.

Signor Botte-ini's little opera, Vinciguerra, originally produced at Monaco, and just performed for the first time at Paris, is said by the French critics to contain some capital music, a waltz sung by the heroine being among the best numbers in the work. The composer has had a very fair chance of gauging the capacities of the ordinary musical public during his world-wide tours, and as his unquestionable knowledge of his art is thus tempered by experience there is every prospect that his opera will attain a general success. The libretto relates the romantic adventures of a Parisian "belle" among the brigands, and the music is said to be remarkably bright and lively.—Choir.

NEW MUSIC.

I Puritani. Morceau elegant for Piano. By JOHANNES WINKELHAUS. [London: Duff & Stewart.]

THE selected themes from Bellini's opera are treated with considerable taste and skill. We can commend the piece as brilliant and effective, without being difficult. By the way, what a polyglot title it has—Italian, French, English, and German!

Apollo and the Nymphs. Morceau elegant for Piano. Composed by JOHANNES WINKELHAUS. [London: Duff & Stewart.]

PERCHANCE of this pretty drawing-room piece had better not trouble themselves about its connection with the title. They will hardly be able to discover what, in the music, is meant for Apollo, and what for the nymphs. Passing this by as immaterial, a good deal remains to admire. There are no difficulties in the work which amateurs of moderate capacity may not easily surmount; and when surmounted, the result is pleasant enough.

The May Blossom. Valse. By W. C. LEVEY. [Dublin: M. GUNN & SONS.]

THIS waltz, which has a gorgeous title page, if not characterised by any very special merit, is melodious, and therefore pleasing. It is vain, we suppose, to look for any originality in waltzes now-a-days. At any rate, we seldom meet with it.

When sunset sheds its reddening glow. Song. Poetry by N. NETTLETON. Music by W. FRIEDRICH. [London: R. Cocks & Co.]

We have nothing to say against this song, and nothing to say for it. It is one of those ordinary effusions which the musical press pours forth so copiously, for no purpose save that of loading publisher's shelves.

Marche Funèbre. Composed in memory of the late George Peabody. Arranged for the Piano by LUIGI CARLINO. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THERE is much merit in this work, and merit of an uncommon sort. The broken character of some phrases expresses admirably the agitation of grief, while excellent contrasts are secured by the smooth and pathetic characters. We are able to commend the march as worthy the occasion which called it forth.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.—"Marche Funèbre," by Luigi Carlino; "A Summer Song," by Henry Walton; "The Brides of Enderby," and "The Spadewell," songs, by E. M. J. Edwardes. "Bella qual rosa Aurora," melodia, composta da Giovanni Marastrilla. "They named her name before me," ballad composed by Frederic Penna.

PROVOST & Co.—"Haydn and other Poems," by the author of "Life Below."

NOVELLO, EWER, & Co.—"Lonely," and "May Song," songs by Christabel. "Naomi," a sacred idyll by Edmund T. Chipp.

GUNN & SONS (Dublin).—"The Cambridge Galop," by M. P.; "The May Blossom Valse," by W. C. Levey.

ROBERT COCKS & Co.—"When Sunset sheds its reddening glow," by W. Friedrich.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
OF
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.
And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

ASTRINGENT LOZENGES OF THE RED GUM OF AUSTRALIA.—For Relaxed Throat, in Bottles, 2s. MURIATE OF AMMONIA LOZENGES, in Bottles, 2s. Useful for Bronchitis, by loosening the phlegm and preventing violent fits of coughing.
P. & P. W. SQUIRE, Chemists and by Establishment in Ordinary to the Queen Gazetted August 8th, 1837—Dec.-mber 31st, 1867), 277, Oxford Street, London.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,
HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

Just Published, price 3s., Illustrated,
HISTORY OF THE PIANOFORTE, by EDGAR BERGMANN. "A serviceable and pleasant History of the Pianoforte, with an account of ancient musits and musical instruments . . . It traces especially the use and development of stringed instruments from the times of old Egypt and Assyria to our own, and is furnished with well executed and judicious illustrations."—Daily Telegraph. "The subject is well handled in a popular form."—The Graphic. "The chapters on tuning and repairs are likely to be of great use to our country cousins."—Punch.
CRAMER, BEALE, & GLEDHILL, London & New York.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."
SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to
MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD.
By BERNARD ZARTMEYER.
London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.
THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. VON WEBER have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have been received with the utmost Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost and delight.

	Poetry by	s.	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUIS GRAY ...	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER ...	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3	0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	4	0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad) ... ... And the Answer to it.	FLORENCE PERCY ...	4	0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	4	0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,
"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"
Composed by E. REYLOFF.
INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.
Price 3s.
London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

Published This Day.

"MARCHE FUNÈBRE,"

Composed in memory of the Great Philanthropist, the late
GEORGE PEABODY, Esq.,
And Dedicated to the President of the United States of America. Arranged from the Orchestral Score, for the Pianoforte,
By LUIGI CARLINO.
Price 3s. 6d.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

ROBERT COCKS & CO.'S NEW MUSIC.

WEST (GEO. F.). SACRED GEMS for the PIANOFORTE. 36 Nos., 3s. each; all post free for 19 stamps each.
WEST (GEO. F.). SECULAR GEMS for the PIANOFORTE. 36 Nos., 3s. each; free by post for 19 stamps.
WEST (GEO. F.). BEAUTIES of the OPERA. 36 Nos. 3s. each; free by post for 19 stamps.
WEST (GEO. F.). A catalogue of all his piano music gratis and postage free.

MISS EDMONDS will repeat (by desire) Mr. Brinley Richards's favourite song, "THE VALE OF TOWY," at his Concert, on the 17th of June, at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square. London: Published only by Robert Cocks & Co., New Burlington Street. Free by post for 18 stamps.

PUBLISHING ARRANGEMENTS.—IMPORTANT TO AUTHORS.

MOFFAT & COMPANY, State Publishers and Agents for the Dublin Steam Printing Co., beg to announce that they have resolved to CHARGE NO COMMISSION for PUBLISHING WORKS PRINTED BY THEM until the Author has been refunded his original outlay.
They would also state that THEY PRINT IN THE FIRST STYLE, GREATLY UNDER THE USUAL CHARGES.
Their Publishing Arrangements will enable them to promote the interest of all Works committed to their charge, as they have very considerable experience of the channels most likely to ensure success.
Estimates and all particulars furnished in course of post.
"Those about to Publish" may rely on finding Economy and Despatch in all Departments.
Moffat and Co.'s Book List sent free on application to Publishing Offices:
6, D'OLIER STREET, DUBLIN.
34, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Price One Penny Monthly, Registered for Transmission Abroad,
THE CHURCH RECORD. Edited by the Rev. Thomas Scott, M.A.

MOFFATT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

WORKS BY ALEXANDER VANCE.

	s.	d.
The History and Pleasant Chronicle of Little Jehan	3	6
Vox Clamantis	7	6
The Book of the Knight of Tower	6	0
Romantic Episodes	6	0
Hellenica Sacra	15	0

(The Introductory Chapters may be had separately, 6d.)

MOFFAT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

Price Twopence Monthly. Registered for Transmission Abroad,
PLAIN WORDS. A Christian Miscellany. Edited by the Rev. Hamilton Magee, Assisted by Ministers and Members of different Evangelical Churches.

MOFFAT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

NEW BOOKS.—NOW READY.

	s.	d.
Hubs of the Sun. By Mrs. Lorenzo N. Nunn	10	6
Concerning Earthly Love, &c. By a Country Parson	2	6
Harmony in Religion. By a Roman Catholic Priest	1	6
Iona, and other Sonnets. By Wade Robinson	2	6
Life of St. Patrick. By Joseph B. Smithson	6	6
Marsh's Bye Hours); Clinical Lectures	2	6
Medical Examination Papers, set at University of Dublin, &c. ..	1	0
Queer Papers. By Barney Brady	2	6
The Church under the Tudors. By D. Dunlop, M.R.I.A. ..	3	6
The Philosophy of the Bible. By D. Dunlop, M.R.I.A	3	6
The Life of St. Patrick. Edited by Rev. J. Lynch, P.P. ..	0	6
Time Will Tell. By N. J. N.	3	6

MOFFAT & CO., State Publishers by Appointment
(Agents for the Dublin Steam Printing Company).
34, Southampton Street, Strand, London. 6, D'Olier Street, Dublin.

THE RED-HAIRED MAN'S WIFE; or, The Awful Proceedings of Stahan Varagt, the Market Stroller. The last and best story written. By the late William Carleton. Will commence in the May Number of "THE CARLOW COLLEGE MAGAZINE." Price 6d.

MOFFAT & CO., State Publishers,
34, Southampton Street, Strand, London. 6, D'Olier Street, Dublin.
To be had by order of all Booksellers in Town and Country.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Just Published,

6 PIECES FOR PIANO,

BY

JOHANNES WINKELHAUS.

The Publishers feel great pleasure in submitting Herr Winkelhaus's Six New Pieces to the notice of the Professor and Amateur. To the Professor they will prove a great relief from the monotonous arrangements which have for so long a time taken the place of a better style of music. To the Amateur they will be acceptable as the means of displaying a considerable amount of execution without the labour required for pieces of a difficult character.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN"
(VICTORIA REGINA).

Is brilliantly and gracefully arranged, without being trying to a moderately advanced performer, the air is never lost sight of, and the piece is evidently by a composer of taste and experience.

"CASCADE DE PERLES."

A very elegant melody set off by passages which, while full of refinement and beauty, are completely under the hand, and consequently adapted to the means of players who combine taste with good execution.

"APOLLO AND THE NYMPHS."

Recommends itself to our notice for its characteristic simplicity and beauty. It cannot fail to please.

"CASTA DIVA AND MARCH."
(NORMA.)

Those delightful subjects have never received better treatment than at the hands of Herr Winkelhaus.

"I PURITANI."

In this transcription, as in the one from Norma, Herr Winkelhaus gives us another proof of his facility in writing passages which are brilliant and effective, without being difficult.

"HAS SORROW THY YOUNG DAYS SHADED."

One of the loveliest of Irish melodies, arranged with consummate skill.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS EACH.

LONDON:

DUFF & STEWART,

147, OXFORD STREET,

(OPPOSITE BOND STREET).

Digitized by Google

CHAPPELL'S
Organ Journal

CONSISTING OF

FAVOURITE MOVEMENTS SELECTED FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS,

ARRANGED FOR

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY THE

MOST EMINENT ORGANISTS.

		COMPOSER.	ARRANGER.
No. 1.	SANCTUS from "Mass"	Rossini	Dr. Spark.
2.	DOMINE DEUS	Do.	Do.
3.	GRATIAS AGIMUS	Do.	Do.
4.	CRUCIFIXUS	Do.	Do.
5.	ADAGIO NON TROPPO	Mendelssohn	G. Cooper.
6.	ANDANTE from String Quartett	Mozart	Geo. R. Griffiths.

(To be continued.)

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS EACH.

THE

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO:

A SELECTION OF

Opening and Concluding Voluntaries

BY THE

MOST CELEBRATED COMPOSERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

ADAPTED CHIEFLY FOR THE USE OF AMATEURS BY

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Each Number contains from 7 to 12 favourite Voluntaries, including one arranged expressly with Pedal Obbligato.

Nos. 1 to 24 are now ready, price 3s. each; or in four Volumes, each containing Six Numbers, and bound in Cloth, price 12s. each.

A THEMATIC LIST OF CONTENTS

MAY BE HAD ON APPLICATION TO

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	SOLO.	DUET.
Grande Valse	3 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	3 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaîté (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torne (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scopate. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valser). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner; and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Great success at the Lyceum Theatre of

HERVÉ'S

OPÉRA BOUFFE,

"LE PETIT FAUST"

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

	s.	d.
The Opera complete for pianoforte solo	7	0
The Overture-Valse. Arranged by Hervé	6	0
Do. do. (easy arrangement). By H. Valiquet ...	5	0
Polka-Entr'acte. Par Philippe Stutz...	4	6
Deux Petites Fantaisies. By J. L. Battmann ... ... each	5	0
Le Petit Faust, pot-pourri sur les motifs favoris. By F. Brissler ...	7	6
Le Petit Faust, Souvenirs par D. Croises	5	0
"Les Quatre Saisons." Idylle. Transcription variée. Par C. Hoffmann	5	0
"Les Trois Chœurs." Polka du jardin. Par A. Mey	4	6
"Méphisto." Polka-Mazurka. Par E. Etling	4	6

SIX EASY PIECES.

No. 1.	Couplets du Guerrier Valentin. Par P. Wachs	2	6
2.	Tyrolienne de Marguerite ... ,, ...	2	6
3.	Couplets du jardin ... ... ,, ...	2	6
4.	Rondo-valse de Méphisto ... ,, ...	2	0
5.	Polka des Trois Chœurs ... ,, ...	2	0
6.	Chanson du Satrape ... ,, ...	2	6

DANCE MUSIC.

Le Petit Faust Quadrille. By Strauss	4	6
Do. do. Piano Duet	4	6
Do. Deuxième Quadrille. By Arban	4	6
Do. Quadrille. Facile. Par H. Valiquet	4	6
Le Petit Faust Valses. Par Olivier Metra	6	0

PIANO AND VIOLIN.

Idylle des Quatre Saisons. Méditation pour Violon et Piano. Par Bernardin	5	0

EDITIONS DE HEUGEL & CIE., PARIS.

LONDON:

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.,

244, REGENT STREET, W.,

Where may be obtained

LE PETIT FAUST,

COMPLETE FOR VOICE AND PIANO (With French Words),

PRICE 12s.

And all the separate Songs, Duets, &c. from same Opera (with French Words).

Printed by HENDERSON, RATT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, May 14, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 20s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 21. SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1870. Price { 6d. Unstamped. 6½d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY.—GREAT FLOWER SHOW.

1. Palace open for admission from .. .. .. 10. 0 till 7. 0
2. Ditto open from about .. .. 12. 0 till 7. 0
3. Full band of Coldstream Guards (Mr. F. Godfrey) 1. 0
4. Orchestral Band of the Company 2.30
5. Ornamental Gardens of Rockhills open .. .. 3. 0 till 6.30
6. Display of Terrace Fountains 3.15
7. Combined Orchestral and Military Bands (conductor, Mr. Weidenzer) 4.15
8. Festival Organ, (Mr. Cowen), for promenade .. .. till 5. 0

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The FULL BAND of the COLDSTREAM GUARDS, under the direction of Mr. Fred. Godfrey, will perform at the GRAND FLOWER SHOW, THIS DAY.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

This Day (Saturday), "FAUST." Mephistopheles, Mons. Faure (his first appearance in London these four years); Faust, Signor Gardoni; Valentine, Mr. Santley; Siebel, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Marguerite, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. Conductor—Signor Arditi.

On Monday Next, Second Performance of Weber's "ABU HASSAN." The Libretto translated by Signor Marchesi, and the dialogue set to recitative by Signor Arditi, expressly for the Italian Opera, Drury Lane. Hassan, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Omar, Signor Castelli; Il Califo, Signor Ragani; Mesrur, Signor Trevers; Zenarod, Madame Cord; Zobaida, Mdlle. Briani; and Fatima, Madame Monbelli. To be followed by Mozart's posthumous Opera-buffa, in two acts, "I GOCA DEL CAIRO" (second time in England). The poem adapted by M. Victor Wilder. The Italian translation by Signor Zaffira. The dialogue set to recitative-parlando by Signor Bottesini. Fatima, Signor Gardoni; Don Beltrame, Signor Casaboni; Pasquale, Signor Trevers; Lo Schiraz, Mr. Lyall; Giacinta, Madame Cord; Oretta, Madame Nantier; and Isabella, Mdlle. Emilie Lavitsky (her second appearance).

Tuesday, May 24, Meyerbeer's Opera, "DINORAH." Corentine, Signor Gardoni; Hoel, Mr. Santley; Un Chasseur, Mr. Randall; Un Carelatore, Signor Ragney; Dea Capeul, Mdlle. Vista and Mdlle. Briani; Fan Capraia, Madame Cord; Un Capraia, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Dinorah, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.

Thursday, 26th, "FAUST" (second performance). Characters as before.

Saturday, 28th, Mozart's LE NOZZE DI FIGARO. Il Conte, Mr. Santley; Figaro, Mons. Faure; Bartolo, Signor Foli; Basilio, Mr. Lyall; Antonio, Signor Zoboli; Don Curzio, Signor Rinaldini; Marcellina, Madame Cord; Cherubino, Mdlle. Pauline Lewitzky (her first appearance in that character in London); and La Contessa, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her first appearance in that character).

Monday, May 30, a favourite Opera.

Tuesday, May 31, "ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO." Characters as before.

Acting Manager .. .. MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

This Evening, Saturday, May 21 (first time these two years), Meyerbeer's Grand Opera, "L'AFRICAINE." Pauline Lucca, Vanzini, Graziani, Bagagiolo, Capponi, Tagliafico, and Nandin. On this occasion the Opera will commence at Eight o'clock.

Next Week there will be Five Performances.

On Monday, May 23, "DON GIOVANNI"; Adelina Patti, Vanzini, Wachtel, Graziani, Ciampi, Tagliafico, and Capponi, and Tietjens.

On Tuesday, May 24, "LA FAVORITA." Mdlle. Lucca, Graziani, Bagagiolo, and Mario.

On Thursday, May 26, "I LA SONNAMBULA." Adelina Patti, Bagagiolo, and Wachtel.

A Grand Morning concert will take place in the Floral Hall, Covent Garden, on Saturday, June 18, supported by all the principal artists of the Royal Italian Opera.

MR. SIMS REEVES. The First Appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves, after his return from Italy, will take place at Mr. Henry Leslie's Grand Concert, on WEDNESDAY MORNING NEXT, May 25th, at St. James's Hall. Handel's Oratorio, "THE MESSIAH."

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Instituted 1822.—Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1830.

Under the Immediate Patronage of
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CHRISTIAN,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

President—The Earl of Dudley.
Principal—Professor W. Sterndale Bennett.

The Next STUDENTS' CONCERT, open to Subscribers and Associates, will take place at the Institution on Thursday Evening Next, the 26th inst., commencing at Eight o'clock.

By order, JOHN GILL, Secretary.

Royal Academy of Music,
4, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square.

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET.

MR. AUSTIN has the honour to announce that his ANNUAL EVENING CONCERT will take place on Friday, May 27th, 1870. To commence at Eight o'clock. Artists—Mdlle. Tietjens and Mdlle. Sessi; Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Fenwick, and Madame Sainton-Dolby; Signor Gratiani and Mr. Sims Reeves (his First Appearance at an Evening Concert on his return from Italy). Clarionet—Mr. Lazarus. Pianoforte, Miss Kate Roberts. The St. Cecilia Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Hargitt. Conductor—Mr. Benedict. Sofa Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Family Ticket (to admit Five) £2 2s.; Area Stalls, 5s.; Balcony Stalls, 3s.; Balcony, 2s.; Area, 2s.; Admission, One Shilling. Tickets to be had of Mr. Austin, St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, and of all Musicsellers.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.—Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," and Beethoven's" Choral Symphony," Wednesday, May 25th, at St. James's Hall. Principal Lancaster-Sherrington, Miss Sinclair, Mr. Cummings, Herr Carl Stepan. Band and Chorus of 350. Conductor—Mr. Barnby. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony and Area (numbered and reserved), 5s.; Admission, 3s., 2s. 1s.; at Novello's, 1, Berners Street, and 35, Poultry; the principal Musicsellers, and Austin's St. James's Hall.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—Conductor—Mr. W. G. Cusins. Monday Evening, May 23rd, St. James's Hall, Eight o'clock. "The Power of Sound," symphony, Spohr; and Beethoven, No. 2 in D; overtures, "Struensee" (Meyerbeer), "Il Seraglio" (Mozart); Concerto in E flat. Pianoforte, Herr Pauer, Weber. Vocalists—Mdlle. Orgeni and Mr. Santley. Stalls, 10s. 6d. Balcony, 5s.; Tickets, 3s. and 2s. 6d. Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; Chappell's; Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall; Mitchell's; Olliver's; Keith, Prowse's & Co.'s; and A. May's.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—MR. HENRY LESLIE'S SECOND GRAND CONCERT, WEDNESDAY MORNING NEXT, May 25th. Handel's "MESSIAH." Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir. Full band. Organist—Mr. John C. Ward. Conductor—Mr. Henry Leslie. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Area Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony Stalls, 15s and 10s. 6d.; Area, 5s.; Gallery, 3s. 6d. Commencing at Half-past Two. Tickets at Cramer & Co., 201, Regent Street, and 43, Moorgate Street; all Music publishers; and Austin's Office, 2e, Piccadilly.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD begs to announce that she will give a MORNING CONCERT at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Saturday, May 28th, to commence at Three o'clock, on which occasion she will be assisted by the following eminent artists:—Madame Monbelli, Miss Elizabeth Philp, Signor Foli, and Signor Gardoni. Instrumentalists—Madame Alice Mangold and Herr Van Biene. Accompanist—Herr Carl Rosa. Tickets at One Guinea and Five Shillings, to be had of Mdme. Mangold, 34, Leighton Grove, N.W., and at the Rooms.

THIS DAY.

MDLLE. BONDY begs to announce that her ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT will take place This Day (Saturday), May 21st, at Hanover Square Rooms. Commence at Three o'clock. Vocalists—Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. W. H. Cummings. Instrumentalists—Violin, Herr Ludwig Straus; Violoncello, Mons. Paque; Pianoforte, Mdlle. Bondy. Conductor—Mr. W. Ganz. Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Seats, 5s. Tickets at Miss Bondy's, 17, South Molton Street, Hanover Square, and at the Rooms.

Digitized by Google

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Conductor—Professor WYLDE, Mus. Doc. LISZT'S Cantata, entitled "DIE LEGENDE DER HEILIGEN ELISABETH" will be performed at the Public Rehearsal, Saturday Afternoon June 11th, and at the Last Concert of the Season, Wednesday, June 15th. The character of St. Elisabeth, by Mdlle. Tietjens. Tickets, 5s., 3s., 2s., 1s.; at the Hall and principal Music Shops.
W. GRANVE NICHOLLS, Hon. Sec.

LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—SIX SCHOLARSHIPS of the Value of Fifteen Guineas each, entitling the holder to one year's free Instruction, are open to PUBLIC COMPETITION—Two for Singing; two for Pianoforte, one for Violin, and one for Violoncello.
Candidates, who must intend making Music a Profession, and not exceed 16 years of age, except for Singing, are requested to send their names, on or before 1st of June to Mr. G. H. WILKINSON, Secretary, London Academy of Music, St. George's Hall, Langham Place, of whom further particulars may be obtained.

GLASGOW CITY HALL.—SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.—Conducted by the Directors of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union. Mr. James Airlie, Secretary; Mr. H. A. Lambeth, Organist; Mr. Emile Berger, Solo Pianist and Conductor. The Seventeenth Season commences next September, and will extend over the succeeding Eight Months, to make arrangements for which Mr. Airlie is now in London, and may be communicated with at Angus's Hotel, 33, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars.
JAMES AIRLIE, Secretary.

MR. E. M. DELABORDE, from Paris, will introduce his celebrated PEDAL PIANOFORTE at his FIRST MATINEE MUSICALE, at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, on MONDAY NEXT, the 23rd Inst., at Three o'clock. He will perform Selections from the works of Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, &c. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea each, at Robert W. Olliviers, 19, Old Bond Street, and at the Office of the Room.

MR. ALFRED CAINK will sing Mr. WILFORD MORGAN'S popular song, "MY SWEETHEART WHEN A BOY," at Highbury, May 31st.

MR. WILFORD MORGAN will sing his popular ballad, "MY SWEETHEART WHEN A BOY," at St. James's Hall, June 4th.

HERR REICHARDT begs to announce his ARRIVAL in Town for the Season. Address, 5, Beaumont Street, Portland Place.

MR. IGNACE GIBSONE has the honour to announce that he will give THREE PIANOFORTE RECITALS at St. Gibson's Hall, May 25th, June 8th and 22nd. Vocalist, at first recital, Miss Katherine Poyntz. Tickets and full particulars to be obtained of Messrs. Ashdown & Parry, Hanover Square; and Hutchings & Romer, 9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP" at Mr. Alfred Baylis's First Matinée, 30th May.

MDME. MONTSERRAT has the honour to announce to her Friends and Pupils that she has REMOVED to 10, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W., where she requests all communications may be addressed.

SIGNOR GUSTAVE GARCIA begs to announce his arrival in Town for the Season. Address, 9, Mortimer Road, Greville Road, St. John's Wood.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing DUGGAN'S great baritone song, "SAMSON," at his principal Engagements—City, 25th May; Hanover Square, 26th; St. George's Hall, June 8th. Address, 28, Old Bond Street.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD will play "MADAME GURY'S WALTZ," composed by CHOPIN, at her Recital of Pianoforte Music.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD (Soprano) has arrived in London and is open to Engagements for Operas, Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S CONCERTS:—Store Street, June 4th, July 16th; Hanover Square, June 25th. Communications addressed Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

MR. CHARLES STANTON (Tenor) may be engaged for Concerts, Operettas, and Oratorios. Address, 10, Duke Street, Portland Place, W.

MISS JULIA ELTON will sing KATE WARD'S admired song, "THE WEAVER," on May 26th, at Windsor; and May 30th, at Mr. Lahee's Concert, Hanover Square Rooms.

"O FATIMA! ETEREA DONO," sung by Madame TREBELLI-BETTINI in Weber's Opera, "ABU HASSAN." Price 3s. LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street

Just Published,

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

N.B. "REVIVALS" will consist of Pieces hitherto only existing in Manuscript, or which have been long out of Print. Selected from the Works of Eminent Masters.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for Instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"LITTLE WILLIE," by JULES BENEDICT. This charming new song (by the popular composer of "Rock me to Sleep") is now being sung with distinguished success by Miss EMMA WYBRA. Price 3s., and may be obtained for 19 stamps from the publisher, DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss Auyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD,

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. ROBERT BERINGER will play his admired "VALSE DE BRAVOURE," at Greenwich, on Monday next, 23rd May.

Published This Day,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

ROBERT COCKS & CO.'S PIANOFORTES. Prices varying from £24 10s. to £66. Lists and drawings gratis and postage free. Purchasers are charged most reasonably for sound and durable workmanship, without an additional charge for a name, or, as is usual, for the risk incident to credit transactions.—New Burlington Street.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANOFORTE.—124th Edition; 70 large folio pages, 4s. "This work has had an enormous run, its circulation being something wonderful, whilst the encomiums passed upon it have raised its reputation beyond all ordinary criticism. We cannot for a moment hesitate in giving it the very warmest recommendation."—Vide South Australian Advertiser, March 2.—London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street. May be had every where.

Digitized by Google

BACH'S PASSION MUSIC.*

Bach, according to the statements of Mizler and Forkel, wrote five Passions-Musiken so-called. These probably stood in connection with those five full-year courses of Church Music, which altogether like an encyclopædia of Church music, which left behind him by the great composer. Of these five Passions two only have come down to us: 1. The St. John Passion, and 2. The Passion according to the Gospel of Saint Matthew. A third Passions-Oratorium, according to the Gospel of St. Luke, of which a copy written in Bach's own hand exists in Munich, and a transcript at Berlin, the latter bearing the mark "J. S. Bach to Leipsic," is open to most reasonable doubts regarding its authenticity. . . .

I. THE PASSION ACCORDING TO ST. JOHN.

This is probably the older of the two. But the date of its composition cannot be positively ascertained. We only know that Bach submitted the work to repeated revision, and that he set out to work it over again after the completion of the Matthew Passion, which was performed in 1729. The poem seems to have sprung essentially from himself, at least to have been prepared after his express designs. It leans upon the text to the Passion-Music, which Brocke had written in Hamburg, which had been composed by Handel, Telemann, Keiser, and Mattheson, and to which Bach was no stranger, since he had himself copied off the score of Handel's composition. But this text did not reproduce the Gospel simply, but translated into (partly) very wretched verses. The epic tone of St. John's Gospel, and the mystical element in the apostle's conception of Christianity, conspicuous also in the text to Bach's composition, may have been the occasion of Bach's following, in the putting together of the work, a more dogmatic philosophical direction, than was the case later in the Matthew-Passion, which passes more into the sphere of immediate life and moves in a more lyrical mood.

On the whole, the poetic structure of the St. John Passion is very simple. The 18th and 19th chapters of the Evangelist, beginning with the arrest of Jesus, form the groundwork. Numerous chorales, two choruses (for the introduction and conclusion), and eight airs for single voices, with various in part very abstract reflections on the sufferings of the Lord, are interpolated amid the Bible words. In the narrative of Peter's denial the composer has supplied from other Gospels what is wanting in St. John: "And he went out and wept bitterly." So too, for greater completeness, he has included the words near the end of the 27th chapter of St. Matthew: "And behold! the veil of the temple was rent," &c. The ideal Christian Church, which takes so prominent a part in the action in the Matthew-Passion, we do not find here characterized as such. The great drama, which depicts the end of the Lord and Saviour, passes before us in essentially the simple form which the Evangelist has given it. It is simply the Gospel, which it is the object of this Church music to announce to us.

But the great master, who wrote his sacred works from the point of view of a believing, pious Christian heart, may well have considered, that on the one hand the long drawn Gospel recitatives might have a wearisome effect on the listening congregation, while, on the other hand, the occasional choruses and arias, with all the splendour of instrumental effect and the declamation of the singers, might easily give to the Church music too much of a concert character. To avoid monotony the connected musical pieces between the recitatives were necessary. But, at the same time, to secure the church-like character of the work, and to bring the entire music belonging to the liturgical part of the service of that time nearer to the congregation present, he made use of the chorale. The listening congregation was also to have an opportunity to join in the song. Unfortunately we have no information as to how far this purpose of the composer was carried out in practice. When we read in the work of Rochlitz Für Freunde der Tonkunst (Vol. 4, page 448), that Bach's way of treating the Passion found a strong participation in the congregation, so that the performance of such an oratorio always became really an edifying Art Feast for the town, we may take it for granted as certain that he reached this end especially through the co-operation of the choral song. This semi-dramatic way of treating a religious subject was no invention of Bach's only. Apart from the fact that such performances were known in the churches of Italy, from the very first beginning of the opera, and were even presented in costume (for example the religious drama, L'anima e corpo, by Emilio del Cavaliere, performed in the year 1600 in the Church della Valicella, at Rome), apart, too, from the Passion processions and Passion plays, which were introduced in many parts of Germany at a very early period, and which are still customary in certain places showing the old traditional tendency to dramatize the sufferings of the Lord at Easter time,—various attempts had been made by Bach himself to bring the Passion virtually before us in this half dramatic manner through the aid of song. There the acting persons, the choruses, and the ideal church or congregation were treated in a matter altogether like that which we find in Bach, and even the employment of the chorale had found its place in precisely the same way as with him. This Passion-musica, like the Church cantatas, formed a part of the liturgy of the Lutheran Divine service. On Good Friday, even in the smallest church, the history of the Passion of Christ was represented musico-dramatically, or oratorically, according to the means at hand.

* From the German of C. H. Bitter.

In Leipsic the performance, at the time of Bach, alternated between the St. Thomas and the St. Nicolai Church, which does not seem to have been the case before. Moreover these performances were made known to the public by printed announcements. Bach had found the general form of this great art work, essentially, ready to his hands. To him it was reserved to ennoble it, to develop it to the highest perfection. * * * The division of the work into two parts indicates that it was designed to be performed one part before, one after the preaching on Good Friday. The Gospel narrative itself is treated in a simple recitative form and assigned to the tenor. The persons there introduced as speaking (Christ, Peter, Pilate, his maid, the servants of the High Priest) are placed directly in the action. So too we find the choruses of the Jews and Priests, as they occur in the Gospel, charactized in characteristic manner. In all these respects there is a certain corresponding treatment between this work and the Matthew-Passion. But here all is simpler, more easily comprehended. Neither in length of time nor in the general intentions of the whole are certain limits of organic form exceeded. This shows itself not merely in the arrangement of the poem, but also in its musical treatment. We know of comparative estimates of the two works, in which the simpler character of the St. John-Passion and the richer moulding of the music to the St. Matthew are set in contrast on the ground of the internal characteristics of the two Evangelists. To declare such a supposition unconditionally wrong in a man like Bach, would certainly be very bold.

Yet it can hardly be assumed that the great outward difference between the two works is to be ascribed to this inward difference of character. Eminent as Bach's gift of conception and power of presentation were, he had not, we may well believe, when he wrote the St. John Passion, yet attained to the height, in the great combination of all the means, by which he could excite our admiration, nay astonishment in the later, so much greater work. But this anticipatory judgment is not meant to take from the just appreciation of the work now before us. It begins with a chorus executed in grand style.

a. THE INTRODUCTORY CHORUS.

This chorus, founded on the words of the Psalmist: "Lord, our God, whose glory is in all the lands, show us by Thy Passion," &c., forms an introduction of a general, religious, Christian purport. It is the prayer for a true faith, which would fain be strengthened and confirmed by a realization of the sufferings of the Lord. In its place stood formerly the chorale, "O man, bewail thy sins so great." Bach, in his last revision of the work, has taken this away from here, and transferred it to the close of the first part of the Matthew-Passion, where it produces such a sublime effect. In its place we have here the present chorus. In it, besides that perfect contrapuntal and harmonic treatment, such as always flows from Bach's pen, that intrinsic worth which becomes the serious grandeur of the solemnity, we also find the fine traits of symbolical meaning not despised, by which the great master thought to make the beginning of the history of the Lord's suffering present to our minds. Above the bass moving in short connected notes upon an organ point, and an orchestra of stringed instruments preparing in an earnest figure for the choral song of praise and thanks, rises a mournful melody. Long, sustained tones of flutes and oboes meet above the heaving basses of tone. They begin their mournful song anew with the entrance of the chorus, which, after three brief and strongly marked exclamations of "Lord, Lord," proceeds in a brilliant, but thoroughly earnest figure to extol the majesty of the Lord. Unlimited and infinite, it seems to swell and roar around us, and lift us on the rising flood. The praise of the Lord resounds in strains which mirror the glowing character of the approaching action. Above them that funeral hymn of flutes and oboes sounds once, twice, and the words, "That Thou the true Son of God," do the lamenting instruments take up for a moment the figured movement of the stringed quartet. It is impossible to hear this chorus without deeply feeling in one's inmost soul, how mightily the eventful, the wrestling of the majesty of the Son of God with the sufferings ordained to him, is prepared; how under the superb structure of this hymn of praise the serious tragedy begins, of which the master will bring before our eyes the full development.

As in the orchestra Bach carries the antitheses through to the very limits of the attainable, so also in the treatment of the chorus we remark traits of individual mastery, such as are only found in Bach. We know that he wrote this chorus after the Matthew-Passion was finished, and after he had transferred to that the chorale originally intended for the introduction to this. The theme of the hymn of praise breaks off after twelve measures, to pass over into another theme, fugue-like in its treatment, which repeats itself later in the words, "before us through Thy Passion." No one, who knows the two Passions of Bach, will hear this theme without being at once reminded, with all the difference of melody and contrapuntal working, of the "Let Him be crucified" in the Matthew-Passion. Bach certainly has not set these words just to a note, not otherwise without a definite purpose. As the peculiar structure of the whole work, to which he afterwards prefixed this chorus, did not allow the use of other more extensive means of preparing the hearers in a right earnest, vivid manner for the history of our Lord's sufferings, he was obliged to let the image of the cross appear before the eyes of the multitude at once, beforehand, through the character he lent to this theme. He has taken from the work a masterpiece in withdrawing the chorale. But in this chorus he has known how to replace it by another masterpiece which surely is its peer.

Digitized by Google

5. THE RECITATION OF THE GOSPEL.

After the introductory chorus, begins at once the recitation of the Gospel. The recitations throughout are simple, accompanied only by the organ and the fundamental bass. In the noblest style, declaimed in strict observance of the word sound, its cantilena seldom, and only at some marked suggestion of the text, passes into the arioso element, and into that sort of musical painting so peculiar to Bach. For example, at the repetition of the words of Jesus, "The cup which my Father hath given me, Shall I not drink it?" So too in the long-drawn mournful melodic phrases of the twice repeated words of Peter, "And wept bitterly?" then at the words of Christ, "Then would my servants fight;" but above all, at the marvellous of the Evangelist, "Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged Him," in which Bach gives free play to his pictorial bent in a long drawn figure over the sharply marked bass. The musical rendering of our Lord's words is not distinguished from the rest of the recitative. It remains all the time in pure, simple recitative style.

[The second part of this article was inadvertently printed before the first, which, however, will now not be read with less interest. For the translation we are indebted to J. S. Dwight's admirable Journal of Music, published at Boston, Massachussets.—Ed. M. W.

FROM CADIZ.

No. VII.

The Holy Week and its supplementary festivities being over, the life of Seville becomes monotonous enough, and people who come to study Spanish manners are obliged, perforce, to go to the Italian opera, which is performed at the only theatre worthy the name in the city. Of course there are the permanent "lions"—the Cathedral; the Museum, with its collection of "Murillos;" the Moorish Palace, called the "Alcazar," and the Palace and gardens of the Duke of Montpensier, which, although occupied by their Royal owner, are opened daily to the public. A review of these would lie beyond my limits; but in connection with "Spanish Recreations," some of my readers may be interested to learn that in a nook of the Duke's garden are placed the sepulchres of three persons whose tale has been so often told on the dramatic and lyrical stage—namely, the noted libertine, Don Juan; Tenorio, the Commandant who perished by his hand; and Donna Anna, who is here, however, called "Ines." There is likewise a street in Seville, the name of which, "El Hombre de Piedra" (the Man of Stone), refers to the Don's terrific guest. The figures in the garden are in a very mutilated condition, having not so much as one face among them.

Of the genuine Spanish living nothing can be learnt at the principal hotels, where the diners are imperfect copies of the French model, regulated by an invincible desire to avoid the piquant and the savoury. It must not be inferred from these genteel resorts that the unsophisticated Spaniard eats, as a decided flavour in his food. On the contrary he has a predilection for those robust luxuries which may be matched in England by the sturdy epicures who covet speats and black-puddings. I partook of two homely meals, given at the house of a private family of the aristocratic class, the chief elements in which were small, dried sausages, containing whole layers of fat, and strongly flavoured with garlic; other sausages preserved in an earthen pot, with yellow-coloured lard, which is eaten with them to facilitate their passage down the swallow; snails, boiled and fried, and new potatoes in lieu of a pigeon's egg. One could not pause over ordinary repasts after the precedent of this "sensational" bill of fare, but any change was welcome after the monotony of the hotel. In their drinks, the Spaniards are not decidedly disposed to the insipid, and those innocent beverages which correspond to the gingerbeer and lemonade of London are remarkable for the faint sickly taste and their lukewarm condition. A really acid lemonade is not to be found, and there is nothing that bites coldly on the palate among the various drinks that are vended in the ornamental kiosks with which the principal squares are dotted, and which are very pretty objects, with the large earthen vases of water ranged on a shelf at the back, and the bottles containing the less primitive beverages placed on the counter. Many of these kiosks are kept by Moors, who wear their native costumes. The same people also carry on a trade as vendors of slippers. Beer-drinking has of late become rather popular in Seville, where a brewery, with a room for the entertainment of retail purchasers, is much frequented. The brewer is a German, and the produce of his industry is of that "lager-bier" kind which, under one name or another, is so familiar to Europe and America. There is, however, a way of dealing with it, which is not, I think, common out of Spain. A small bottle, with an equal quantity of lemonade, is poured into a bowl, and then served into glasses as a mixture. The mixture is on the same principle as that composed of ale and ginger-beer, on which cookeyes confer the appellation of "shandy-gaff," but the use of the ladle and bowl constitute a marked difference. After all, these little dissipations are exceptional. The general beverage with the people is water, and the painter of Spanish life who could represent a square in Seville without the figure of a man bearing a huge vase filled with the drink of pristine man, and in the act of shouting "Agua!" to the passers-by, would be guilty of a heavy sin of omission. Hence I was not a little surprised to see in a kiosk at Cadiz, erected for the sale of Protestant tracts, &c., our well-known teetotal publication, the British Workman, translated into Spanish, and converted into El Obrero—so as to appeal in a cosmopolitan spirit to the workman in general, as distinguished from the workman British. It struck me that to preach total abstinence to a people already drinking nothing but water was rather an odd direction of missionary enterprise. Some publication of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals would more directly hit a blot in the Spanish character; but I would advise not be the keeper of a kiosk in Andalusia where a tract against bull-fighting was sold.

Having come back to the irrepressible bull fight, I may repeat an anecdote that I heard, apropos of a pair of stupendous horns that decorated the room of a private family. It is the general rule of the "Plaza de Toros" to terminate the combat with the death of the bull; but the original owner of these particular horns distinguished himself, I was told, by prowess so exceptional that the spectators insisted on a pardon, the refusal of which would have subjected the "matador" to the fate of John de Witt. Because he did not fight and run away, the bull was allowed to live and fight another day. When the other day arrived he displayed even more valour than before, but on this occasion the people thought that he was becoming old and useless, and he was accordingly killed according to routine. Accounts differ as to the nature of his first grand exploit. Some say that he ripped up no fewer than eleven horses; others that he performed the rare achievement of tossing a priest. As Cardinal Richelieu remembered that before he was a priest he was a Frenchman, so it seems, this unfortunate ecclesiastic bethought himself that before he had taken orders he was an Andalusian. However, I prefer the story of the horses to the other legend, which I would assign to the inventive power of some Protestant propagandist, whose zeal exceeded his veracity.

The practice of bull-fighting has an immense effect on the manners of the people. As every lad at an English public school is, in his way, an amateur pugilist, so every Andalusian is a sort of amateur bull-fighter, and I have heard of bull bulls in the streets of Seville have been attacked by small boys and despatched with short knives. And yet there is not a kinder or more obliging people in the world than the people who inhabit the city associated with the names of Don Juan and Figaro. N. D.

Cadiz, April 30.

CARLOTTA PATTI IN IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

(From the "Philadelphia Inquirer," May 3, 1870.)

The first performance of Il Flauto Magico by Max Strakosch's new company was, in many respects, quite successful. The house was very full and very enthusiastic, especially when Carlotta Patti appeared, which, however, was so seldom that the applause was naturally great, if only from its condensation.

Miss Patti sang her two arias as she does everything, faultlessly, in an artistic sense: and when we add that the manner was soulless, we must bear in mind that the greatest lovers of music have not been able to find any soul in these two compositions. They are intended for show, and a wonderful exhibition of vocal capacity Miss Patti gave us. The first one, "Non paventar," is full of endeavors enough to set a music master distracted, and after an unpardonable run of fourteen measures it glides up to the high F and drops suddenly to C natural on the staff; an interval of eleven notes, holding a trill on the C for a whole measure. The more celebrated "Gli angui de Inferno," in the third act, has a more regular theme, and is of much greater interest. Her success in this was most remarkable, and the applause was tremendous. In this aria she not only reaches the altissimo F three or four times; but, what is far more wearing on the voice, she strikes the high C eight successive times, staccato, before gliding up to the F. Both feats, however, seem alike easy to Miss Patti, and the public in the minds of the hearers is the same one that used to agitate musical circles during Thalberg's piano performances, "How does she do it?"

GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.

A slight entertainment, offered by a new candidate for the place left vacant by Mr. John Parry, now fills up the short interval occurring between the musical legend of Ages Ago and the operatic duologue of Beggar My Neighbour. Mr. Corney Grain, who thus comes before the public to display his ability as a humourist, has evidently studied with considerable profit in the school which his predecessor founded. Sufficiently youthful to permit the hope that his powers may be capable of greater development, he manifests an amount of confidence which suggests the notion that he has been long favoured with the admiration of young ladies at evening parties. Mr. Corney Grain provides, under the title of The School Feast a musical sketch framed on a familiar model, which enables him to introduce a few vocal imitations and to indicate, with more or less distinctness, different peculiarities of manner. In the course of the fifteen minutes thus occupied, he shows he has a flexible voice, a ready command over the piano, and a vivid remembrance of all that has been done by the gifted artist who preceded him. The result is generally satisfactory to the audience, but no justification of the indiscreet enthusiasm evinced by over-zealous friends. Those who have never seen Mr. John Parry are, however, in possession of such a claim to commiseration that it would be ungenerous not to feel some sympathy with them.

Digitized by Google

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

Although still not quite recovered from the indisposition which prevented her from appearing, as had been announced, on Saturday night last, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson came forward on Tuesday (the 9th inst.) as the heroine of Lucia di Lammermoor, and was welcomed with an enthusiasm too real to be mistaken. Few artists have so speedily attained the very highest professional rank as this gifted and accomplished lady; and at the same time it must be admitted that few have been able to bring forward credentials of equal value. A voice brighter, richer, or more "sympathetic" to tone, more flexible and amenable to every shade and variety of expression than hers has not been listened to in our time. Then comes the personal charm in her singing, which may in some measure be attributed to its spontaneity or, in plainer language, its entire want of effort. Mdlle. Nilsson, if we may be allowed to quote the phrase, "sings like a bird"—as though sing she must, and could not help it. But we need not again dwell upon the qualities that here, as all over the Continent, have won unanimous recognition. Nor is it requisite that we should give a new account in detail of her impersonation of Walter Scott's unhappy heroine, or her execution of Donizetti's familiar music. Enough that, from the cavatina in the opening scene to the touching incident of the madness—in which last she reaches the highest degree of dramatic impressiveness and vocal perfection—Mdlle. Nilsson, though evidently suffering, succeeded in enrapturing the audience. How frequently she was called forward we don't care to remember; and, indeed, such compliments are in these days so indiscriminately bestowed as to be scarcely worth the consideration of a genuine artist.

On Thursday night (the 12th) the two operas by Weber and Mozart, which had unavoidably been held back for ten days, in consequence of the severe indisposition of that versatile, useful, and always ready artist, Signor Gassier, who was cast for a leading character in the longest and most important of the two, were produced, to the great and unanimous satisfaction of an audience among whom were a larger number of musical connoisseurs than are accustomed, except on exceptional occasions, to congregate at the Italian Opera. About these works, the production of which does the utmost credit to the management of the Italian Opera at Drury Lane, and the admirable performance of which is no less creditable to Signor Arditi and those who act under his direction, we shall take another occasion of speaking. Meanwhile, we merely say that Abu Hassan (the overture to which has long been familiar in our concert rooms) is the freshest, most tuneful, and most sparkling of the early dramatic works of the composer of Der Freischütz, Euryanthe, and Oberon; and that the Oca del Cairo, about the manufacture of which we cannot speak now, is entirely made up of music written when Mozart's genius was at its zenith—that is, between the periods of Il Seraglio and Le Nozze di Figaro were produced. It contains masterpiece after masterpiece, the worth of which those who believe that form and symmetry are no less essential to music than to other arts will not fail to appreciate. About the performance generally we can say no more at present than that, in Abu Hassan, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, who, in male attire, represented the hero, obtained an extraordinary success, and that L'Oca del Cairo introduced Mdlle. Pauline Lewitzky, a new singer, Russian by birth, pupil of M. Wartel (to whom we are also indebted for Mdlle. Nilsson and Madame Trebelli), with a young, fresh, and beautiful soprano voice, a method of vocalization already remarkable, an expression unstrained and natural, an intonation beyond reproach, and, her qualities, both dramatic and vocal, which, or we are much mistaken, are destined to make their mark. But to Mdlle. Lewitzky, as to Abu Hassan and L'Oca del Cairo, we hope again to refer at no long date.

Robert le Diable was given, according to promise, on Saturday. The Prince and Princess of Wales were in the Royal box, and the house was crowded to the roof; the audience, in fact, was the most brilliant of the season. That the excitement should be great to see Mdlle. Christine Nilsson in a part which had made another Swedish songstress, whose name will at once occur to our readers, known to England is not astonishing; nor can any amateur acquainted with Mdlle. Nilsson's talent feel surprised at hearing that her success more than came up to general expectation. We have had many representatives of Alice in English, German, French, and Italian, but not one who has embodied the character more poetically or sung the music in greater perfection. How Mdlle. Nilsson has grown from a somewhat cold and studied actress into a really great and impassioned one, those who, from the beginning—and that dates but three years back—have watched her career know full well. The transformation is as complete as it has been rapid. No more convincing proof need be adduced than her performance on Saturday night. Old frequenters of the Opera must have been reminded of what used to be called that "glorious 4th of May," when, three-and-twenty years ago, the fortunes of Mr. Lumley, who, after years of prosperous management, saw himself confronted with an opposition the strength of which could hardly be over-estimated, were suddenly restored by the triumph of a young Scandinavian songstress, who became famous in a night, and, for years afterwards, was the topic of musical circles. We have no wish to institute comparisons, the Alice of Mdlle. Nilsson possessing merits which entitle it to admiration on its own account, without reference to anything that has gone before. That certain endowments necessary to realize the character of the interesting Norman peasant as it naturally offers itself to the imagination are possessed by Mdlle. Nilsson we need hardly say. In these, perhaps, no Alice since Robert le Diable was first produced in London—at Her Majesty's Theatre, under Mr. Monck Mason, in 1832—has surpassed, if any, indeed, has equalled her. Alice must be young—that is a sine qua non; Alice should be more or less prepossessing in appearance; Alice should have a voice capable of the highest vocal displays, as no one familiar with Meyerbeer's music will deny; and Alice must be an actress—or else what becomes of the great scene with Bertram before the Cross, and the greater trio at the conclusion of the opera, in which the simple earnestness of the single-hearted maiden saves Robert from all the persuasive eloquence of Bertram? These indispensable qualifications are concentrated in Mdlle. Nilsson; and hence the success she achieved on Saturday night —a success which has raised her higher than ever she stood before in the estimation of connoisseurs. We need not enter scene by scene into details. Enough that it was in the most striking situations that Mdlle. Nilsson most completely satisfied expectation. Space will not allow us to say more at present than that the new Alice was received with enthusiasm, and has added fresh laurels to a brow already overcharged.

Signor Rongini was Robert; Signor Foli played Bertram; Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, as the Princess Isabella, created the never-failing impression by her truly impassioned delivery of the air most familiarly known as "Robert, toi que j'aime;" Mdlle. Fioretti, now the best and most graceful dancer in Paris, was Elena, in the scene of the "Resuscitation of the Nuns;" the picture of the ruined Abbey (by Mr. W. Beverley, we believe) showed the hand of a practised master; the costumes were fresh and characteristic; the mise-en-scène, by the veteran, Mr. Stirling, was all that could be wished; and the orchestra and chorus, under the direction of Signor Arditi, were in most respects singularly efficient. But on another occasion we hope to return to this performance of Robert le Diable, which, if in some respects not altogether perfect, was on the whole in the highest degree creditable to the Drury Lane Opera.

About the highly successful performance of Madame Volpini, as the heroine of Martha; Monday night, we shall speak in our next. Martha is repeated on Tuesday and Thursday. The opera to-night is Faust —Mdlle. Nilsson as Margaret, and M. Faure (his first appearance) as Mephistopheles.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

This society's fourth concert was given in St. James's Hall on Monday, May 9, the Prince and Princess of Wales being present. Haydn's symphony in D, one of the works which show most fully the master's pleasant characteristics, opened the programme, and was capitally played. That it was much enjoyed, we need scarcely add, for whenever Haydn speaks, enjoyment follows, as a matter of course. The second symphony was Beethoven's "Pastoral," which noble composition has a place in every Philharmonic season. Music so well known to the performers must be expected to be rendered satisfactorily, and we find no fault with its interpretation by Mr. Cusins and his subordinates. The concerto (Schumann's) for piano, in A minor, brought forward as soloist Madame Anguissola-Kolar, who sustained the reputation she acquired by her recent performance at the Crystal Palace. Madame Kolar was applauded after each movement, and recalled at the end. The official programme contained an almost passionate plea for Schumann in connection with his work. We refer to this, not for the purpose of contesting Mr. Macfarren's statements, with which we may or may not agree, but simply to point out that a "book of words" is no place for an exhibition of partisanship. The overtures to Oberon and Le Siége de Corinth may be passed with the remark that both were well played, and, though in very different styles, much relished by the audience. Mdlle. di Murska was the vocalist. She sang, first, "Che pur segno" (Il Seraglio), one of the airs written by Mozart for an exceptional voice, and which, therefore, legitimately belongs to the clever Hungarian lady. She next gave her favourite "Ombra leggiera" from Dinorah, and finished with the charming Hungarian airs she has made so welcome in concert-rooms. It will be assumed that long and loud applause rewarded each effort.

At the next concert Spohr's Power of Sound will be performed, the second symphony being the No. 2 of Beethoven.

A NEW symphony, by Herr Joachim Raff, entitled In the Forest, has been played at Weimar with, it is said, great success.

Digitized by Google

OPERA IN AUSTRALIA.

(From the "Melbourne Argus," Feb. 14th)

It may be accepted as an axiom that speculators do not, as a rule, engage in commercial enterprises merely with a view of conferring a benefit on their fellow creatures. They have, it may be presumed, invariably a keen eye to their own interests. Speculations are, however, of various kinds, some detrimental and some beneficial to the community operated upon, and those which come prominently within the latter category are deserving of public recognition.

The introducer of a good opera company is essentially a speculator of the beneficent type, and has claims upon a community not to be comprised within the ordinary rules of commercial transactions. Music is universally recognised by educated minds as one of the most powerful of civilising agents, and men who seek to make money by importing music are worthy of superior recognition to those who make their living by importing brandy. The laws of supply and demand are doubtless the most potent authorities in commercial pursuits, but the moralist cannot altogether ignore the effects produced by special developments of the code in question. Regarded from this point of view it is not too much to say that Messrs. Lyster and Smith have, by the pursuit of their private interests, conferred a boon upon Australia by bringing to these shores the excellent singers and organizing the admirable opera company at present delighting the ears and elevating the tastes of the frequenters of the Melbourne Theatre Royal. Actors of burlesque, dancers of breakdowns, conjurors, and "nigger" melodists are capital things in their way. As sources of amusement—one of the necessities of healthy human existence—they are not to be despised, but they can scarcely be regarded in the light of public educators. Of the lyric drama, as it is now being rendered in this city, it may be affirmed that it is something more than a recreation—it is an instrument of art development. There are persons, of course, to whom this assertion will seem ridiculous—good pachydermatous souls, who are no more moved by a strain of Donizetti or a chorus of Meyerbeer than by the rattle of mill machinery or the thunder of quarts-stampers. We are happy to knowing, however, that there are many thousands in this colony whose spirits are capable of elevation under the influence of musical interpretation, and who regard it as no slight privilege to have the opportunity presented to them of further lyrical culture. To these Messrs. Lyster and Smith's speculation will commend itself as a public boon, and its success will be regarded as a desideratum of importance to others besides the firm personally interested.

In appraising the value of the musical artists Mr. Lyster has brought amongst us, it must not be forgotten that we are necessitated to use as Australian, and not a European standard. For us this is the day of comparatively small things. We cannot hope to tempt to a voyage round the world a Patti or a Tietjens, a Gioglini or a Reeves. Our seven-and-sixpence, grudgingly given, cannot compete with the guineas of London, Paris, and St. Petersburgh. But, considering our resources, and the out over liberal manner in which our local impresarios are disposed to patronise such enterprises, the general verdict, which has been pronounced highly laudatory of the opera troupe now before the public, must be regarded as a just one. There will be additional cause for gratulation should the speculation prove a commercial success. We must recollect not only what this enterprise is in itself, but what, if successful, it promises for the future. These artists have been engaged for their world-round venture in the central operatic market of Europe, and through the medium of the most famous musical contractor.

To their brethren in Italy they are reliable pioneers. Impresarios of music are not famous for their possession of general information, and doubtless to the operatic alumni of Milan, Australia is as much a terra incognita as are the northernmost steppes of Russia to ourselves. How much, then, depends on their good or ill report of us—how much, that is to say, to these genuine lovers of the divine art who hope to see opera an annual and not an occasional institution in this city! Australia may be declared to be a civilized land, containing towns not altogether undesirable as places of residence; but, after all, the money result will be the vital test, both to the home friends of the artists, and to the astute Donatelli, through whose agency they contracted the engagement. Let them be in a position to inform their friends that their money claims have all been promptly settled, and Australia will come to be regarded by the musicians of Italy as within the circle of speculative possibilities. There will be no need for further voyages of discovery, like that which Mr. Lyster has so happily concluded. The Italian market will be open to us, and the musical current will set this way as long as we can offer auriferous attraction.

We trust, then, there is no occasion for us to commend these melodious missionaries to the good graces of the public here or elsewhere in Australasia, but that everywhere they will be received in a manner worthy of the art they elucidate and the skill they undoubtedly possess. There is no description of public amusement so acceptable to refined minds as that which they offer, and it will be a reproach to the taste and the cultivation of these colonies if it fail to secure a warm welcome and substantial recognition.

C. H.

By way of "improving the occasion" of the plébiscite, M. Schott has published a Valse de Salon, entitled "Oui ou Non."

WHAT IS NEW MUST BE GOOD.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Not in a complaining spirit, but merely as a reminder, would I put in my humble protest against the apparent neglect which has befallen the two new oratorios produced for the first time last week. Call them cantatas if the name suits better, that matters nothing. Perfectly new works have a claim to something more than an ambiguous notice, en passant, of five or ten lines.

What would be said of a sporting journal, such as the Era or Bell's Life, coming out on the Saturday after the Derby and Oaks had been run on the preceding Tuesday, Wednesday, or even Thursday, with a meagre ambiguous two-and-one paragraph of ten lines. Ask journals of that kind what would you think of such a procedure in contemporary journalism. Of course the reporter was otherwise engaged. The golden locks of some thousand-and-first Amina or Traviata had charms for him which a new sacred work could not for a moment countenance. And, besides, after the weekly newspapers proper had given extended notices of the oratorios it would be so easy to dish up an article on the following week. In calling your attention to the almost total neglect, and provoking the barest possible notices of Mr. Barnby's Rebekah, and Mr. Limpus's Prodigal's Return, of new extensive works of a thoughtful cast, I feel that such remonstrance is, even at the grave peril of calling down from your dread editorial throne vengeance on any unhappy interloper who may have the temerity to expostulate, imperatively thrust upon me. Surely a journal devoted to music should record new events of such importance and rarity as the first performance, with adequate talent, of a new oratorio—the very highest order of composition. No, on the contrary, after lavesting his subscription in the Musical World one habitual reader has to seek such news in perchance the Weekly Dispatch, which happened last Sunday to give a very intelligent account of both these new and important works. Of course there were three or four columns of abuse about Wagner, and the customary warm and impolite adjective, that would become the utterances neither of barbarian nor civilian, cast at the head of some unfortunate correspondent who perchance had something to say not altogether in unison with editorial infallibility; but, at the risk of coming in for a share of your disapprobation I humbly ask whether such an oversight is not worth, for the World's own sake, some revision. The executant is placed too frequently in advance of the original writer; and too often the musical reporter appears to imagine that he is called upon to utter a strong opinion pro or con., when his vocation would be magnified by the more simple record of actual facts.—Yours, very truly. GEORGE TOLHURST.

Maidstone, May 17th, 1870.

[We are thoroughly charmed with the letter of Mr. Tolhurst, whose fellow-feeling makes him wondrous kind. We only wish that we had more correspondents of such spirit. We are aware that every man who writes an oratorio must be a genius. Mr. Tolhurst himself once wrote an oratorio. For our own parts we are generally thankful to men who don't write oratorios. We wish there were more of them.—A. S. S.]

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS.

The first concert of the interesting series announced by Mr. Henry Leslie took place in St. James's Hall on Wednesday week, and attracted a large and distinguished audience. Mdlle. Nilsson was advertised to take a prominent part, but, unfortunately, illness kept her at home, and Madame Sinico did her best to fill the Diva's place. As a matter of course some disappointment was felt, but it gradually wore off under the influence of a capital performance. The concert opened with Rossini's Stabat Mater, solos by Madame Sinico, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Mongini, and Mr. Santley. This favourite and always attractive work had an excellent rendering, the choruses being equal to the solos in point of effect. It is easy to imagine how the two ladies above-named acquitted themselves in music so purely vocal and melodious. Signor Mongini was also effective in the solos, "Cujus est homo," which made a great impression. Signor Mongini was loudly applauded for a striking performance of "Cujus animam," and Mr. Santley's "Pro peccatis" proved not less excellent than heretofore. Most prominent in the second part of the concert was Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor played by Madame Arabella Goddard. The distinguished pianist was very warmly received, and after going through her work in a style we must in justice call unequalled, she was summoned back to the platform with marked unanimity. Rarely has any artist obtained a more genuine success. Other features in the selection were "Maggari," sung by Signor Mongini and encored, and "Home, sweet home," charmingly given by Madame Sinico. T. E.

KONIGSBERG.—The hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth will be celebrated here, on the 7th, 8th, and 9th, June. The great features of the festival will be the performance, on an imposing scale, of the Missa solemnis and the Ninth Symphony.

Digitized by Google

MARTA AT DRURY LANE.

Marta was given, for the first time this season, on Monday night, and was received with as much favour as ever. We are not the arbitrators of conflicting opinions about M. Flotow's opera, and need only point out that for fifteen years it has kept a position before the public; being, perhaps, more firmly established now than at any previous time. Were this the case only among ourselves, "The Last Rose of Summer"—of which popular air such large use is made—would, in some degree, explain it. But Marta is not less a favourite where the Irish melody appeals to no old associations and excites no special feeling. Fifteen years of general esteem on its own merits has, therefore, been the good fortune of Marta, and the fact signifies much that needs no expression.

The Lady Enrichetta of Monday night was Madame Volpini, who made her entrée in the character. Madame Volpini will be remembered as having appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre a few years ago, and as having been, only last season, one of the many attractions of London concert-rooms. Her merits, therefore, are pretty well known to the musical public, and the degree of her success in Marta was scarcely doubtful. We may say at once that Madame Volpini was in high favour with the audience throughout the evening. Gifted with a light and flexible soprano voice, of sympathetic quality and being in many respects a finished singer—endowed, moreover, with the sine qui non of "first ladies" a pleasing appearance—this result was the most natural in the world. A dramatic artist, whatever Madame Volpini does is done in a graceful and unaffected style which can hardly fail to please. The action of presenting Tristano with the bouquet, furnished a striking case in point, and was accompanied by a "shake" which, for closeness and brilliancy, could not easily be surpassed. Without entering into the details of singing which we may describe as almost uniformly good, it will suffice to mention that "Qui sola, vergin' rosa" (The Last Rose) was received with acclamation, and encored by an audience well qualified to judge the manner of its delivery. Madame Volpini was frequently and heartily applauded, but her success in Flotow's adapted melody contributed more than anything else to a satisfactory début.

Madame Trebelli-Bettini sang and acted with her customary effect as Nancy. The part could scarcely be in better hands; while assuredly no other could sing the music in better style. "Il tuo stral nel lanciar" again afforded the popular contralto an opportunity, of which she availed herself to the utmost. Signor Bettini sang carefully as Lionello, and obtained an encore for "M'appari." To praise Mr. Santley's Plumkette is as needless as to mention that a repetition of the "Beer song" was demanded. Signor Zoboli made as funny and ridiculous a Tristano as could be desired. Of course his efforts to make the audience laugh were much aided by the extraordinary costume which operatic tradition assigns to English noblemen in the reign of Anne. Apropos of this matter, however, "Sir Tristan di Mickleford, d'Inghilterra pari e lord baronetto e gran scudiero," must have been an extraordinary personage. We have only to add that the chorus and orchestra did well.

THADDEUS EGG.

MARTA AT COVENT GARDEN.

Marta at Drury Lane, on Monday, was followed by Marta at Covent Garden, on Tuesday. In the latter case no new soprano made her début, the prima donna of the evening being, however, one whom lovers of Flotow's opera would hardly change for ever so great a novelty.

That the Lady Enrichetta of Madame Patti is among her most attractive impersonations few require to be told. The character of the part and the predominant lightsomeness of the music are exactly suited to Madame Patti's genius. Hence the uniform success of Marta when given with her co-operation, so far as success depends on a well-nigh perfect representation of the chief personage concerned. To say that Madame Patti sang from first to last with all needful vivacity or all needful sentiment, as the case might be, is superfluous. She has too often asserted her great command of varied styles to make the result of an appearance in Marta for a moment doubtful. The special success of the evening was, of course, obtained in "Qui sola, vergin rosa," than which nothing could be given with greater propriety of expression, or greater charm of delivery. Answering to a demand for its repetition, Madame Patti sang the melody to Moore's beautiful verses with, if possible, still greater effect. She must be mainly credited, moreover, with the encore awarded to the "Spinning-wheel" quartet, in which her brilliant vocalization was very conspicuous.

In some respects Mdlle. Scalchi did good service as Nancy. Her acting was intelligent if not striking, and in such parts of the music as suited her style—notably in the soliloquy, "Esser mesto il mio cor"—she made a legitimate success. On the other hand there were passages which required greater vivacity of manner and agility of voice. Lionello was represented by Signor Urio, an artist well known to frequenters of last year's summer concerts at the Crystal Palace. Judging by the applause of Tuesday night's audience, and by the encore awarded to "M'appari," this gentleman may be a serviceable addition to the Covent Garden tenors. His voice, while somewhat hard in quality, is sufficiently powerful, and of extensive compass the upper notes, moreover, being delivered with resonance and ease. Upon the precise claims of Signor Urio as a dramatic singer, we would rather not pronounce after one hearing. That he will shortly appear again admits of little doubt. Signor Graziani's Plumkette was in no respect other than what we have known it on former occasions. The part suits him well and he sings the music with care. His rendering of the "Beer song" obtained the encore to which, by this time, it has acquired a prescriptive right. Signor Tagliafico was a demonstrative Tristano, and is an artist with thoroughly independent notions, his independence extending even to matters of costume. For example, he appeared as an English nobleman of 160 years ago, wearing "tights," borrowed, we should say, from the wardrobe of Rigoletto the Jester.

THADDEUS EGG.

THERE is a rumour that the director of the Brussels Théâtre de la Monnaie intends to take his company to Paris for the purpose of playing Lohengrin at the Italiens.

PAREPA-ROSA AT CHICAGO.

(From the "Chicago Tribune," April 20.)

If Parepa-Rosa had never done anything more for music in Chicago than to introduce Weber's Oberon, she would have merited the lasting gratitude of all lovers of music. Any music from the man who wrote Der Freischütz, and Precioso must always be warmly welcomed, and in producing this she has set the seal upon her great success, and in closing her season crowns it with the best representation of her musical genius. Parepa has, in past seasons, made unmistakable successes in the Traviatore, the Marriage of Figaro, Martha, and other operas, and especially in her matchless oratorio vocalization; but we think she will be longest remembered in her personation of Reiza, and that more pleasant memories will cluster around the efforts of all the artists in Weber's romantic opera than in any other. We must not forget Mr. Carl Rosa. During the comparatively short time in which he has held the operatic baton he has rapidly risen, and, by his untiring zeal and industry, his quick and accurate musical perceptions, now occupies a commanding position as an orchestral conductor of opera. This was manifest in his production of the Marriage of Figaro. It is more palpably manifest in Oberon. The manner in which he controls his players, giving spirit and shading to the instrumentation and enthusiasm and life to the artists, shows that he possesses analytical powers, joined to imagination, entitling him to conduct any operatic work. It is no child's play to prepare and conduct such operas as the Marriage of Figaro and Oberon, and the tact and skill of a man who proves himself competent to do it successfully deserves hearty recognition.

* * * * * * *

"Ocean, thou mighty Monster," thoroughly descriptive, and in keeping with the subject, was a fitting theme for Parepa to illustrate with her boundless resources. She herself is a theme of magnitude, and never rises to her full height and to the perfect exercise of her powers until singing of oceans, rocks, and mountains, or in such works as the Creation and the Messiah. For once, therefore, we have had an opportunity of hearing her at her best, and her singing was almost like an inspiration. It was never grander, never more in earnest, than when she recited this apostrophe to ocean, with the richness and purity of her voice, and all the resources of her finished technique.

The opera was mounted beautifully, and some of the scenery, especially the vision of Reiza, the view of Bagdad and the port of Ascalon, admirable in spectacular effect. The costuming, also, was very rich, and the opera may be set down as a great success. This evening Martha will be given.

ABBÉ LISZT will remain at Weimar till the end of June, in order to assist at the model representations of Wagner's operas. Among the works decided upon are Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Tristan und Isolde and the Meistersänger. Dr. Gunz is engaged to take part, and Herr Wagner himself is expected to be present.

Digitized by Google

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S
Beethoven Recitals.
1870.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ has the honour to announce that his TENTH SERIES of PIANOFORTE RECITALS will take place on the following Afternoons:—

Friday, May 27, | Friday, June 17,
Friday, June 3, | Friday, June 24,
Friday, June 10,
To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely.

This year being the Centenary of the birth of Beethoven, who came into the world, at Bonn, on the Rhine, December 17, 1770, Mr. Hallé has considered it becoming and appropriate to devote his series of Recitals exclusively to the music of that illustrious composer.

The programmes as on previous occasions, consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, p.m.

Mr. Hallé is assisted at all the Recitals by

HERR STOCKHAUSEN,

who will sing Schubert's collection of songs entitled "The Fair Maid of the Mill," accompanied by Mr. Hallé.

Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the sonatas will, as on previous occasions, accompany the programmes.

THE FOURTH RECITAL
WILL TAKE PLACE ON
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 27TH, 1870,
To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

PART I.

SONATA, quasi Fantasia, Op. 27, No. 1 .. .. Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Morgengruss" (Morning Greeting) / "Des Müllers Blumen" (The Miller's Flowers) } .. .. Schubert.
Herr STOCKHAUSEN.
SONATA, quasi Fantasia, Op. 27 No. 2 .. .. Beethoven.

PART II.

GRAND SONATA (The Pastoral), Op. 28 .. .. Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Mein" (Mine) / "Pause" (A pause) } —Herr STOCKHAUSEN .. .. Schubert.
SONATA, Op. 29 (31), No. 1 .. .. Beethoven.

Prices of Admission (for the Series).—Sofa Stalls (numbered and reserved), £2 2s. Balcony, £1.

For One Recital—Sofa Stalls, 7s.; Balcony, 5s.; Area, 1s.

Subscriptions received at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co.'s, 48, Cheapside; Hays, 4, Exchange Buildings; Austin's Ticket Office, 28, Piccadilly; and by Mr. Charles Hallé, 11, Mansfield Street, Cavendish Square.

DEATHS.

On May 6, JULIA, the beloved wife of J. REDI, Esq., of 28, Bloomsbury Street—aged 48.

On May 13, ELIZABETH, widow of Dr. CAMIDGE, of York—aged 75.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1870.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—A paragraph has appeared in several papers, said to be copied from the Musical World, respecting the Vicar of Richmond, and containing statements calculated to do injury, as they mention facts contrary to the truth. The Vicar did not, as stated, refuse permission for the fire-escape to be placed in the churchyard solely on account of its being "consecrated ground," but by the wish of a large number of his parishioners, who objected to the site for many reasons, and chiefly on account of its being almost inaccessible. With regard to the choir-boys, the concert referred it was not given in aid of the Richmond Infirmary, or for any other charity. I am sorry to trouble you with this matter. Whoever your informant may have been, the case has been misrepresented, and I trust you will not object to contradicting the statement.—I am, Sir, your faithful servant,

* * *

Richmond, Surrey, May 19th, 1870.

[We have, we need hardly say, the greatest pleasure in inserting the foregoing letter, and in giving it the most conspicuous place in our columns.—ED. M. W.]

THE Committee of the Vienna Beethoven Centenary have issued the following address or manifesto:—

"To celebrate Beethoven's hundredth birthday in a manner becoming the importance of the Master himself, and corresponding to the position occupied by Vienna in the world of music, the representatives of the various artistic and scientific bodies of that capital have combined to form a Festival Committee, who have drawn up a programme, which has been sanctioned in the proper quarter. The Beethoven Centenary Festival will be held on the four days, from the 23d to the 26th October, 1870. In the morning of the 23d, there will be a musical solemnity in a provisional 'Monumental Square,' preceded by a procession to that spot. In the evening there will be a festival performance of Fidelio in the Imperial Operahouse. On the 24th, a performance of the Missa solemnis, in the large Hall of the Society of the Friends of Music. On the 25th, a grand banquet in the same locality. On the 26th, at noon, a grand concert, consisting of chamber-music, vocal compositions, and the Ninth Symphony, also in the same locality. In the evening, a performance of Egmont, by the artists of the Imperial Burg Theater, and the orchestra of the Imperial Operahouse. The leading musicians of Germany will be invited to attend the concerts, and the most highly esteemed masters have offered to act as Festival Conductors. To give the Festival a grand representative character by large numbers of the great composer's admirers participating in the proceedings, the Festival Committee have determined on establishing a special Festival Association the members of which, assisted by the undersigned Festival Committee, shall arrange all the proceedings. The members of the Association, in addition to receiving the Festival Badge and the Festival Medal, will be entitled to take part in the grand procession, or to a seat in the stand erected in the 'Monument Square.' They will, also, enjoy the right of securing places for the concerts and performances before any one else, according to the date of their admission into the Association, and the space available. The fee for membership is ten florins; receipts will be given for any additional contributions. The net proceeds of the Festival are to be devoted to forming a Beethoven Fund,—for assisting musicians in necessitous circumstances—and a Beethoven Monument Fund. The Festival Committee, therefore, invite all admirers of Beethoven to belong to the Association. Promises of contributions, and payments, will be received at the offices of the Society of the Friends of Music, Vienna."

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A CORRESPONDENT ("Otto Beard") writes to suggest that, considering the thousands upon thousands of pounds which Rossini's Barbiere has, in the course of twenty years and upwards, brought to Covent Garden, Dr. Bartolo might be provided with a new house, and Rossini with a better furnished drawing-room. Mr. Beard should state his grievance to Mr. Augustus Harris.

ACCORDING to report from Munich, the fire-effects in Herr R. Wagner's Walküre are accompanied by an amount of danger that would fully justify the attendance at the doors of the theatre of all the fire engines and all the firemen in the Bavarian capital, whenever there is a performance or even a rehearsal of the aforesaid masterpiece. We should think that no assurance company would like to grant a policy on the building. But what does that matter to Herr Wagner? He has enough assurance himself alone for all the companies that ever even issued a prospectus.—Herr Nachbaur, the Wagnerian vocalist, has just been highly distinguished. His Bavarian Majesty granted him a long audience, in which he was pleased to congratulate the fortunate son of song on having been honoured by the Grand Duke of Hesse with the large medal for Art and Science.

Digitized by Google

The following is from the Echo of Wednesday the 18th inst:—

"The Musical World is responsible for the almost incredible statement that the Rev. C. T. Procter, Vicar of Richmond, has refused to allow the choir-boys of the parish church to sing at a concert in aid of the Richmond Infirmary, on the ground that they might be required to sing secular music. Is not this the same gentleman that refused to allow a fire-escape to stand in his churchyard, because he would not have such a thing in 'consecrated' ground? We have heard people object to sacred music at a concert, and the objection is at least intelligible, but an objection to secular music, in the abstract, is worthy of the worst days of Puritanism. Does Mr. Procter take fright at the word 'secular' which has been so badly used in the Education controversy, or does he consider that a choir-boy is devoted to the exclusive service of the Church? In any case we should advise him in future to give his decisions without furnishing his reasons. It is always possible to imagine that there is a good reason for a plain 'No,' and no man is bound to make public his own intellectual aberrations."

The Musical World is no more responsible than all the rest of the London and provincial press.

THE two conductors of the Theatre at Leipsic, who went to Berlin for the purpose of witnessing the performance of the Meistersinger, have returned full of enthusiasm for that specimen of Herr R. Wagner's Muse. They state that the opposition manifested by Judaism in Music in the Prussian capital is directed against the composer personally. On which the Berlin Echo very properly remarks:—

"And we beg to state that the view taken by the worthy conductors is utterly erroneous: Judaism has nothing in the world to do with the Berlin opposition. On the contrary, since the appearance of the celebrated pamphlet, Judaism has preserved a most becoming neutrality at all the performances of Herr Wagner's works, from Rienzi to Die Meistersinger."

The chef-d'œuvre is to be produced at Leipsic, but, as it requires so much time to get up, it cannot be ready before the middle of next winter. This is a fact which will, doubtless, not be overlooked by theatre-goers whose subscriptions expire on the 31st of January. "Forewarned, forearmed." At any rate, people cannot be compelled to hear Herr Wagner's operas. They are not yet what military service is in Prussia —an ordeal through which every one must pass.

PROFESSOR LUDWIG VON BRENNER, Imperial Russian Conductor at St. Petersburgh, composed, some time since, a St. George's March for grand orchestra, on the occasion of the centenary jubilee of the Imperial Russian Military Order of the said warlike saint. For this march, the various sovereigns who are knights of the Order appear to be unusually grateful, if we may judge by the unanimity—as wonderful as that of the personages in The Critic—with which they have showered marks of their favour on the lucky composer. From the Emperor of Russia, Professor von Brenner received a gold snuff-box, set with brilliants and displaying the Imperial miniature and initials; from the King of Prussia, the Order of the Crown; from the ex-King Francis II. of Naples, the Order of Merit (first class) for Art and Science, of Francisca I.; from the Grand Princess Constantine, Nicholaus, and Michael, diamond breast-pins; from Prince Albert of Prussia, a gold snuff-box set with diamonds; from Prince Friedrich Carl of Prussia, his portrait in a rich gold frame; and from Prince Alexander of Hesse, the Hessian Order of Merit.

SINCE the seventeenth century there has existed in Russia a society of singers, destined for the religious ceremonies of the Court. The members of the society came from Kiew, and followed the Court from Moscow to St. Petersburgh. At present there are fifty singers, basses, tenors, contraltos, sopranos (young boys). Most of them are younger sons of Russian priests, the eldest sons succeeding to their fathers in the ministry. The boys are received into the society from the age of nine, the Emperor providing for their maintenance and elementary education, until they are seventeen, the period at which the voice changes. If at the end of these studies they have no vocation for singing, they are at liberty to follow other callings. A director is at the head of the establishment, besides whom there are professors, singing masters, choir masters, and an inspector-general. The Imperial choir is employed solely in Divine service celebrated at Court, and it is an exceptional case when its members are permitted to take part in concerts for charitable purposes.

THE Théâtre de la Monnaie, at Brussels, is closed for the season, the last opera given being Lohengrin, which was played on the occasion for the twentieth time. But though Herr R. Wagner certainly shut up the theatre in one sense, candour requires us to state that it was not because his Lohengrin proved a failure. On the contrary, it was such a hit that, according to the local papers, it enabled the manager to prolong the season beyond its ordinary limits. Well, it is no more use disputing de gustibus, than cum gustibus, as the gentleman observed—or might have observed—when a sudden puff of wind blew his hat into the sea, as we were walking on the Margate jetty. And, after all, what is taste? In the case of the braves Belges and Lohengrin, it might fairly be asserted—by our Irish contributor—that taste is want of taste.

APPEAL ON BEHALF OF SIX YOUNG ORPHANS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—May I be permitted through the medium of your columns to make an earnest appeal on behalf of the six orphan children of the late Mr. and Mrs. Evans, of 12, Gillies Street, Kentish Town, whose sudden death—both having recently died within three weeks of each other—have left them totally unprovided for, and, with the exception of an aunt, without a relation in the world. Mr. Evans was a professional tenor vocalist, who first appeared before the public at the oratorios conducted by Mr. John Hullah, and since occasionally at those of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The aunt (Miss Shaw), with true woman's feelings, has determined nobly to act the part of a mother to these two poor children—the youngest of whom is not three years old—and endeavour to support them by keeping a school. It is for the purpose of assisting her in such efforts that this appeal is made. The Committee of the Benevolent Fund of the Sacred Harmonic Society and several kind friends have promised contributions; but the extent of the need demands a larger measure of help than can be thus obtained. The case is strongly recommended, and contributions will be most thankfully received, by the Rev. C. Lee, M.A., Vicar of Holy Trinity, Haverstock Hill; the Rev. W. Calvert, M.A., F.S.A., St. John's Parsonage, Kentish Town; W. Slyman, Esq., M.R.C.S., Caversham Road, N.W.; Mr. Cox, 14, Gillies Street, Kentish Town; at the London and Westminster Bank, St. James's Square, S.W.; and by yours, &c.,

J. F. PUTTICK.

26, King Street, Covent Garden, May 16.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

SELECT CONCERT.—A few days since a fashionable company assembled at a concert given by Mrs. Henry Davies, of George Street, Hanover Square. This was the first appearance of Mrs. Davies in the London musical world since her protracted sojourn on the Continent. She was assisted by Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Angela, Mr. John Thomas, and Herr Carl Reinecke. Several compositions of the gentlemen named were performed. The pianoforte and harp performances of Mrs. Davies were warmly appreciated.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Operas after operas succeed each other with such rapidity at this part of the season that it is necessary to "take time by the forelock," and say what is to be said of them as early as possible. The performance of Mozart's Don Giovanni, the other night, may be described in a sentence or two. It was a success for Mdlle. Tietjens and a success for Mdlle. Adelina Patti, who represented two of the principal characters—Donna Anna and Zerlina. These artists, each inimitable in her line, were over more admirable than on the occasion under notice. In the great recitative and air ("Or che sai qui l'indegno"), when Donna Anna recounts to the placid Don Ottavio the story of her wrongs, Mdlle. Tietjens displayed all her wonted excellence as a practised lyric declaimer; while in those personally fresh and charming airs allotted to the volatile Zerlina—"Batti batti bel Masetto," and "Vedrai Carino,"

Digitized by Google

Madame Patti exhibited all her well-known perfection as singer and actress, winning unanimous encores. "La ci darem," the love duet with Don Giovanni, earned a similar compliment for the popular songstress, who never more convincingly proved herself the best Zerlina the present generation has witnessed. The other characters were sustained by Signor Graziani (Don Giovanni), Madame Vanzini (Donna Elvira), Signor Ciampi (Leporello), Signor Tagliafico (Masetto), and Signor Casaboni (the Commandant). Apart from the points we have referred to, this performance of Mozart's dramatic masterpiece was hardly fitted to sustain the high repute of the Covent Garden Opera. But, as it was on what is termed an "off-night," it should not, perhaps, be scrutinized too closely. Anything more original than Herr Wachtel's singing in "Dalla sua pace," and "Il mio tesoro," we have not, for a long time, heard.

About Mdlle. Pauline Lucca's first appearance for the season a line or so may equally suffice. The work selected for her was the very familiar opera of Faust e Margherita. Of the Margherita of Mdlle. Pauline Lucca we have spoken so frequently that to enter into a fresh analysis of it would either be to charge our musical readers with a defect of memory, or to assume that what was written has never been read. The impulsive little Teutonic songstress was completely mistress of her means, and rarely has her splendid soprano voice been in more splendid order; rarely has she sung with more power, or acted with more feeling and intensity. To single out once again, from so much that is excellent, what is still best of all—the scene where the repentant Margherita, missal in hand, vainly endeavours to pray in the cathedral, was fully as impressive as of old. Mdlle. Lucca conceives and renders out this interesting situation in a manner as individual as it is natural and effective. We do not quite appreciate her delivery of the "Jewel song" in the Garden scene (although here we are at variance with the audience, who heartily encored it); but we can imagine nothing more impassioned and tender than the love duet with Faust, in which Mdlle. Lucca enjoyed the co-operation of Signor Mario, of all the Fausts we have been introduced to in this country still the Faust who reigns supreme. No wonder that this duet, given with such consummate feeling on both sides, brought down the curtain amid loud and unanimous applause. Mdlle. Lucca could hardly have returned to us, after her brief absence, under more favourable auspices. Her performances throughout was a genuine success—and, what is better, a deserved one. The other characters were sustained by Mdlle. Scalchi (Siebel), M. Petit (Mephistophiles), Signor Graziani (Valentine), Mdlle. Anese (Martha), and Signor Tagliafico (Wagner)—in each instance we need hardly add, with efficiency. The orchestra and chorus were all that could be wished; and the picturesque mise-en-scène, which so greatly enhances the effect of M. Gounod's opera at Coveut Garden, met with its accustomed recognition.

Thursday week was the Sonnambula, with Madame Adelina Patti as Amina, the character which, nine years since, first made her known to the English public, and a new word about her performance of which would be superfluous. Enough that, from "Care compagne," in the opening scene, to "Ah non giunge," in the last, she was received with the old enthusiasm. Among the audience were the Prince and Princess of Wales. Herr Wachtel was an obstreperous Elvino, and Signor Bagaglio (who must not be confounded with King Bagaglio, of Morte Arthur) a mild Rodolpho. Lisa was impersonated by Mdlle. Bauermeister, and Teresa by Mdlle. Anese.

About the Favorita, which was played on the following evening, with Mdlle. Lucca as Leonora, and Signor Mario as Ferdinando, we need say no more than that Mdlle. Lucca's impersonation presented all its old characteristics, being, as usual, most intensely interesting in the scene of the cloisters (Donizetti's serious masterpiece); and that Signor Mario's acting, where Ferdinando rejects Leonora indignantly at the entrevue projected for him by the King, whom he has served too well, was as magnificent as ever, creating in the house one of those sensations as rare as the exhibitions of consummate dramatic art of which they are but the just recognition. The other characters were sustained by Signor Graziani (Alphonso XI.), Signor Bagaglio (Baldassare), and Mdlle. Bauermeister (Inez).

Faust was repeated on Monday, and the Barbiere last night. About Martha (with Madame Patti and the new tenor, Signor Urio), and about Hamlet, with Mdlle. Sessi as Ophelia, Mdlle. Tietjens as the Queen, and Signor Cotogni as Hamlet, we must speak in our next. Martha was played on Tuesday, and Hamlet on Thursday.

"MADLE. NILSSON," says the New York Weekly Review, "has been secured by Mr. Strakosch. This is the latest news which stirs the passions of our musical community. Whether she receives 1,500, 1,200, or 1,000 dollars in gold for every appearance, is of very little consequence to us, although it seems to be made the chief topic of the conversation about her. Enough, that she will come to us next autumn and give us an opportunity to judge for ourselves of her merits as a vocalist.

TWO NEW WORKS.

We are fond of condoling one with the other upon the scarcity of native musical talent; and of wondering whether in the revolution of all things, it will ever come to the turn of England to distinguish herself as a mother of musical genius. At the same time, there are composers among us who, if they were asked, would say that we take a pessimist view of the case, and who prove the sincerity of their opinion by giving proof practical that they consider themselves able to do the highest and most exacting musical feat. Hence the oratorios and cantatas which succeed each other with tolerable rapidity; and hence those—a far greater number—which we may reasonably assume to be lying in obscurity, waiting a favourable moment to see the light. An oratorio and a cantata have been produced during the week just ended; and it becomes our duty to assess their merits as well as we can with—be it added—every disposition to find merit and to rejoice over it.

Mr. Limpus was, no doubt, placed in a somewhat awkward position when he discovered that Mr. A. S. Sullivan had taken the same subject and had got the start of him in treating it. There is room, however, for both works, especially as their have very little in common. The Rebecca of the Prodigal's Return differs from that of the Prodigal Son, and the music runs in altogether a separate groove. Mr. Sullivan follows Mendelssohn; Mr. Limpus follows a master who flourished long before the composer of St. Paul, and their paths lead them widely apart. Frankly, we do not like Mr. Limpus's book. It rigidly avoids anything approaching to dramatic interest, and is not only didactic, but didactic with a vengeance. As in Mr. Sullivan's case, the incident of the elder brother is ignored, and the story thus maimed is broken up into texts, upon each of which a sermon is preached. Take one example:—

Text.—"And when he had spent all there arose a mighty famine in that land, and he began to be in want." Sermon.—"Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered; let those that hate Him flee before Him. Like as the smoke vanisheth, so shalt Thou drive them away; like as the wax melteth at the fire, so let the ungodly perish."

"Father, scorned and slighted Dost Thou see Thy child?" &c.

"Terrors are turned upon me; they pursue my soul as the wind. My welfare passeth away as a cloud." "The wicked flee when no man pursueth."

We will not enlarge upon the doubtful taste which calls upon God to "arise" against a poor miserable swineherd, and which indulges wishes for his "enemies" worthy of David in his most ferocious mood. Rather let us point out that a libretto so constructed scarcely brings the work under the head of oratorio. There is nothing of the religious drama about it; it is simply a musical preachment; natural, perhaps, to Mr. Limpus, who is a musical clergyman, but none the less misnamed an oratorio.

As regards the music there is a good deal to be said in favour of the reverend composer. Mr. Limpus has evidently been industrious at the work of cultivating and developing his natural gifts. He can write, for example, fluent and thoroughly vocal melodies, which, though not remarkable for originality or beauty, are, at all events, pleasing. Added to this is the result of careful theoretical study. In his choruses—most of them treated fugally—there is clear and correct writing only possible to a man who has real aptitude, and who has made the best use of his opportunities. We could cite numerous examples as showing how, in a perfectly legitimate fashion, Mr. Limpus secures genuine effects. This is enough to prove the composer a good musician; likely, within a certain limit, to do creditable things. But it by no means establishes his pretensions as a writer of oratorio, who must, above all, have imagination and creative power. Mr. Limpus seems to have felt his weakness in this matter; and to have resolved upon doing nothing on his own account with regard to it. We have known composers less modest; those who, crediting themselves with qualifications really like the proverbial chateau en Espagne, have come forward with music perfectly original, but from the presence of which all men flee at the earliest moment. Mr. Limpus has shown himself wiser, and at the outset, we opine, resolved not to split upon the rock of originality. The model he selected does credit to his taste. Few young composers think of copying Handel now-a-days. The fashion is to look upon the old master as "played out" with all but the multitude who run after him, because it is according to precedent so to do. They look with a sort of lofty compassion upon the great man's characteristics, and no more think of adopting them than of wearing full-bottomed wigs and rubies. Here again Mr. Limpus has been wiser than his composers. Recognizing the true master of oratorio, the man who wrote religious music of the grandest and most exalted order, he has put himself in close communion with that great genius; and the result is such as we see it in the Prodigal's Return. For the most part, Mr. Limpus has followed his model with conscientious care; only departing from it in certain of the airs which suggest other reminiscences. We are bound to say, however, that he has followed it a little too closely, and given us, what we do not want, a kind of modified Handel. Physiologists point out that, in certain instances, where two persons have been living together many years in intimate communion and sympathy, their features gradually assimilate, and, out of the two original faces, comes one type for both. Something of the sort appears—on one side at least—to have resulted from the communion of Mr. Limpus with Handel. He has not only caught the more prominent characteristics of the master, but he has reproduced him with the exactness an Academy student might be expected to show in a copy of Rubens. Occasionally this exactness becomes ludicrous, and makes us wonder if Mr. Limpus has so absorbed Handel into himself as not to know whether he utters his own ideas or those of his familiar spirit. Having said so much we reach the point whence the Prodigal's Return must be chiefly considered. It is, beyond doubt, a clever imitation, showing much facility, much knowledge of the subject, and many gifts we should like to see associated with a greater amount of independent thought.

Digitized by Google

The performances in St. James's Hall on Tuesday week was conducted by Mr. Benedict, and the solos were confided to Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, who each and all did entire justice to their respective parts. Several pieces were encored, and at the close Mr. Limpus was "called" to receive the ovation usual in such cases.

Mr. Joseph Barnby's Rebekah is entitled "A Sacred idyll in two scenes." The libretto, by Mr. Arthur Matthison, confines itself entirely to the business of Eliezer and Rebekah at the well, and to the meeting of Isaac and his bride, as the latter drew near to the patriarchal camp. Hence there is great unity about the narrative, the thread of which, if it have a thread, can hardly be lost. Mr. Matthison has treated his subject in a imaginative and poetical fashion, idealising actual facts, as he had a perfect right, and was, in some sort, bound to do. Take, as an example, the conduct attributed to Rebekah on hearing the object of Eliezer's mission. Mr. Matthison puts these words into the young girl's mouth:—"My soul this day hath been in joyous tumult, and my heart foretold me ere the night should come, glad tidings would be brought unto me. Oftimes in sleep have visions of thine image blessed me, O beloved? Oftimes hath fancy pictured to my soul thy hand enclasped in mine, thy loving kiss upon my brow! And freely, gladly, to thy love I come." This is very pretty, we grant, and confirms the romantic notion that "marriages are made in heaven." Nevertheless the fact was that when Eliezer presented Rebekah with a golden earring of half a shekel weight, and two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight of gold (vide Genesis xxiv. 22), the damsel, like a natural and unsophisticated damsel, ran home to tell her mother, thinking no more of Isaac than her parents thought of consulting herself when they made up their minds as they should go. This however, by the way; and we have only to add that Mr. Matthison has produced a libretto which answered Mr. Barnby's purpose very well by giving all needful scope for effect. Addressing ourselves to a study of the music we expected to note the influence of M. Gounod more or less apparent. Former works by Mr. Barnby clearly revealed his predilection for that showy and shallow French composer, and we are glad to find that it is in this case considerably diminished. As a matter of fact, Mr. Barnby has deserted Gounod for Spohr. Some may declare that the change merely involves looking at the same ideal through a German instead of a French medium; but, at any rate, we congratulate Mr. Barnby on having made it. Spohr, with all his faults, was a master who founded a school of his own, fascinating enough at one time to bid highly for predominance. The influence of Spohr upon the music of Rebekah cannot be mistaken. Mr. Barnby has produced melodies full of sentiment, often full of beauty also; and to these he has wedded harmonies so ornate that the decorations seem to jostle each other for notice. Moreover, he has adopted the thoroughly Spohrish device of incessant modulation and of unexpected progressions, which unfrequently make one uneasy as to whither they will lead. We may take the liberty of counselling Mr. Barnby to go no farther in this direction. There are passages in Rebekah which can only pass muster by courtesy; and any further development of the restless search for effect out of which they spring would be certain to do the clever composer harm. We have no space left for a notice of the music in detail, and must be content to point out those numbers which are most characteristic. The two fugues, at the beginning and end respectively, are worked with freedom and boldness enough to secure for Mr. Barnby no little esteem as a scholastic writer. A chorus of damsels (with solo), "Who shall be fleetest and first," has a charming effect due to pretty melody and elegant treatment; this number was encored at the performance in St. James's Hall on Wednesday week, as was a "Bride's March," which promises to meet with favour apart from its connection. One or two of the airs may also be cited as examples of Mr. Barnby's best style—that for Eliezer, "The Daughters of the city come," and that for Isaac, "The soft southern breeze plays around me," respectively well sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas and Mr. Vernon Rigby. The scoring is throughout admirably done—so far, indeed, nothing could easily be better.

We can praise the performance almost without reserve. The choruses were given excellently well, the accompaniments were played with taste, and the soloists—Madame Sherrington, Messrs. Rigby and Thomas—sang their very best. Mr. Barnby was applauded to the echo at the close of his work.

THADDEUS EGO.

—o—

WAIFS.

Antwerp is raising funds for a statue to the late Albert Grisar.

Napoleon III. has presented M. Capoul with two superb Sèvres vases.

Mr. Max Maretzek has returned to America from his trip to London, Paris, Milan, and Vienna.

Mrs. C. A. Barry, whose vocalism has attracted so much attention of late in American concert-rooms, is coming to Europe.

A Philadelphia musician, named Thunder, is about to bring out Rossini's Messe Solennelle.

Mr. Ole Bull left America for Europe a fortnight ago after having been presented with a flag by the New York Philharmonic Society.

Signor Bottesini is writing an operetta for the opening, under new management, of the Théâtre Déjazet.

A National Academy of Music, for teaching sacred and secular music, is to be established at Quito, capital of Ecuador.

M. Rubinstein gave his last concert in Paris on Wednesday week. The Ocean Symphony was performed.

M. Guédéonoff has ceased to be director of the Russian Imperial theatres. His successor is not yet named.

M. Felicien David is writing a new grand opera, the soprano part for Madame Sass.

M. Pasdeloup is at Brussels organising a series of grand concerts in the principal towns of Belgium.

A company of eighty artists is now forming in Paris for the operas of Santiago and Valparaiso. Among the sopranos is Mdlle. Nau, late of the Royal Italian Opera.

The Abbate Franz Liszt was at Leipsic recently to make arrangements with the local musical celebrities about their taking part in the approaching Beethoven Festival at Weimar.

A "popular theatre" to seat 2350 persons will shortly be erected in St. Petersburg. One thousand places are to be available at a cost of from fourpence to eightpence each.

Mrs. Howard Paul has been singing and acting with much success in Boston. She returns to London, we hear, under an engagement for two years at the Gaiety Theatre.

The reconstruction of the Tuileries Theatre is under discussion. The building has not been used since Louis Philippe, otherwise, John Smith, Esq., started on his memorable journey to England.

The French critics agree, for the most part, as to the excellence of Mr. Benedict's St. Cecilia; they also agree that the Grand Opéra was by no means the place best fitted for its production.

Don, the name of M. Coben's new work just produced at the Opéra Comique, is said to have been suggested by three of the initial letters of Auber's names: D. (F.) E. A. The point escapes us.

The future directorship of the Théâtre Lyrique still remains undecided. M. Martinet, of the Athenée, is spoken of as likely to take the vacant post.

A season of French opera has commenced in Madrid, under the direction of Las Señor Rivas. M. Thomas' Mignon is announced for early performances.

A small opera venture at Chorillos, the watering-place of Lima, has collapsed, after a very short season, and the company has not succeeded in obtaining a footing at Lima.

Mr. William F. Ketch is about to start on a concert tour with Miss Clara Louise Kellogg, Signor Lotti, Signor Randolfi, Herr Carl Werner, and Mr. S. B. Mills, with Mr. Whitley as accompanist.

The ball recently given at St. George's Hall, for the purpose of raising funds for forming musical scholarships at the London Academy of Music, appears to have been very successful, as six scholarships are announced for competition to students who intend following the musical profession.

Digitized by Google

Madame Volpini has received from her St. Petersburgh admirers a jewelled ornament, representing a music-staff with the notes La, Do, Re, followed by the words du public—a not unhappy mode of describing the singer as l'adorée du public.

Mr. Francesco Berger's part song, "Night, lovely night," is among the music selected for performance by the 5000 voices of the Metropolitan Charity Schools, at the choral festival in the Crystal Palace next month.

La France Musicale criticises somewhat severely the Jeanne d'Arc of Mr. Alfred Holmes, which has just been performed at the Italiens. According to our contemporary, Mr. Holmes is a new victim to Wagner. We are sorry to hear it.

A committee, consisting of Lord Gerald Fitzgerald, Sir John Pakington, Mr. W. H. Gladstone, the Hon Seymour Egerton, and Mr. Frederick Clay, has been appointed to advise on the use of the Royal Albert Hall for musical performances in the evening. The committee met for the first time on Friday, the 6th of May.

Madame Parepa-Rosa's last appearance in New York was to be on the 14th and 15th of this month. After her departure for Europe Mr. S. D. Hess, who was a co-operator with Mr. Carl Rosa in the management, will retain the troupe, strengthened by Mr. and Mrs. Bowler, Mr. Drayton, and Mr. Peakes; and next season he will resume the performances of English opera.

The resignation of Mr. Edward Dicey as editor of the Daily News has taken his friends by surprise. The appointment was kept open for him several weeks during his tour in the East, at the opening of the Suez Canal; he was appointed on his own terms—a very liberal salary, complete control of the editorial department, and a twelvemonth's notice on either side. That he should have left his post in three months seems strange. There was, however, good reason for his doing so. The Daily News belongs to twelve proprietors, who look upon the paper not merely as an investment for their money, but also as an organ of their individual opinions. Each of them had a hobby which he wished to ride; each of them had a bête noire which he tabooed. The consequence was that when Mr. Dicey proceeded to put down the hobby horses and to write up the black beasts there were storms. The result is known. Mr. Dicey has left Bouverie Street amid the regrets of all his colleagues. To this I may add that Mr. Frank Hill, who has for a long time been chief leader-writer of the Daily News, has succeeded Mr. Dicey. I trust that he will induce the twelve proprietors to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest, the first verse of the third chapter of the Epistle of St. James.—Western News.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.

And may be obtained of Signor Ferrari, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

Just Published, price 3s., Illustrated,

HISTORY OF THE PIANOFORTE, by Edgar Bringhead. "A serviceable and pleasant History of the Pianoforte, with an account of ancient music and musical instruments . . . It traces especially the use and development of stringed instruments from the times of old Egypt and Assyria to our own, and is furnished with well executed and judicious illustrations."—Daily Telegraph. "The subject is well handled in a popular form."—The Graphic. "The chapters on tuning and repairs are likely to be of great use to our country cousins."—Post. Cassell, Petter, & Galpin, London & New York.

MOZART'S "L'OCA DEL CAIRO."

The Favourite Airs arranged by

W. HUTCHINS CALLCOTT.

SOLOS, 2s.; DUETS, 4s.

Also all the Favourite Songs, &c., with Italian Words (Copyright).

Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street, and Cramer & Co., 201, Regent Street.

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner; and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,
"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"
Composed by E. REYLOFF.
INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.
Price 3s.
London: Cramer & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

Publishing Arrangements.—Important to Authors.

MOFFAT & COMPANY, State Publishers and Agents for the Dublin Steam Printing Co., beg to announce that they have resolved to CHARGE NO COMMISSION for PUBLISHING WORKS PRINTED BY THEM until the Author has been refunded his original outlay.
They would also state that THEY PRINT IN THE FIRST STYLE, GREATLY UNDER THE USUAL CHARGES.
Their Publishing Arrangements will enable them to promote the interest of all Works committed to their charge, as they have very considerable experience of the channels most likely to ensure success.
Estimates and all particulars furnished in course of post.
"Those about to Publish" may rely on finding Economy and Despatch in all Departments.
Moffat and Co.'s Book List sent free on application to Publishing Offices:
6, D'OLIER STREET, DUBLIN.
34, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Price One Penny Monthly, Registered for Transmission Abroad,
THE CHURCH RECORD. Edited by the Rev. Thomas Scott, M.A.
MOFFATT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

WORKS BY ALEXANDER VANCE.

	£. s. d.
The History and Pleasant Chronicle of Little Jehan	3 6
Vox Clamantis	7 6
The Book of the Knight of Tower	1 0
Romantic Episodes	6 0
Hellenica Sacra	15 0

(The Introductory Chapter may be had separately, 6d.)
MOFFAT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

Price Twopence Monthly. Registered for Transmission Abroad,
PLAIN WORDS. A Christian Miscellany. Edited by the Rev. Hamilton Magee, Assisted by Ministers and Members of different Evangelical Churches.
MOFFAT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

NEW BOOKS.—NOW READY.

	s. d.
Heirs of the Soil. By Mrs. Lorenzo N. Nunn	10 6
Concerning Earthly Love, &c. By a Country Parson	2 6
Harmony in Religion. By a Roman Catholic Priest	1 6
Iona and other Sonnets. By Wade Robinson	2 6
Life of St. Patrick. By Joseph S. Smithson	0 6
Mark's (Sir Hardy), Clinical Lectures	3 6
Medical Examination Papers of University of Dublin, &c. ..	1 0
Queen Papers. By Barney Brady	0 6
The Church under the Tudors. By D. Dunlop, M.R.I.A. ..	3 6
The Philosophy of the Hand. By D. Dunlop, M.R.I.A. ..	3 6
The Life of St. Patrick. Edited by Rev. J. Lynch, P.P. ..	0 6
Time Will Tell. By N. J. N.	3 6

MOFFAT & CO., State Publishers by Appointment
(Agents for the Dublin Steam Printing Company).
34, Southampton Street, Strand, London. 6, D'Olier Street, Dublin.

THE RED-HAIRED MAN'S WIFE; or, The Awful Proceedings of Stagan Varagy, the Market Stroller. The last and best story written. By the late William Carleton. Will commence in the May Number of "THE CARLOW COLLEGIAN MAGAZINE." Price 6d.
MOFFAT & CO., State Publishers,
34, Southampton Street, Strand, London. 6, D'Olier Street, Dublin.
To be had by order of all Booksellers in Town and Country.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."
SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to
MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,
By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.
London: Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

GOLD MEDAL DRAWING-ROOM ORGANS versus HARMONIUMS.
SEVENTY-FIVE GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS
AWARDED TO
THE MASON AND HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS.

Pure, soft, sweet, silvery Diapason Tone, capable of every gradation of light and shade, with Automatic Swell, New Vox Humana, 2 to 16 Stops with or without Ornamental Top and Pedals. Constructed to remain in tune and perfect order in hot climates. All the wood used in these instruments subjected to a heat of 140 degrees for three months, before being used. The Free Reeds are of very peculiar metal, and every Reed Voiced, each vibrating in a separate air chamber, the air being exhausted or drawn through the chambers, it being thus impossible to force the Reeds, they cannot go out of tune. Patronised by Lady Rollington, Rev. J. Gaisford, Lady Brooke, Rev. J. Ellington, Lady Fletcher, Rev. S. Livius, Honourable Mrs. Cowper Temple, and more than five thousand purchasers in the last year.

From Rev. J. A. Gaisford.
Pedal Organ No. 10.—Gentlemen, the instrument gives very great satisfaction.—Yours truly, J. A. Gaisford.
Henley-on-Thames, April 5th, 1870.

From Eustace Hinton Jones, Esq.
Dear Sirs,—My Eight Stop Cabinet Organ in Resonant Case (No. 46), two Manuals, and with Vox Humana, gives me more pleasure than I can express. The quality of tone is exquisite. How such purity of tone can be got out of reeds, is a perfect marvel. It is comparable to nothing but the effect of a large and powerful pipe organ heard at some distance. Indeed, in capacity for delicate effects of light and shade, from full power down to the softest whisper which the ear can hardly catch, but listens for attentively because it is so precious, it has advantages which even a pipe organ has not. To compare it to a harmonium is to compare an Amati violin to a hurdy-gurdy. I tried one of Debain's very best concert harmoniums after it on Friday, and it jarred all my nerves with its buzz. The tone of the Mason and Hamlin Organ spoils the ear for anything less pure than itself.
There is all the difference between putting a reed on a piece of board and expecting to get tone out of it (as other makers do), and Mason and Hamlin's plan of fixing a voiced reed in a chamber over a resonant sounding box. It is the same difference as between stretching a violin string on a bit of stick and straining one over the resonant body of a violin.
It has not one single defect common to all harmoniums. The bass does not overpower the treble. There is perfect equality in all the tones. The rapidity of touch (without the miserable expedient of percussion action) is superior to a pipe organ, being so much lighter even when coupled—and is almost up to a Broadwood piano. It is splendid as an accompaniment for singing, and I regard as a conclusive proof of its merit the fact that even at full power it does not drown a single voice—the tone is so true. Nobody ever yet heard a powerful harmonium that was not overpowering.
I have exercised my organ at all sorts and styles of music, from the Requiem Mass, down to polkas and Irish jigs. It will do almost any mortal thing between these two extremes. I can't find fault with it anywhere.
The Vox Humana is a very beautiful addition to the instrument. I am delighted to find it is no trickish effect like the Tremolo and Voix Celeste, of which one soon gets tired, but imparts a very rich and sympathetic modulation to the stop with which it is used, such as the violin string derives from the bow. Besides this, it adds unmistakably to the brilliancy of the organ.
The Resonant Case is a capital addition—it makes the whole instrument ring again after a chord. I was certainly afraid that an organ of such capacity would be too much for my small room, which is only twelve feet square. But it is not—and this not on account of any deficiency of power in the organ, but because of its exquisite quality of tone—for the same reason, in other words, that it does not drown voices.
The imitations of instruments are remarkably good; but I must say in the case of the piccolo and flute, it is a libel on the organ to compare these two effects to the notes of either piccolo or flute. Your piccolo is so lovely, and the flute is—Well, Orpheus had a good flute, and drew his wife out of Hades with its tones; but I am inclined to think that he might have even drawn her out of the other place to listen to Mason and Hamlin's.
You are heartily welcome to print this note. I am sure any lover of music will be grateful to any one who recommends them a Mason and Hamlin Organ.
Please send me more catalogues. I've given all mine away.—Yours truly,
Springfield Villa, Eustace Hinton Jones.
Freemantle, Southampton, March 7th, 1870.

Illustrated Books, one stamp, of
Brewington & Sons, 84, New Bond St., 309, Oxford St., & 309, Regent St.

Digitized by Google

CHAPPELL'S
Organ Journal

CONSISTING OF

FAVOURITE MOVEMENTS SELECTED FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS,

ARRANGED FOR

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY THE

MOST EMINENT ORGANISTS.

	COMPOSER.	ARRANGER.
No. 1. SANCTUS from "Mass"	Rossini	Dr. Spark.
2. DOMINE DEUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
3. GRATIAS AGIMUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
4. CRUCIFIXUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
5. ADAGIO NON TROPPO	Mendelssohn	G. Cooper.
6. ANDANTE from String Quartett	Mozart	Geo. R. Griffiths.

(To be continued.)

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS EACH.

THE

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO:

A SELECTION OF

Opening and Concluding Voluntaries

BY THE

MOST CELEBRATED COMPOSERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

ADAPTED CHIEFLY FOR THE USE OF AMATEURS BY

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Each Number contains from 7 to 12 favourite Voluntaries, including one arranged expressly with Pedal Obbligato.
Nos. 1 to 24 are now ready, price 3s. each; or in four Volumes, each containing Six Numbers, and bound in Cloth, price 12s. each.

A THEMATIC LIST OF CONTENTS
MAY BE HAD ON APPLICATION TO

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet.
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaîté (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Beamais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Siagoo	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Resaje (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s.	d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various Kinds	7	6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	5	0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	7	6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonized in various styles, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard. ...	5	0
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7	6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 4s. each, or one vol., boards, 12s. This book, containing 85 Compositions, includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 30 of his best Pieces.	6	0
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 35. Six Books in one vol.	6	0
J. T. STONES ORGAN-BOOK, an arrangement of 18 Classical Compositions	6	0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

46. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3—Op. 13, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
48. SONATAS, Op. 22—Op. 26—Op. 27, No. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
49. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastorale), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
50. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53—Op. 54 (Apassionata), and Op. 57.
51. SONATAS, Op. 78—Op. 79 (Caracteristique)—Op. 81—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
52. SONATAS, Op. 106—Op. 109—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Fantasia and Sonata), 2, 3.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 16.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 14, 15, 17, 18.

Complete in one volume, 5s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complete in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42.) No. 2 (Op. 120.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 122.) No. 4 (Op. 122.) No. 5 (Op. 143.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 147.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, No. 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS FOR PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 64 to 96 pages, including Overtures.

FIGARO	GRAND DUCHESS
ROBERT LE DIABLE	FIDELIO
DON JUAN	BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA
LUCREZIA BORGIA	SONNAMBULA
DER FREISCHUTZ	BALLO IN MASCHERA
CRISPINO E LA COMARE	TRAVIATA
TROVATORE	MARTHA
NORMA	WILLIAM TELL
DON PASQUALE	CROWN DIAMONDS
FRA DIAVOLO	MASANIELLO
RIGOLETTO	DOMINO NOIR
ZAMPA

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 6s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.

138. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and "Oh voulez vous aller?"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY.
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VIOLINCELLO for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring," "Solitaire Lied," "True Love," &c.
140. STEPHEN HELLER'S 24 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s. 4 post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

90. SANTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original compositions, published in no other collection.
77. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BALFE, BASSO, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYDEN HAYLEY, ALEXANDRA LEE, &c.
93. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep," "My Pretty Page," "As it fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Lesson Duet," &c.
6. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
66. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
63. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
92. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET

Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.

1. TWENTY FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CREATION, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S FIFTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND HESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS.
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, KUHE, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.

SHILLING BOOKS of PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.

113. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
106. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
120. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LAST ROSE, and LILLIE DALE.
111. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete.
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
123. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
99. FRANZ SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS, and SIX MOMENS MUSICAUX. All complete.
97. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Puritani," "Sonnambula," &c.
96. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Musical Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
85. STEPHEN HELLER'S PROMENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
89. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
84. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS.
79. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Perles et Diamans," "Il Carricolo," &c.
33, 34, 98. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.	WALPURGIS NIGHT.
HAYDN'S IMPERIAL MASS.	BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.	ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.	MOZART'S REQUIEM.
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.	DETTINGEN TE DEUM.
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.	ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE MESSIAH.	THE CREATION.

	s.	d.
BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees	2	0
BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 60 Glees	2	6
THE CHORALIST, 36 Part-songs. 2 vols, each	3	0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	1	0

The above Works, for Soprano in penny numbers.

THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs	6	0
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 50 Part-songs for village and school use	6	0

LONDON:

BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Digitized by Google

"HAMLET,"

(AMLETO)

OPERA IN FIVE ACTS,

BY

AMBROISE THOMAS,

AS PERFORMED AT

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The Opera Complete, for Voice and Piano, with Italian Words, 20s. net.
Do. Do. with French Words, 20s. net.

ATTO I.

No. 2. Recitativo e Duo. Price 6s.
Cantato dalla Signora Nilsson e dal Signor Santley.

No. 2 bis. Cantabile (estratto del Duo). Price 4s.
Cantato dal Signor Santley.

No. 2 ter. La Stessa (Per Soprano o Tenore). Price 4s.
Cantata dalla Signora Nilsson.

No. 2 quat. La Stessa, in Do (per Mezzo-Soprano). Price 4s.

No. 3. Cavatina di Laerte. Price 4s.
Cantata dal Signor Cotti.

No. 4. Coro degli Ufficiali. Price 5s.

No. 5 bis. Invocazione Price 4s.
Cantata dal Signor Santley.

No. 5 ter. La Stessa (per Soprano o Tenore). Price 4s.

ATTO II.

No. 6. Aria d'Ofelia. Price 6s.
Cantata dalla Signora Nilsson.

No. 6 bis. La Stessa (per Mezzo-Soprano). Price 6s.

No. 6 ter. Fabliau (estratto dall' Aria). Price 4s.
Cantato dalla Signora Nilsson.

No. 6 quat. Lo Stesso (per Mezzo-Soprano). Price 4s.

No. 7. Arioso (per Mezzo-Soprano). Price 4s.
Cantata dalla Signora Nilsson.

No 7 bis. Lo Stesso (per Contralto). Price 4s.

No. 10. Canzona Bacchica. Price 4s.
Cantata dal Signor Santley.

No. 10 bis. La Stessa, in Do (per Tenore). Price 4s.

ATTO III.

No. 13. Monologo. Price 3s.
Cantato dal Signor Santley.

No. 13 bis. Lo Stesso (per Tenore o Soprano). Price 3s.

No. 15. Trio (S.M-S.B.) Price 6s.
Cantato dalle Signore Nilsson e Sinico e dal Signor Santley.

No. 15 bis. Romanza (estratta dal Trio). Price 3s.
Cantata dal Signor Santley.

No. 15 ter. La Stessa (per Tenore). Price 3s.

ATTO IV.

No. 18. Scena ed Aria. Price 7s. 6d.
Cantata dalla Signora Nilsson.

No. 18 bis. Ballata estratta (per Soprano). Price 4s.
Cantata dalla Signora Nilsson.

No. 18 ter. La Stessa (per Mezzo Soprano). Price 4s.
No. 18 quat. La Stessa, Ridotta, Senza Vocalise. Price 3s.
Four Pianos solo.

No. 19. Valse d'Ofelia. Price 4s.

No. 19 bis. Valse cantato, per Sop. { (Vi voglio off- }
No. 19 ter. Lo Stesso, per Mezzo Sop. { rir dei fior . . } 4s.

ATTO V.

No. 22. Arioso. Price 3s.
Cantato dal Signor Santley.

No. 23 bis. Lo Stesso (per Tenore). Price 3s.

EDITIONS DE MM. HEUGEL & Cie, PARIS.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET.

Printed by HENDERSON, RAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, May 21, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT REPRESENTS."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 20s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—NO. 22. SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1870. PRICE { 1. Unstamped. 2. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY (Saturday). QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.—Combined Attractions.—GRAND SUMMER CONCERT. Fashionable Promenade, and Great Display of 3,000 Roses in pots. Artists in Concert: Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Orgeni, Signor Verger, Signor Costelli, Signor Ragues, and Signor Mongini. Crystal Palace Choir. Conductor, Mr. Manns.

These delightful concerts take place in the centre transept, the most agreeable locale imaginable for concerts in hot summer weather. The enjoyment of music is considerably enhanced by such surroundings as are found here; groups of stationary and banks of flowers meet the eye at every turn. The ear and the eye are equally delighted, and the airiness and general comfort of this vast concert hall are beyond comparison with the heated atmosphere and closeness experienced in theatres and concert rooms. The Orchestral Band of the Company considerably reinforced.

No extra charge to Concert or Rose Show. Admission by half-crown tickets, if purchased before the day of the Show; by payment at doors, 5s., or by guinea season tickets.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

This Evening (Saturday), Mozart's "LE NOZZE DI FIGARO." Il Conte, Mr. Santley; Figaro, M. Faure; Bartolo, Signor Foli; Basilio, Mr. Lyall; Antonio, Signor Zoboli; Don Curzio, Signor Rinaldini; Marcellina, Madame Corsi; Cherubino, Mdlle. Pauline Lucca; (her first appearance in that character); Susanna, Mdme. Volpini (her first appearance in that character in London); and La Contessa, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her first appearance in that character). Conductor—Signor Arditi.

On Monday, "MARTHA." Lionello, Signor Mongini; Plunkitto, Mr. Santley; Lord Tristano, Signor Zoboli; Un Sheriffo, Mr. Lyall; Un Servo, Signor Archiati; Nancy, Mdlle. Carl (her first appearance at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane); and Martha, Madame Volpini.

On Tuesday, May 31, "ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO." Roberto, Signor Mongini; Raimbaldo, Signor Gardoni; Bertrame, Signor Foli; Un Paggio, Signor Lassere; Alberti, Signor Ragues; Un Eremita, Signor Rinaldini; Cavalieri, Signor Archiati, Signor Castelli, Signor Zoboli, Signor Trevers; Elena, Mdlle. Fioretti; Isabella, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; and Alice, Mdlle. Marie Battu.

On Thursday, June 2, "FAUST." Mephistopheles, Mons. Faure; Faust, Signor Gardoni; Valentino, Mr. Santley; Siebel, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Marguerite Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

Acting Manager . . . . . MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

SIGNOR ARDITI'S GRAND MORNING CONCERT will take place on FRIDAY, June 10th, supported by all the principal artists. Band and Chorus of the Italian Opera, Drury Lane.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

SATURDAY, May 28, Rossini's Opera, "IL BARBIERE DI SVIGLIA." Rosina Madame Adelina Patti; Basilio, Signor Tagliafico; and Almaviva, Signor Mario.

Next Week there will be Five Performances, on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

EXTRA NIGHT.—On MONDAY NEXT, May 30 (first time this season), Mozart's Opera, "LE NOZZE DI FIGARO." Cherubino, Madame Pauline Lucca; Susanna, Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi (her first appearance in that character); Antonio, Signor Tagliafico; and La Contessa, Mdlle. Thiljens. Conductor—Signor Bevignani.

On Tuesday Next, May 31, Meyerbeer's Opera, "DINORAH." Dinorah, Mdme. Adelina Patti; and Hoel, Signor Graziani.

EXTRA NIGHT.—On THURSDAY NEXT, June 2, "FAUST E MEGHERITA." Madame Pauline Lucca, Signor Graziani, Signor Tagliafico, and Signor Mario.

EXTRA NIGHT.—On FRIDAY NEXT, June 3, "DON GIOVANNI," Zerlina, Madame Adelina Patti; Don Ottavio, Signor Mario (his first appearance in that character these three years; Don Giovanni, Signor Graziani; and Donna Anna, Mdlle. Thiljens.

On SATURDAY, June 4, "HAMLET." Ophelia, Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi; Hamlet, Signor Ordogni; and the Queen, Mdlle. Thiljens.

The Opera commences at Half-past Eight.

A Grand Morning Concert will take place in the Floral Hall, Covent Garden, on Saturday, June 18, supported by all the principal artists of the Royal Italian Opera. To commence at Two o'clock. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Seats, 5s.

MADAME PATEY will sing RANDEGGER'S admired song, "PEACEFULLY SLUMBER," at Herr Kuhe's Concert, St. James's Hall, May 30th.

PUBLIC HALL, CROYDON.—Programme of Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL'S RECITAL of Classical and Modern Pianoforte Music, on MONDAY Evening, May 30th, 1870, assisted by Madame Florence Lancia and M. Paque. Part I.—Sonata (in), for Pianoforte and Violoncello, Mr. George Russell and M. Paque.—W. S. Bennett, Mus. Doc.; Song, "Voiche Sapete," Madame Florence Lancia.—Mozart; Solos, Moorese Musicus, Mr. George Russell (first time in Croydon).—Schubert; New song, "Good night, sweet mother," wrote from the Poet Laureate's "May Queen," composed for Madame Florence Lancia.—Diodonato; Sonata (quasi Fantasia, "The Moonlight Sonata," Mr. George Russell (first time in Croydon).—Beethoven. Part II.—Fantasia sur Violoncello, M. Paque.—Paque; Grand Aria (Lorla), Madame Florence Lancia.—Bonvetti; Fantasia (by desire), "The Recollections of Ireland," Mr. George Russell.—Moscheles; Sonata duo (in D major), for Pianoforte and Violoncello.—Mr. George Russell and M. Paque.—Mendelssohn. Prices of Admission.—Reserved Seats, 3s.; Unreserved Seats in the Body of the Hall, 2s.; Balcony and Back Seats, 1s. Tickets and Programmes to be had of Mr. Warren, Bookseller, High Street, Croydon; Plan of the Seats may be seen; and of Messrs. Webb, Musicsellers, North End, Croydon.

MDME. R. SIDNEY PRATTEN begs to announce to her Friends and Pupils that her QUITAR RECITAL will take place on WEDNESDAY, June 15th, 1870, at Three o'clock, at 21, Harley Street, Cavendish Square, when she will be assisted by Eminent Artists, whose names will be duly announced. Madame Pratten will play Selections from the Compositions of her, Giuliani, Leonard Schulz, and her own; and two Grand Duets for two Guitars, Giuliani's two Rondos, and "Di tanti palpiti," accompanied by a Pupil of hers, an Amateur, who has kindly consented to do so for this occasion. Tickets, 10s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 15s. To be had at Madame Pratten's Residence, 30, Welbeck Street, Cavendish Square, W.

WALTER MACFARREN'S new Pianoforte Solos, "LA PENSEROSA," Nocturne, "GOLDEN SLUMBERS." Berceuse, will be played by the Composer at the Matinée Musicale, This Day, at the Hanover Square Rooms.—LAMBORN COCK & CO., 63, New Bond Street.

MR. CUMMINGS will sing WALTER MACFARREN'S new sacred songs, "LET THE WORDS OF MY MOUTH," "O SING UNTO THE LORD A NEW SONG," at Mr. Walter Macfarren's Third Matinée, This Day.—LAMBORN COCK & CO., 63, New Bond Street.

MISS MARIE D'ETIENNE and Mr. HENRY GORDON, will sing NICOLAI'S Duet, "ONE WORD," at Herr Lehmeyer's Concert, Store Street, June 1st.

MISS MARION SEVERN will sing HENRY SMART'S popular song, "THE LADY OF THE LEA," at Miss ida Henry's Concert, This Day, at the Bechtoven Rooms.

CONCERTS, Bazaars, Hebrew Weddings, Readings, &c. Meetings, and Balls.—The QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square. Early application is invited for securing available days. Apply to Mr. Hall.

ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC, Scholarships and musical attendance. Concert Tour commencing at Ramsgate, June 8th. Artists—Mdlles. C. and R. Doria, Alexandrina Dwight, Carl Dolby, Messrs. Sotcliff, Wadmore, and W. C. Bell. Students' Concert, Hanover Square, June 25th.—Norfolk Road, Haymarket.

F. WEBB, Sec.

MONS. PAQUE has the honour to announce that his MATINEE MUSICALE will take place on TUESDAY, 31st of June, at Three o'clock, by the kind permission of the Most Noble the Marquis of Downshire, at 24, BELGRAVE SQUARE. Tickets to be obtained only at M. Paque's, 138, Great Portland Street, W.

Now Ready.

SACRED CANTATA, "BLOW YE THE TRUMPET IN ZION," by C. WARWICK JORDAN, Mus. Bac., Oxon. Price, handsomely bound, 5s.; in paper covers, 3s. Suitable for Choral Societies. Advantageous terms may be made with the composer for large quantities, and the Band parts obtained.

NOVELLO & Co., London.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL, REGENT STREET, with the Hall and Theatre are to let for Concerts, Operatic and Dramatic Entertainments, Public Meetings, and Lectures. The Hall can be hired by the night or for a term. N.B. All the Afternoons are let up to July. For terms, apply to Mr. Wilkinson, Manager. Offices, 4, Langham Place, Regent Street.

Digitized by Google

MR. ALFRED CAINK will sing Mr. WILFORD MORGAN'S popular song, "MY SWEETHEART WHEN A BOY," at Highbury, May 31st.

MR. WILFORD MORGAN will sing his popular ballad, "MY SWEETHEART WHEN A BOY," at St. James's Hall, June 4th.

HERR REICHARDT begs to announce his ARRIVAL in Town for the Season. Address, 5, Beaumont Street, Portland Place.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP" at Mr. Alfred Baylis's First Matinée, 30th May.

MDME. MONTSERRAT has the honour to announce to her Friends and Pupils that she has REMOVED to 16, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W., where she requests all communications may be addressed.

SIGNOR GUSTAVE GARCIA begs to announce his arrival in Town for the Season. Address, 9, Mortimer Road, Greville Road, St. John's Wood.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing DUGGAN'S great baritone song, "SAMSON," at his principal Engagements—St. George's Hall, June 8th. Address, 20, Old Bond Street.

THIS DAY.

MADAME ALICE MANGOLD will play "MADAME OURY'S WALTZ," composed by CHOPIN, at her Recital of Pianoforte Music.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD (Soprano) has arrived in London and is open to Engagements for Operas, Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, care of Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

MR. CHARLES STANTON (Tenor) may be engaged for Concerts, Operettas, and Oratorios. Address, 10, Duke Street, Portland Place, W.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 30, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"LITTLE WILLIE," by JULES BENEDICT. This charming new song (by the popular composer of "Rock me to Sleep") is now being sung with distinguished success by Miss EDITH WYNNE. Price 3s., and may be obtained for 19 stamps from the publisher, DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss ANYON, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANOFORTE.—126th Edition; 70 large folio pages, 4s. "This work has had an enormous run, its circulation being something wonderful, whilst the encomiums passed upon it have raised its reputation beyond all ordinary criticism. We cannot for a moment hesitate in giving it the very warmest recommendation."—Vide South Australian Advertiser, March 2.—London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street. May be had every where.

THE MUSICAL BOX. A Sensational Caprice for the Pianoforte. Composed by I. LIBHICH. 3s. Free by post for 19 stamps. "As agreeable and clever piece, which is very popular among amateurs, as it is not too difficult for the majority of players."—Musical World. London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street. Order everywhere.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."

SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.

Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD.

By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

TARANTELLE,

POUR LE PIANOFORTE.

Par PAUL SEMLER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"O LADY, TWINE NO WREATH FOR ME."

SONG.

The Poetry by SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The Music by W. FRIEDRICH.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. VON WEBER have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s.	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD	3	0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)		3	0
THE PARTING (Le Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS	3	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE	3	0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad) ... ... And the Answer to it.	FLORENCE PERCY	3	0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,

PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.

LYON & HALL,

WARWICK MANSION.

Digitized by Google

THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

The 216th Anniversary Festival of the Sons of the Clergy was held under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral on the afternoon of the 18th inst. when, as usual, there was the full choral service which, time out of mind, has added to the importance of the occasion. Upon the origin and purport of this excellent charity it would be superfluous now again to dwell, so universally familiar are they to all who take an interest in the subject. Instituted as far back as 1665, and established in 1678, by Royal Charter (under Charles II.), the "Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy" has been largely instrumental for good. Originally designed chiefly, if not exclusively, to give needful assistance to the widows and orphans of clergymen endowed with less worldly riches than devotional zeal, its influence has been from time to time considerably enlarged. Take, for example, the following from the latest report (1869):—

"The charitable operations of the corporation are directed to the following purposes:—To afford continuous or occasional assistance to clergymen of the Established Church in England and Wales, when in need, from mental or bodily infirmity, the reverses of fortune, or the heavy expenses incidental to large families, or from any other cause of improvidence beyond their own control. To grant pensions to widows of clergymen, and donations to widows in temporary difficulties, ineligible for pensions. To grant pensions to maiden daughters of deceased clergymen upon attaining the age of 45 years, and donations to unsuccessful candidates and others under the age of 45, who are incapacitated by want of health from earning their own maintenance. To apprentice clergymen's children, orphans or not, to schools, professions, and trades; to assist in their education at schools or colleges, and to provide outfits for them on being placed out in the world."

Clergymen in full orders, residing in England and Wales, and having been licensed to a cure of souls, are entitled to the benefits of the charity; and during the last year (1869) as many as 241 clergymen, rectors, vicars, perpetual curates, chaplains, &c., were thus assisted with a sum of no less than £4,923. But further to promote the objects of so praiseworthy a cause we are happy to publish an exhaustive paragraph from the printed appeal of the Governors in reference to the "Special Proceedings" of 1869:—

"In 1853 very few of the pensions, 712 in number, exceeded £10 per annum, whereas now the great majority are £20 per annum, and a few are £25. This has been effected by the Minor Canonries, improved values on the corporation estates, and increased receipts from donations and subscriptions. The result is encouraging, and the Governors, earnestly trusting the support given by the clergy and laity to this corporation for so many generations may be continued and enlarged, look forward to the time when the society will be in a position to secure to all widows and aged single daughters of the poorer clergy a sufficient provision. . . . Additional assistance is also needed for sick and infirm clergymen in all parts of the kingdom, who, incapable of doing duty, have little or no other resource than the funds of the corporation. The Governors would also rejoice to find their means enlarged for educating and placing out the children of poor clergymen, this being a branch of the society's operations which is found by experience to offer an almost unlimited field for the contributions of the benevolent and to effect great and unmixed good."

The foregoing extracts will answer all purposes.

Among the foremost attractions of the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy is, and must always be, the cathedral choral service. On this occasion even a larger congregation than usual was assembled, not merely filling the choir and the space under the dome, but extending almost as far as the west door. The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs arrived, in semi-State, received by the choir and clergy, who conducted them up the nave, in a procession including the Bishop of London, the committee and stewards of the Festival, with others more or less directly interested. Prayers were intoned by the Rev. Minor Canon Simpson, and Lessons read by the Rev. Minor Canon Milman. The musical part of the service was again noticeable for the improvement which has of recent years been slowly going on. Mr. Winn was conductor, and the surpliced choir under his control was made up from the choirs of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, the Temple, and Lincoln's Inn, strengthened by delegates from Canterbury, Winchester, Rochester, &c. That the "suffrages" were sung to Tallis's "Festival no" it is scarcely necessary to say. The time is long distant when that custom will be changed. The solemn and majestic effect of these, from so large a body of well-trained voices, may be easily imagined. Passing over the chanting of the Psalms, with a word of acknowledgment for the obvious results of a uniform system of "pointing," we should make special mention of a new Service, in B flat, by Mr. Henry Smart (selections from whose noble Service in F made the music of the Canticles in 1868). Mr. Smart's setting of the "Magnificat" is one of the finest examples of modern English church music with which we are acquainted. The opening, for full choir, at once arrests attention; and the interest thus created at the outset is sustained to the end by writing which is everywhere as masterly and scholastic as it is beautiful. The "Nunc Dimittis" is not unworthy to associate with the "Magnificat;" and, in short, the whole offers a fresh instance of that kind of thoughtful church music which is gradually superseding the vapid pedantry of bygone times. Three anthems were sung—"O Saviour of the world," by Mr. John Goss, organist of the Cathedral (composed for the Good Friday Service of last year), the expressive beauty of which is worthy of Mendelssohn himself; Dr. S. S. Wesley's "Blessed be the Lord," a recognized masterpiece in its school; and (more ancient) Dr. Greene's "O clap your hands together." All were extremely well given, and, indeed, the musical service was worthy the place and the occasion.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. H. P. Liddon, M.A. (Canon of St. Paul's), whose text was Galatians vi. 10—"As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." At most our space could merely allow an abstract of the rev. gentleman's appeal, and an abstract could by no means do it justice. Perhaps the best commentary on its eloquence lies in the fact that the collection at the doors of the Cathedral (for it only amounted to more than double the ordinary sum of contributions on any previous occasion. The dinner was held, as of old, in Merchant Taylors' Hall. President, the Lord Mayor. Among the company were a more than usual number of distinguished persons. After the usual conventional toasts, the Lord Mayor, in practical language, proposed "the President of the Sons of the Clergy," and the Lord Bishop of London, in reply, advocated the pressing claims of the Corporation. Other toasts followed, and a collection was made on behalf of the charity. The musical arrangements, directed by Mr. Francis, were as efficient as usual.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The operas represented since our last notice of the performances at this theatre have been Faust e Margherita, Martha, Hamlet, the Barbiere, the Africaine, Don Giovanni, and the Favorita. About the first, fourth, sixth, and seventh of these we have already spoken. Martha too, might pass with the simple recognition of the fact of its having been produced, but that a tenor, new to our stage, took the part of Lionel. Signor Urio is not literally a stranger, inasmuch as he has been heard at the Crystal Palace Concerts—most frequently in the great orchestra of the middle transept, for which his sonorous voice and emphatic delivery render him best fitted. Whether he is destined to take a position at the Italian Opera must remain an open question until further opportunities have been given of discussing his pretensions. Lionel, with some very pretty music to sing, is, at the best, an insipid personage, whose ebullitions of sentiment can possess but small interest for any but the lady to whom they are especially addressed, and such a part, judging from a single experience, does not appear to us well suited to Signor Urio's peculiar gifts. The encore he obtained in "M'appari tutt' amor" forms no criterion; for that famous apostrophe to the absent fair one is invariably asked for again, no matter who may be the lack-a-dasical utterer.

About Madame Adelina Patti's lively and fascinating impersonation of Lady Enrichetta (Martha), we shall say no more than that it was as lively and as fascinating as on former occasions, and that the accomplished lady's delivery of the romance, "Qui sola vergin rosa," first in Italian, then, after a rapturous encore, in the familiar language of the Irish poet, reached the ideal perfection of ballad singing. What more need be said about Signor Graziani (Plunkett) than that he was, as a matter of course, compelled to repeat the song in praise of beer, which he gives with such apparently sympathetic heartiness? Surely nothing. Mdlle. Scalchi acted Nancy well, and sang the music for the most part fairly; while Signor Tagliafico played the amorous Lord Tristan with his ordinary humour, and in a costume somewhat extraordinary for a peer of England, no matter of what date. Besides the encores we have named, there was another for the quartet at the Spinning-wheel—chiefly attributable to the wonderfully piquant execution of the soprano part by Madame Patti, whose "staccato" embellishments in the last verse never fail to create a sensation. How full of bustling life is the mise en scène of M. Flotow's opera at Covent Garden all are aware.

So much was written last season about the Hamlet of M. Ambroise Thomas—one of the most successful contemporary lyric dramas of French manufacture since the time that Meyerbeer, followed by Halévy, &c., showed how operatic representations might, without risk, be interminably spun out—that a word or two about the performance will suffice. There was a new Ophelia, in Mdlle. Seed; a new Queen, in Mdlle. Tietjens; and a new Hamlet, in Signor Cotogni—all three successful. The gain accruing to the opera by the fact of such an artist as Mdlle. Tietjens undertaking the part of Gertrude is incalculable. The vocal and dramatic skill—the scene of the portraits and of Hamlet's solemn admonition to his mother—now, for the first time, had its due importance. In this Mdlle. Tietjens was so impressive as to cause those who know what a perilous venture is that of using one of Shakspere's tragedies as a vehicle for music to think more highly of the composer than they had thought before. It was a rare exhibition of vocal and dramatic power combined. Whatever Mdlle. Tietjens had to do was thoroughly well done; her declamation was superb; her acting subtle, and at the same intensely real throughout, and—thanks to her—the foremost character of the opera is now incontestably that of the Queen. Mdlle. Sessi afforded fresh proof of her remarkable versatility by the manner in which she represented Ophelia. Nothing seems beyond the range of this artist's powers. This is the best achieved greatness in any part she has yet essayed it would be untrue to assert, but that in everyone she has displayed a certain degree of excellence is unquestionable. As a piece of acting, Mdlle. Sessi's Ophelia may rank with her preceding assumptions. It is not, however, as an actress, and particularly as an actress in serious opera, that this lady shines, but as a singer—each new part she tries further exhibits the agreeable tone, wide range, and flexibility of her voice, added to a more than common profiency in the vocal art. Her Ophelia in this respect was almost everywhere good. In the last finale—where M. Thomas has made as happy a use of a melody not his own as M. Flotow has done in Martha—Mdlle. Sessi sang with equal taste and fluency, mastering the most difficult passages with ease. The Hamlet of Signor Cotogni was a surprise. Few, even among those who admire this gentleman in comedy, expected that he would equit himself so well in a part which one might have imagined to be altogether out of his sphere. Signor Cotogni nevertheless, exhibited both dramatic intelligence and a self-reserve for which his earlier assumptions had not prepared us. In the great scene between Hamlet and Gertrude, Signor Cotogni seemed inspired by the example of his accomplished partner. In the scene after his spirited delivery of the drinking song (Part 3), and frequently applauded during the performance. Signor Bagaglioli's King Claudius was a king with a deep bass voice, and Signor Capponi's Ghost was a ghost with a deeper. Signor Larocca played Laertes. Of the opera itself, the performance of which was directed by Signor Bevignani, we have not another word to say. That under any circumstances it can achieve an extended popularity in this country is, we think, out of the question.

Digitized by Google

With Mdlle. Pauline Lucca at hand, that the Africaine of Meyerbeer would be one of the productions of the season might have been taken for granted. We have no more to say about the last great work of one of the greatest operatic composers of our time. Its wealth of melody, its picturesque colouring, and its dramatic power are now universally admitted. Despite Herr Richard Wagner, the Africaine lives and is likely to live—the moral and physical absurdities of its libretto, together with its excessive length, notwithstanding. Mdlle. Lucca's Selika is more than ever instinct with poetic feeling. To single out one situation from many others, each full of interest, the final scene, where the unhappy African Queen, like Dido of old, is abandoned by her fickle lover, is exquisite in its pathos and unaffected pathos. The death from the insidious poison of the mancanilla tree, under the shadow of whose branches Selika laments her bereavement, and slowly expires, is depicted with a power that makes itself felt. The tremulously failing tones of voice impart to her last utterances a tenderness which it is hard to evoke sympathy true art would commt for nothing. The other characters of importance in the Africaine are sustained by Mdlle. Vanzini a fairly acceptable Inez; Signor Graziani, with whose earnest and demonstrative Nelusko we are familiar; and Signor Naudin, Meyerbeer's own Vasco di Gama—as yet the very best that has been seen and heard. About the gorgeous ballet and mise-en-scène which recommend the Africaine to the sympathies of those whom the music alone has supported would have, perhaps, less abiding charm, we need not speak.

La Sonnambula, with Signor Naudin instead of Herr Wachtel as Elvino—a change manifestly for the better—was given on Thursday; L'Africaine was repeated last night; and the Barbiere is promised for this evening.

COPENHAGEN.—Herr Richard Wagner's Muses have at last found their way to this northern capital, Lohengrin has been produced at the Royal Operahouse, and, as it appears, with such satisfactory results, that Tannhäuser will shortly follow. By the way, the date selected by the management for introducing Lohengrin to the Danish public was the birthnish of April. Would not the first have been a more appropriate day?

MUNICH.—At length a conductor has been found for Herr R. Wagner's Walküre. This rara avis is Herr Marpurg, hitherto second conductor at Darmstadt. It is to be hoped he has duly studied Herr R. Wagner's pamphlet on "Conducting." If not, he had better have remained at Darmstadt, than run the risk of exciting the somewhat ready rage, and consequent vituperation of the modest Hermit of Lucerne.

REVIEWER'S WAIL.—No. 2.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I had no idea that you would hand me up to your devil (printer's), and still less did I imagine that you would hand me down to the real gentleman; or even be riled at my temerity in writing to tell you what you must have assured yourselves would have been the opinion of all people not entirely obfuscated, had either of you given the matter a moment's serious thought.

As a young man I was called Abraham the Placid (Abraham Smooth was another man); and if the allusion to the late Duke of Wellington and Harriet Wilson was meant to designate me an old woman, I don't at all object to being likened to one in my settled maturity. Old women are generally sensible, often clever, and always better and "truer hearted" than men. That I may possess this latter attribute is what I heartily desire. As a reviewer (not of music) I had but one object—to help the crushed, the weak, and the powerless, and to give talent its due.

The gentleman who so generously votes me damnation has cast upon himself a reflector, by which he enlightens and enables me to estimate him and his reviewership by a standard not hitherto accessible to me. When he dies may his soul rest—not with the damned.

Pleased as I was with his paper upon the Manns-Heller subject, I am infinitely more charmed with Mr. Tolhurst's letter in your last number; and I am thankful that some one has the moral resolution to write what he thinks, and so endeavour to put some check upon the monopolizing publishers and down-writing reviewers, who, when to write "down" would be too flagrant, or, for special reasons, impolitic, are eloquently silent. A broader and more generous spirit is needed in London journalism. Journals (vide extracts from the Economist and Echo, which I enclose); and I am truly gratified to find that you have been largely-minded enough to insert Mr. Tolhurst's letter.

Assuredly, the question is, not whether a composer or author is new, but whether his productions bear the impress of talent. I fear, though, that this is a view which vested interests and the jealousy of a certain class of established authors will not recognise.

Agreeing, still further, with Mr. Tolhurst, I would add that I subscribe to three musical papers, and I have been frequently inclined to ask—"What do we pay our money for?" Certainly, up to a given point. my family, reading the stereotyped advertisements and fulsome panegyrics which these papers contained, have expended many pounds in purchasing the lauded publications of the monopolizing publishers and the eloquented, only to find them utter trash, while compositions that have been avoided on account of the severity of condemning reviewers in these papers, have, when accidentally met with, turned out to be gems.

I hope the success which has hitherto attended the practice of thrusting rubbish upon us by means of forced advertisements, reviews, and notices, is receiving the result it deserves. I wish the public would decide for themselves, and not be guided by press leading-strings and criticisms.

With many sincere apologies for my extreme tediousness, believe me much more than ever and always,—Yours,

ANOTHER REVIEWER

(In another School).

May 24th, 1870.

["Another Reviewer" ought now to be satisfied. He has hit upon a method by which all chance of being taken in for the future is prevented. Let him purchase the publications, analyse them—that are abused in the papers he refers to, and carefully eschew the new pieces, oratorios included, that are praised. He will then be spared the "utter strain," and find himself possessor of countless "gems." "Another Reviewer" need not apologize for his "extreme tediousness," inasmuch as were he "tedious as a king," the fact of his being "much more than ever" ours, whereas two weeks since he was no more than "somebody" ours, would reconcile us to his short—or rather long-comings. We cannot hear from him too often, and, provided he has not composed an oratorio, we shall be glad to make his acquaintance. We apprehend, however, that it is six to four the other way. He is so tender on the point.—A. S. S.]

ST. PETERSBURGH.—A subscription is being got up to erect at Smolensk a monument to the well-known Russian composer, Michael Nicholajewitch Glinka, born at the village of Nowospask, in the Jelna district of the Smolensk Government, and died the 3rd February, 1857, at Berlin. His opera, Life for the Czar, was produced for the first time at St Peterburgh, on the 27th November, 1836, and his other opera, Russlan and Ludmilla, on the 27th November, 1842.

FLORENCE.—Herr Hans von Bulow has returned from Berlin. He will shortly carry out a project he has long cherished, namely—the formation of a permanent "Sinfonie-Capelle," for the purpose of giving popular orchestral concerts. The first of such concerts will be given in the Teatro Principe Umberto, and the programme thus constituted: "Jubel Ouvertüre," C. M. von Weber; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Pianoforte Concerto, Beethoven; Overture to Struensee, Meyerbeer; "Reapers chorus," from Prometheus, Liszt; and Symphony in C minor, Beethoven.

Digitized by Google

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

Two more performances of Robert le Diable have confirmed the success of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, and strengthened the conviction that Alice is destined to become one of her most popular, as it is assuredly one of her most finished, parts. A word or two about the other characters, which want of space prevented us from giving last week, may not be out of place. The Robert of Signor Mongini shows decided improvement. He has now made himself so familiar with the music that his splendid voice has full play, and it is only in the last act that occasional criticism is called for. No one ought to sustain this arduous character better, for no one has more ample means at disposal. Signor Foli, too, has every requisite for a Bertram if not equal to the Bertram of Formes and the Bertram of Marini, in days gone by, at least equal to any now easily met with. As it is, Signor Foli leaves little to desire, except in the last act, which he has not yet completely mastered. By no means the least commendable feature in this performance of Robert le Diable is the Raimbaud of Signor Gardoni. Many years ago Signor Mario "condescended" (we use an expression of the time) to represent this character, representing it as effectively that the "condescension" was lost sight of, and Raimbaud became a personage of as comparatively great importance as Robert or Bertram, while psychologically more agreeable than either. Signor Gardoni—an artist if there ever was one—is now doing what Signor Mario did years ago (when Signor Tamberlik played Robert); and it is but just to say that in the general performances his Raimbaud ranks only second to the Alice of Mdlle. Nilsson. If singers of ability feel inclined to yield more in this direction, composers would be manifold gainers. No artist loses status by playing a small part well, and thereby enhancing the efficiency of the "cast;" and Signor Gardoni, recognized at the very outset of his career in England as an artist of high pretensions, was always received, when his turn came to assume a leading part, with the same favour as if he had never "condescended" to strengthen an opera by undertaking a subordinate one. Thus, he succeeded in winning the gratitude of managers, the esteem of composers, and the favour of the public. A more admirable Princess Isabella than Mdlle. di Murska could not be named; nor, probably, has there in our time been an Elena superior to Mdlle. Fioretti, whose exquisitely refined (and modest) art might almost create a renewed taste for the now so entirely neglected ballad.

Martha, the irrepressible Martha, brought with it a new attraction. Many will remember Madame Volpini, who six years ago made so favourable an impression with the small character of a "Shepherd Boy," in M. Gounod's Mireille, at Her Majesty's Theatre. Since then she has played at some of the chief theatres of the Continent, and is now not merely a singer but an actress of real distinction. The audience of Drury Lane had possibly forgotten her, though connoisseurs had not. Her reception was far from cordial; but she speedily carried the house with her. Madame Volpini looks now much as Madame Volpini looked in 1864; but she is a more thorough mistress of her art. As an example of facility in making a great deal out of little, her performance of Lady Enriched was to the point. Other Marthas (instance Madame Boski) were contented to look like ladies and sing like nightingales; but Madame Volpini, like her famous contemporary, Madame Adelina Patti, seasoned the dramatic with the character, and her impersonation is both natural and graceful—half comedy, half sentiment, altogether genuine and true. The earlier scenes, before Lady Enrichetta changes her name and Martha becomes love-sick, are not less well conceived and carried out than what follow. But we really cannot enter into a new description of Martha. Enough that Madame Volpini's performance was dramatically irreproachable, and that the well-known air, "Qui sola vergin rosa," was sung with such genuine expression as to call forth a loud and unanimous encore. Madame Trebelli-Bettini as Nancy, and Mr. Santley, as Plumkett, have no superiors. Signor Bettini, as Lionel, gave the usual sentimental tone to "M'apparì tutt' amor," and obtained the usual 'encore.' A similar honour was conferred upon Mr. Santley, in the apostrophe to "Alice," and also upon the "Spinning-wheel" quartet. Signor Zoboli was a quaint Lord Tristan. We hope shortly to judge of Madame Volpini's progress in an opera less hackneyed than that which has made the reputation of M. Flotow, and to which we have ceased to listen so often.

On Saturday night there was an enormous house, not merely to see Mdlle. Nilsson as Margaret in Faust, but to welcome back a very popular and distinguished artist, after an absence of four years. That Mephistopheles was one of M. Faure's most characteristic and successful impersonations when he was last among us all our opera-going readers know. But since then he has played the part at the Grand Opéra in Paris (with Mdlle. Nilsson) so often, and with such success, that it is not surprising he should have brought it to a high degree of perfection. In short, the Mephistopheles of the renowned French singer may now, without hesitation, be pronounced the best on the stage, whether judged from a musical or a dramatic point of view. M. Faure—whose costume is similar to that so frequently adopted at German theatres, and, though hardly appropriate to the "Jahrender Scholastiva" of Goethe, still, we may presume, acceptable to the German mind—had no sooner made the sudden apparition which astonishes Faust than he was received with acclamation. His performance of Mephistopheles is so well known as to absolve us from the task of detailed criticism. Each of the salient features—from the first dialogue with Faust to the animated duet which ensues; from the characteristic song about the "Calf of Gold" to the crouching of the Evil Spirit incarnate before the semblance of the Cross, and so on up to the mock-serenade (uttered with that quiet irony of which M. Faure is so admirable a master), and the final scene, where the unswerving religious faith of the stricken but repentant Margaret prevails over all the artful persuasions of her enemy—was brought out with the skill and effect of former years, and, as may be imagined from what we have already stated, with even more elaborate refinement. M. Faure, indeed, well repaid an enthusiastic reception by a performance of singular merit.

The Margaret of Mdlle. Nilsson, it need hardly be said, is one of the chastest and most touching delineations of the character ever witnessed. In looking at the performance of this consummate artist from first to last, we are above all impressed with the idea of that absolute purity of innocence which, before the severest tribunal, would acquit Margaret of any witting sin. Never was unconscious victim of remorseless fate more strikingly portrayed. That such was the ideal of the poet none who have read him can dispute. Of Mdlle. Nilsson's execution of the music we have spoken on several occasions, and we need only add here that it remains in a technical sense as pure as in a dramatic sense is her conception of the personage—a personage than even the often doubted "cynical" Goethe, worldliest of inspired poets, could do no less than send to heaven. But except to add that Mr. Santley made the death scene of Valentine as he never fails to do, one of the most impressive and striking passages in the opera, that Madame Trebelli-Bettini was a Siebel beyond reproach, and Signor Gardoni the earnest and artistic representative of Faust we have recognized so long, we shall be expected to say no more about so familiar an opera—a performance of which, moreover, has already once this season been recorded.

On Monday, the operas of Abu Hassan and L'Ora del Cairo (of which we have more to say) were repeated, and on Tuesday, Meyerbeer's charming pastoral opera, Dinorah, was given for the first time, with Mdlle. Rina di Murska, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Bettini, and Mr. Santley—one of the best performances of the season, and altogether too remarkable to be dismissed in a sentence. The opera for Thursday evening was Faust (second time); and to-night we are promised the Nozze di Figaro (first time), with Mdlle. Nilsson and Lewitzky, Madame Volpini, Mr. Santley, and M. Faure in the principal characters.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Athenæum speaks thus of Mr. Limpus's oratorio, The Prodigal's Return:—

"The composer is an amateur clergyman, who holds the post of Minor Canon at St. George's Chapel, Windsor. We will not counsel the Rev. H. F. Limpus at St. George's Chapel, Windsor. We will not counsel the Rev. H. F. Limpus to inwardly digest the proverb, 'Ne sutor,' &c., because it is evident that he has ability enough to warrant a use of the pen. But there is music and music—psalm-tunes and oratorios for example; and our advice to Mr. Limpus is—avoid the latter, since it can only result in much wasted labour, and more disappointment. It is hardly worth while to dwell upon the libretto of a work not likely to occupy much attention; but we may say that the story is treated in a clumsy fashion. Certain verses are taken from the parable; and upon each is hung a string of reflections. The narrative itself is meanwhile rendered the load of moralising, and becomes, at best, of secondary concern. Whether such an arrangement be right or wrong the reader may safely be left to decide for himself. The music is for the most part correctly and agreeably written, and shows an easy predilection of commonplace melody. This is merely all we can urge in its favour. In the matter of original invention and independant thought the work is sadly wanting. We may even go so far as to say that Mr. Limpus appears to have copied Handel assiduously, only drawing a line at the actual reproduction of the great master's themes. If it were worth while, we could bring forward example upon example of this; but it is not worth while, and we refrain. Let us, however, ask what is the use of producing such tame and colourless music in the days when the great masters are known and admired by everybody. Compositions like The Prodigal's Return have not the ghost of a chance; and their sure fate is speedy forgetfulness—a fate the composers should look upon as merciful."

HAMBURGH.—Herr Niemann has been singing with great success in a round of characters. He concluded his engagement by appearing as Masaniello in La Muette.—Certain leading men here, considering the size, wealth, and taste for art of this old city, have set on foot a project for the establishment of a Conservatory of Music.

Digitized by Google

THE DRURY LANE NOVELTIES.

It is much to be desired that some competent hand would do for Weber what Jahn did for Mozart and what Thayer is doing for Beethoven—write an exhaustive account of his life and works. Such biographies of the composer as now exist, not excepting that by his son, Baron Max von Weber, are very unsatisfactory, and hence the few particulars which can be obtained with regard to Abu Hassan. Only the simplest facts being available, if our notice of the work be meagre, the fault lies elsewhere. Abu Hassan is Weber's second opera, and closely followed Sylvana. The third, Der Freischütz, was written ten years after, so that Abu Hassan may be said to have ended the first period of Weber's career as a dramatic composer. It will be assumed that a material difference is observable between the style of Weber at 24 and 34. In point of fact Abu Hassan and Der Freischütz have very little in common. When writing the earlier opera, Weber had not found his proper metier. He was, above all, a composer of the romantic school, and must have felt as little at home with comic music as can be imagined. A man of genius, however, can touch nothing without adorning it; and in Abu Hassan we have comic opera face to face with which that now passing as such may well blush for shame. But we must return to the few historical details of which mention has been made. The libretto was written by Herr Heiner, a friend of the composer, and is based upon the well-known story in the Arabian Nights. About August 1810, Weber had the work in hand, beginning when on a visit to Mannheim; and, we should say, getting on very slowly, for in December it was not completed. What happened between December and June, 1811, history saveth not; at all events, Abu Hassan was brought out in the Munich Theatre at the latter date, and, according to Weber himself, "played twice with great applause." Other representations followed, in various parts of Germany, and the little work was soon accepted as an honour to contemporary act. It was first heard in England at Drury Lane Theatre; a comic drama in two acts, called Abu Hassan, being produced in 1825, with Weber's music as an illustrative and incidental accessory. Since then it has lain neglected, and only exceptional knowledge and enterprise such as now directs the Drury Lane operas could have determined upon its production. Lightness and grace are characteristic of the music from beginning to end. Here and there, indeed, the inspiration is feeble, becomes apparent to a degree nobody can overlook, and by no means, we need scarcely say, to the disadvantage of the work. If the question be asked—Was it worth while to revive Abu Hassan? our answer is emphatically—Yes. It presents to us a phase of the composer's genius not otherwise apparent. The author of Der Freischütz has long been familiar, but what Weber was as a dramatic musician, ten years earlier, Abu Hassan alone can show.

The story of L'Oca del Cairo is better known. It was begun in 1783, one year after the production of Il Seraglio, and three years before that of Le Nozze di Figaro. The work is, therefore, an outcome of Mozart's genius when in its prime, and not, as some have supposed, a youthful effusion he was only too glad to leave in manuscript. The fact the illustrious master left L'Oca del Cairo unfinished is true, but the explanation can be found apart from any question of its merit. Readers of musical biography know that Mozart had more than one quarrel with the Abbé Varesco, court chaplain at Salzburg, who dabbled largely in libretti. This reverend gentleman prepared the book of Idomeneo, and in connection with it a rupture took place between composer and librettore. Varesco was an obstinate man, with supreme confidence in his own ability, and a disinclination to see himself right, every body else wrong. Mozart, however, gave him another trial, with a result even more unfortunate. The composer's letters show with what difficulty the two worked together so long as they did. At last the time came when Mozart could stand it no longer, and he quietly laid the opera aside never to resume work upon it. At his death, therefore, L'Oca del Cairo consisted of only six, or at most seven 'numbers, more or less incomplete as regards scoring for the orchestra. These were the "Air de la Déclaration" (doubtful), the "Ariette de la Soubrette," the "Duo du Dépit Amoreux," the "Quatuor du Balcon," the "Duetto des Cadeux," the "Ariette de Basse," and the Finale. In this condition the MS. passed from Mozart's widow to Herr André of Offenbach, whose descendant, the music publisher of that town, printed it nine years ago. As so printed the work was, of course, unfitted for stage use, and would have remained in that condition but for an ingenious and clever Frenchman, M. Victor Wilder, to whom occurred the happy thought of completing it. M. Wilder's plan was to re-write the libretto with the assistance of such indications of Varesco's plot as were available; to expand the music by adding other of Mozart's pieces not generally known and to have scored for orchestra those parts left incomplete by the composer. The first portion of this triple task he did well; though it must be said that the story is very absurd and silly. In the second portion he displayed judgment which the result proves to be sound. We translate his own account of the procedure:—"Mozart had written neither overture nor introduction, but just when he busied himself with L'Oca del Cairo he had begun to set music to an old opera, Le Sposo Deluso. He soon gave up the idea, though not before the overture and introductory quartet which, by a curious chance, presented a complete analogy with the first scene of L'Oca del Cairo, were completed and scored for the orchestra. This overture and quartet naturally, therefore, take the place of the absent introduction. I find the rondo of Isabel also instrumented in a score of the master of which title and words are lost. (Here M. Wilder is wrong. The rondo is part of the opera of Zaide, as any one can see by looking into the thematic catalogue of Mozart's works.) As regards the final trio, it completes the first act of Bianchi's opera, La Villanella Rapita, played at Vienna in 1785, for which Mozart, that grand prodigal, wrote this admirable chef d'œuvre." All the music in L'Oca del Cairo, as now performed, is, therefore, not only Mozart's, but was written about the time when the opera was in hand. This accounts for the singular unity there is about it; a unity so complete that one can scarcely regard the work as a pasticcio. We shall not enter upon a critical examination of its merits for reasons of space. Enough that not a bar is unworthy to be connected with an illustrious name.

T. E.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The fourth of these entertainments took place in St. James's Hall last Wednesday week, when the following selection of music was performed:—

PART I.

Overture, "Der Wasserträger" ...	...	...	...	...	Cherubini.
Aria, "O mio Fernando" (La Favorita)	...	...	...	...	Donizetti.
Concerto in A minor, Violin ...	...	...	...	...	Spohr.
Aria, "In qui lo vedo" (L'Africaine) ...	...	...	...	...	Meyerbeer.
Symphony, in B flat ...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven.

PART II.

Rondo. Pianoforte and Orchestra, "Le Retour de Londres"	...	...	...	...	Hummel.
Aria, "Vedrai carino" ...	...	...	...	...	Mozart.
Variations, Violin ...	...	...	...	...	Paganini.
Aria, "Le Vallon" ...	...	...	...	...	Gounod.
Symphony, "Finale of the Jupiter" ...	...	...	...	...	Mozart.

The vocalists were Madame Pauline Lucca and M. Waldeck, the solo violinist, Herr de Grahn, and the pianist, Miss Kate Roberts. The pièce de résistance was the symphony in B flat by Beethoven. In the adagio the excellent playing of Mr. Radcliff (flute), Mr. Barret (oboe), Mr. Lazarus (clarionet), and Mr. Butcher (bassoon) was heard to the best advantage. Spohr's dramatic concerto served to introduce Herr de Grahn to a New Philharmonic audience. With his style, intonation, execution, and expression, Herr de Grahn is entitled to be considered one of the players of the day. He was applauded and recalled. The pianist, Miss Kate Roberts, is an established favourite at the New Philharmonic Concerts. Her playing of Hummel's "Retour de Londres" was characterized by those charming qualities which early brought her into notice as a pianist. The audience were enthusiastic in their applause. Instead of detailing how Madame Lucca was applauded and encored, it is simpler to say she met with the same success in the concert-room as always attends her appearance at Covent Garden Operahouse. M. Waldeck, in Gounod's "Le Vallon," made a favourable impression, and sang with much taste and refinement. Dr. Wylde conducted the orchestral works. Signor Bevignani and M. Zerbini accompanied the vocal music.

At the next concert, June 15th, Liszt's Legend of St. Elisabeth is announced for performance. Mdlle. Thetjens has undertaken the character of St. Elisabeth.

CARLSRUHE.—The Theatre will be closed at the end of the present month. Herr Niemann, and Mdlle. Schneider (from the latter from Leipsic, will, however, previously sing a few nights. From all accounts, it appears that the retirement of the late stage-manager, Herr Devrient, is severely felt, and that the operas are not produced with anything like the completeness for which they used to be distinguished in his time.

VIENNA.—The ex-King of Hanover continues to distribute his orders right and left. He is as lavish in that respect as certain London managers. He has just conferred the Guelph Order upon Herren O. Dessoff, Hellmesberger, L. A. Zellner, and Mosenthal.—Mr. Adams leaves the Imperial Operahouse at the end of June. He wished to get a higher salary, and so did the management—wish he might get it. It is his intention to return to America.—A juvenile Italian Opera company is announced to appear at the Vaudeville Theater. They will perform in costume Il Barbiere, Il Trovatore, La Sonnambula, &c. Every real lover of art will assuredly hope that the success of the undertaking may be as small, in proportion, as the size of the artiste.

Digitized by Google

PROVINCIAL.

GREENOCK.—A local paper of May 21st says:—

"The fourteenth session of the Choral Society was brought to a close last night by a private concert in the Town Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. D. Middleton—Mr. A. L. Peace being accompanist and organ soloist. After a brief prelude on the organ by Mr. Peace came a sacred cantata, Supplication, by Mr. Middleton. The soloists and choristers did ample justice to Mr. Middleton's work, and if that gentleman was as contented as the audience were delighted with their efforts, he has every cause for gratification. Next came Meyerbeer's grand march, composed for the coronation of the present King of Prussia. Mr. Peace was thoroughly at home in its rendering, and passed through it with completest success. Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm followed, the orchestral accompaniments to which were played by Mr. Peace upon the organ. Dr. Bennett's ever-welcome May Queen formed the second part of the concert. Thus a rich treat was provided, and the society earned at once the thanks and the applause of those who were privileged with an invitation to be present."

EXETER.—Jephtha was performed on the 16th inst., in the Victoria Hall, by the Exeter Choral Society. With regard to it we read as follows in the Western Morning News:—

"The solos were taken by Miss Banks (Iphis), Mrs. Patey-Whytock (Storge), Mr. Vernon Rigby (Jeptha), and Mr. Patey (Zebul). Miss Banks, in 'Tha smiling dawn of happy daya,' was warmly applauded, and 'Happy they' would have been re-demanded but for the lateness of the hour. 'Let other creatures die,' was given with impassioned earnestness by Mrs. Patey, who sang magnificently her husband's music in artistic effort, the recitative, 'But Jephtha comes,' Mr. Rigby, in 'O Zebul,' and 'Hide thou thy hated beams,' won most applause. We must mention an amusing incident nearly at the close. Miss Banks was singing her very best in the air 'Farewell, ye limpid streams,' when a railway engine, passing close at the back of the hall, gave a discordant screech three or four notes above the singer's voice; a minute after the break whistle sounded the exact pitch of the note Miss Banks was at the instant holding out; had it been the silver flute itself the effect could not have been more harmonious."

DINORAH AT DRURY LANE.

(From the "Daily Telegraph" May 26.)

Whether Mr. Wood's acting manager produced Dinorah on Tuesday night for its own sake, or for the sake of the artists who took part in it, is a matter of no consequence. Anyhow, the performance was adequate; but, if moved solely by admiration for Meyerbeer's most charming opera, the services of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Signor Gardoni, and Mr. Santley, gave admiration the quality of special timeliness.

It will be remembered that, when Dinorah was brought out at Her Majesty's Theatre, under Mr. Mapleson, the artists just named were acknowledged on all hands as thoroughly efficient in their respective parts. Mdlle. di Murska does most things well—those things most well which give scope for a somewhat erratic genius; and hence the success of her Dinorah has, perhaps, exceeded that of any other character in which she appears. Signor Gardoni is admittedly the best Torentino on the stage; and Mr. Santley's Hoel, from what it was in the days of the Tyrer-Harrison régime, has come to rank among the most striking of vocal and dramatic achievements. The conjunction of three such artists gave a special value to Tuesday's performance, and when we say that the subordinate parts were, without exception, well filled, it is evident that a treat of no ordinary kind was afforded. There is hardly need to travel once more over ground so well trodden, and to point out in detail the merits of a very familiar representation. Enough that Mdlle. di Murska asserted her old superiority, and that her execution of the "Shadow Song"—most fanciful of operatic conceits — roused the house to enthusiasm, and elicited the noisiest of encores. Not the least effective part of Mdlle. di Murska's work, let us add, was done in the last act, after the "cold water cure" brought about by Dinorah's immersion. The gradual comprehension of actual facts was shown in the simplest, most unaffected, and most natural way conceivable. Signor Gardoni once more acted the cowardly Breton peasant to the life; that he sang very unlike a Breton or any other peasant we need not assert. With regard to Mr. Santley, who was perfect from first to last, it must be mentioned that his touching delivery of Hoel's lament over the senseless form of Dinorah obtained a thoroughly deserved encore. The charming pastoral which succeeds the storm, and comes with such welcome brightness, had its beauty heightened by the singing of Mdlle. Vinta and Madame Trebelli (shepherds), Signor Rinaldini (reaper), and Signor Ragnier (hunter); and the choral music has not often been given with greater effect. The principal artists were "called" after each act.

EDINBURGH.—The Grand Baden Vocal Festival, to be held here after Whitsuntide, bids fair to be exceedingly good. About 2,000 singers are expected to take part in it.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Spohr's symphony, The Power of Sound, to adopt a misnomer even more expressive than the rightful title—was played at this society's fifth concert on Monday last, and again asserted itself as the composer's masterpiece. There are reasons in plenty why the symphony should be popular. It is full of melody, and of the charm arising from refined treatment; moreover it illustrates a theme that appeals to every heart. The work was heard on Monday with unflagging attention, and a generally good performance presented it under favourable, if not the most favourable, conditions. Beethoven's second symphony (in D) is too well known even for such general remarks as the foregoing. There was room for improvement in the execution of certain passages; but this is usually the case with one or other of the symphonies at the Philharmonic concerts, and it arises, we presume, from want of adequate rehearsal.

The concerto was Weber's in E flat for piano, a work rarely heard, owing, perhaps, to the overshadowing popularity of the Concert-stück, which seems to monopolise all the attention pianists are able to give its author. The concerto in E flat is Weber's second, and was written at various times during the years 1811-12. It ranks, therefore, in chronological order soon after Abu Hassan, and, like that pleasant little opera, illustrates the master's less characteristic style. That it is a work of great merit we cannot say; at the same time its claims to an occasional hearing are undeniable. The pianist was Herr Pauer, who suggested the thought that, amid the incessant demands made by a London season upon artists of eminence, it is barely possible for them to do justice to their fame when the work in hand requires careful preparation. Under all circumstances, however, Herr Pauer shows himself a genuine artist, and the recall he obtained was a due recognition of merit. The overtures were Meyerbeer's Struensee and Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, widely-contrasted examples of composers who had very little in common. That the audience heard Mozart with delight, and Meyerbeer with curious interest, need not be said. As regards Struensee, however, we may question if it appears to advantage out of the place assigned to it by the composer. Mdlle. Orgeni, who sang the concert-aria, is remembered as one of the Royal Italian Opera company some time ago, sang the great scena from Der Freischütz, and Donizetti's "Ardon gl'incensi" (flute obbligato espitally played by Herr Svensden) so as to obtain considerable applause. Mr. Santley also appeared, his selections being Spohr's "Di militari onori" (Jessonda) and "Non più andrai," both given perfectly.

THADDEUS EGG.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS.

The second of the summer series of four performances took place on Wednesday afternoon at St. James Hall. It will be remembered that Mdlle. Christine Nilsson was unable to sing at the first in consequence of indisposition. On Wednesday, however, the accomplished Swedish vocalist duly appeared, and again created a profound impression by her admirable delivery of the principal soprano solos in the Messiah. She was encored in "I know that my Redeemer." We have before dilated on the high qualities, executive and intellectual, which Mdlle. Nilsson brings to the interpretation of this sublime music; and therefore need only now say that the effect produced was fully as great as in previous instances. "Rejoice greatly," was brilliantly sung by Madame Sinclair, and the other solos were sufficiently rendered by Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. G. Perren, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli. As on some former occasions, Mr Perren was a ready and well-prepared substitute for Mr. Sims Reeves, who was to have made his re-appearance at this concert after his recent sojourn in Italy; but was prevented by an attack of hoarseness, for which an apology was made Mr. Leslie, who stated that he had received but short notice of the disappointment. Some slight expressions of dissatisfaction were changed to general applause at Mr. Leslie's temperate self-justification in a matter wherein he is himself much more injured than his audience, and quite as little to blame as they.

ORATORIO CONCERTS.

The ninth and closing concert of the season took place on Wednesday, when the programme included Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The association of two such masterpieces is peculiarly appropriate, and formed a grand climax to an interesting series. The performance was generally efficient, especially in the Lobgesang, which appeared to have had the advantage of more preparation and rehearsal than the symphony. The solo vocalists were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Sinclair, Mr. Cummings, and Herr Carl Stepan. Mr. Barnby conducted with his usual judgment and care; and his capital choir did good service in the choral movements of both works.

The series of concerts just terminated commenced on December 8 with Handel's Dettingen Te Deum and Acis and Galatea—both for the first time with Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments—which were followed by the Messiah, the Seasons, Jephtha, Beethoven's Mass Solemnis, Bach's Passion Music, Elijah, Mr. Barnby's Rebekah, and Alexander's Feast.

Digitized by Google

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

BY SPECIAL DESIRE.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S
Beethoven Recitals.

1870.

This year being the Centenary of the birth of Beethoven, Mr. Hallé has considered it appropriate to devote his Recitals exclusively to the music of that illustrious composer.
The programmes, as on previous occasions, consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, p.m.
Mr. Hallé is assisted at all the Recitals by
HERR STOCKHAUSEN.
Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the sonatas, accompany the programmes.

THE FIFTH RECITAL
WILL TAKE PLACE ON
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JUNE 3RD, 1870,
To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

SONATA, Op. 29, No. 2	.. .. ..	Beethoven.
RECIT. and AIR, "Tyrannic love"—Herr STOCKHAUSEN.	.. ..	Handel.
GRAND SONATA, Op. 28, No. 3	.. .. ..	Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Mit dem grünen Laubenkranz" (With the green ribbon. / "Der Jager" (The Hunter.	.. .. ..	Schubert.
	Herr STOCKHAUSEN.
ADDANTE, Op. 35	.. .. ..	Beethoven.
TRIZTY-TWO VARIATIONS on an Original Theme	.. .. ..	Beethoven.
SONGS, { "Ellenschi und Stolz" (Jealousy and Pride) / "Die liebe Farbe" (The dear Colour)	.. ..	Schubert.
	Herr STOCKHAUSEN.
GRAND SONATA, Op. 53 (Dedicated to Count Waldstein)	.. ..	Beethoven.

The LAST FOUR RECITALS will take place on the following Afternoons:—
Friday, June 3, | Friday, June 17,
Friday, June 10, | Friday, June 24,
To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely.

Prices of Admission (for the Series)—Sofa Stalls (numbered and reserved), £2 2s. Balcony, £1.
For One Recital—Sofa Stalls, 15s.; Balcony, 10s.; Area, 5s.
Subscriptions received at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co.'s, 48, Cheapside; Hays, 4, Exchange Buildings; Austin's Ticket Office, 28, Piccadilly; and by Mr. Charles Hallé, 11, Mansfield Str. et, Cavendish Square.

DEATHS.

On May 15th, at Londonderry, HENRY, eldest son of the late J. B. LOUDER (author of Logier's System).
On May 24th, CHARLOTTE JACKSON, for many years known in the musical profession as Miss CURTIT.
On May 25th, ELLEN, daughter of Mr. FREDERICK WHITE, musicseller, of Oxford Street—aged 20 months.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday; otherwise they will be too late for insertion.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). Advertisements received as late as Three o'clock P.M. on Thursdays, but not later. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1870.

COSTUMES AT COVENT GARDEN.

A REFRESHING breeze has sprung up around Covent Garden, and is likely to ventilate the obscure places where questions of operatic dress are determined. We hail it, as another evidence of the movement which gathers force year by year in the direction of stage realism. Let us not be understood to believe that realism in opera is of equal importance with realism in the spoken drama. The dramatic stage assumes to illustrate life as it is; the lyric stage claims, and does so of necessity, a certain degree of license. We may illustrate these positions by reference to the prose writer and the poet. The former is held strictly to the rules of grammar; the latter may, if he pleases, violate those rules, where they stand in the way of effect. But though realism in opera has limits which, from the very nature of the case, cannot be overstepped, there is no excuse whatever for falling short of them. Even the lyric drama is life-like to a certain point; and so far realism has claims that deserve attention. With this preface we revert to the Covent Garden incident—a history of which may be thus told.

At a recent performance of Marta, Signor D. Tagliafico played the English nobleman, Lord Tristan di Mickleford, &c., &c., and did so in bi-coloured "tights," whereof one leg was green and the other white. As the incidents of the opera are supposed to take place at Richmond ("Star and Garter," Richmond), in the reign of the late Queen Anne (whose death is by this time generally known and lamented), and as the other costumes, though not historically correct, could fairly be brought under the ægis of poetic license, our contemporary, the Daily Telegraph, took note of Signor D. Tagliafico's "tights," and suggested that they were, perhaps, borrowed for the nonce from the wardrobe of "Rigoletto the Jester." The critic, however, did not know that Signor D. Tagliafico (according to his own account) is a severely historical artist, prepared to go any lengths and wear any "tights" that may become a connoisseur. Being this, we can imagine how the ire of Signor D. Tagliafico was kindled when he saw himself accused of an anachronism in the columns of our widely-circulating contemporary. His first impulse was, no doubt, to "write to the Editor"—most dangerous of rash thoughts—and upon it he acted. This is how Signor D. Tagliafico appeared in print:—

"MONSIEUR,—Accusez-moi d'avoir voulu renverser la Colonne de Trafalgar Square, si tel est votre bon plaisir; mais ne m'accusez pas d'une erreur historique comme celle que le Daily Telegraph me reproche aujourd'hui à propos de la Martha d'hier à Covent Garden. Tout le monde sait que bien qu'il repose sur un fait due 17e siècle, l'opéra de Martha se joue depuis 20 ans en Angleterre et partout avec des costumes du 18e. Me voyez-vous venant faire ma cour à Mdlle. Patti costumée en Agnès Sorel, avec des chausses du temps de la Reine Anne et une perruque à la Louis XIV? Si votre reproche était fondé, il s'adresserait non pas à moi seulement, mais à tous les personnages de la pièce. Que voulez-vous? Tout ça c'est la faute à Mario, qui n'a jamais voulu couper sa barbe, et qui nous a fait aussi jouer La Dame aux Camélias avec des costumes Rebelais! Je vous en prie, Monsieur, relevez-moi d'une pareille accusation d'ignorance. Chacun a son faible! Le mien c'est de me croire assez bon connaisseur en fait de choses d'art et d'histoire.—Votre tout dévoué, "D. TAGLIAFICO.

"Covent Garden Théâtre, Mercredi, 11 Mai."

The first part of this letter is somewhat evasive. With regard to the costumes of Henrietta, Nancy, and the peasants, in Marta, we have only to say that they are not glaring anachronisms which at once offend every intelligent observer. The dress of Lord Tristan, as worn by Signor D. Tagliafico, is very different. It is an anachronism that not only irritates as such, but irritates all the more because there is no beauty to extenuate its defiance of chronology. An English nobleman of Anne's time, with one leg green and the other white, ought to be hissed off the stage. Signor D. Tagliafico's reference to Signor Mario was hardly called for. Either Lord Tristan's costume was right or it was wrong. If right, why say "Tout ça c'est la faute à Mario?" No wonder that the distinguished tenor's friends took up his quarrel, or that one of them wrote as thus to the Daily Telegraph:—

"SIR,—With reference to Monsieur Tagliafico's letter in yesterday's Daily Telegraph, about the costumes of Martha and the Traviata at Covent Garden, I beg to observe that it is not fair to saddle Signor Mario with the responsibility for those costumes. In the case of the Traviata the question of 'dress' had been settled, and the opera had been sung in London and elsewhere for some years, before Signor Mario undertook the part of Alfredo; and no change of costume was introduced by him. As regards Marta, I need only remark that, as 'a well-to-do peasant,' it could signify very little to Signor Mario, or his beard, whether the scene were laid in 1300 or 1700. Monsieur Tagliafico might inquire of Messieurs St. Georges and Flotow why they selected the former period.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Digitized by Google

"May 21." "J. W.

The Traviata question thus settled—on, no doubt, the best authority—Signor D. Tagliafico has no more to say about it; but he returns to the charge à propos of Marta, in the following letter, also addressed to the D. T.:—

"MONSIEUR,—Je vous prie d'avertir, avec le plus de ménagement possible, mon honorable contradicteur que les paysans ne portaient pas plus de barbe au 17e Siècle que n'en portaient les policemen de Londres il y a deux ans. J'ai du reste suivi son avis en écrivant à M. de St. Georges et en lui demandant en même temps pourquoi dans Un Ballo in Maschera, dont le sujet est l'assassinat de Gustave de Suède par Ankastroem, les artistes ne sont pas tous coiffés avec le poudre à la Maréchale?—Votre tout devoué,

"Londres, 24 Mai, 1870. D. TAGLIAFICO."

Mark, here, the reverential accuracy of Signor D. Tagliafico. He has found out that the English peasantry of the "17e Siècle" (Signor D. Tagliafico should have said the 18th) used razors, and as Signor Mario will not use razors, he is, of course, disqualified from playing Lionello unless the period be thrown further back. The writer should have been satisfied with this retort; but, instead thereof, he chooses to plunge still further in medias res, after an argument based on the accepted costumes of Un Ballo in Maschera. Here Signor D. Tagliafico comes to very conspicuous grief. He asks why the assassination of Gustavus is not represented by bewigged and bepowdered actors—forgetting that Un Ballo in Maschera has nothing at all to do with Sweden or its king. At Covent Garden, the scene of the opera is laid in Naples, and the victim is a supposititous Duke Richard, who may have lived at any age, and worn any dress.* Had Signor D. Tagliafico remembered this it would have been much better for his case, which sorely needs all the strength available.

The upshot of the matter must be a new standard of judgment with regard to Signor Tagliafico's Lord Tristan. There now remains to be discovered whether English noblemen, who wore green and white "tights," were also buffoons; whether they had no sense of dignity even in the presence of a high-born lady; and whether, when compelled against their will to take a lesson in country dances, they stood on one leg and aped the tricks of modern ballet girls. These things, we repeat, are now matters for inquiry; and it is possible that Signor D. Tagliafico will learn the result of the investigations made. We have said nothing of the Tristan at the other house, because the only difference between the two (apart from costume) is that the Covent Garden Lord stands on one leg, and he of Drury Lane stands on both. Va pour ZOBOLI!

* At the Lyceum, and Her Majesty's Theatre, the scene was laid in Massachusetts; and Gustave became a "Governor of Boston." How would Sig. Tagliafico dress this?—A.S.S.

MARK LEMON.

Our readers will learn with sincere regret the death of Mr. Mark Lemon, which happened on Monday morning, at his residence at Crawley, Surrey. He had occupied the editorial chair of Punch (the enormous responsibility of which position may be easily imagined) for nearly thirty years. Mr. Lemon was born in the neighbourhood of Oxford Street on the 30th of November, 1809, so that he had only got halfway through the 61st year of his age. His kindly and genial disposition was well known to a large circle of authors and literary men. He was married and has left a family of sons and daughters.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Der Freischütz was to be given in Paris, on Monday, in the Opéra Impériale, with Mdlle. Ilisson as Agatha, and M. Villaret as Max. A ballet was to be played on the same evening, which necessitated sundry ugly cuts in the masterpiece of Weber. This recalls to the Ménestrel an action once brought against the director of the Opéra by a gentleman who had purchased a stall, as he alleged, to hear Der Freischütz, and especially certain pieces in Der Freischütz which were his favourites. The pieces in question were precisely those omitted; the action was brought by the indignant admirer of Weber—and gained. Who will bring an action about a still greater opera—Rossini's Tell!

VERILY American criticism is a wonder. It sounds the depths, soars to the heights, and embraces the length and breadth of what is known over the water as "high-falutin." Ole Bull is not a great man; he is not even a great fiddler, but he can touch the hidden springs of the poetry in an American critic to some purpose. The very name of him sent our reporting friend to a study of Scandinavian mythology, and here is the result:—

"When Ole Bull appeared upon the stage, we thought that the mighty shades of Thor and Odin moved behind him, who should have been a minstrel demi-god of Eld—who should have wielded the brand in the battle, and struck the harp in the banquet hall—a warrior and a bard combined, owning mighty sway in both. No artist who ever trod the stage conveyed so marked a sense of strength as Ole Bull does. He seems as though he could tear the heart out of the Nemean lion, even while the sweet music exhales from his fingers; and it is possible it is the contrast between his grand physical strength, and the exquisite sentiment, and delicacy of his manipulations that heightens the effect of his marvellous playing!"

If thus about Ole Bull, what when the Scandinavian Nilsson appears? Good friends, reserve some eloquence for that advent.

PANSERON was a friend of Berlioz, and, likewise, his constant butt. But one fine day he revenged himself upon his tormentor. At a concert given in the Operahouse by Berlioz, when the programme contained music by no other composer, the band played a funeral march which seemed as if it would never end. The entire audience began gaping and stamping with impatience; still the band went on, and some of the audience fell off to sleep. Berlioz, of course, was conducting. Catching hold of him by the tail of his coat, Panseron hallooed out in a loud voice: "I say, my dear colleague, it strikes me the churchyard is a very long way off." The house rang with uncontrollable laughter, which did not stop as quickly as the funeral march.—The worm will, &c., when, &c.

M. VACHOT, the manager of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, at Brussels, has just written to invite his colleagues, the French managers, to hold a Congress next month in Paris, for the purpose of adopting some measures calculated to stop the continually increasing terms of lyric artists. "Such a measure can only be," says the Guide Musical, "an agreement of the managers never to give more than a fixed maximum for certain lines of business." "Perhaps," the same paper goes on to observe, "some result, which we do not perceive, may spring from the Congress. This is highly desirable, for it cannot be denied that the evil imperiously demands a remedy, and that the ridiculously large amount of the salaries paid to singers causes the ruin of most managers of lyrical theatres. While they are assembled, the managers would do well to see whether they might not derive advantage from forming associations which would enable them to establish an interchange of virtuosos. Singers might then be engaged by the associated managers to sing three or four months in one town, and as long in another. The company would thus be renewed at each theatre three or four times a year. This would infuse variety into the performances, and stimulate the curiosity of the public. The idea might prove not to be bad; at any rate, we do not think that its realization would be attended with such serious obstacles that a trial should not be made. What would not have been possible formerly has now become easy, thanks to our rapid modes of communication." True, respected Guide, our modes of communication are changed, but man's nature remains pretty much what it used to be. To put only one question: Do you suppose managers would ever agree among themselves? If you do, you are of a sanguine temperament, to say the least of it.

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

On Saturday last Mrs. Roney gave her annual matinée d'invitation, when amongst the artists who appeared was the young pianist, Miss Amy Weddle, who played Ascher's "Chant des Naiades," to the evident gratification of the audience.

THE LONDON GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—Amongst our musical associations none is more worthy notice than the London Glee and Madrigal Union (established 1859), so ably conducted by Mr. Landon—consisting of Miss Jane Wells, Miss Eyles, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Coates, and Mr. Lawler. On Thursday last the society commenced its twelfth annual series of five "afternoon concerts" at St. James's Hall, when a varied and interesting selection of part music was sung with the old charm—the charm of precision, grace, and taste. The applause was enthusiastic; the audience large and fashionable. Mr. Sydney Smith was the solo pianist.

MISS JULIA SYDNEY, from New South Wales, gave an evening concert on Wednesday, at the Hanover Square Rooms, which was well attended. She possesses a mezzo-soprano voice, which she displayed to advantage in Arditi's "Reminiscences in omagio del Bosio" (accompanied by the composer), "Voi che sapete," "The birds were telling one another" (Smart), and "La Dove Prende" (with Signor Ragueri). She was assisted by Mesdames Florence Lancia, Osborne, Williams, Drasdil, Montserrat, Patti Laverne, and Miss Marie Arthur (who possesses a charming voice), Messrs. J. H. Ratcliffe, F. Elmore, Harley Vinning, and Castelli. Miss Marie Strindberg played Pfeiffer's "Quatrième Mazurka" in a brilliant manner on the pianoforte. Signor Arditi, Messrs. Frank Mori and Van Noorden were the accompanists.

MR. LOUIS GISSONE gave his first pianoforte recital on Wednesday, at St. George's Hall, which was crowded. Mr. Gibsone has an expressive style and fluent execution, which he displayed with great effect in several of his own compositions, among which "Song of Spring," "Arabian Lay," and "Dans le rangue" were most applauded. His Meditations, Book 1., consisting of six pieces, were listened to with much pleasure, each number being received with favour. The recital ended with a brilliant solo, "Thème militaire," a highly characteristic piece. Mr. Gibsone was excellently assisted by Miss Poynte, who gave several songs, and Mr. Boleyne Reeves, the well-known harpist. Mr. Henry R. Eyers (Royal Academy) presided as accompanist.

THE third of Mr. and Mrs. Benedict Alfred Gilbert's chamber concerts took place at 9, Cendnit Street, on the 11th inst., when an excellent selection of classical music was performed. The instrumental pieces comprised two movements of Mendelssohn's trio in C minor, Op. 66 (Messrs. Gilbert, Holmes, and Reeve); Boccherini's sonata in A for violoncello (Sig. Pezze); Beethoven's sonata in E flat, for pianoforte, Op. 81 (Mr. Gilbert); the same composer's sonata in G, for piano and violin (Messrs. Gilbert and Holmes); and his trio in B flat, Op. 97, for piano, violin, and violoncello (Messrs. Gilbert, Holmes, and Pezze). All these were played in excellent style. Madame Gilbert, Mr. Perren, and Mr. F. F. Reilly supplied the vocal music; the lady being especially successful in Handel's "Where'er you walk," and Haydn's duet from The Seasons, "Ye gay and painted flowers," sung with Mr. Reilly.

MDLLE. BONDY'S annual morning concert took place in the Hanover Square Rooms on Saturday last. A numerous and fashionable audience attended, and the programme—a capital example of what such a thing should be—gave entire satisfaction. Mdlle. Bondy first joined Herr Straus and M. Paque in Hummel's trio in E major (Op. 83); after which she gained the heartiest applause by her rendering of three small pieces respectively by Schumann, Moscheles, and Weber. The concert-giver was not less successful in performing (with Herr Straus), the "Kreutzer" Sonata, and Beethoven's excellent fantasia on Der Freischutz. To say that each display elicited hearty applause, would be superfluous. The vocalists were Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Cummings, the latter obtaining an encore by a charming delivery of Dr. Sterndale Bennett's charming "Lord of Arnd."

AN amateur concert, in aid of the Maternity Institution connected with University College, took place in Hanover Square Rooms, on the 16th inst., presided over by Mr. W. G. Cusins. The first part began with Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, the solos in which were ably sustained by Miss Sophie Ferrari, Mrs. Glenelg, Miss Burt, Mr. W. F. Mills, and Mr. Lloyd. A word of special praise is due to Miss Ferrari, who also sang Mozart's "Non più di fiori" in a style which promises a large share of future success. Schumann's duet, in B flat, for two pianos, was capitally played by Lady Thompson and Mr. Cusins; the latter, moreover, earning great applause in Thalberg's fantasia on Moïse. A new duet for piano and clarionet, the work of Mrs. F. M. White (Alice Mary Smith), was ably rendered by the composer and Mr. Lazarus; and, not to particularize other things, the concert, generally, was a success.

HERREN LEOPOLD and GERARD BRASSIN (pianist and violinist), by kind permission of Messrs. John Broadwood & Sons, played Bach's sonata, for piano and violin, in E major, and a cadenza, for violin solo, as well as Chopin's scherzo in B minor, for piano solo, at Great Pulteney Street, last week, before a select number of connoisseurs, who expressed themselves much pleased.

MDME. E. DELABORDE gave a matinée musicale at the Queen's Concert Rooms on Monday, when he introduced the Playel Wolff Pedal Pianoforte to a London audience. The instrument has three octaves of pedals (with independent strings), in the same manner as those of an organ. How much the addition increases the capacity of the piano must be apparent. MDME. Delaborde performed a selection of music ranging from fugues by Bach, to ballads and romances; not only exhibiting with extraordinary effect the resources of his instrument, but proving himself an excellent artist.

MISS PHILP gave a concert in the Hanover Square Rooms, on the 18th inst., assisted by Madame Rudersdorff, Mdlle. Carola, Miss Poole, Miss Fairman, Mdme. Patey, with Mdme. Alice Mangold, Herr Carl Rosa, and Herr van Biene as Instrumentalists. A good deal of the programme was devoted to the concert-giver's own songs, among which were several novelties:—"The Story of a Year," sung by Miss Philp herself; "The Knight's Reveille," an animated effusion to which Mr. Patey did ample justice; "Sad, soft, wind," to which Miss Philp was again heard to advantage; and, "Lillie's Good Night," which, aided by the charming singing of Mdme. Patey, obtained an encore. Mr. Cummings was much applauded in a pretty song by Miss Amy Coyne, entitled "Maddalena;" and Mdme. Rudersdorff made a great effect with Miss Philp's "La Pazza" (MS.). The admirable pianoforte playing of Mdme. Alice Mangold was a striking feature in the concert, and, as a matter of course, Herr Reinecke appeared in the capacity of "lion."

MISS LILY SHEWTEN'S annual evening concert took place at the Marlborough Rooms, Hackney, on the 10th instant, and attracted a crowded audience. The lady was assisted by Miss Lucy Franklein, Miss Kate Gordon, Messrs. Perren, Stedman, Fox, J. B. Chatterton, Regondi, and Schuberth; but her own doings naturally claim most attention here. Miss Shewten sang in excellent style Gounod's "Ave Maria" (violoncello obbligato, Herr Schuberth), took part with Mr. Perren in Nicolai's popular duet, "One Word," with Messrs. Perren and Fox in Randegger's "I Naviganti," sang with "Voce di quest' anima," joined Miss Franklein in Bishops "As it fell upon a day," obtained an encore for Benedict's "Bird that came in Spring," and, finally, joined Miss Franklein, Messrs. Perren and Fox, in Costa's "Honour and Glory." This was a pretty good evening's work, but Miss Shewten went through it with uniform success, and deserved all the honours awarded to her by an appreciative audience. Messrs. Lehmeyer and W. Miller, jun., acted as accompanists.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL was crowded last Wednesday week with an audience, attracted by the programme which Mr. Ridley Prentice had issued, on the occasion of his annual concert. The principal works were Beethoven's quintet in E flat for pianoforte, oboe, clarionet, horn, and bassoon, and the same composer's sonata in C, Op. 50, dedicated to Count Waldstein, besides Weber's sonata in F minor for pianoforte and clarionet. In all Mr. Prentice not only showed classical taste and refined style, but also admirable skill, executing them with a precision and brilliancy which called forth repeated expressions of approval. The shorter pieces which Mr. Ridley Prentice introduced consisted of the prelude and fugue in E by Bach, and Mendelssohn's caprice in E major. In the rendering of these he was no less successful than in the concerted music. Mr. Ridley Prentice's efforts to establish in one of the environs of London a regular succession of classical chamber concerts merits encouragement, and the display of his talents on this occasion was so satisfactory that it is likely to strengthen his hands in the good work he has undertaken.

MISS EMMA BOWYER'S morning concert took place in the Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday week and attracted an appreciative audience by a programme of more than average merit. Miss Bushy herself did an important share of the work, playing (with Mr. Carrodus and Signor Pezze) Beethoven's familiar trio in C minor; Schubert's sonata in A minor—the most beautiful of that master's pianoforte compositions, not even excepting his so-called sonata-fantasia in G major; Schumann's "Stucke im Volkston," for piano and violoncello (with Signor Pezze); and, lastly, Haydn's adagio and Rondo all'Ungarese, in which the concert-giver enjoyed the able co-operation of the gentlemen already named. The best testimony to Miss Bushy's playing may be found in the unmistakable satisfaction of an audience well able to appreciate the talent she possesses, and the skill displayed. Mr. Carodus rendered Ernst's solo, "Il Pirata," in masterly fashion, and Signor Pezze exhibited his powers to great advantage in Boccherini's somewhat weak, if pretty, sonata in A major. The vocalists were Mdlle. Angelina Salvi and Miss Jewell, the latter of whom sang in good style the charming romance from L'Oca del Cairo. The accompanists were Messrs. Deacon and Callcott.

Digitized by Google

THE fourth concert of the Schubert Society took place on Friday, 20th May, the second part of the programme being devoted to Benedict's vocal and instrumental compositions. Mr. Benedict himself played his charming sonata for pianoforte and violin (with Herr Hugo Hermann), which was received with great applause. Miss Lucy McManus introduced the fantasia on Der Freischütz; and the vocal part included "Ange adoré," sung by M. Waldeck; "The Bird that came in Spring" (Miss Lily Sinesteer); "The Maiden's Dream" (Mdlle. d'Etienne); and "Rock me to sleep" (Miss Amy Strangways). The other part of the programme was, as usual, miscellaneous, including—Trio, Mendelssohn; solo, violin, Ernst; solo, pianoforte, Herr Hermann; solo, violoncello, air, J. S. Bach, Herr Schuberth; solo pianoforte, sonata (Mozart) and impromptu and waltz, Herr Schrattenholz. Smart's "Wake, Mary, Wake" (Miss Strangways); cavatina, Donizetti (Miss Sinesteer); canzonet, Haydn (Mdlle. d'Etienne); and "Thaddy O'Flin" were the vocal selections. Mr. Benedict, Herr Schrattenholz, and Herr Schuberth were accompanists. The rooms were crowded. The last concert of the present season is to take place on Thursday, 16th June, when the director will take his benefit.

On Saturday last the large room at Hanover Square was crowded by a fashionable audience; the announcement of a new pianist (member of Mr. Cottell's Academy) having created no little interest in the musical world. Miss Amy Perry, notwithstanding evident nervousness, which was natural in one so young, in presence of so large an assembly, proved herself a pianist of excellence. She was unanimously recalled after "Woelfl's Ne plus ultra, and gave much satisfaction in Ascher's "Alice." Mdlles. Clara and Rosamunda Doria sang to perfection a new duet by Francesco Berger, entitled "Love and Flowers," accompanied by the composer. In their solos these ladies also showed themselves artists of the first rank. Miss Alexandrina Dwight does credit to her master, Mr. Cottell. She was encored in the "Nightingale's Trill." Mdlle. D'Elise, vocalista, was recalled after "Hero's Waiata," a new song. Madame Muntserrat was encored in Berger's "Night Bird," Mr. Fred. Childerstone obtaining a like honour in Ascher's "Alice." Mr. Sutcliffe (from New York) sang well, and possesses a voice of quality and power. Mr. W. C. Bell, who was also encored in "Hybrias the Cretan." He has a fine bass voice Mr. Walter Reeves gave "The Vagabond" with much expression; and Mr. Blohendorn's "Dearer to my soul" was in his well-known style. The concerted music was satisfactorily, as did also Mr. Cottell's singing. The other artists were Miss Agnes Sutcliffe and Miss Andromeda Oxley; the conductors were Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, Mr. C. F. Weber, Herr Lehmeyer, and Mr. Francesco Berger. Praise is due to Mr. Cottell for the admirable direction of the whole arrangements, and congratulations to Miss Amy Perry on the genuine success of this, her first London probation.

MADAME ROSALIE LONSDALE-THEMAR gave an evening concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Wednesday, the 18th instant. The vocalists were Mesdames Edith Wynne, Wells, Lucy Franklein, and Cantelo; Messrs. George Smith, Winn, and Trelawny Cobham. Miss Edith Wynne was encored in Madame Sainton-Dolby's "How said you wouldn't"—a song requiring the particular sprightliness and archness it received. Mr. Lodet's "Diver" Mr. George Smith was eminently successful, while Mr. Cobham was much applauded in "The Violet" of Mozart. Mr. Winn sang a new song, "The Flight of Time," in his approved and well-known style. Mdlle. Cerrah made her first appearance in this country, and gave promise of becoming a valuable addition to our concert singers. She rendered well a canzonetta-polka by Badia, called "Bel Moretto." The instrumentalists began with Mayseder's trio in A flat (Op. 52). They were Herr Ludwig (violin), M. Vieuxtemps (violoncello), and the bénéficiaire herself (pianoforte). Madame Lonsdale-Themar exhibited a clear light touch, skilful fingering, and judicious phrasing, aiding much the very good playing of the gentlemen. M. Vieuxtemps was much applauded for his fine tone and expressive rendering of the andante movement. Madame Lonsdale-Themar also contributed a vigorous composition of her own, on themes from La Sonnambula, and two minor compositions of Dohler and Litolff. She was recalled after each performance and loudly applauded. Herr Sjöden contributed two solos for the harp, playing them carefully and correctly, but with pianissimo effects, more suitable to a drawing-room than to the Queen's Concert Rooms. Altogether, the concert gave satisfaction.—H. L.

BONN.—The erection of the grand hall for the approaching Beethoven Festival is being actively carried on. The outer walls are already run up higher than the first gallery.

A NEW lyrical opera, entitled Die Bettlerin, has been produced at Würzburg. The music is by Herr Vincent. The great feature is the grand air and scene of the third act, during which the first tenor endeavours to put an end to his existence by—coal damp! Of a truth, a strange, and fanciful means of suicide. However, variety is charming.

WAIFS.

Gottschalk began his professional career in Boston receiving his first encouragement from the late Mr. Jonas Chickering.

Signor Tito Mattei has just completed a new Italian opera, the libretto written by Signor Cimino, entitled Maria di Gant.

Watts composed 697 hymns, and Wesley 600; and about a tenth part of them live to this day, and are sung in every Christian church where the language is used.

A reader of the Buffalo Commercial submits the following:—"Why is one of Chopin's compositions like a battered coffee pot?" "Because it is a nocturne" ("Knocked-urn").

An Indiana young lady, attending a private party, excused herself when asked to sing, saying, "You must excuse me, for I never attempt to sing except to warble a few wild notes for pa at evenitide."

The Figaro proposes that three representations shall be given each week at the Grand Opéra, with "popular prices," and with artists, band, and choruses, made up of every available source. The Figaro dreams.

We understand that Messrs. R. Cocks & Co. purpose erecting a suitable organ in the Hanover Square Rooms. The need for such a step has long existed, and the result will be, no doubt, satisfactory in all respects.

A minister in Pittfield, Mass., at whose church congregational singing is practised, gave out a hymn of six verses on a recent Sunday, remarking that if the congregation sang it well the entire hymn might be sung; but if it was to be poorly performed, one or two verses would be enough.

A little boy of Provincetown, four years old, very anxious for a drum, on going to bed made the following prayer:—"Now I lay me down to sleep, I want a drum, I pray the Lord, I want a drum, my soul to keep, And if I should die before I wake, I want a drum." His prayer was answered.

A major in the United States Army was crossing from England in one of the Cunard steamers, when one afternoon a band on deck played "Yankee Doodle." A gruff Englishman who stood by inquired whether that was the tune the old cow died of. "Not at all"—retorted the major—"that is the tune the old Bull died of!"

According to L'Art Musical, the programme of Mdlle. Nilsson is complete up to the point of her retirement from the profession. After the present London season she goes to America, remaining there thirteen months. Returning, she takes the place of Madame Patti at St. Petersburgh, and then bids farewell to the Lyric stage.

Music is to be introduced as a curative treatment for insanity, hypochondriasis, and other chronic diseases of the mind, in some of the great asylums of Paris. Several of the greatest physicians have stated that, in their opinion, music, if well and skilfully applied, will cure, or at least moderate, or check insanity and kindred diseases.

A young and pretty lady in New Orleans has undertaken a novel missionary work, which is likely to expose her to criticism, though she is evidently in earnest. She is visiting the concert saloons in that city for the purpose of reforming the habitués of those establishments. Her method is to sing a few hymns at each place accompanying herself on the piano.

The committee who have conducted the musical performances in Victoria Park during the past fourteen years are again at their post, and commenced their fifteenth season on Sunday week. The First Chief Commissioner, trustee for the people, having communicated to the committee his desire that dance music should be discontinued, they have made arrangements with their musical director to that effect, and sacred and operatic selections will henceforth be performed. It should be observed that the band is supported by voluntary contributions.

The inauguration of the statue of Ponsard the dramatist, took place on Sunday at his native town of Vienne, on the Rhone. The fete brought strangers enough to fill all the hotels to overflowing. M. Emile Augier was principal speaker at the banquet, which was attended by a great many Parisian dramatists and journalists. In the evening scenes from Ponsard's principal plays—Charlotte Corday, Honor and Lydia, and Lucrece—were performed, some of the characters being taken by actors who had originally represented them at the Théâtre Français.

A work of considerable interest to musical antiquarians is about to be published by M. J. B. Labat, the veteran organist of the cathedral of Montauban, consisting of the fourth book of the organ music of Claude Merulo, a Venetian organist, the original of which, three hundred years old, exists in the library of the Augustine Convent at Toulouse. The book contains no less than three complete Masses and three Credos. M. Labat has devoted much time in its editing and to the somewhat arduous task of transcribing it in our modern notation.—Choir.

Digitized by Google

At the fourth sitting of the Commission now engaged in remodelling the Paris Conservatoire, M. Edmond About suggested that the pupils should go through a course of elementary instruction, including reading and writing, is being notorious that a tenor engaged at one of the largest theatres in the capital could not sign his name. Taking higher ground, M. Gonnod proposed the addition of a course of philosophy, to include Cicero and the Bible. Eventually it was decided that candidates should be examined as to their general knowledge, and not passed unless properly qualified.

Some of our French contemporaries appear to be imitating their confrères of the New York Press in the practice of slightly departing from the truth in their efforts to convey to the world a forcible account of the success of favourite artists. Thus in a recent issue we are assured that after a concert at Milan M. and Mdme. Jaell were recalled twenty times! Verily, as the reporter adds, the audience must have applauded "con furia;" but as far as the pianists were concerned (if endowed with the smallest grain of modesty), we should imagine that they would have preferred a less enthusiastic reception.

After a tolerably successful effort on the part of the New World concert directors to keep the "Music of the Future" out of their programmes, it is at last making itself heard, and at Mr. Theodore Thomas's orchestral concerts at Boston, the works of Wagner, Berlioz, and Liszt, have recently been performed. Up to the present, however, the composers of modern Germany have not made many friends, and the critics tell us that they "turn with a joyful, restful feeling" from one of these astonishing modern efforts to "the music of the sane old fellow madmen," to a movement from one of Beethoven's symphonies.

The will of Louis Moreau Gottschalk, the pianist, who died at Rio Janeiro lately, was recently admitted to probate in Philadelphia City. The will was made in Philadelphia as far back as January 14, 1856. All the property, real and personal, is left to the mother as a life estate. After her death it reverts to the brothers and sisters of deceased. These are the provisions, and as Mrs. Gottschalk died before her son, the surviving children come into immediate possession. Mr. Charles Verin, merchant, of Philadelphia, is appointed executor under the will. The value of the estate is estimated at twenty-five thousand dollars.

The coming season at Baden-Baden bids fair to be no less full of attraction than it usually is. Italian opera will be the order of the day, from the middle to the end of this month. A new will be chiefly taken up by concerts, MM. Seligmann and Rubinstein being among the performers; in July the Palais Royal company will appear, and—strange juxtaposition—the International Chess Congress will take place; the Théâtre Français actors, including Mdlle. Favart, MM. Delaunay and Coquelin, will amuse the August visitors; and they will be followed by a second instalment of Italian singers. Lastly, there is to be an important musical festival on the 14th of September.

Recently we recorded the christening of a new ship after the celebrated Rimini, and suggested that Children the advisability of adopting a similar course in naming the new Ironclads in the British Navy. This week we have to announce the wise resolution of the Belgian municipal authorities to introduce a similar fashion in street nomenclature the name of De Beriot, the late violinist, having been given to a new thoroughfare in Brussels. As the members of our own Metropolitan Board of Works are fond of changing street names, perhaps they might consider this example worthy of imitation, instead of perpetuating the anything but euphonious titles to which we are accustomed.—Choir.

A pianoforte duel has actually occurred at Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The challenge was offered by a Mr. Mathieson and accepted by a Mr. Rooney. Gottschalk's "Last Hope" was played by Mr. Mathieson in six minutes and a half, while Mr. Rooney got through it in five minutes and a half. In a piece called "The Rivulet," Mr. Rooney walked right away from his competitor, beating him by just four minutes and fifty-nine seconds. The umpires on this occasion were ladies, and their decision was quite in accordance with the artistic spirit of the contest. They awarded the laurels to Mr. Rooney, "not because Mr. Mathieson proved himself less skilful, but because Mr. Rooney displayed superior skill." This strikes us as about the richest Hibernicism of the present century.

Gottschalk was very proud of his nativity, and on all his bills could be seen "Le pianista Americain;" he was as generous as talented, and gave away much money to needy Americans who had gone to Rio all after the late war, and had been deceived regarding the country, without the means of returning home, yet unable to make a living there. Don Pedro II., Emperor of Brazil, invited him to Court, while his good wife, a deformed lady, beloved by all, fairly worshipped his genius, and while at Tijuco sent often inquiring about his health. Gottschalk would rise in the morning about nine o'clock, and after having partaken of a cup of coffee, run his fingers over the keys of the piano until two; this rule he never varied from. Should any friends call to see him during those hours he would converse with them while he continued his practising. He was a master of seven languages, and was as fluent in one as another. At the time of his death his pecuniary affairs were worth about fifty thousand dollars in gold, while his property in all amounted to about two hundred thousand dollars. He supported his sisters and mother up to her death. Had he not been lavish, he would have left one million in money, but at all times his purse was open to a friend.

The coldness of the reception accorded to English composers in Paris forms a striking contrast to the heartiness with which even the most trivial and worthless of French music is greeted in London. Mr. Benedict's St. Cecilia having been performed in the cause of charity, and the success of the cantata having been duly recorded by our contemporary, La Revue et Gazette Musicale it is difficult to see there is a single good point in the composition of the English violinist. Mr. Holmes, we trust, will not be disappointed, but rather will retaliate on the Frenchman with his own proverb, "Chacun à son goût," for there can be very little question that in this as in too many other cases the pen of the critic is far from impartial, and that the nationality of the composer lies at the root of a good deal of the severity of criticism.—Choir.

A correspondent of Church Opinion gives the following account of a visit to the great French cathedral:—

"I got down to the Isle de la Cité, and safe within the walls of Notre Dame, some minutes before nine o'clock a m. on Sunday morning. I subsequently learned from the magnificent huissier in command, that Service would not begin for an hour; but I determined to abide with patience the eagerly expected moment. By ten o'clock not a hundred people were in the nave of the cathedral (though it was much fuller afterwards), and a very few choristers made their appearance. The Service, instead of being grand, thrilling, nay, overwhelming even, was the tamest and most unmusical (I say it with regret) that could possibly be conceived. Being within the octave of the Festival of the Annunciation of our Lady, I naturally supposed that the service in the cathedral specially dedicated to her, and bearing her name, would be, to say the least, somewhat ornate. But I was miserably disappointed. The whole Office was sung to the dismallest of Gregorian tones in unison; and how dismal they are to one whose mind craves for harmony in music as much as colour in painting, I can safely leave you to guess. The organ accompaniment was harmonized, and two violoncellos helped to break the harsh monotony of the Service; but the whole thing was as hard and dull and blank as an elementary singing-class going through their scales."

One morning, says the New York Tribune, the secretary of the board of managers, Mr. John W. Chambers, was having his boots blacked at the entrance of the Fair of the American Institute, by a small boy, shoe-less and stockingless. The secretary inquired of that if he would wash himself and come the next day he would admit him to the Exhibition. The next morning, a young lad, with his face polished, appeared in the office, and asked to be admitted, as he had been promised. Half an hour afterwards, while the secretary was passing one of the pianos, he noticed a crowd surrounding the instrument, and, to his surprise, found the young bootblack delighting the audience by the brilliant tones he was drawing from the instrument. It is a pleasure to record that this young lad has been taken into the store of the manufacturers whose piano he was then playing. These gentlemen have furnished him with a new suit of clothes, and every evening he has been heard at the Exhibition playing equally well on the piano or electric organ. The boy is an orphan. His father, a German musician, taught his infant son to play; but after the former's death, his son was thrown unprotected upon the world, and, finding nothing to do, earned a precarious living by blacking boots. His name is Charles Knubel; he is now fourteen years of age, and we have no doubt that he will be heard of in the future.

A correspondent, whose veracity is unquestionable, calls our attention to a fact which, at first sight, seems almost incredible—the Te Deum is sung at the parish church of Whitechapel, by the desire of the Rector, the Rev. J. Cohen. A more extraordinary evidence of the vast love of priestly dominati n which still exists among those who profess to be most sterly Protestant, could scarcely be found, and we should be curious to hear the arguments by which the worthy cleric would sustain his inconsistent practice. Of all the sacred hymns in our Prayer Book, that of St. Ambrose seems pre-eminently to call for musical treatment of the most elaborate character, and the man who would condemn a congregation to repeat its inspiring words in the colloquial tone of voice almost deserves to be described in the words of Scott as possessing "a dead soul." In the church of this ancient parish, hideous though it is, there is one of Harris's organs, rebuilt some years ago by Hill, while the presence of a good peal of bells completes the instrumental resources; and yet, in the face of this provision for music making, at the fiat of an individual, the people are silenced in one of the noblest portions of their worship. O ur advice to the congregation—if the state of affairs remains the same as at the date of our correspondent's letter—is to memorialize the Bishop and request his Lordship to use his influence with the Rector.—Choir.

Digitized by Google

BADEN.—At the first performance given by the company from the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Carlsruhe, the programme included two operas. Of these, one, entitled Carlouska, was a novelty. It is in three acts. The words are by Herr Falkenhner, and the music by Herr Heinrich Hoffmann. Both words and music were much liked.—Herr Johann Strauss is to receive from the Administration of the Kurhaus, for conducting a series of twelve concerts in August, the highly respectable sum of 24,000 francs for his own particular share. The Viennese papers make it 24,000 florins. But supposing Herr Strauss receives only the former amount, he will not have made such a bad haul. It is to be hoped he will be satisfied, and not try his luck at the celebrated green table. This, we know requires a great deal of resolution, for, though 24,000 francs is a "lot" of money, do we not recollect Horace's assertion, enclosed in a question to his friend:—

> "Qui fit, Maecenas, ut nemo, quam sibi sortem
> Seu ratio dederit, seu fors objecerit, illa
> Contentus vivat?"

and why should we expect Herr Strauss to be more contented with his "lot" than other men with theirs?

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

M. EYBENSTOTOS (Richmond).—"Kathleen's Dream." Song by Christabel.
NOVELLO, EWER, & Co.—"Lonely" and "May Song," by Christabel; How the trumpet in Zion, sacred chants by C. WARWICK JORDAN, Mus. Bac., Oxon.
LAMBORN COCK & Co.—"Come, May, with all thy flowers" and "Oh! Charity blest gift of Heaven," songs by Claribel H. Cooldrey; "Where the bee sucks," transcribed for the pianoforte by Arthur O'Leary.
OLIVER DITSON & Co. (Boston).—"Ad alumni Materem," solo, with chorus ad lib. by F. Boott.
CHAPPELL & Co.—"The Stars' Message," sung by Berthold Tours.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.
And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 22, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

ASTRINGENT LOZENGES OF THE RED GUM OF AUSTRALIA.—For Relaxed Throat, in Bottles, 2s.
MURIATE OF AMMONIA LOZENGES, in Bottles, 2s. Useful for Bronchitis, by loosening the phlegm and preventing violent fits of coughing.
F. & W. SQUIRE, Chemists to the Establishment in Ordinary to the Queen (Gazetted August 8th, 1837—December 31st, 1867), 277, Oxford Street, London.

Just Published, price 3s., illustrated,
HISTORY OF THE PIANOFORTE, by EDGAR BERNHARD. "A serviceable and pleasant History of the Pianoforte, with an account of ancient music and musical instruments . . . It traces especially the use and development of stringed instruments from the times of old Egypt and Assyria to our own, and is furnished with well executed and judicious illustrations."—Daily Telegraph. "The subject is well handled in a popular form."—The Graphic. "The chapters on tuning and repairs are likely to be of great use to our country cousins."—Fun. CASSELL, PETTER, & GALPIN, London & New York.

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND AND MASTER, Z. BUCK, ESQ., MUS. DOC.
"FAREWELL,"
SONG.
Sung by Mrs. H. ESMYTH MIERS, the Words by LORD BYRON.
The Music by GEORGE GAFF.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.
Where may be obtained, Composed by GEORGE GAFF,
"MAIDEN, WRAP THY MANTLE ROUND THEE."
POETRY BY KIRKE WHITE.

Just Published
"A SUMMER SONG,"
NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By HENRY WALTON.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

PUBLISHING ARRANGEMENTS.—IMPORTANT TO AUTHORS,
MOFFAT & COMPANY, State Publishers and Agents for the Dublin Steam Printing Co., beg to announce that they have resolved to CHARGE NO COMMISSION for PUBLISHING WORKS PRINTED BY THEM until the Author has been refunded his original outlay.
They would also state that THEY PRINT IN THE FIRST STYLE, GREATLY UNDER THE USUAL CHARGES.
Their Publishing Arrangements will enable them to promote the interest of all Works committed to their charge, as they have very considerable experience of the channels most likely to ensure success.
Estimates and all particulars furnished in course of post.
"Those about to Publish" may rely on finding Economy and Despatch in all Departments.
MOFFAT AND CO.'S BOOK LIST sent free on application to PUBLISHING OFFICES:
4, D'OLIER STREET, DUBLIN.
34, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Price One Penny Monthly, Registered for Transmission Abroad,
THE CHURCH RECORD. Edited by the REV. THOMAS SCOTT, M.A.
MOFFATT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

WORKS BY ALEXANDER VANCE.

	s.	d.
THE HISTORY AND PLEASANT CHRONICLE OF LITTLE JEHAN	3	6
VOX CLAMANTIS	7	6
THE BOOK OF THE KNIGHT OF TOWER	1	3
ROMANTIC EPISODES	6	0
HELLENICA SACRA	15	0

(The INTRODUCTORY CHAPTERS may be had separately, 6d.)
MOFFAT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

Price Twopence Monthly. Registered for Transmission Abroad,
PLAIN WORDS. A Christian Miscellany. Edited by the REV. HAMILTON MAGEE, Assisted by Ministers and Members of different Evangelical Churches.
MOFFAT & COMPANY, LONDON AND DUBLIN.

NEW BOOKS.—NOW READY.

	s.	d.
HOURS OF THE SOUL. By Mrs. LORENZO N. NUNN	10	6
CONCERNING RAFFLES' LOVE, &c. By a Country Parson	2	6
HARMONY IN RELIGION. By a Roman Catholic Priest	3	6
IONA AND OTHER SONNETS. By Wade Robinson	2	6
LIFE OF ST. PATRICK. By Joseph B. Smithson	3	6
MARSH'S SIR HERBERT, CLERICAL LECTURES	2	6
MEDICAL EXAMINATION PAPERS OF University of Dublin, &c. ..	1	0
QUEEN ESTHER. By BRITTEN HEALY	6	0
THE CHURCH UNDER THE TUDORS. By D. Duslop, M.R.I.A. ..	3	6
THE PHILOSOPHY OF BATH. By D. Dunlop, M.R.I.A.	3	6
THE LIFE OF ST. PATRICK. Edited by Rev. J. Lynch, P.P. ..	6	6
TIME WILL TELL. By N. J. N.	3	6

MOFFAT & CO., State Publishers by Appointment
(Agents for the Dublin Steam Printing Company),
34, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. 6, D'OLIER STREET, DUBLIN.

THE RED-HAIRED MAN'S WIFE; or, THE AWFUL PROCEEDINGS OF STAIR VANCEY, THE MARKET STROLLER. The last and best story written. By the late WILLIAM CARLETON. Will commence in the May Number of "THE CARLOW COLLEGE MAGAZINE." Price 6d.
MOFFAT & CO., State Publishers,
34, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. 6, D'OLIER STREET, DUBLIN.
To be had by order of all Booksellers in Town and Country.

Digitized by Google

GOLD MEDAL DRAWING-ROOM ORGANS VERSUS HARMONIUMS.

SEVENTY-FIVE GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS
AWARDED TO
THE MASON AND HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS.

Pure, soft, sweet, silvery Diapason Tone, capable of every gradation of light and shade, with Automatic Swell, New Vox Humana, 2 to 10 Stops with or without Ornamental Top and Pedals. Constructed to remain in tune and perfect order in hot climates. All the wood used in these instruments subjected to a heat of 140 degrees for three months, before being used. The Free Reeds of very peculiar metal, and EVERY REED VOICED, each vibrating in a separate air chamber, the air being exhausted or drawn through the chambers, it being thus impossible to force the Reeds, they cannot go out of tune. Patronised by Lady Rollington, Rev. J. Gaisford, Lady Brooke, Rev. J. Ellington, Lady Fletcher, Rev. S. Irvine, Honorable Mrs. Cowper Temple, and more than five thousand purchasers in the last year.

From REV. J. A. GAISFORD.

Pedal Organ No. 10.—Gentlemen, the instrument gives very great satisfaction.—Yours truly,
J. A. GAISFORD.
Henley-on-Thames, April 5th, 1870.

From EUSTACE HINTON JONES, Esq.

DEAR SIRS,—My Eight Stop Cabinet Organ in Resonant Case (No. 46), two Manuals, and with Vox Humana, gives me more pleasure than I can express. The quality of tone is exquisite. How such purity of tone can be got out of reeds, is a perfect marvel. It is comparable to nothing but the effect of a large and powerful pipe organ heard at some distance. Indeed, in capacity for delicate effects of light and shade, from full power down to the softest whisper which the ear can hardly catch, but listens for attentively because it is so precious, it has advantages which even a pipe organ has not. To compare it to a harmonium is to compare an Amati violin to a hurdy-gurdy. I tried one of Debain's very best concert harmoniums after I got Friday, and it jarred all my nerves with its buzz. The tone of the Mason and Hamlin Organ spoils the ear for anything less pure than itself.

There is all the difference between putting a reed on a piece of board and expecting to get tone out of it (as other makers do), and Mason and Hamlin's plan of fixing a voiced reed in a chamber over a resonant sounding box. It is the same difference as between stretching a violin string on a bit of stick and straining one over the resonant body of a violin.

It has not one single defect common to the best harmoniums. The bass does not overpower the treble. There is perfect equality in all the tones. The rapidity of touch (without the miserable expedient of percussion action) is superior to a pipe organ, being so much lighter even when coupled—and is almost up to a Broadwood piano. It is splendid as an accompaniment for singing, and I regard as a conclusive proof of its merit the fact that even at full power it does not drown a single voice—the tone is so true. Nobody ever yet heard a powerful harmonium that was not overpowering.

I have exercised my organ at all sorts and styles of music, from the Requiem Mass, down to polkas and Irish jigs. It will do almost any mortal thing between those two extremes. I can't find fault with it anywhere.

The Vox Humana is a very beautiful addition to the instrument. I am delighted to find it is no trickish effect like the Tremolo and Voix Celeste, of which one soon gets tired, but imparts a very rich and sympathetic modulation to the stop with which it is used, such as the violin string derives from the bow. Besides this, it adds unmistakably to the brilliancy of the organ.

The Resonant Case is a capital addition—it makes the whole instrument ring again after a chord. I was certainly afraid that an organ of such capacity would be too much for my small room, which is only twelve feet square. But it is not—and this not on account of any deficiency of power in the organ, but because of its exquisite quality of tone—for the same reason, in other words, that it does not drown voices.

The imitations of instruments are remarkably good; but I must say in the case of the piccolo and flute, it is a libel on the organ to compare these two effects to the notes of either piccolo or flute. Your piccolo is so lovely, and the flute is—Well, Orpheus had a good flute, and drew his wife out of Hades with its tones; but I am inclined to think that he might have even drawn her out of the other place to listen to Mason and Hamlin's.

You are heartily welcome to print this note. I am sure any lover of music will be grateful to any one who recommends them a Mason and Hamlin Organ.

Please send me more catalogues. I've given all mine away.—Yours truly,
Springfield Villa, Freemantle, Southampton, March 7th, 1870. EUSTACE HINTON JONES.

Illustrated Books, one stamp, of
Brewington & Sons, 84, New Bond St., 309, Oxford St., & 309, Regent St.

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:
ASHDOWN & PARRY,
HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

CHAPPELL'S
Organ Journal

CONSISTING OF

FAVOURITE MOVEMENTS SELECTED FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS,

ARRANGED FOR

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY THE

MOST EMINENT ORGANISTS.

		COMPOSER.	ARRANGER.
No. 1.	SANCTUS from "Mass"	Rossini	Dr. Spark.
2.	DOMINE DEUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
3.	GRATIAS AGIMUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
4.	CRUCIFIXUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
5.	ADAGIO NON TROPPO	Mendelssohn	G. Cooper.
6.	ANDANTE from String Quartett	Mozart	Geo. R. Griffiths.

(To be continued.)

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS EACH.

THE

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO:

A SELECTION OF

Opening and Concluding Voluntaries

BY THE

MOST CELEBRATED COMPOSERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

ADAPTED CHIEFLY FOR THE USE OF AMATEURS BY

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Each Number contains from 7 to 12 favourite Voluntaries, including one arranged expressly with Pedal Obbligato.
Nos. 1 to 24 are now ready, price 3s. each; or in four Volumes, each containing Six Numbers, and bound in Cloth, price 12s. each.

A THEMATIC LIST OF CONTENTS
MAY BE HAD OF APPLICATION TO

CHAPPELL & CO.,
50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S
NEW AND SUCCESSFUL
COMPOSITIONS.

	SOLO.	DUET.
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Margellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Battesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Beaumal). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	..
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèrn (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Cariotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Margellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:
HUTCHINGS & ROMER,
9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s. d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various Kinds	7 6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	5 0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	2 6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonized in various ways, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard.	6
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7 6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 8s. each, or one vol., boards, 20s. This book, containing 53 Compositions, includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 39 of his best Pieces. ...	6 0
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 35. Six Books in one vol.	6 0
J. T. STONES ORGAN-BOOK, an arrangement of 18 Classical Compositions	6 0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

46. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3—Op. 13, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
48. SONATAS, Op. 22—Op. 26—Op. 27, No. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
49. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastorale), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
50. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53—Op. 54 (Apassionata), and Op. 57.
51. SONATAS, Op. 78—Op. 79 (Characteristique)—Op. 81—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
52. SONATAS, Op. 106—Op. 109—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Fantasia and Sonata), 2, 3.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Complete in one volume, 5s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complete in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42) No. 2 (Op. 53.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 120.) No. 4 (Op. 122.) No. 5 (Op. 143.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 147.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, Nos 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS FOR PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 48 to 80 pages, including Overtures.

FIGARO	GRAND DUCHESS
ROBERT LE DIABLE	FIDELIO
DON JUAN	BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA
LUCREZIA BORGIA	SONNAMBULA
DER FREISCHUTZ	BALLO IN MASCHERA
CRISPINO E LA COMARE	TRAVIATA
TROVATORE	MARTHA
NORMA	WILLIAM TELL
DON PASQUALE	CROWN DIAMONDS
ERA MAVOLO	MASANIELLO
RIGOLETTO	DOMINO NOIR
ZAMPA

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 6s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.

138. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and "Oh rosier wont aller?"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY.
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VOLKSLIEDER for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring," "Soldaten Lied," "True Love," &c.
146. STEPHEN HELLER'S 24 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s.; post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

96. SANTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original compositions, published in no other collection.
97. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BLUMENTHAL, HARTE, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY, ALEXANDER LEE, &c.
83. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep," "My Pretty Page," "As it fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Fisherman's Duet," &c.
6. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
44. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
43. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
93. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET

Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.

1. TWENTY-FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CREATION, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S FIFTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND HESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS.
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, KUHE, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.

SHILLING BOOKS OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.

113. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
106. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
120. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LAST ROSE, and LILLIE DALE
117. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete.
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
123. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
129. TEN SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS, and SIX MOMENS MUSICALS. All complete.
81. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Puritani," "Somnambula," &c.
86. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Musical Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
85. STEPHEN HELLER'S PR MUNADES FUN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
86. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
84. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS
79. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Perles et Diamans," "Il Corricolo," &c.
33, 34, 35. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.	WALPURGIS NIGHT.
HAYDN'S IMPERIAL MASS.	BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.	ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.	MOZART'S REQUIEM.
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.	DETTINGEN TE DEUM
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.	ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE MESSIAH.	THE CREATION.

BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees 2 0

	s. d.
BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 60 Glees	2 6
THE CHORALIST, 96 Part-songs. 2 vols, each	3 0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	1 0

The above Works, for Societies in penny numbers.

THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs	6 0
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 50 Part-songs for village and school use	6 0

LONDON:

BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Printed by HENDERSON, HAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex. Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, June 4, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART AFFEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 20s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48.—No. 24. SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1870. PRICE { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY.—SECOND and LAST GREAT FLOWER SHOW and DISPLAY of TABLE DECORATIONS.

The general features of this Show will be the same as on the 21st ult., the principal classes being stove and greenhouse plants, exotic Orchids, Azaleas, Cape Heaths, Pelargoniums, Roses, cut flowers, &c., for Nurserymen and Amateurs.

The interesting exhibition of Dinner Table Decorations which was held last year will be fresh in the memory of all present, in this competition exhibitors may either decorate a table laid out for dinner à la Russe, or may send a single vase, épergne, or basket, to show their skill in floral arrangement. A number of Prizes competed on the last occasion, and from the interest taken in the exhibition it is anticipated that the number of entries in this special class will be greatly augmented.

Full Band of the Royal Artillery (Mr. J. Smyth) and the Orchestral Band of the Company during the day. Organ performances at intervals.

Admission 2s. Guinea Season Tickets free. Admission on June Guinea Season Tickets, admitting to the great fêtes of the next few months, and generally to 31st May, 1871, at the Palace, 7 Exeter Hall, and usual agents.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

This Evening (SATURDAY), "RIGOLETTO." Duke, Signor Mongini; Rigoletto Mr. Santley; Sparafucile, Signor Foli; Monterone, Signor Ragnar; Marullo, Signor Zoboli; Horns, Signor Archilei; Ciprano, Signor Trevere; La Contessa, Mdlle. Brisa; Giovanna, Madame Corsi; Maddalena, Madame Tre-belli-Bettini; and Gilda, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska. Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

On MONDAY, June 13, "ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO." Roberto, Signor Mongini; Raimbaldo, Signor Gardoni; Bertramo, Signor Foli; Un Prete, Signor Gastier; Alberti, Signor Ranzer; Un Araldo, Signor Rinaldini; Carathert, Signor Arabini, Signor Castelli, Signor Zoboli, Signor Trevere; Elena, Mdlle. Fiorelli; Isabella, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; and Alice, Mdlle. Rebonx.

On TUESDAY, June 14, "LE NOZZE DI FIGARO."

Acting Manager ..... MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from 10 till 5. Private boxes, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

JUNE 20TH.—GREAT COMBINED ATTRACTION.—Mr. GANZ'S ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT, at St. James's Hall.—Artists—Mdme. Adelina Patti, Mdlle. Madigan, and Mdlle. Scalchi; Sig. Bagagiolo and Sig. Graziani; Mdme. Monbelli and Mdme Trebelli-Bettini; Sig. Bettini and Sig. Foli; Mdlle. Liebhart, and Mdlle. Enequist; Mdlle. Carola, Mdlle. Leon Duval, and Mdlle. Orgeni; Mme Edith Wynne and Mdme. Patey; Herr Reichardt and Mr. George Perren; M. Jules Lefort and Mr. Patey. Pianos—Mr. Ganz and Chevalier de Kontski. Violoncello—M. Paque. Conductors—Messrs. Benedict, Randegger, Lehmeyer, and Wilhelm Ganz. Commence at Two o'clock. 8-th Stalls, 21s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Balcony Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony, 5s.; Area, 3s.; Gallery, 2s. Tickets at the principal Musicsellers; at Austin's Ticket Office; and of Mr. Ganz, 13, Queen Anne Street, W.

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT, JUNE 22, at the ST. JAMES'S HALL, under the immediate patronage of the Royal Family. Artists already engaged—Mesdames Christine Nilsson, Volpini, Sinico, Monbelli, Lewitzky, Rebaux, Carola, Orgeni, Doval, Enderssdorff, Liebhart, Edith Wynne, and Ilma di Murska; Mademoiselles Carl, Drasdil, Patey, E. Angèle, Wells, Osborne Williams, and Madame Trebelli-Bettini.—The doors will be open at 12.30, to commence at 1.30 precisely, and terminate at 5 o'clock.

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT, JUNE 22.—MM. Mongini, Gardoni, Bettini, Reichardt, George Perren, W. H. Cummings, Faure, Foli, Verger, Jules Stockhausen, Bossi, G. Garcia, Jules Lefort, Waldeck, Patey, and Santley.—Tickets at the principal Libraries and Musicsellers; and at Mr. Austin's Ticket Office.

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT, JUNE 22nd.—Instrumentalists—Madame Arabella Goddard, MM. Lindsay Sloper, Benedict, F. H. Cowen, M. Rendano, Osborne; Herr Ander, and Mdlle. Castellan; Sig. Piatti and M. Paque; Mr. John Thomas, Chevalier de Kontski, W. J. Cusins, Howell, Benedict, Sullivan, E. Berger, W. Carter, and Randegger. Tickets of Mr. Benedict, 2, Manchester Square, W.

UNDER the PATRONAGE of H.R.H. the DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE, H.R.H. the PRINCESS MARY OF TECK, &c.—Mr. CHARLES FOWLER (of Torquay) will give his EIGHTH ANNUAL CONCERT, on FRIDAY, June 17th, at 1, Stratton Street, Piccadilly (by the kind permission of Miss Burdett Coutts), at Three o'clock. Artists—Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Alice Royal, Mdme. Patey; Mr. W. H. Cummings, M. Lemmens, Mr. Charles Fowler. Tickets—Reserved Seats, One Guinea; Unreserved Seats, Half-a-Guinea; at Messrs. Lamborn Cock & Co.'s, 63, New Bond Street; or of Mr. Fowler, 36, Bedford Place, Bloomsbury Square.

SCHUBERT SOCIETY, BEETHOVEN ROOMS.—President, Mr. BENEDICT. Director, Herr SCHUBERTH. FOURTH SEASON, 1870. The LAST CONCERT of the SEASON (Director's Benefit) will take place on TUESDAY NEXT, June 14th. The programme will include Schubert's Elegie for two Violoncellos; "La Carita," Rossini, sung by the Ladies of the Society; a new song by Reichardt, sung by the Composer, &c. Tickets at Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, W.

MISS EMMA WILDISH'S (Pupil of Madame Eleanor Ward) FIRST EVENING CONCERT, WEDNESDAY, June 15th, at the Hanover Square Rooms, Harley Street, W. Artists—Mme. Montenegro, Miss Orridge, Miss L. Sinnetar, Mdlle. Angelina Saint, Miss M. Galloway, and Miss A. Fairman; M. Kœter and M. Waldeck. Piano—Madame Eleanor Ward and Miss Emma Wildish. Violin—M. Chandeau Lane. Violoncello—M. Albert. Conductors—Herr Lehmeyer, Mr. E. Berger, and Mr. Benedict. To commence at Half-past Eight. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 5s.; Admission, 2s. Tickets at Nimmo's, 3, Wigmore Street; and of Miss Emma Wildish, Vine Cottage, Park Village East, Regent's Park, N.W.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—"ELIJAH," FRIDAY Next, June 17th.—Band and Chorus of the National Choral Society. Conductor—Mr. G. W. MARTIN. Mr. Santley, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and other artists. Tickets, 10s. 6d., 5s., 3s., to be had at 14, 15, Exeter Hall, where also may be had Mr. Martin's new song, "Lothair," post free, 26 stamps.

JUNE 22ND.—Mr. BENEDICT'S ANNUAL GRAND MORNING CONCERT at the ST. JAMES'S HALL. Under the immediate Patronage of the Royal Family. Artists already engaged—Mesdames Christine Nilsson, Volpini, Sinico, Monbelli, Lewitzky, Rebaux, Carola, Orgeni, Doval, Enderssdorff, Liebhart, Edith Wynne, and Ilma di Murska; Mdlles. Carl, Drasdil, Patey, E. Angèle, Wells, Osborne Williams, and Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini. Mdlle. Enequist, Mdlle. Leon Duval, Mdlle. Orgeni, Mdlle. Carola, Mdlle. Liebhart, Mdlle. Edith Wynne, Mdlle. Rebaux, Mdlle. Sinico, Mdlle. Monbelli, Mdlle. Lewitzky, Mdlle. Volpini, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Mdlle. Adelina Patti, Mdlle. Madigan, and Mdlle. Scalchi; Sig. Bagagiolo and Sig. Graziani; Mdme. Monbelli and Mdme Trebelli-Bettini; Sig. Bettini and Sig. Foli; Mdlle. Liebhart, and Mdlle. Enequist; Mdlle. Carola, Mdlle. Leon Duval, and Mdlle. Orgeni; Mme Edith Wynne and Mdme. Patey; Herr Reichardt and Mr. George Perren; M. Jules Lefort and Mr. Patey. Pianos—Mr. Ganz and Chevalier de Kontski. Violoncello—M. Paque. Conductors—Messrs. Benedict, Randegger, Lehmeyer, and Wilhelm Ganz. Commence at Two o'clock. 8-th Stalls, 21s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Balcony Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony, 5s.; Area, 3s.; Gallery, 2s. Tickets at the principal Musicsellers; at Austin's Ticket Office; and of Mr. Ganz, 13, Queen Anne Street, W.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS'S EVENING CONCERT, June 17th, HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, when a Selection from his Compositions will be given, including some new morceaux de salon, and his Welsh National Songs, "The Cambrian War Song" and "The Cambrian Flume," with a Select Choir of Twenty Voices. Mr. Brinley Richards will play (with Mons. Pente) a duet composed expressly for him by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and solos by Scarlatti and Heinelt. His will also play, for the first time, "The Morgan-March" (Welsh National Air) as a Fantasia for the Pianoforte. Vocalists—Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Edmonds, and Madame Patey; Mr. Cummings and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Conductors—Messrs. Benedict, Calicott, and Ryan. Tickets, 7s., and 3s.; at the Musicsellers, and of Mr. Brinley Richards, 6, St. Mary Abbott's Terrace, Kensington.

MDME. R. SIDNEY PRATTEN begs to announce to her Friends and Pupils that her GUITAR RECITAL will take place on WEDNESDAY, June 15th, 1870, at Three o'clock, at 21, Harley Street, Cavendish Square, when she will be assisted by Eminent Artists, whose names will be duly announced. Madame Pratten will play Selections from the Compositions of Sor, Giuliani, Leonard Schulz, and her own Grand Duett for the Guitars, Giuliani's two Rondos, and "Di tanti palpiti," accompanied by a Pupil of hers, an Amateur, who has kindly consented to do so for this occasion. Tickets, 10s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 15s. To be had at Madame Pratten's Residence, 3c, Walbeck Street, Cavendish Square, W.

MDLLE. DRASDIL will sing "HE IS UPON THE LONELY DEEP" (new song by the composer of "The Weaver") on June 15th, 20th, 21st, William Carter's Concert; and on the following dates:—June 18th, 20th, 22nd, 23rd, 27th; July 7th.

MISS BANKS will sing "AH! MY HEART IS WEARY" (by the composer of "The Weaver"), at Miss Walton's Concert, Hanover Square Rooms, June 27th.—Weekes, & Co., 14, Hanover Street.

COMMUNICATIONS for MISS FENNELL respecting Concerts and other Musical Engagements may be addressed for her to Messrs. Chappell, 50, New Bond Street, or to Miss Fennell's Residence, 92, Lower Baggot Street, Dublin. Miss Fennell hopes to be in London on the 20th of June, and will remain for one month.

Digitized by Google

JUNE 17TH.—"THE CAMBRIAN WAR SONG" will be sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas and a Choir of Seventy Voices at Mr. Brinley Richards's Concert, at the Hanover Square Rooms.

JUNE 17TH.—"THE CAMBRIAN PLUME" will be sung for the first time in London by Mr. Cummings and a Choir of Seventy Voices at Mr. Brinley Richards's Concert, at the Hanover Square Rooms.

MISS MARIAN ROCK will play E. SAUERBREY's new transcription of "LORELEY," at Barnsbury Hall, Islington, on Friday, June 17th.

NEW SACRED CANTATA, by ALEXANDER ROWLAND, performed at Southampton, June 2nd. The words from the 79th Psalm. The following Pieces published separately :—

	s.	d.
Air, "AND LET ALL SUCH AS DELIGHT IN THY SALVATION"	3	0
Air, "AS FOR ME I AM POOR AND IN MISERY"	3	0
Air, "LET THEM BE ASHAMED"	3	0
Quartet (unaccompanied) "LET THEM FOR THEIR REWARD" ..	3	0

LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. EMANUEL's new song, "THE CHARM," at the Hanover Square Rooms, June 24th; St. George's Hall, 25th. Address, 28, Old Bond Street.

MISS BANKS will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP," and WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S romance, "A SUMMER EVE," at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Miss Elizabeth Walton's Grand Concert, June 27th.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP," at the Beethoven Rooms, June 18th, Miss E. Walton's Matinée.

MR. ALFRED BAYLIS will sing ASCHER'S popular romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" BENEDICT'S "NULLA DA TE BEL ANGELO," and the tenor part of RANDEGGER'S trio, "I NAVIGANTI," at the Beethoven Rooms, June 18th.

CONCERTS, Bazaars, Hebrew Weddings, Readings, Meetings, and Balls.—The QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square. Early application is invited for securing available days. Apply to Mr. Hall.
ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC. Scholarships and musical advantages. Students' Concert, Hanover Square, June 25th.—Norfolk Road, Haywarder. F. WEBER, Sec.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL, REGENT STREET. The Hall and Theatre are to let for Concerts, Operatic and Dramatic Entertainments, Public Meetings, and Lectures. The Hall can be hired by the night or for a term.
N.B. All the Afternoons are let up to July. For terms, apply to Mr. Wilkinson, Manager. Office, 4, Langham Place, Regent Street.

MDME. MONTSERRAT has the honour to announce to her Friends and Pupils that she has REMOVED to 16, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W., where she requests all communications may be addressed.

SIGNOR GUSTAVE GARCIA begs to announce his arrival in Town for the Season. Address, 9, Mortimer Road, Grevtlle Road, St. John's Wood.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 28, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HARRY SHARP'S new songs, are published, 2s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

Now Ready,

SACRED CANTATA, "BLOW YE THE TRUMPET IN ZION," by C. WARWICK JORDAN, Mus. Bac., Oxon. Price, handsomely bound, 7s.; in paper covers, 3s. Suitable for Choral Societies. Advantageous terms may be made with the composer for large quantities, and the Band parts obtained.
NOVELLO & Co., London.

SITUATION WANTED.

MUSIC TRADE.—A Young Lady desires a SITUATION in a Music Shop. Fully understands Sheet Music, Letting and Selling Pianos, &c. Five years' experience. "Viola," Messrs Sinter & Rose, High Street, Oxford.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

, Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG,

DEDICATED TO MDLLE. NILSSON.

"I LOVE AND I AM LOV'D"

("J'aime, je suis aimé").

Sung with distinguished success in Paris and London. Sent for 24 stamps.

DUFF & STEWART, 147, Oxford Street.

Where may be had A. REICHARDT'S celebrated song,

"LOVE'S REQUEST,"

In C, E Flat, and F.

Also Arranged for the Pianoforte by

BRINLEY RICHARDS AND W. KUHE.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"CHILDREN'S SUMMER FEAST."

CHORUS IN UNISON.

The Words from "The Aflerglow" (with the Author's permission)

The Music, composed expressly for Children, by

CIRO PINSUTI.

Price 6d.

Published by LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63 & 63, New Bond Street.

Just Published,

"THE WILD ROSEBUD,"

SONG.

Sung by Miss EDITH WYNNE. The Words by GOETHE.

The Music by JOSEPHINE WILLIAMS, R.A.M.

Price 3s.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Digitized by Google

FERDINAND HILLER ON RICHARD WAGNER.*

(Continued from page 330.)

With regard to the style in which the members of the new community compose, their great principle, according to Wagner (which principle, also, is said to emanate from Mendelssohn), is never to aim at producing an "impression or effect."† Wagner places these words sophistically enough side by side, as synonymous. He knows very well, however, that no one aims at not producing an impression, while the notion of producing an effect has obtained in Germany an unfavourable secondary signification. But when we see that the desire for effect has led a man like Wagner to absolute ostgelling in the Meistersinger, to the most violent outrage ever known upon art, good taste, music and poetry, some slight anxiety on the subject is very natural. "But this repugnance for effect sways this school even when performing classical music. A tribute is here paid Liszt as a pianist; as though it had ever entered the head of the partisans of any school in existence to doubt his enormous geniality in rendering any kind of music whatever, a geniality of which Mendelssohn himself spoke as of something marvellous. Hans von Bulow, also, Liszt's einzig berufenster‡ successor is so supremely fortunate as to be praised. But why does not Wagner say a single word about Liszt's compositions? Why does he not mention Bülow as a conductor? The fact is, there is but one God, who is his own Prophet, and his name is Richard Wagner.

"The principal ingredient of this new school," the god goes on to say, "is a certain circumspectly reflective cautiousness of what it cannot do, with defamation of what it would like to do." That it was possible to "entangle so sterling a nature as Schumann in this," he finds, "above everything sorrowful." From what has been said concerning Schumann, who is described as "amiable and thoroughly charming," but of whom it is also asserted that the "narrowness of his natural gifts was displayed, and he became bombastic and unnatural," we are completely incapable of gathering what Wagner really likes, and what he dislikes in him. This, however, is a matter of supreme indifference.

"But, under the power of these musical eunuchs, what becomes of our great and unspeakably magnificent German music?" exclaims Wagner, and his astonishment, cannot be got in the way of his anxiety for the wondrous inheritance of German genius. We do not find the answer to the question before we reach a subsequent page, after going through some long dissertations, which enter minutely into details, on the way in which his Meistersinger has been performed. He is supported "by the eminently consultatory conviction, that, despite the very unintelligent way in which this work has been handled, its effective power is not to be destroyed—the fatal gift of effectiveness, against which the Leipsic Conservatory so zealously warns us, and which, as a punishment, cannot be got in the way of destruction." Wagner, however, will strike him as the more marvellous, as he can no longer prevail on himself to be present at a performance of his works, and he therefore "draws, wonderful to say" (very wonderful) "from their said almost incomprehensibly effective power, a conclusion, peculiarly gratifying to him, respecting the talents of musicians conducting such compositions to our great classical music, the continuing existence of which, ever warning us anew, despite the stunting cultivation of such individuals, is, by this very thing, rendered intelligible to him. That does not cannot destroy it—and this conviction gives me almost more strangely enough, to be growing into a sort of consolatory dogma for the Genius of Germany, with which dogma it tranquillizes itself on the one hand, believingly and comfortably, while, on the other, it goes on cresting in its own way." (Let us take breath.) ||

"But what we should think of the wondrous conductors" (everything and everyone is wondrous!) with a celebrated name, considered as musicians, remains to be asked," Wagner goes on to say. He tells us that: "The assumption of their excellence is firmly established—though he does not know one to whom he should consider himself justified in trusting with confidence a single tempo in his operas." (How terrible for the conductors!) He doubts their being "real musicians, for it is incontestable that they exhibit no musical feeling." Mozart explains it to him by his enormous aptitude for arithmetic; "they are musical arithmeticians, but deficient in everything else, men to whom "the correct tempo of our music must be explained according to the regula de tri, since nothing can be imparted to them by the instrumentality of feeling"!

* From the Kölnische Zeitung.

† "Wirkung oder Effect."

‡ "Solely most-having-a-call," a pretty specimen of Wagnerian style. Despite a fearful martyrdom while learning the German language, and the works of the Lucerne Anchorite, I am not even yet quite perfect in the language invented by him, to supply the place of German. As in the previous instance, therefore, I leave to those of our readers who possess a peculiar taste for riddles the task of saying what "solely most-having-a-call" signifies. It may be wisdom clothed in mystic garb, but, to the uninitiated, it resembles exceedingly unmitigated nonsense. Disbelievers in Herr R. Wagner's profundity may be persuaded if they sometimes feel tempted to accept the theory that the Musician of the Future puts his sentences with grand words, to make believe that beneath them lurks a finely developed thought, just as some beauties call in the aid of cotton-wool to supply the place of certain charms which would otherwise be prominent only by their absence.—Translator.

‡ You! requested Dr. Hiller. With all my heart! The slightest respite to a book.—Translator.

The battle-field is strewn with corpses—we breathe death and corruption. But the tyrant now experiences a human emotion, and, on the last page, flings our admirable Joachim a half encouraging greeting. He has not heard him himself, but he has heard others speak of him—and he is glad to believe that in his playing we "recognise the beneficial result of a many years' intimate intercourse with Liszt." However, "the conductor's stick is said not to have obeyed him well; composing, too, appears to have embittered him more than it has delighted others." Wagner is rendered, moreover, suspicious by having been informed that: "Joachim is expecting a fresh Messiah for music." But: "Bravely, forwards!" he exclaims to him. "If he himself should happen to be the Messiah, he might at least hope not to be crucified by the Jews!" And with this delicate, cheerful, and clever turn, Wagner concludes.

But what can have impelled Wagner to indulge in these outrageous diatribes? Above aught else, anxiety for his works. Whenever anything in them does not please, the fault is attributed to the bad execution, and if they strike many persons as too long, it is because they have been cut too much. For "Cut. Cut — is the ultima ratio of our worthy Capellmeister." There can be no question that a great deal too much is done in this way, yet it is a "wonderful" fact that this violent system of curtailment was never applied to such operas as Figaro, Die Vestalin, Fidelio, Der Freischütz, Jessonda, etc. The system was first adopted in Germany for grand French operas, which had been composed for a public who do not sup; they were, therefore, in their original length insupportable to persons who are hungry when they come into the theatre. Why has not the German Wagner accommodated himself to the German custom? He must have been familiar with his cousins, Shakspere and Schiller, with whom very different liberties are taken than with him, but whose pieces may very well be witnessed even after his "Musicdrama."—Another reason why Wagner attacks every mortal thing in the way of music is that as yet all German mortals have not sworn allegiance to his standard. If we reflect how short was the active public career of Mendelssohn, and what a comprehensive influence Wagner ascribes to it, though, it is true, only in a bad sense, even now, twenty-three years after Mendelssohn's death, it seems indeed "wonderful" how insignificant, and how superficial is Wagner's influence on the majority of his artistic contemporaries, after a very noisy, and, to some extent, successful career of thirty years.—According to Wagner himself there is only one way of explaining this—his contemporaries are too narrow-minded, too "solemn," too deficient in character; "their love, their belief, their hope, all is artificial." In Wagner, it must be confessed, all these qualities are in the highest degree natural: he is his own love, his own belief, his own hope, his own all.

This jealous and tender anxiety for the prosperity of our "unspeakably magnificent music," can, therefore, merely conjure up an incredulous smile. Not that he is incapable of appreciating Beethoven's or Weber's music—the former master, according even to the assertions of Wagner's own apostles, stands on a line with "materials" for his musicdrama, and the other, in Euryanthe, had at least a "presentiment" of him. But whether Bach, Handel, Haydn, Cherubini, and Mendelssohn, are ever performed is to him a matter of utter indifference, and, when they are performed, the effect on him is rather disagreeable than otherwise.

The most outrageous thing, however, is that Wagner speaks about subjects, men, and works, of which his knowledge is most superficial. Living, for the last two-and-twenty years, in Switzerland, devoted to his labours and his pleasures, he has interrupted his seclusion only on rare occasions, to direct performances of some of his own works—and now and then to conduct a symphony or two. He lives so completely in a sphere peculiarly his own, that, as we know, he does not care about hearing any more music than that which converts his attention, impels and excites him. He never was present at the performance of any great work, or at one of our Musical Festivals, and nearly all our modern concert institutions, the musical blossom of Germany, are strange to him. Does he know aught of the compositions of recent times? We should hardly say so. Brahms once played him some variations, from which he saw "that he does not understand joking"—but, except this, he appears to have seen only his most trivial work—his "Waltzes with Song." Max Bruch is not mentioned—perhaps because he succeeds in producing an "impression or effect." Does Wagner know Bargiel's Overtures, which could certainly not fail to interest him? With what, Joachim has done, he is acquainted only by hearsay. And thus he throws everything, indiscriminately, like a lot of vegetables, simultaneously, into one pot.

The majority of our "Music-Bankers" may be deficient in any great productive power—they may not all be admirable conductors—but, completely as they differ from each other in disposition, talent, and everything that constitutes individuality, we find in Germany, fortunately, at the present day, a common trait in innumerable instances: earnestness, and love of what is done. That these qualities frequently do not suffice, when the industrial, financial, and executive resources on which our art depends, are too small, is a matter of course. But it is touching to find that there are often in the smallest town conductors who show no labour, no sacrifice, to do their part towards the propagation and advancement of our great German music, and who succeed in obtaining most splendid results. In this respect, Mendelssohn's example has indeed produced its fruits. Notwithstanding the vast amount he did as a composer, he always managed to find time for devoting his talent, his energy, and his love to the works of our masters. If Wagner does not know of a single conductor but himself, and if he is so tortured by anxiety for our "unspeakably beautiful music," why does he not allow the light of his own example to shine upon us? He has in Munich the most magnificent means at his disposal; he possesses an amount of influence, such as, probably, no composer ever possessed before him—why does he not give model performances in the Bavarian capital, and thus form a new school of conductors? The attendance would certainly be numerous—for if a man has only confidence in himself, the rest of the world also will have confidence in him.

Digitized by Google

What tricks Wagner plays with musical history wherever it does not suit his purpose. I took an opportunity of showing on a former occasion. This latest work, also, swarms with similiar instances. Each instance, must characterise entire epochs, and, in consequence, it characterises them falsely. But I leave these things to more learned colleagues, as there is reason to fear I have already run to too great a length, and I hate the morning-knife no less than does the autocrat of the Lake of Lucerne.

That I am mentioned and, also, even when not mentioned, duly put down, in the pamphlet, is a matter of course. I do not, however, experience any impulse either to defend myself or to sound my own praises, but merely exclaim with Goethe's painter: "What I have painted, I have painted."

As a cheerful finish let me give one more short quotation: "The assumption of the excellence of the wonderful conductors is so firmly established," Wagner writes at page 82, "that the entire musical community does not feel the slightest hesitation as to who, when the nation determines to have something played (as, for instance, at grand Musical Festivals) shall beat time. It can be only Herr Hiller, Herr Rietz, or Herr Lachner. It would be utterly impossible for the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth to be celebrated if these three gentlemen were suddenly to sprain their hands." Quite correct! And since the great happiness and honour have devolved upon me of having to conduct at the said splendid Festival, I will treat my hands with as much attention, and take as much care of them up to then, as though I were the most lovely Parisian coquette. Let me, therefore, quickly lay down the pen—and not be in too great a hurry to dip it again in the ink for another such fatiguing effort as the present.

—o—

RETURN FROM SPAIN.

No. IX.

From the trite quotation, "Facilis decensus Averni," we learn that the infernal regions of classical paganism had at least one advantage over Gibraltar,—namely, that they were easy of access, whereas the British possession is hard to enter and hard to quit. Having fought your way over by main force from Algeciras, you soon begin to reflect and to entertain serious misgivings that you might as well have remained at (say) Cadiz, or any other interesting Spanish town. The Rock, of course, is admirably picturesque object, and the galleries are wonderful works of military art. But these may be "done" in a day, and, these done, what is to be done next? "Go away," answers some unsophisticated reader. That is all very well, but how? Here you are in a town which no railroad approaches, and where diligences are unknown; a town whither and whence the mails are carried on the backs of mules. Nurtured in an atmosphere of railroads, you are always forgetting your situation, and asking yourself when the next train will start. Then, remembering that trains are not, you walk into the hall of your hotel, and your heart beats high if you read on a placard that in about three days hence the P. and O. steamer will call at Gibraltar on her way from Malta, for you flatter yourself that you will be conveyed to Southampton.

Battening on hope, you brace up your nerves to endure three days more, although each proves more intolerable than the one preceding. Of Spanish life there is scarcely a trace, save in the shape of one wretched water-carrier, who wastes his lungs in the national "cry" "Agua," and a sprinkling of melancholy Moors, who glide about in pairs, and seem to discourse seriously about nothing. English life is represented by the garrison and the friends of the garrison; that is to say, by a set of gallant gentlemen who are perfectly satisfied with each other, and have a desire for the society of strangers. At first, indeed, there is something exciting in the signal gun, which, first from the summit of the Rock, shakes the whole town, and in the military music by which it is followed. You may likewise feel enthusiastic when, at a late hour, the National Anthem is played. But all this becomes terribly monotonous in a short time. The gun that startled you on the first evening has ceased to be lulling influence on the third; the tunes that the band has borrowed from the music-halls and from Offenbach begin to acquire a funeral ring, and even the dulcet strains of the Scottish bagpipes grow unpleasing to the ear. But your greatest horror is the sentinel, who all through the night, at short intervals, is shouting, "Who's there?" to some inoffensive wanderer, and is sure to receive some satisfactory answer. You almost begin to wish that somebody may be shot, by way of creating a little variety, but your wish is even more vain than wicked. Everything is dreadfully secure. The impregnability of the fort extends to the whole population. Strict preservation of order, without the slightest fear of an attack, is the rule of the day. The lively knife of Andalusia is unknown in Gibraltar. However, the third day is waning, and the hour of deliverance is at hand. The approach of the P. and O. is announced, and you prepare to take leave of Gibraltar with a parting benediction. But a horrible telegram arrives, and you learn that, the steamer being completely full, a berth is not to be had for love or money. The information that another P. and O. will call a week hence is far from reassuring. In the course of the week you will be sorely tempted to commit some outrage that will induce the indefatigable sentinel to end your miserable existence, and if you conquer the temptation you are by no means sure that P. and O. the second will not be as full as P. and O. the first.

I myself have gone through all the misery which I have inflicted on the impersonal "you." Delighted, therefore, was I to learn that on the day after the departure of the English vessel the noble Spanish steamship (say) Cid Rodrigo, coming down the Guadalquivir, from Seville, will stop at Algeciras, and proceed to Marseilles, calling by the way at Malaga, Almeria, Carthagena, Valencia, and Barcelona. At each of these places a good part of a day would be lost, and therefore the journey would be long; but all trivial considerations vanished before the intense desire to quit Gibraltar. And I must own that, long as it was, the journey, preceded of course by a long, strong pull to Algeciras, fully repaid the expenditure of much time and a little money. There were very few first-class passengers on board, and as we all knew that we had to form a compact family for about a week, we each of us put our best sides forward, determined to make ourselves mutually agreeable. Like perfect gentlemen we were without history, the recurrence of breakfast and dinner being the only events of our day. But the dinner was racy of the Spanish soil, the chief dish being a kind of "olla podrida" (called a "Corsido"), composed of bacon, broad beans, chick-peas, and sausages, red and coal-black, strongly flavoured with garlic, the whole arranged in a condiment to the vanilli of the soup. Moreover, our opportunities for observation were abundant.

I was stupid enough to get out at Malaga, where I saw nothing worth seeing, and only had the privilege of returning to the Cid Rodrigo for my pains. But I was thereby let into an unwritten page in the book reflected in the desire of seeing too many Spanish towns. They are terribly like each other, especially those on the eastern coast. A high mountain, which faintly repeats the Rock of Gibraltar, a row of trees, which at Barcelona is called the "Rambla," and everywhere else the "Alameda," are the principal objects in view. We had been brought all the way from Seville, and had been removed from the hold to make way for other commodities. The deck between the bridge and the forecastle was occupied by a herd of pigs, whose sweet music resounded throughout the night.

On the following morning we reached Almeria, where the chief article of import was lead, taken from the neighbouring mines, and brought in the form of pigs, which were slowly craned into the hold in bundles of seven. At the moment when the position of some of the miners rendered them visible by the appearance of chimneys on the hilly coast. The lead was intended for Marseilles, where, I was informed, the silver it contained would be extracted. This operation, to which the Spaniards are unequal, having been duly performed, the baser metal was to be taken back to Spain. The people who inhabited the cork mountains now became strongly varied by the appearance, of uncouth male figures dressed in a style with which we are not familiar The English reader may easily bring this custume before his mind's eye by imagining a gentleman wearing his shirt, his white stockings, a black waistcoat, a broadish hat, and—nothing else. As to the vocation of these strangers accounts differed. Some said that they were miners, others that they were types of the Murcian peasant. At all events, they differed entirely from the normal Andalusians, always to be distinguished by their broad seat, their loose jacket, and the hat, with its brim turned up to a level with the crown. This hat, however, is of no ancient date. Of old the crown rose in a peak high above the brim, and the reduction of the former denotes a compliance with modern fashion. The picture also gained diversity from the attire of some Catalan Republicans, who were returning from exile, and were rendered most conspicuous by their red shirts, Magenta bands, and high crimson caps.

At Carthagena, which we reached on the following day, a new interest arose. We got rid of our (living) pigs, which numbered 200, but we took in nearly 600 African sheep, which had been sent to Carthagena from Oran, the corresponding port. Part of the cork was returned to the hold, to make way for these wretched animals, who covered almost the whole of the deck from the quarter-deck to the forecastle, the other part of the cork being chiefly formed into a barricade, so as to prevent an ovine invasion of the principal cabins. The manner in which the sheep were crushed together and knocked about was worthy of a bull-fighting people. One choice spirit even used them as means of transit, rolling himself over their backs from one end of the deck to the other. As the cook-house was situated by the chimney, our copious meals had to be brought every day across the mass of vegetable and live animal matter which the spirit of commerce had huddled together, the stewards, heavily laden with plates and dishes, bestowing incessant curses on the sheep Nearly the whole eastern coast of Spain consists of a series of barren rocks, but this barrenness is perhaps the most conspicuous at Carthagena, the memorable peculiarities of which ancient town were celebrated of old by some local Martial, in the following epigram :—

Digitized by Google

"Monte in lena.—Mar sin pescado,—Muger sin vergüenza.—Vino mal criado." (Mountain without wood; sea without fish; women without shame; children badly educated.) The epigram was composed in the good old orthodox days; but of late some eminent person has increased—certainly not improved it—by the addition of this line, "Y los curas locos." This would be, literally translated, "and the priests mad;" but the word "locos" is held to refer less to mental derangement than to the vow of celibacy.

At Valencia, our next port, we landed several barrels of a salted fish called "tun"—I don't vouch for the spelling—which had come from Cadiz, and probably, in the first instance, from Portugal. The fish is of enormous size, and is cut into pieces before it is salted. In our English dictionaries will be found, I think, the word "tunny," which possibly corresponds to the Spanish "tun," but on this subject I speak from the depths of my ignorance. Of our fellow-passengers, the sheep, we took a most unpathetic leave at Barcelona. The miserable creatures had had nothing to eat or to drink since we left Genoa, their acquaintance at Carthagena, and new with their shrunken flanks they made a most dismal figure. At first they had attempted to satisfy the cravings of hunger by nibbling at the cork, and plucking at each other's wool; and in the course of a certain night, two, more spirited than the rest, had committed suicide by leaping overboard. But for the most part they had displayed a mournful resignation, and, abandoning all hope of sustenance, had even refused to notice some vegetable matter which a kind-hearted wight flung among them. They were, of course, dead without difficulty. One thing I omitted into the boat, the others followed naturally, after the immortal precedent of "Les Brebis du Panurge."

Waking in the morning after our departure from Barcelona we find ourselves at Palomos, having previously made a stoppage at another small port. The inhabitants of these places are chiefly cork-cutters, so to them we transferred our raw material, receiving in return several bags filled with corks cut and ready for use. Our ship now presented an appearance strangely clean and unpicturesque. Gone were our mountains of cork; gone were our mountaineers, and gone were our sheep. But the mountains became more and more green as we approached the territory of France, and we felt that we had bounded into civilisation when we entered the port of Marseilles.

Marseilles, May 23. N. D.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

Our opera season rarely passes without the occurrence of events which attract public attention to the exciting atmosphere of the lyric stage, and the excitable nature of those who breathe it. Artists of all sorts are famous for their sensitiveness, their readiness to fancy intended wrong, their quickness to resent it; and, generally, their entire unsuitableness to be members of any "happy family" whatever. Why this should be we need not stop to enquire; nor are we under obligation to explain why the phenomenon is specially obvious in connection with operatic artists. Enough that these sons and daughters of harmony have a sort of natural affinity with discord, and gravitate thereto as by the action of a natural law. An occurrence at Covent Garden has just come to hand in illustration of the foregoing, and may so be used because one version of the story has become public property. The facts may be thus stated :—At a recent performance of Don Giovanni in which Madame Adeline Patti and Herr Wachtel participated, the former imagined herself to be insulted by the latter, and felt the insult so keenly that she formally expressed her intension never to sing with the German tenor again. So far the incident had been talked of among operatic gossips for several days. It was reserved for Herr Wachtel to complete the case, and put it before the public in a definite form, which he did by writing as thus to the public journals. (The letter appeared in our last number.)

* * * * * * *

The public being thus appealed to, we make no apology for whatever comments seem fairly called for by the merits of the case. Herr Wachtel gives no clue to the nature of the fancied insult, and, therefore we cannot say whether Madame Patti was or was not entitled to resent it in the strong manner she did. Undoubtedly, there are insults one artist may offer another which would fully justify extreme resentment. If, for example, a gentleman were, in coarse terms, to bid a lady cease to sing while he sang a solo, we should fully expect the lady to decline any further relations with him. Herr Wachtel, however, could hardly be supposed capable of such behaviour even if we had not his public disclaimer in this particular case. It must be assumed, therefore, that he unconsciously simulated an insult, and that Madame Patti resented it in mistake for the real article. What followed was equally unfortunate. Herr Wachtel explained to the lady the error into which she had fallen; and did it clearly enough to convince her that it was an error. In ordinary life, this would have settled the matter, and restored harmony. But artists are not ordinary folk; and it did nothing of the kind. The offender having proved that he meant no offence, and the quarrel having been made up, Herr Wachtel feels it his turn to be hurt at the suspicion which had attached to him, and to be even more indignant than Madame Patti. The lady simply declined to sing any more with Herr Wachtel; Herr Wachtel went further and declined to sing any more in the theatre, preparatory to shaking the dust of London off his feet and bidding us all adieu. Of course we are sorry to lose Herr Wachtel under such circumstances, particularly as they reflect little credit on anybody concerned. On the one hand we cannot but suspect that Madame Patti was too quick in her resentment, and too severe in her punishment, of an imaginary offence; on the other we feel sure that Herr Wachtel is too sensitive about his "reputation as an artist" and his "personal honour," neither of which was in question when once Madame Patti accepted his statement. The whole matter is suggestive of the irritable-ness which makes its home behind the scenes of lyric theatres, and transforms those regions into anything but abodes of the blessed. May we say, also, that Herr Wachtel's letter was scarcely called for. Had he left without writing it, nobody would have inquired why he left. London is big, its inhabitants are busy, and there are operatic tenors enough for all who care about the article. Hence Herr Wachtel may have silently taken his departure without giving rise to gossip possibly injurious to his interests.

Another incident of a less personal character deserves a word of comment before it drops out of sight, and is forgotten. The subject of realism in the matter of operatic costume was brought forward a week or two ago by some remarks in the Daily Telegraph, having reference to the parti-coloured "tights" worn by Signor Tagliafico in his character as Lord Tristan (Martha). These remarks led to the writing of several letters, the drift of which would profit us nothing if we discussed them. They served to show, however, in what a very loose way matters of costume are regulated. According to Signor Tagliafico, the story of Martha is thrown back four or five hundred years because Signor Mario objected to show his legs in a modern dress. At the same time noblemen, ladies, and peasants of Queen Anne's time dressed in the clothes of their forefathers and exposed to the ridicule of an observant audience. Signor Tagliafico as being the most ridiculous—he appeared with one leg white the other green—was the most unfortunate. Hinc illæ lachrymæ. Does it not seem as though a dictator were needed on all such matters, who, knowing the right, should be able to enforce it, who, for example, should look sharply after the anachronisms and absurdities to which artists are prone where real or imaginary effect can be secured; and who, therefore, would stop Lindas from wearing sapphire bracelets, and peasant farmers from appearing in silken hose.

THADDEUS'S EGG.

LE NOZZE WITHOUT NILSSON.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

Mdlle. Nilsson again disappointed the public on Saturday night, when she should have played the Countess in Le Nozze di Figaro. But as hoarseness was the cause, quiet submission was a duty—one, let us say, made tolerably easy to those who could appreciate Mozart's music and the merit of an ensemble not often surpassed. We recently pointed out the aggregation of talent made necessary by Mozart's great operas; and now an obvious remark is that they are very little affected by the accidents to which prime donne are liable. A favourite lady may fall ill, but even though her place be taken by one less competent, Le Nozze or Don Giovanni or Il Flauto goes on all the same, and with scarcely diminished pleasure to those real connoisseurs who are devoted to art rather than to the reigning soprano. An illustration of this was afforded on Saturday night, when with Mdlle. Rebonx as the Countess, Madame Volpini as Susannah, Mdlle. Lewitzky as Cherubino, M. Faure as Figaro, and Mr. Santley as the Count—not to mention minor parts equally well filled—a most enjoyable performance was given. Having already discussed the representation at some length, we are absolved from entering upon details now. Enough that, under the the charm of Mozart's divine music adequately interpreted, the absence even of Mdlle. Nilsson, however regrettable, could not be looked upon as an eminently serious misfortune.

WIENER.—The grand Musical Festival has been duly held, with tolerable success. As most of the artists belonging to the operatic company were engaged in it, the Theatre was closed from the 24th to the 31st May.

VIENNA.—Miss Minnie Hauck is engaged for one season, beginning the 1st September, at the Imperial Operahouse. She is to receive 300 florins an evening, and the manager binds himself that she shall appear at least six times a month.—Herr Grau, the manager of the German Theatre, New York, is negotiating with Mdme. Wilt, of the Imperial Operahouse. He wishes to engage her for the summer season of 1871. He offers her 40,000 dollars, besides an additional sum for costumes, etc.—Herr Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser is to be produced during the present month, with a magnificent mise-en-scène, at the new Imperial Operahouse.

Digitized by Google

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—The following is condensed from the Morning Mail of Tuesday, May 31st:—

"Professor Glover's concert, at the Antient Concert Rooms, in aid of Mercer's Hospital, was under distinguished patronage, and fashionably attended. The feature of the programme was the first performance of the Professor's cantata, St. Patrick at Tara, for which several leading artists were engaged, with a numerous and efficient orchestra and chorus. The argument is founded upon St. Patrick's visit to Tara, with a few Christian followers, in the fifth century, while the King and Court were celebrating the great Beltina Festival of the Druids, and the subsequent introduction of Christianity into Ireland. Of the music there can be but one opinion—that it is sweet and expressive throughout, devotional and effective in many passages, and admirably arranged. The composer has evidently taken special pains with the instrumentation. The overture is of a high order, and, played as it was last evening, must ever be listened to with pleasure. 'The March of the Heralds' is also full of melody, and was warmly encored. The music allotted to the Saint, the best in the work, was sung by Mr. Richard Smith, who was in capital voice, and gave the recitative passages, as well as the beautiful sacred song, 'Lord, have mercy upon me,' with great judgment, especially the latter, which he had to repeat. Miss Pennell interpreted the part of the King's daughter, Fethlema, with a skill worthy of a finished artist, singing with charming taste and expression. Miss Lina Glover also gave the music of Ethnea, another daughter of the King, in a manner to please all present. The other characters—the King, and Dufa, a bard—were represented by Mr. Peele and Mr. Hemsley. The former was not in good voice; but Mr. Hemsley acquitted himself with skill, and amongst his other solos, the alto air, 'I often wish this trembling lyre,' was warmly applauded. The chorus had evidently not been well rehearsed; nevertheless, two or three of the choruses were executed in creditable style. On the whole, the cantata passed off most successfully, and the majority of those present will doubtless avail themselves of the next opportunity afforded of hearing it. The effect produced by the skilful harp accompaniments played by Miss Emilie Glover. The composer conducted with his usual skill, while the direction of the orchestra was entrusted to Mr. R. M. Levey. The remainder of the entertainment included operatic selections, all well executed."

SOUTHAMPTON.—The concert given by Mr. Alexander Rowland, the well-known double-bass player, at the Hartley Hall, on Thursday, the 2nd inst., was attended by the élite of the town and neighbourhood, who listened with great attention and evident pleasure to a sacred cantata (the text taken from the 103rd Psalm) composed by Mr. Rowland. The cantata had already been given at Southampton (June 2, 1869), when it was received with favour. Some excellent solo singers were engaged for the present occasion. Miss Sophia Vinta, Miss Marion Severn, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, were the principals; Mr. Weist Hill led the band. A well trained chorus sang "Haste Thee, O God," and "Thou art my helper and Redeemer," with precision and effect. Among the most admired of the solo pieces were the airs, "Let them be confounded" (Mr. Lloyd), "Let all those that delight in thy Salvation" (Miss Vinta), and "As for me I am poor and in misery" (Miss Severn). The unaccompanied quartet, "Let them for their reward," by the vocalists just named, was one of the gems of the cantata, and was remarkably well sung. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous, including a duet for piano and double-bass, played by Mr. Rowland and a young lady pupil. Mr. Rowland's command over his ponderous instrument is great and the playing of his pupil showed he was a good pianoforte instructor. Mr. Weist Hill played a solo on some well-known operatic airs in the style of an accomplished violinist, and was deservedly applauded and recalled. Miss Marion Severn did ample justice to a song by Signor Randegger (violoncello obbligato, Mr. Gould). Miss Vinta gave "Una voce poco fa," from Rossini's Il Barbiere, in finished style and was recalled. The same compliment was also deservedly paid to Mr. Lewis Thomas after "When time has beset thee," and to Mr. Lloyd after "Good-night, beloved" (Balfe). Miss Vinta was compelled to repeat a Scotch ballad, and Miss Severn, Balfe's popular song, "I'm not in love, remember." The concert altogether gave complete satisfaction, indeed we can justly say it was one of the best ever given in Southampton.

DUBLIN.—Herr Elsner gave a grand concert on the 4th of June, in Molesworth Hall, and was favoured with an excellent attendance. Herr Elsner played with his daughter, Mdlle. Pauline Elsner, a duo concertante for piano and violoncello; a duet for harp and violoncello, with Herr Oberthür (the "Ave Maria" of Schubert); three movements (andante, cantabile, and scherzo) from a trio by Schubert; the adagio and rondo from Beethoven's sonata (Op. 69) for piano and violoncello, with Mr. Sproule; and a solo by Romberg, "Alla Riva del Lago." In all these performances Herr Elsner showed himself a master of his instrument, and was rewarded after each with genuine and deserved applause The harp performance of Herr Oberthür met with marked approbation, the talented artist being encored after his grand fantasia, "Souvenir de Londres," when he gave his charming "Cascade," and was recalled and warmly applauded after his fine execution of Parish Alvars' difficult solo on airs from Monteschi e Capuleti. The vocalists were Miss Beasie Craig, Mr. Stickley, and "An Amateur," the last exhibiting excellent vocal capacity, especially in Mr. Wilford Morgan's song, "My Sweetheart was a Boy." Mdlle. Pauline Elsner, besides joining in the duet with her father, played Benedict's "Where the bee sucks" in a way that showed she possesses considerable mechanical skill. A grand duet, by Herr Oberthür, for piano and harp, "Les Huguenots," capitally played by the composer and Mr. Sproule, brought the concert to a satisfactory conclusion.

NORMA AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

There are not a few people who hold that Norma has been played out, that its melodies have been heard ad nauseam, and that, even with an adequate heroine, its performance is mainly conducive to weariness. Without discussing the truth of this opinion, we may gratify those who cherish it by the reminder that, to all appearance, the last Norma is Mdlle. Tietjens. From the time when Madame Pasta first won honours in the rôle of the Druid priestess, artists worthy to succeed her have not been wanting. Now, however the supply threatens to run short, as though there could no more be a continuous succession of great Normas than of great composers. Those, therefore who wish the retirement of Bellini's too familiar music, may possibly get help out of the very "nature of things;" but, for the present at all events, Norma is safe, and its appearance in the bills, with Mdlle. Tietjens in the company, amounts only to a question of time. The well-worn opera was played on Saturday night, in conjunction with the last act of Hamlet. How many of the tolerably large audience were attracted by Bellini, and how many by M. Ambroise Thomas we cannot tell; but it is certain that much of Norma was received with unanimous approval, thanks to the very fine performance of Mdlle. Tietjens, whose representation of the principal character gathers force as time runs on. To point out in what her excellence consists would be superfluous, and we do all that is necessary when we remark that each well-known point was made to the satisfaction of an audience which knew perfectly well where to look for it. As on all previous occasions, the wrathful address to Pollio on the discovery of his treachery was given with magnificent emphasis and encored. Mdlle. Olma, as Adalgisa, demonstrated that she has much to learn both vocally and dramatically before the success can be obtained at which she aims, and for the gaining of which she is not without important qualifications. Considerable allowance, however, must be made when, for the first time, a young artist plays so prominent a part on a strange stage and before a strange public. Signor Naudin filled the ungracious rôle of Pollio in his accustomed and sufficiently effective manner; and the fine voice of Signor Bagagiolo gave dignity to the utterances of Oroveso. With music so familiar to execute, neither band nor chorus could easily go wrong. We can add nothing to former remarks upon the Ophelia of Mdlle. Sessi, unless it be a statement that, while remaining impressed with its cleverness, we are no nearer accepting it as an adequate impersonation.

THADDEUS EGG.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

Mdlle. Schneider made her first appearance in London this season on Monday evening, in La Grande Duchesse. On Mdlle. Schneider's eccentric impersonation of the Duchess we have commented more than once, and it is sufficient to say that all the points were effectively marked, and that the same spirit was infused which has rendered the actress's name identical with the character. We may regret the disappearance of the goodly company of French players, and marvel at the increase of prices which has followed its departure, but Mdlle. Schneider draws a fuller house than M. Lafont, one being "the rage," while the other is only a genius.

Mdlle. Schneider has not lost any of her courage or vivacity, and plays throughout with immense spirit. She is admirably supported by M. Carrier, who replaces M. Dupuis as Fritz; by Mdlle. Vizentini, as Wanda; by M. Beckers, as General Boum; and by M. Schey, as Baron Grog. The musical arrangements are under the able direction of M. Vizentini. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince (of course) and Princess (alas!) of Wales honoured the first performance with their presence.

Digitized by Google

THE CHARITY CHILDREN AT ST. PAUL'S.

On Thursday afternoon, in accordance with time-honoured custom, the charity children of our Metropolitan schools assembled to celebrate their annual festival under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral. This anniversary is of its kind unique; nothing at all approaching to it, indeed, can be witnessed either in London or any other European capital. The children, some 5,000 in number, alone form a spectacle which once to behold is never to forget; while the thousands attracted to the church help to make up a coup d'œil wholly unparalleled. The arrangements for the accommodation of the host of young singers, prepared, as usual, by Mr. Arthur S. Newman, architect of the festival, who, for nearly a quarter of a century has undertaken the same very responsible task, without the occurrence of a single accident, were yesterday as picturesque, imposing, and in all respects satisfactory as on any previous occasion. The indefatigable representative of the Committee of "Patrons" who ordinarily superintends these proceedings (Mr. F. J. Fuller, if we are not mistaken) was again at his post, attending to the requirements of the choir and performing his other duties with the zeal and activity for which, time out of mind, he has been recognized. The children were placed with military order, and, once all seated, wherever the eye could travel the sight was one easier to remember than to describe.

Considerable interest had been excited outside by the appearance of the children and the officials of the various schools, as, gay with banners and bouquets, they paraded the streets leading to the church. St. Paul's Churchyard was made impassible by an eager crowd. It is to the praise of the multitude that much greater curiosity seemed to attach to the children, as they filed past, than to the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and other civic dignitaries, who attended in demi-state, and were received by Dean Mansel, Canon Melvil, and other of the Cathedral authorities.

The full musical service, accompanied on the organ, with trumpets and drums to strengthen and enforce the full passages, was, as it has never failed to be, wonderfully impressive. The important part which the children take in this was, of course, as always, the most striking feature. They had previously enjoyed the advantage of some twenty rehearsals, under the direction of Vicar-Choral James Shoubridge, assisted by Mr. George Cooper, organist of the Chapel Royal and St. Sepulchre's, and deputy-organist at St. Paul's. Mr. Shoubridge again proved himself an excellent conductor, able to make his best thoroughly intelligible to the army of young executants under his charge. The choir, numbering about 100 voices more than the accustomed one, was more than usually efficient, though naturally weak in contrast with the children. The organ, still—proh pudor!—caseless, was, nevertheless, in excellent order, and could not possibly have been in abler hands than those of Mr. John Goss, organist to the Cathedral, and one of England's most learned and admirable musicians, assisted, too, as he was, by Mr. George Cooper, his inseparable associate at these anniversaries.

There was nothing new in the musical part of the service, which consisted of precisely the same materials as last year and some years previous. We need hardly say that prayers were preceded by the unsurpassable "Old Hundredth" ("All people that on earth do dwell"), with the singing of which, in unison, by the children, so many great foreign musicians, from Haydn downwards, have been enchanted beyond measure. This, indeed, which has never been more impressively given, and the verses, equally well sung, from the 104th Psalm ("My soul, praise the Lord"), to the music of Dr. Croft ("Hanover" tune), now nearly 170 years old, yet still vigorous and fresh, were really the conspicuous musical points of the service; for in them the children's voices had full play, with nothing to perplex or hinder. Dr. Croft's psalm, which followed the sermon, was the omega, as the "Old Hundredth" was the alpha.

Prayers were intoned by the Rev. J. Coward, and the Lessons were read by the Rev. J. V. Povah—both minor canons of the Cathedral. That the "responses" were given to the music of Queen Elizabeth's famous organist, Thomas Tallis, it is hardly requisite to state. As we have said more than once, these could no more be dispensed with than the "Old Hundredth"—and for the best of reasons, they could not be improved upon, if indeed, without a doubtful, they could be equalled. The psalms for the day were chanted by the gentlemen and boys of the choir to Dr. Crotch's "slow chant" in C, which has effectively put aside "Jones's in D"—admired by Haydn, and, if tradition may be credited, altered and improved by that great master. We are bold enough to say that we like neither one nor the other—neither Jones nor Crotch. Mr. Goss himself could supply from his own pen a chant far superior to either, something simpler, and something, in short, more like a genuine chant and less like a rambling tune, with wide intervals and exceptional range, such as that of Dr. Crotch—which not to speak irreverently, is vulgar no less than rambling. According to custom, the children added their fresh voices, "fortissimo," to the "Gloria Patri" at the end of each psalm, accompanied by trumpets and drums.

The Te Deum and Jubilate were again sung to Mr. Goss's beautiful and truly devotional service in A major, which, composed for the festivals in 1865 and 1866—the Te Deum being the earliest contribution—has since then replaced Dr. Boyce's in the same key, and it is to be hoped may continue to replace it until Mr. Goss thinks proper to provide something new for the same office. What is most precious in this admirable music of the St. Paul's organist is the opportunity it affords the children of taking part in the execution. The voice parts are written in unison; and thus, as was remarked when the Te Deum and Jubilate were first produced—we have an exemplification of genuine congregational worship—a thing often talked about, but rarely put in practice. That the voice parts may be throughout in unison and yet the composition be artistically interesting, is clear; but to effect this demands a facility only possessed by erudite musicians. For the most part the execution of the Te Deum and Jubilate yesterday was remarkably effective.

As of old, the prayer for the Queen was uttered in by "Zadok the Priest and Nathan the Prophet anointed Solomon king"—the anthem written by Handel in 1727, for the coronation of George II. The children performed their part in this anthem, so simple in its harmonies and yet so broad and grand, to perfection—so well, indeed, as once more to suggest the advisability, at some future period, of their joining in the opening sentence, a preamble which in stately dignity has not been surpassed even by Handel himself. The time is surely ripe for the innovation. It would, moreover, be an evident advantage; for what with the vast space and the powerful chorus, and of the organ, when the keys of which, if we are not mistaken, both principal and suborganist were engaged in the accompaniment, the voices of the choir were scarcely audible.

Once more, and once more happily, the musical preface to the sermon was Mendelssohn's sublime chorale, "Sleepers wake, a voice is calling," from the oratorio of St. Paul; and once again, and not less happily, the magnificent "Hallelujah" from Handel's Messiah was the last and culminating piece. Of this chorus, and of the organ, which the children take in it, we have spoken so often that we have not another word to say. Those who have not heard the "Hallelujah" under such exceptional conditions have still to learn something of which it is capable.

The sermon was preached by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Winchester who took for his text 18th of Matthew, 4th verse—"It is not the will of your Father which is in Heaven, that one of these little ones should perish." On the whole this festival may be pronounced one of the most successful of recent years.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The sixth concert of the season took place on Monday, when the following selection was performed:—

PART 1.—Overture, In Memoriam—A. S. Sullivan. Scena, Infelice—Mendelssohn. Concerto, in B flat, MS., violoncello—Piatti. Romanza, "Quando a te lieta" (Faust)—Gounod. Rondo in B minor, pianoforte—Mendelssohn. Overture, Athalie—Mendelssohn.

PART 2.—Symphony, Eroica—Beethoven. Ode, "I wish to tune my quiv'ring Lyre"—Sullivan. Overture, Zauberflöte—Mozart.

The programme contained but one symphony—three overtures and two instrumental solos, however, making up a sufficient quantity to satisfy all but the unreasonable. Of Beethoven's great orchestral work it is not necessary now to speak. Signor Piatti's clever concerto and his own inimitable execution were noticed when it was first performed by him at the Crystal Palace Concert, of November 20, 1869, since when the composer has substituted a new "Larghetto" for the former "Largo" movement, with improved effect. The work again drew forth strong demonstrations of approval. Mr. Cowen, too, was greatly applauded for his animated playing of Mendelssohn's Rondo; and, like Signor Piatti, he was recalled. Of Mr. Sullivan's impressive and skilfully instrumented overture we have several times spoken. The overtures of Mendelssohn and Mozart and the symphony were effectively played by Mr. Cusins's orchestra. That Madame Sinico did full justice to Mendelssohn's Scena and Gounod's Romance, and Mr. Santley the same to Mr. Sullivan's ode, scarcely needs assertion.

BONN.—According to the Neue Freie Presse, the Committee of the Beethoven Centenary Festival wrote to request Herr Richard Wagner to conduct the Ninth Symphony. Herr Richard Wagner declined.

RÜDESHEIM.—Mdme. Mallinger was engaged to "star" here for a limited number of nights, but suddenly broke off her engagement, and left the town. The reason of her unexpected departure is said to be an unpleasant fracas between her husband and the manager, Herr Woltersdorff. The latter has already commenced legal proceedings.

Digitized by Google

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S
Beethoven Recitals.

1870.

THIS year being the Centenary of the birth of Beethoven, Mr. Hallé has considered it appropriate to devote his Recitals exclusively to the music of that illustrious composer.

The programmes, as on previous occasions, consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, p.m.

Mr. Hallé is assisted at all the Recitals by

HERR STOCKHAUSEN.

Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the sonatas, accompany the programmes.

THE SEVENTH RECITAL
WILL TAKE PLACE ON
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JUNE 17TH, 1870,
To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

PART I.

SONATA, Op. 81, "Les Adieux, L'Absence, et le Retour" .. .. Beethoven.
SONATA, Op. 90 .. .. Beethoven.

PART II.

GRAND SONATA, Op. 101 .. .. Beethoven.
GRAND SONATA, Op. 106 .. .. Beethoven.

The LAST TWO RECITALS will take place on Friday, June 17, and Friday, June 24.

Prices of Admission—Sofa Stalls, 7s.; Balcony, 3s.; Area, 1s.
Subscriptions received at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co.'s, 48, Cheapside; Hays, 4, Exchange Buildings; Austin's Ticket Office, 26, Piccadilly; and by Mr. Charles Hallé, 11, Mansfield Street, Cavendish Square.

NOTICE.

It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor).

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1870.

HERR WAGNER'S LATEST DELIVERANCE.

THERE are certain Parliamentary proceedings which are not what they seem, but which, nevertheless work very well. Let us suppose that A. is a cabinet minister who desires to make an important communication to the country; and that B. is a rank-and-file M.P. who asks A. a question, the answer to which embodies the communication aforesaid. On the face of matters, B. is burning for information, and drinks in the words of A. as a thirsty dog laps water. Really B. has been in collusion with A. from the outset; A. having engaged to ask B. the question, and the two going through a solemn but, possibly, not unuseful farce. We suspect something of this kind between Herr H. Esser and Herr R. Wagner, who have been playing at question and answer in the columns of the Neue Freie Presse.

The Prophet of the Future is given to issuing manifestoes and writing epistles; he delights to flaunt his paper banner before the eyes of the Peoples; and to sound a trumpet in the place which stands to him for Zion. But there are limits to the prerogatives of a prophet. He is not a god, who can "thunder when he pleases," and amuse his leisure hours by promulgating decalogues from the top of a Sinai. Hence there are times when Herr Wagner does love to speak, but needs that somebody should open to him what, in Puritanic circles, is called "a door of utterance." This good service Herr Esser has done. He wrote to Herr Wagner: "O Prophet, speak in the ears of thy servants, and say whether the Walküre is to be produced at Munich, and when; whether, also, the light of thy countenance will shine upon the performance, and thy 'Benedicite' consecrate it." Then opened the floodgates of Wagnerian eloquence, and the following streamed forth to delight the faithful:—

TRIEBSCHEN, NEAR LUCERNE,
16*th May*, 1870.

RESPECTED FRIEND.—The question which has been addressed to me by yourself, regarding the character of the projected performance of my Walküre in Munich, has also been recently addressed to me from the most various quarters. I should like to answer it once for all, and, therefore, should be much pleased if, using your own discretion, you would give further publicity to this my reply to the said question.

I am indebted to my high patron, King Ludwig II. of Bavaria, not only for the fact that—as, by the way, may easily be surmised—my efforts for art have not entirely sunk into oblivion, and that attention is still directed to my later works following Lohengrin, but more especially for the circumstance that, after an interruption of eleven years, I can resume the musical realization of my Ring der Nibelungen, and, in the course of next year, I shall succeed in bringing to an end the very fatiguing task of setting the last part to music, and, consequently, as far as I am concerned, there will probably be nothing to prevent the whole from being represented in the year 1872.

As I was obliged, in order to carry out, very much to my request, above all things, the necessary time, and freedom from all pressure in this respect, I considered myself bound to merit this favour, by proving myself anxious to gratify, to the best of my ability, the wish of my high patron, to become acquainted at once with separate portions of my work. As, about two years ago, there appeared a probability that I should obtain satisfactory influence upon the artistic efforts of the Theatre Royal, Munich, I was entitled to hope that, by fulfilling the desire, by which I was so highly honoured, of my illustrious patron, I should not be unfaithful to my artistic principles, but rather be advancing them, by gradually preparing the ground for the development of my tendencies.

As you have already, no doubt, heard from others, I was very soon compelled to renounce the hope of maintaining a profitable understanding with the management of the Theatre Royal; consequently, there was nothing left for me to do but to allow the Theatre Royal, Munich, to go on just as it is, without any interference on my part, but, on the other hand, from this very necessity, to oppose no obstacle to the production of detailed portions of my work, since the wish to hear them still existed with him who had to decide.

My request having been graciously granted, I am freed from any necessity of co-operating in these partial performances, and thus find myself relieved of a very painful pretension. Whether the performance which it is proposed to give shortly of the Walküre can really take place, is at the present moment, as much unknown to me, as it is difficult for me to guess whether, if it does take place, it will prove successful. But, however this may be, the wish which gave rise to these performances, is for me, as it always has been, worthy of respect, and, at the same time, a happy sign of the life-long duration of the extraordinarily magnanimous interest for which I am indebted not only for being enabled to complete my work, but for most certainly seeing it some day or other produced in the noblest way.

Only then will I once more take part in a public performance; but never will I again produce a work for our operatic theatres, or deliver it into their hands; with the Meistersinger, I had dealings with those theatres for the last time.

So much on this head! At present receive my congratulations on my knowing that you have now reached an asylum which protects you from further contact with the German Operatic Stage and its singers.

Digitized by Google

With cordial good wishes, your devoted

RICHARD WAGNER.

There is in average human nature a strong desire to peep into the future, and especially to know the times and seasons when blessings may be expected. From this arises the eager reading of Millennial literature, and its not less eager writing by persons whose object is much more tangible and definite. Happy Wagnerians, who know that, in 1872, the apotheosis of their master will come, and the era of his glory will begin! Between now and then an irreverent Munich may do as it pleases; but, then, with King Louis as a nursing father, the religion of the one true Prophet shall be established. There shall be set up, on the Bavarian plains, a triple-headed idol, at sight of which Shadrach, Meshek, and Abednego will cheerfully bow down, forgetful of Judaism in Music, and not needing the stimulus of the burning fiery furnace of Herr Wagner's wrath.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A WRITER in Le France Musicale, signing himself "Jacoby," puts forth a grandiloquent "Jugement sur Richard Wagner," which contains certain very remarkable statements. On the whole, it is unfavourable to the Prophet of the Future; but "Jacoby" can hurt nobody. Here are the words which demonstrate the particular ears that adorn Jacoby's head:—"Richard Wagner is beyond doubt a very great musician, the greatest, it appears to me, of living artists. He has profoundly studied that legislator of his art, old Bach——" (!!!) Adieu, "Jacoby," c'est assez.

A RECENT act of unsurpassed magnanimity ought not to be passed over. The chief support of one opera (Mdlle. Nilsson) being unable to sing at a certain concert, the prima donna of another (Mdlle. Tietjens) comes forward and "gives her services" as substitute. Who shall say that the days of chivalry are over? "Messieurs," said the French Guards to their English antagonists at Fontenoy or somewhere else, "be pleased to fire first." This was pretty fair; but what shall be said when a warrior snatches up the sword of a foe placed hors de combat, and wields it vigorously in the name of chivalry against his own party?

THE officials of the Prussian post-office, considering themselves insulted by the appearance of a character in their uniform on the stage of Wagner's Meistersänger, have memorialized the chief of police to interfere for their protection. The answer contained a declaration of powerlessness to interfere, but promised that care should be taken to prevent such an occurrence for the future. After this, we may expect the exemplary Metropolitan police to agitate against the pantomimic "Bobby" of next Christmas.

LET nobody take up with Richard Wagner and his works who would escape a lunatic asylum. The latest victim is Herr Eberle, who was sent by the Prophet to conduct the Meistersänger at Berlin. Moreover, we learn that a dog, having caught sight of a page of the opera just named, immediately bit twenty people, and was knocked on the head.

MANAGERIAL energies may find plenty of room in Italy and elsewhere just now. Among the theatres open to the highest bidder for the next season, are those of Milan, Naples, Venice, Palermo, Bologna, Messina, Verona, Mantua, Vicenza, Treviso, Cremona, Lucca, Lugo, Urbino, Cento, Rovigo, and Lodi. Out of Italy the "empties" are Madrid, Valencia, Lisbon, Oporto, Constantinople, and Alexandria.

THE Emperor of Russia, says Le Ménéstrel, intended to give 16,000 francs per annum for division among the French dramatists whose works are played at the Michel Theatre. On second thoughts, however, he resolved to go on applauding the pieces and keeping his money.

THE Musician is dead. Requiescat in pace! (What will Richard Wagner do? Was the editor of our late-respected contemporary also driven mad?)

A NEW five-act play, Maurice de Saxe, was produced at the Français on Thursday week. MM. Jules Amignes and Marcelin Daboulins, have dramatized a disgraceful episode in the life of the hero of Fontenoy. Saxe persecuted with dishonourable intentions Justine Favart, wife of a comedian, who, like Susanna in Figaro, tricked her lover and remained faithful to her husband. Marshal Saxe was a brutal Count Almaviva, using the power of the State in furtherance of his unlawful love, imprisoning and otherwise persecuting husband and wife. The piece, a bad imitation of Beaumarchais, drags heavily through the first three acts. It afterwards takes a tragic turn. Saxe is killed by the Prince de Conti, who has challenged him in consequence of information given by Justine that the Marshal had dishonoured his mother. M. Got, who played Favart (the Figaro of the piece), acquitted himself admirably. Mdlle. Victoria Lafontaine (the Susanna or Justine) is not in her element; while M. Maubant (Marshal Saxe) did not succeed in making much of the part. M. Ollivier, a personal friend of M. Jules Amignes, attended on the first night, and in the course of the evening left his box to sit for a long while with his brother Academician, the great critic, Jules Janin. Maurice de Saxe is hardly destined for a long run.

HERR CARL LEVI, musical director at the Grand Ducal Theatre at Carlsruhe, was asked by Herr von Perfall, Intendant of the Theatre Royal, Munich, to conduct Herr R. Wagner's Walküre. Herr Levi stated that he was very willing to oblige Herr von Perfall, provided that Herr R. Wagner, of whom he—Herr Levi, not, most decidedly, Herr von Perfall—is an enthusiastic admirer, gave his sanction to the negotiations. In consequence, however, of the hostile position assumed by the Composer of the Future towards Herr von Perfall, it was as impossible to come to an understanding with him, as it is, generally, of course, to an understanding of him. So Herr Carl Levi gracefully retired from the scene, and Herr Wüllner was elected to conduct Die Walküre, just as, some time since, he was chosen to perform the same office for Rheingold. The first representation of the said Walküre will take place some time in the second half of the present month. According to report, Herr Vogl will be the Sigmund; Herr Betz, Hunding; Herr Kindermann, Wotan; Mdme. Vogl, Sieglinde; and Mdlle. Stahle, Brünnhilde.

DEATH OF CHARLES DICKENS.

We feel sure that a thrill of sorrow as well as of surprise will be felt by our readers when they hear of the sudden death of Mr. Charles Dickens. On Wednesday evening he was seized with a fit, at his residence, Gad's Hill Place, Higham, near Rochester, between six and seven o'clock, while at dinner. Mr. Stephen Steele, a surgeon at Strood, was sent for, and promptly arrived. He found Mr. Dickens in a very dangerous state, and remained with him for some hours. A physician was summoned from London on Thursday morning, and Mr. Steele was also in attendance. Unfortunately, there was no improvement in the patient. In the afternoon Mr. Steele was again summoned from Strood. The reports in the after part of the day were discouraging, and shortly after six o'clock the great novelist expired.

CARLSRUHE.—Mdlle. Schneider, from the Leipsic Stadttheater, appeared here in Fidelio and the Huguenots with such success that she has been permanently engaged.—The St. Cecilia Association continues to display the most laudable activity. The programme of its fourth concert was particularly good, including the Ode to St. Cecilia (Handel); the second act from Gluck's Orpheus; and Mendelssohn's setting of the 98th Psalm.—A fair young singer Mdlle. Josephine Shefzky, who was sent, some time since, at the King's expense, to conclude her musical studies in Vienna, has just made a successful first appearance here as Azucena, in Il Trovatore.—The Action-Theater (theatre built by a joint-stock company) has been purchased by the King for 125,000 florins. It will be a kind of branch establishment of the Theatre Royal.

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mons. Delaborde gave a second morning concert in St. James's Hall on Tuesday, the programme being chiefly made up of ordinary pianoforte music, or pieces for the piano à clavier de pédales. Among the former were Chopin's second grand sonata, Beethoven's fantasia (Op. 77), and smaller works by Schumann and Mendelssohn. The latter comprised a prelude by Alkan, Bach's fugue in C minor and prelude and fugue in D. Herr Stockhausen was the vocalist.

Mr. Walter Macfarren's third matinée took place in the Hanover Square Rooms on Saturday last, when he played (with Herr Daubert) Beethoven's sonata in G minor (Op. 5); (with MM. Sainton and Daubert) Mendelssohn's trio in C minor (Op. 66); (with Miss Josephine Williams) Schumann's andante and variations (Op. 46); (with M. Sainton) the Kreutzer Sonata; and, as solos, four of his own drawing-room pieces. Mr. Cummings sang two new sacred songs by the concertgiver, in addition to Pinsuti's "I heard a voice." The character of the entertainment can be inferred from these particulars with all desirable ease.

Miss Kate Roberts gave a recital of classical pianoforte music in St. George's Hall yesterday evening week, to a moderately large audience. The young artist played first (with Mr. Edward Howell) Hummel's sonata in A for piano and violoncello, following this work up with Heller's "Dornen Stücke" and Chopin's "Fantasia Impromptu," the latter of which she rendered so well as to obtain an encore. The first part ended with Schumann's piano and violin sonata in A minor, well executed by Miss Roberts and Herr Pollitzer, and the second began with Bach's Bourée, and one of Mendelssohn's seven characteristic pieces (Op. 7). The Bourée was encored by acclamation, and deservedly so. Mendelssohn's trio in D minor, played by the three artists above named concluded the programme of a capital recital. The vocalist was Miss Katherine Poyntz, who sang Benedict's charming "Rock me to sleep," and Sullivan's "Where the bee sucks."

M. Paque, the eminent Belgian violoncellist, upon whom has fallen the mantle of Servais, gave his annual matinée on Thursday, the 2nd instant, at the residence of the Marchioness of Down-hire, 24, Belgrave Square, and was honoured by the attendance of a large and fashionable audience. M. Paque selected for performance a polonoise by Chopin for violoncello and piano, which he was ably assisted by Herr Wilhelm Coenen; a fantasia of his own composition on airs from Don Giovanni, calculated to display his executive powers as well as the quality of the tone he can produce from his instrument; and two graceful bagatelles—a romance and a tarantella, also of his own composition. All these were evidently to the taste of his audience, who honoured M. Paque with flattering marks of approval. He also played the obbligato violoncello accompaniment to Spontini's "Hymne de Milton," in which the voice and style of M. Jules Lefort had ample scope. M. Paque must be praised for his moderation in providing himself at his own concert with so few opportunities of exhibiting his command of the violoncello. Mdlle. and H. Heerman, played solos respectively on the harp and violin; Herr Coenen, introduced some clever pianoforte pieces of his own; Madame Florence Lancia, sang vocal arrangements of two mazurkas by Chopin; Miss Alice Fairman, Signor Tagliafico, and Mr. George Perren sang various pieces; and M. Jules Lefort, introduced, with genuine effect, a new song, entitled "J'aime," which is sung almé," the composition of Herr Reichardt, famed for his lied, "Thou art so near and yet so far." Among the accompanists were MM. Benedict, Ganz, and Vianesi.

The soirée musicale of the New Philharmonic Society, on Thursday evening week, in St. George's Hall, was numerously attended. Conspicuous amongst the performers were Mdlle. Heerman, harpist, and Herr Heerman, violinist, M. L. Brassin, pianist, and M. Brasin, violinist, besides a new aspirant for public favour, Mdlle. Borland, pianist, from the Brussels Conservatoire. The selections of pieces consisted of Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, a chaconne by Bach, a duet by Spohr for violin and harp, a scherzo by Chopin, a violin solo by Vieuxtemps, &c. Mdlle. Heerman was heard to advantage in Godefroid's Danse des Sylphes, and Spohr's duo. The manner in which this young artist executed the most difficult passages elicited enthusiastic applause. Herr Heerman, in Vieuxtemps' solo, established himself as a virtuoso of the first rank. Herr L. Brassin, the pianist, and his brother, the violinist, are, like the Heerman's, strangers to London audiences. Herr L. Brassin is a first-rate executant, and an excellent musician. His rendering of Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata was characterized by a broad style, accurate phrasing, and perfect execution. He was ably seconded by his brother, the violinist, who also displayed his talents in Bach's chaconne. Mdlle. Borland created a favourable impression in two pianoforte pieces, one by M. Dupont, another by Herr Alfred Jaell. Two violoncello solos written and performed by M. Paque were heard with the greatest interest. The Tarantelle, played as the second morceau, was encored, and listened to for the second time with increased pleasure. The vocal music was well selected. Miss Eleanor Armstrong's "Dove sono" was much admired and applauded. Miss Jenny Robinson displayed a pleasing voice and good style. Signor Romani (a French baritone) and Mr. Dudley Thomas were both heard to advantage. In a selection from Spohr's Jessonda the amateur members of the society took part, under the direction of Mr. W. Beavan. The solos were assigned to Miss Ganthony (soprano), an amateur contralto, Mr. Wake (tenor), and Mr. Beavan (bass). Herr Ganz, assisted by Mr. John Beavan, accompanied the vocal music.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS.

Although Mdlle. Nilsson again disappointed Mr. Leslie's patrons on the occasion of his third concert in St. James's Hall, last Wednesday, the audience had no reason to complain; Mdlle. Tietjens being to the fore as a substitute, and a capital programme being gone through in an adequate style. The Stabat of Rossini constituted Part 1; solos by Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Monbelli, Mdme. Trebelli, and M. Faure. "Quis est homo" was beautifully sung, and encored; Mdme. Trebelli was re-called after "Fac ut portem;" and a like honour fell to Mdlle. Tietjens for her superb singing in the "Inflammatus." M. Faure, also, made a great effect with "Pro peccatis." Among the notable features of Part 2, were Mr. Charles Hallé's performance of Mendelssohn's concerto in D minor; Mdme. Volpini's delivery of "Bel raggio;" Mr. Santley's "O, Huddier than the Cherry" (two re-calls); Mdlle. Tietjens's "Ocean, thou mighty Monster," and Mdme. Monbelli's "Come per me;" M. Faure obtained an encore for his hymn, "Les Rameaux," to which his own fine singing, aided by that of the choir, helped as much as the excellence of the music. The overture to Zampa brought the concert to a close.

[Private and strictly confidential.]

REVIEWER'S WAIL.—No. IV.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—Guerre à l'outrance is evidently your cry, and so let it be. In my last, promises should have been printed premises, as in my letter written. I have, in an agony of gout (donkeys do have the gout) scribbled to you at length, but I will not irritate you with my gouty ee-haws; and, therefore, will only say, in an ecstacy of ee-haw, ee-haw, that you must allow me, from this time, hence, and for evermore, to remain your Double,

Another Reviewer

June 9, 1870. (In a different School).

P. S.—There are plenty of points for your "last word," and I promise you you shall have it, so, let it be short, and a stinger.

[In his last letter "Another Reviewer" wrote himself down a quadruped, but without stating precisely of what species. He is now more explicit; and we are satisfied.—A. S. S.]

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—Observing in your account of some recent lectures on music by Mr. A. S. Sullivan that the old exploded familiar "saw" about the high musical education of our great-great-grandmothers was again trotted out, let me once more rehearse the "other side" of the case. It is stated, on the one hand, that in the days of good Queen Anne no English lady's education was thought complete unless to various other accomplishments was united a thorough knowledge of the art and practice of music. Very true, no doubt. Then we are told "it was the custom," upon the removal of the cloth, to bring in the music-books, and for the amateur ladies and gentlemen to read from notes and sing various charming and learnedly composed madrigals in three, four, or five parts. From hence it is asserted music must have been in a high state of culture, wonderfully flourishing in the reign of Queen Anne. Now, on the other side it has been gravely asked—What proportion of "usage" constitutes a "custom"? History always has two sides; every event, the most simple as well as the most portentous, may be told in two ways. No surprise need be manifested if this scrap of ancient intelligence is no exception to the general rule. Therefore, if in a population of twenty millions twenty amateurs could be found capable of reading at sight the works of our great madrigal writers, it is humbly submitted that "one in a million" is not sufficient to found a "custom," howbeit ample for proof positive that the practice cited was not the "custom," but the exception. But to descend a little from these figures, to give the "other side" the fairest possible ground. If these families where the singing was so perfect were so numerous, how were they taught? Where were the teachers? There were probably not more than three or four "learned" sets of madrigal singers in London at that time. There were no

Digitized by Google

Hullah's classes, no Tonic-Sol-fa gatherings, no opera chorus (worth naming), no Sacred Harmonic Associations, no Sunday schools, no infant schools, no Orpheus Unions; the part-song itself had no existence. Where did they learn? Who were their teachers? Let us suppose the men at the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, spent all their "filling-up" time in communicating knowledge by the orthodox notation. How many pupils could they "do?" Like Bobadil's twenty, or Falstaff's "score" in buckram, or the boy's "thousand" cats of proverbial notoriety—which eventually diminished down to "our old tabby and another"—this universal custom of every lady and gentleman singing "from note" has at last followed in the wake of the story of the Three Black Crows—something "very like a crow" at last doing duty for the whole "three." Let the benefit be given to the "other side" of the supposition, that the people of those days had exceptional natural ability, and that they were born "readers,"—that might account for the success of their musical meetings. But yet it must in fairness be said that they could not sing without copies, and where were the copies? Hundreds of singers, or thousands of singers, would have required hundreds or thousands of copies. Where did they come from? Were they in manuscript? Who wrote them? Were they printed? Who printed them? Did they exist in sufficient numbers? Where are they now? Were they committed to memory by one family, and the book that contained them then lent to a second, and afterwards passed on to a third, and so on? This could not be, for are we not told that they sung "from books." Printing music by types was unknown; even lithography was not invented. From the plates engraved how many copies could have been printed? Certainly not sufficient to make the use of the books a "custom," though every subscriber were supposed to be a singer. Probably seven or eight hundred of each book were issued, and perhaps one-fourth of the purchasers could sing them; and further, of this one-fourth at least half were in the profession; and if there were six or eight or ten families or musical circles where the madrigals of the day were sung with anything like accuracy, it is as much as can be said. Figures are ignored and history persistently perused backwards by those who would state again the fallacy about the superior knowledge and more extended prevalence of musical taste over our sons and daughters amongst our ancestors two centuries ago. Statistics can be made to prove many fallacies, but not that. Consider that in our day the best sacred and secular compositions are sung by thousands of groups from five to five thousand strong; and they circulate, like the penny press, by millions. Would that our teachers were less prodigal of sweeping unauthenticated statements.—Yours very truly,

June 6, 1870. IDEALIZER.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I have been shown a paragraph in your issue of March 12th last stating that I am the teacher of a lady about to make her début at the annual concert of Miss Berry Greening. Permit me to say that neither at the present, or any previous time, have I had a pupil of any kind. My reason for wishing this paragraph contradicted, is that I am much annoyed by persons addressing me upon professional matters, to which I have neither the time nor the disposition to attend.—Yours respectfully, WILLIE B. M. PAPE.

63, Chayne Walk, Chelsea.

[We do not remember the paragraph.—ED.]

MADAME PAREPA-ROSA IN NEW YORK.

(From "Watson's Art Journal," May 21.)

Strange as it may appear, for disappointments are not the order of the day with the Parepa-Rosa Opera Company, when we reached the Academy on Friday evening, May 13th, a placard announced a change of opera. Mr. Nordblom was sick, and for Don Giovanni, Martha was to be substituted. Three-fourths of the audience, we are compelled to say, seemed very much rejoiced at the change, preferring to be amused rather than to be instructed—such is the perverseness of our obstinate public. So Martha was sung in a manner so generally excellent that little was left to be desired. The chorus was unusually excellent; the voices good and fresh, spirited and prompt to the time, and well up in the action of the scene. The orchestra, under the skilful and careful direction of Carl Rosa, executed the light and graceful accompaniments with much grace, and exhibited more than the usual refinement in the development of artistic shading. It was a most pleasant feature in the performance. It would be impossible to pass over an opera in which Madame Parepa-Rosa sang without paying just tribute to her most admirable singing, and to her most exquisite voice. Of course we feel it very difficult to speak of her in set terms of praise, for we believe that we have exhausted our vocabulary of eulogistic terms, and should, consequently, have to fall into the deadly sin of repetition—not that we are by profession a "repeater." Still the charm of her singing and her voice seems to give eloquence to a barren pen, and language to thoughts exhausted. Her spontaneity seems as involuntary as the bursting of the buds into blossoms in the happy spring time, and, like them, she scatters fragrance, which in her is melody. Her notes flow, they are not made; they come, they are not sought for. They are as pure and bright as the falling drops of crystal water, and as they drop in their purity they form a chain of perfect cyrsoliten, whose value cannot be estimated. To indicate any special excellence would be like time wasted in choosing between two bright stars of equal magnitude. One beauty is but sequential to another, which owns no degree of lesser excellence, so that indeed we know not where to choose. We are, truly, embarrassed with riches, so prodigally does Parepa-Rosa scatter on the expectant air the flashing jewels of her song. Perhaps "The Last Rose of Summer" was never given with such a full sense of rounded beauty as it was by Parepa-Rosa last night. Each note was perfect, and melted one into the other with a blending so delicate that the transitions were imperceptible, and still each note was instinct with sonorous resonance. In addition to this rare and exquisite vocalism, she sang the simple, touching ballad in a manner so unpretentious, with so expression so pure and earnest, and so free from the appearance of artificiality, that it literally brought the house down to her feet. Madame Rosa never won a triumph more complete than upon this occasion, and she may feel proud when she reflects that it was accomplished by pure and chastely impassioned singing, and not by meretricious aids, and that it was sympathy, and not wonder, that held spell-bound the heart and judgment of the audience.

The other artists, Mr. and Mrs. Seguin, and Messrs. Castle and Campbell, sustained Madame Parepa-Rosa in their usual efficient and agreeable manner, and justly shared in the approbation bestowed upon the performance.

Mark Lemon.

(From "Punch," June 4, 1870.)

He had been absent: but was with us still
In letters, messages of wonted cheer;
We drank a quick recovery from the sick;
Asked, and were answered, "He will soon be here."

His kindly eyes looked on us from the wall:
In spirit at our board he seemed to sit,
Back into bounds too reckless mirth to call,
To quicken seemly fun and decent wit.

Little we thought the time was near at hand,
When we no more should meet the honest eyes:
Return no more that welcome blithe and bland,
Take counsel of that spirit, kind and wise!

Death has been frequent in our fellowship:
Where is A'Beckett's Babelasian style;
Where Jerrold's wrath 'gainst wrong and lightning quip;
Where Thackeray's half-sad, half sunny smile;

Where Leech's facile hand and faithful brain,
The truest, truest, abstract of the time?
All memories! And he that linked the chain,
Now theme of our obituary rhyme!

Never did brethren of the pen owe more
To elder brother than we owed to him:
Still his wit's weapon like a Knight he bore—
Would never poison point, nor polish dim:

And 'twas his pride to teach us so to bear
Our blades as he bore his—keep the edge keen,
But strike above the belt: and ever wear
The armour of a conscience clear and clean.*

The while he sat among us there was none
But felt the kindlier for his kindliness:
Jealousy resmed his genial smile to shun;
Failure was soothed; more modest grew success.

Never self-seeking, keen for others' rise
And gain, before his own, he loved to see
Young wrestlers of his training win the prize,
Nor asked what his part of the prize should be.

His memory will not die out of ours
For many a year to come: the thought of him,
Erewhile associate with our merriest hours,
Will be a sad one, till all thought grows dim.

But what our loss to theirs, who with sick hearts
Sit in the darkened house, whence he has past:
Till new life shall unite whom death disparts,
Where tears are dried, and grief turns joy at last!

* "Sotto l'usbergo del sentirsi puro."—DANTE.

Digitized by Google

OPERATIC WRITING AT THE PRESENT MOMENT IN RUSSIA.*

THE DEMON:

AN OPERA IN THREE ACTS, BY BORIS SCHEEL, FOUNDED ON THE POEM OF THE SAME NAME, BY LERMONTOFF.

(Continued from page 279).

The merits of the opera, William Redcliff, by S. Kwi, performed last winter, were duly appreciated in these columns; and the work has now disappeared. We must mention, also, S. Kaschperow's opera, The Thunder Storm. What dramatic interest can there be in the circumstance that, during the absence of a merchant upon a business journey, his wife becomes faithless to him with another merchant, and then, stung by remorse, flings herself into the Volga? The book is founded upon the romance called The Kingdom of Darkness, by the popular folk's author, Ostrowski, and over it S. Kaschperow poured fourth his Italian music. The composer is a little Verdi bidden beyond Moscow who has mixed up Italian motives with Italian forms, and Italian treatment of the voice. This typical specimen of mediocrity is not superior to Werstowski's efforts, and has vanished from the repertory.

A very different kind of personage is M. Alexander Seroff, the ruler for the moment, of Russian opera. Seroff composed Rusalca, and did not merely turn national Rossian motives to account. Possessing a profoundly synthetical intelligence, he penetrated more deeply into things. He composed in the spirit of Sclavonic music, which is based upon a scale (upon another musical alphabet) differing materially from that of the music of Western Europe. Sclavonic music is based, to state the fact concisely (as is appropriate in these columns), upon the ecclesiastical modes, or Gregorian Tonalities. Upon the peculiarities of these do the characteristic features of national Russian melody depend as much as a man's growth upon his backbone. These ecclesiastical modes are the spina dorsalis of the grand subject selected for Seroff's opera, Rogneda, which embraces no less than the introduction of Christianity into Russia, in the 10th century, by the Prince of Kiew, the Prince Sun (as he is called), subsequently the holy apostle-like Grand Prince Wladimir (the Christian name of the Sun of Kiew). The Pagan Prince is led to adopt Christianity, by the self-sacrifice of a Christian for him, because the Christian sees nothing to affright him in death. We perceive, at once, how organically the old Gregorian tonalities take their place in such a subject. It is from national elements, which, transplanted through the Greek Church into Russia, passed into the very soul of Russian feeling and Russian thought—it was from this deep stratum of musical ideas, a stratum not merely lying upon the surface of Russian middle-class society, that Seroff drew his Rogneda, which has become a stock-piece, and always commands a full house wherever it is played. Whether Seroff's genially musical, and philosophical speculations have succeeded in creating, in a synthetic manner, an opera, whether the attainment of the ideal does not always recede as the artist approaches it, inasmuch as realism (the fusion of words with music) is prejudicial to idealism, or inspiration—this is a question that cannot be discussed here, and for the answer to which we must await with growing interest Seroff's third opera; or, as he himself styles it, his third musical drama, treating a drama of the people, which is to be produced next winter.

In his public lectures, just concluded: On the historical development of the Ideal in Opera as a Musical Drama, M. Seroff called all operas with dialogue—"Singspiele." † and Der Freischütz a modest Singspiel—Der Freischütz, in which a nation and not merely a libretto is set to music! Euryanthe he calls a grand lyrical opera; Oberon, a step backwards, and, also, a "Singspiel," because (sic) no drama!

We think that with such a step backwards as Oberon, opera made a great step forwards over the whole world, and another step backwards of the same description would be exceedingly desirable, though it will not be made, probably in a hurry in Russia!

We place the Ideal of Opera in our own way over the heart through the feelings, which does not exclude our way over the understanding, as Mozart and Weber teach us. We find that we are better on leaving an opera by Weber; but that, after hearing a musical drama by Wagner, we go away in a more egotistical and material (realistic) mood than when we entered. We find that the path from Weber's Agathe leads us to the sanctity of the domestic hearth, but that from a Wagnerian drama into the Orpheum.

Mozart and Weber created types, melodically painted in melody, like Don Juan, Donna Anna, the Commander, Zerline, Leporello—Max, Agathe, Aennchen, and Caspar.

It is not by the musical idea, the incorporation of which constitutes melodic invention, that, in musical drama, the dramatic sensations are to be excited in the hearer; these sensations are to be henceforth impressed upon the ear by the material (real) means of sonority, of the power of sound, without clothing the idea in the conditions of musical speech, of melody indispensable to it.

A production as important as gratifying is the opera, The Demon, by Boris Scheel, a work corresponding to the object of opera, namely: to work upon the heart and feelings (without excluding the understanding); a work which sprang from inspiration—and not from any system.

The composer displays complete mastery over all mechanical resources in the management of the voices, in the polyphony, and in the judicious employment of the orchestra. Such a style of melody as this penetrates to the heart, because it comes from the heart, and not from a system. To give the reader a notion of the work, without drawing any comparison, we say: "The style of melody operates here like Weber's, it lives and moves like Weber's; the facture, on the contrary, the breadth of style, and the tonal impression, are like Meyerbeer's. The progressions arise naturally; the composer is very economical with his modulations, which he employs as a necessity, while other composers at the present day force us to receive them as the meal itself."

The romantic, and, we might almost say, sky-blue tone-colours, B major, and E flat major, which have an affinity with the subject, the composer places in the foreground, and represents his personages by thematic modulations of their musical individuality. There is inspiration at work here. The whole is one piece; the whole is one fancy, in which the details aid the entirety. With respect to what is done, and necessarily so at the present day, by technical skill, reflection, and brooding intelligence—there is no leaden hand clapped upon our shoulders with the words: "See how clever, how learned I am!" This is merged in the impression produced upon our feelings: it works as a whole towards the creation of a poetic picture before our inward eye.

The subject, borrowed from Lermontoff's poem, The Demon, already mentioned, has been arranged as a libretto by the skilful hand of Count Solobuh, the well-known Russian author. The composer has had the libretto put into German verse, and thinks of presenting his work in this garb to the Berlin public.

We compared Glinka to Pushkin, and Seroff to Gogel; but Scheel, as a composer, and Lermontoff, as a poet, appear to us to represent pure poetical inspiration, charming import, and elegant mastery over form. The subject runs (summa sequar vestigia) as follows. Scene: The Caucasus. Nature in her Asiatic splendour. Two betrothed lovers, of princely Caucasian blood, a Prince and a Princess. The Demon, from love for the Prin ess Tamara, swears to destroy the Prince, and conquer the Princess. The Prince is suddenly attacked by a band of mountaineers, with the Demon at their head.

The Prince mortally wounded, promises the Princess, when he is dying, to appear to her at all important conjunctures of her life. Tamara enters a cloister. The Demon, who has long borne in his heart the barb of despising love and contemning, overwhelms her appearance before her. He is the wicked spirit who has tormented her, and avows such to be the case. He informs her that, by returning his love, she can change the evil spirit into a good one. The Princess's womanly heart cannot resist quite without a struggle, the temptation of causing good to triumph over Evil. She revolves the matter in her mind, for the Demon is handsome, and she now loves no one. At the moment she is about to succumb, her dead lover appears before her. Tamara dies from the shock, and her death drives the Demon from the field.—In addition to the three principal factors: the Prince (tenor); the Princess (soprano); and the Demon (bass), the Princess's Father and her Confidante play each a musical part; while a very important one, perhaps the most important, is assumed by the choruses of Angels and Demons, opposed to one another in the plot. The Demon, too, from the very beginning, takes an invisible share in the actions of the other personages.

The story is founded upon a very old Caucasian legend of the dualism between Heaven and Hell, which it dramatically effective. Tamara and the Demon are contrasted with each other like Ormus and Ahriman in the neighbouring land of Persia, whence the legend, no doubt, formerly found its way into the Caucasus.

The score has a West European character as regards our ideas of Opera, without the slightest Sclavonic pretensions, without any nationality save the universal human nationality of the feelings. The work, as a work, dramatically conceived and dramatically represented, is free from Italian whims; it makes no concessions to the virtuosity of the executants; it is offered them as a work of inspiration, before which the means of execution must give way. Among the most prominent features may be mentioned the introduction in G, with a most charming episode in D, between the choruses representing the principle of Good and that of Evil; the Trio in the descending scale between

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

† "Singspiel" means a piece generally of no great importance, interspersed with songs.

Digitized by Google

Tamara, the Prince, and the Demon, who, though not seen, is not unfelt by them; the well-conceived storm, during which the Prince perishes; the apparition of the Demon in the convent, and his duel with Tamara, which, in a naturally dramatic situation, calls forth his declaration of love and the vacillating emotions of her soul; and the double chorus which concludes the work. A pleasing piece of composition is the ideal ballet-music in the house of the Princess's Father, accompanying the action of the ballet, whilst the characters are expecting the Prince, whom death has meanwhile overtaken; highly original, and based upon chords of the second, is the march-like, demonical motive preceding the apparition of the Evil One, when he tempts Tamara, and lays the treasures of the world at her feet, with the brilliant background of his redemption through her love and through her fall.

The composer, who is of Courlandish descent, is a Russian with a German name, born and bred in Russia. His education, in German books, under great German masters, was German.

W. VON LENZ.

WAIFS.

One artist mortally wounded another in the Turin Theatre Alfieri, during a rehearsal of La Favorita. The cause was jealousy.

M. Martinet, of the Athenée, has been definitively accepted as the new director of the Théâtre Lyrique.

It is proposed to revive Auber's Philtre at the Grand Opéra, with Mdme. Carvalho as Térésina.

Miss Minnie Hauck has been re-engaged at the Vienna opera, and will resume her performances in September next.

M. Bagier's troupe have closed their Baden representations with a performance of Il Trovatore.

A new opera, called The Three Musketeers, but having nothing to do with M. Alexandre Dumas, has been brought out at Milan.

Two young lady violinists have arrived in London, Mdlle. Marie Tayau and Mdlle. Liebé.

On Monday, June 20th, a new piece, Our Island Home, will be produced at the Gallery of Illustration; the libretto is by Mr. W. S. Gilbert, music by Mr. German Reed.

Herr Oberthür, the accomplished harpist, has returned to London after fulfilling engagements at the Philharmonic and other concerts in Dublin.

The marriage of Signor Polonini with Mdlle. Lelia Ricci is contradicted by Le Ménestrel, though it appears that the lady has formed a connection with a base whose fine is comic.

M. Vogt, the celebrated French hautboist, has just died, aged ninety years. He was a Conservatoire student in the year VI. of the Republic.

According to the Paris Journal, four financiers have agreed to supply M. Carvalho with a new theatre, wherein he may try to stem the tide of ill-luck which has so long set against him.

M. Vachot, director of the Brussels Théâtre de la Monnaie, has given up his intention to produce Lohengrin at the Paris Italiens. Tant mieux pour M. Vachot.

M. Offenbach has been seriously ill of late; but is now sufficiently recovered to make arrangements for six weeks' rest and relaxation, at Ems and Wiesbaden.

Madame Nadine Dunord, the Russian vocalist, who has lately arrived from Italy, made a favourable début at the Crystal Palace Concert, on Saturday. She sang "Robert toi que j'aime" with such power and feeling as to elicit well merited applause. Madame Dunord also joined M. Urio and chorus in the "Miserere," from Il Trovatore.

ROYAL GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.—Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment, Ages Ago and Happy my Neighbour, is advertised for the last performance on Saturday, June 18, when the former piece will have reached its 202nd representation. On the following Monday a novelty, from the pen of Mr. W. S. Gilbert, entitled Our Island Home, will be produced. Mr. German Reed has composed the music. The plot, we hear, is of novel construction, enabling every member of the company to appear in propriâ personâ.

DRAMATIC PERFORMANCE AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL.—The performance of Lord Lytton's drama of The Rightful Heir, in which Mrs. HERMANN VEZIN, Sir Charles Young, and several distinguished amateurs were to have taken parts, on the 16th instant, has been postponed until Wednesday, July 13th, in consequence of serious illness in the families of two of the principal performers. The proceeds will be contributed to to "The Working Mens' Club and Institute Union."

We read as follows in the Dublin Express:—

"It will be a source of gratification to Dr. Stewart's friends and admirers to learn that a high compliment has just been paid him from the other side of the Channel. Dr. Stewart's Ode on Shakspere has been selected for performance at the Birmingham Festival. This speaks well for the merits of Dr. Stewart's cantata. Indeed few could compete with Dr. Stewart in some departments of his noble art, as his numerous prizes in composition testify. His cantata will now take its place at Birmingham beside the works of some of the most elevated composers of the world. Such a fact, of course, enhances the distinction shown towards this gifted Irishman, and is in Professor Stewart's case a graceful recognition of real genius."

Party feeling runs high in our English Convocation, but in the Scotch Synods there is a general tendency to repress demonstrations. On some occasions, however, it is impossible to curb the spirit, and an amusing instance of the length to which the feeling against the use of "human" hymns is carried in the Free Church was given a few nights ago, when a member of the Assembly made a speech against the introduction of an authorized hymnal. Waxing mightier in his wrath, he was at last heard to mutter, "And Judas went and hanged himself"—a remark naturally felt to be a reflection on the probable end of all those who use "human" hymns. Taking this view of the question, a Mr. Kidston approached the speaker, and tapped him on the shoulder, to caution him to restrain his feelings; but this added fuel to the fire, and Mr. Walters turned round on the intruder, amid the laughter of the Assembly, with the forcible piece of advice—"Go thou and do likewise."

We have more than once adverted to the cruelty of certain public amusements, and from week to week our views are confirmed by accidental mishaps. A few days ago an acrobat was killed while having a stone slab broken with a sledge on his chest. In London we had some pretty and perilous spectacles for the recreation of our holiday-folk and visitors in Derby week. Little children played prominent parts. In one establishment a lady clothed as a street tumbler tossed a couple of infants in the air with a confiding belief in her skill in catching them. She balanced on her head a male gymnast, who had also a turn at the young clowns, making them trundle over the stage in imitation of hoops, and perform a series of monkey tricks which were loudly applauded. Perhaps the most disagreeable sight, however, was that of a female comic performer of about eight years of age. Cruelty to animals is being put down; something has been done for sweeps; why not an effort for the reclamation from torture of baby singers, dancers, and "phenomena" generally? There are no people so attached to children as the English. We make our artists paint nursery pets, and yet we promote the exhibition of boys and girls in degrading and dangerous performances. The worst of it is that these performances are increased in difficulty and hazard through competition, and the taste for them becomes stronger and stronger.

There will be a musical festival in Rostock in July. Both Mdme. Joachim and her husband will take part in it.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

G. W. MARTIN.—"Lothair," song, composed by G. W. Martin.
DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.—"Oh! whisper but the gratis word," song, by James Greenhill.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING,
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.
And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,
HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

ASTRINGENT LOZENGES OF THE RED GUM OF AUSTRALIA.—For Relaxed Throat, in Bottles, 2s.
MURIATE OF AMMONIA LOZENGES, in Bottles, 2s. Useful for Bronchitis, by loosening the phlegm and preventing violent fits of coughing.
F. & P. W. SQUIRE, Chemists on the Establishment in Ordinary to the Queen (Gazetted August 8th, 1837—December 31st, 1867), 277, Oxford Street, London.

Digitized by Google

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s. d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3 0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3 0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)		3 0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3 0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	3 0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad) ... ... And the Answer to it.	FLORENCE PEACT ...	3 0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

Now Published,
"SUNSHINE,"
MARSHALL HALL BELL'S NEW SONG.
"SUNSHINE" was rapturously encored when sung at the composer's concert by Miss Robertine Henderson, and is published, price 3s., by
DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,
"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"
Composed by E. REYLOFF.
INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.
Price 3s.
London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,
TARANTELLE,
POUR LE PIANOFORTE.
Par PAUL SEMLER.
Pris 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND AND MASTER, E. BUCK, ESQ., MUS. DOC
"FAREWELL,"
SONG.
Sung by Mrs. H. EGERTON MUNBY, the Words by LOAN BROOK.
The Music by GEORGE GAFF.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.
Where may be obtained, Composed by GEORGE GAFF,
"MAIDEN, WRAP THY MANTLE ROUND THEE."
POETRY BY KIRKE WHITE.

Just Published
"A SUMMER SONG,"
NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By HENRY WALTON.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."
SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to
MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,
By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.
London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Just Published, price 3s., Illustrated,
HISTORY OF THE PIANOFORTE, by EDGAR BUCKINGHAM. "A serviceable and pleasant History of the Pianoforte, with an account of ancient music and musical instruments . . . It traces especially the use and development of stringed instruments from the times of old Egypt and Assyria to our own, and is furnished with well executed and judicious illustrations."—Daily Telegraph. "The subject is well handled in a popular form."—The Graphic. "The chapters on tuning and repairs are likely to be of great use to our country cousins."—Punch. CASSELL, PETTER, & GALPIN, London & New York.

Just Published,
SYDNEY SMITH'S
METHOD
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to call all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—*Examiner, April*30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:
ASHDOWN & PARRY,
HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

MESSRS. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

VOCAL.—No. 3.

		Poetry by	s.	p.
ADDISON (J.)	"Spirits of the Sea"	E. J. Wright	3	0
AGULLAR(E.)	"O Lovely Vision" Romance from the opera of The Bridal Wreath	W. H. S. Alexander	3	0
Ditto	"Oh! where is the life" The Gardener's song from	W. H. S. Alexander	3	0
ALLEN (G.B.)	"Ophelia," composed expressly for and sung by Mdlle. Liebhart	R. Clothier	3	0
Ditto	"The Bride of a Day"	W. Guernsey	4	0
ALLISON (M.C.)	"Philomela" Chanson	J. B. Rousseau	4	0
ANDREWS (Mrs. J.)	"Mary, beneath of thee," Chatelain's lament on the departure of Mary Queen of Scots from France	C. Whyte Melville	3	6
ARDITI (Luigi)	"A kiss for your thoughts"	W. C. Bennett	4	0
ARMSTRONG (C.)	"Think of me"	C. Armstrong	3	0
ASCHER (J.)	"A Minstrel's song," O deir di fiamma bella	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"Mélanie," Romanza, Cantata dal Signor Gardoni	Maggioni	3	0
AVANT (T.)	"Mabel's reason why," song by Miss Edmonds	Miss Saunders	3	0
Ditto	"My bonnie Soldier lad"		3	0
BALFE (M. W.)	"She stood in the sunshine" (in A & F)	Jessie Rankin	3	0
BANISTER (H. C.)	"Two winter songs." No. 1, "Winter and wealth." (Elliot Stock.) No. 2, "A widow bird." (Sheiley) each		3	0
Ditto	"The wind goes by," sacred song for baritone or contralto		3	0
BARTHOLOMEW	"God previleth for the morrow," sacred song	Bish-op Heber	3	0
Ditto	"Flow murmuring stream"	C. Neale	3	0
BELLINI	"Soft roams the balmy wind"	W. Guernsey	3	0
BELL (Marshall H.)	"Sunshine"	Miss E. Gomes	3	0
BENEDICT (Julius)	"Un Anno su ra Ginasa," operetta in one act. No. 1. Duetto (soprano and mezzo) "Vieni o mare"		3	0
	2. Cavatina (mezzo) "O che rabbia"		3	0
	3. Aria (baritono) "Al campo della gloria"		3	0
	4. Duetto (soprano and baritono) "Ciel che mi vegglo"		4	0
	5. Duetto (soprano and mezzo) "Infelice, Fiorino"		3	0
	6. Romanza (mezzo) "Fatorello pien d'amore"		3	0
	7. Aria (soprano) "Che più dirvi, io non posso"		4	0
Ditto	"Little Willie" (Sung by Miss Edith Wynne.)	Louis Diehl	3	0
Ditto	"Sighing for thee"	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"A spring thought"	Lady John Manners	3	0
Ditto	"They speak of him lightly." The Knight of Snowdon	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"Mine, thou art mine"	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"Why art then saddened" (answer to "Rock me to sleep.")	W. Guernsey	4	0
Ditto	"When my thirsty soul I sing" (sung by Mr. Sanlley)		4	0
Ditto	"A Volunteer's greeting"	H. B. Farnie	3	0
Ditto	Choral parts to the above	each	0	6
Ditto	"The parting" (La partenza)	W. Guernsey	3	0
BAKER (Henry)	"As I lay a thinking." From the Ingoldsby Legends		3	0
Ditto	"There sits a bird on yonder gate" (violoncello obbligato)		4	0
Ditto	"Think on me" (Go where the water, gliddeth.)	As Old Time	3	0
BERGER (Emilo)	"A message from the deep"	R. Buchanan	4	0
BERGSON (M.J.)	"Il Sonno" (Le Retour). Rondo Valse		4	0
BEUTHEN (F. G.)	"The orphan's tear" (song by Mr. Alfred Henning)	Charles Long	3	0
BLANGINI (F.)	"Through valley, o'er mountains" (Per valli per boschi.) Notturno for soprano and mezzo-soprano	W. Guernsey	4	0
BOIELDIEU (A.)	"Gentle moon now beaming" (Au clair de la lune) Duet for soprano and tenor		4	0
Ditto	"Village Bells," duettino for soprano and contralto	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"Where sunbeams shine" (ni larmes ni regrets.) Romance	W. Guernsey	3	0
BOUCHER (J.B.)	"Waiting"	S. G. Rowton	3	0
BROWNE (T.)	"Sweet bird, come sing" Christy Minstrel ballad. (Illustrated title)	G. Beckett	3	0
Ditto	"I'm waiting at the gate," Christy Minstrel song with chorus ad. lib. (Illustrated title)	G. Beckett	3	0
Ditto	"The hole in the garden wall," (Illustrated title)	G. Beckett	3	0
BROOKFIELD(A.M.)	"Sun of my soul" (Evening prayer for four voices)		10	0
BULMER (Rev. E.)	"Daffodils," song	Wordsworth	3	0
BUNNETT (E.)	"The moss rose," song, words from the Germ....		3	0
CAIRD (Robert)	"Beyond the Sea"	H. B. Farnie	3	0
Ditto	"A morning's message"	W. W. Martin	3	0
CATALANI (E.)	"How softly o'er the darwing" (Mora la quad maniderne)		3	0
CARDER (Alfred)	"Songsters of Spring," canzonet	B. B. Stevens	3	0
CHRISTABEL	"One morning, oh! so early"	Moore	4	0
CLELIA	"And art thou gone," song		3	0
Ditto	"Ritorna," canzona	Conte di Torgelina	4	0
COCKBURN (F.B.)	"O, crystal tears"	W. Guernsey	3	0
COLES (C. B.)	"Songs of the birds" each No. 1. "The Canary" (Gratitude.) No. 2. "The Bullfinch" (Instruction.) No. 3. "The Robin" (Charity.) No. 4. "The Skylark" (Devotion.) No. 5. "The Nightingale" (Perseverance.) No. 6. "The Carrier Pigeon" (Instinct).		3	0

		Poetry by	s.	p.
COLOMB (Captain)	"The Garland Green," a cavalier's song, with chorus ad. lib.		3	0
Ditto	"Our own Brigade," patriotic song		3	0
Ditto	"The Wife Advertisement"		3	0
Ditto	"Perdita"		3	0
COOPER (Wilbye)	"Thine and Mine"	C. Sarn	3	0
COULDERY (C. H.)	"Hail, lovely Spring," quartet for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass	Sir William Mitchell	4	0
COYNE (Amy)	Six songs with English and German words: each No. 1. "Farewell for ever;" No. 2. "Fidelity;" No. 3. "Parted;" No. 4. "The Request;" No. 5. "Victory of Spring;" No. 6. "Evening sounds."		4	0
COSTA (M. W.)	"My heart to thee"	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"Mon âme a Dieu, mon cœur à toi"	Le Baron Lambert	3	0
CUMMINGS (W. H.)	"He is with thee though alone," sacred song.	H. Davies	3	0
Ditto	"May's Wedding"	W. C. Bennett	3	0
DELMER (E.)	"To Mary," ballad	M. W. K.	3	0
DUNNE (John)	"The moon hath risen gaily," song	T. C.	6	0
EDWARDES (E. M.)	"The Brides of Enderby"	Jean Ingelow	3	0
Ditto	"The Spaniewell"	E. M. J. Edwardes	3	0
EISOLDT (H.)	"The snapped thread," a spinning song, sung by Miss Edith Wynne	J. Lay	3	0
Ditto	"The little messenger"		3	0
ELLA	"On a day—alack the day," song	Shakspere	3	0
ELLIOTT (J. W.)	"She walks in beauty"	Byron	3	0
Ditto	"The peasant's holiday," quartet, for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass	J. W. Elliott	4	0
ESTELLE	"The wind blows cold," song	Phillip Lardner	3	0
FAREBROTHER(B.)	"Abe, love's horn doth blow" (The Song of the Fairy)	Beddoes	3	0
Ditto	"Pastoral Terzetto," soprano, mezzo, and contralto		4	0
FORBES (George)	"The Flower of Sleep," song	W. Hill	3	0
FOX (Arthur)	"It was even so"		3	0
Ditto	"Two happy dreams"		3	0
Ditto	"I was dreaming all the while"		3	0
Ditto	"My Nora"		3	0
FRIEDERICKS (W.)	"O lady, twine no wreath for me," song	Sir Walter Scott	3	0
FRICKER (Anne)	"The Bird and the Sunbeam," song	W. Frost	2	0
Ditto	"The Spirit of Spring,"	W. H. Thomson	3	0
FROST (F.W.)	"Oh! would that thou wert by me"	Miss (Horace) Smith	15	0
GABRIEL (Virginia)	"A Rainy Day," operette	Miss (Horace) Smith	15	0
	Separate Songs and Duets from the above operetta. No. 1. Duet (soprano and contralto), "Pit pat, pit pat"		3	0
	2. Ballad (contralto), "I really wish I'd seen that man"		2	0
	3. Ballad (soprano), "All among the sunbeams rove"		3	0
	4. Song (baritone), "Umbrella song"		4	0
	5. Trio (soprano, contralto, and baritone), "What joy to see the sun"		4	0
	6. Duet (soprano and bass), "Silence, madam"		4	0
	7. Trio (soprano, contralto, and bass), "Farewell pain"		4	0
GAFF (George)	"Farewell"	Lord Byron	3	0
Ditto	"Maiden, wrap thy mantle round thee," romance	H. Kirke White	3	0
GIBBONS (E. T.)	"I find out whom I love"		3	0
GOLDBERG (J. P.)	"Vieni la Barca s pronta," barcarola a due voci.	Conte Carlo Pepoli	4	0
GOLLMICK(Adolph)	"Take this forget-me-not" (in A and F)		3	0
Ditto	Six sacred four-part songs each No. 1. "There is a name I love;" No. 2. "O where shall rest be found;" No. 3. "When our heads are bowed with woe;" No. 4. "O Thou, from whom all goodness flows;" No. 5. "From Greenland's icy mountains;" No. 6. "Come, then fount of every blessing."		0	6
GRAZIA (E. N.)	"If thou dost rend within mine eyes," song		3	0
GREENHILL (J.)	"Oh! whisper but the gentle word"	Mrs. Clara Hammond	3	0
GREVILLE (A.)	"The beautiful daughters of Spain," ballad	Crawford	3	0
Ditto	"When last they met"		3	0
Ditto	"How softly now the vernal gales"		3	0
Ditto	"Oh! come to Glengarrif," Irish ballad		3	0
Ditto	"The forest one's return"		3	0
GUERNSEY (W.)	"The Naiades," valse rondo		3	0
Ditto	"Mid the rose leaves," cavatina		3	0
Ditto	"My gentle love"		3	0
Ditto	"The Spring"		3	0
Ditto	"Wake, lady, wake," serenade		3	0
Ditto	"The Hindoo widow," with illustrated title.	H. F. White	3	0
Ditto	"Ave Regina"		3	0
Ditto	"The deep sea shore," a boating song, with chorus ad lib.		3	0
Ditto	"My own dear land"		3	0
	"Memory's Garland," ballad	C. Hall	3	0
HALL (King)	"The wind and the sea loved the rose"		3	0
HAUSE (Carl)	"In mirth's bright hour," ballad	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"Slumber Song" (Sleep, baby sleep)	Hon. Augusta Bethel	3	0
Ditto	"The simple flower," song		3	0
Ditto	"Sleep, my Lelia," song	H. Kirke White	3	0
Ditto	"I weep that I am all alone"		3	0

Digitized by Google

CHAPPELL'S
Organ Journal

CONSISTING OF

FAVOURITE MOVEMENTS SELECTED FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS,

ARRANGED FOR

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY THE

MOST EMINENT ORGANISTS.

		COMPOSER.	ARRANGER.
No. 1.	SANCTUS from "Mass"	Rossini	Dr. Spark.
2.	DOMINE DEUS	Do.	Do.
3.	GRATIAS AGIMUS	Do.	Do.
4.	CRUCIFIXUS	Do.	Do.
5.	ADAGIO NON TROPPO	Mendelssohn	G. Cooper.
6.	ANDANTE from String Quartett	Mozart	Geo. R. Griffiths.

(To be continued.)

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS EACH.

THE

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO:

A SELECTION OF

Opening and Concluding Voluntaries

BY THE

MOST CELEBRATED COMPOSERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

ADAPTED CHIEFLY FOR THE USE OF AMATEURS BY

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Each Number contains from 7 to 12 favourite Voluntaries, including one arranged expressly with Pedal Obbligato.

Nos. 1 to 24 are now ready, price 3*s. each; or in four Volumes, each containing Six Numbers, and bound in Cloth, price* 12*s. each.*

A THEMATIC LIST OF CONTENTS

MAY BE HAD ON APPLICATION TO

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet.
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il Balletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaîté (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vallianee (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	..
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dich Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Torniera (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Printed by HENDERSON, HAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, June 11, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 25. SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1870. Price { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—GRAND SUMMER CONCERT and FASHIONABLE PROMENADE.—THIS DAY (SATURDAY).—Madame Ilma di Murska, Madame Volpini, Madame Sinico, Madame Monbelli, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Mongini, Signor Bettini, Verger, Ragoer, and Castelli. The Crystal Palace Choir. The Company's Saturday Orchestral Band. Conductor—Mr. Manns.

These delightful Concerts take place in the Centre Transept—the most agreeable locale imaginable for concerts in hot summer weather. The enjoyment of music is considerably enhanced by such surroundings as are offered here: groups of statuary and banks of flowers meet the eye at every turn. The ear and the eye are equally delighted, and the alertness and general comfort of the visitor at these Concerts is in comparison with the heated atmosphere and closeness experienced in theatres and concert rooms in London. The lengthened promenade is an agreeable feature in these Saturday re-unions.

Admission, 5s.; stalls, 2s. 6d., now ready, at the Palace and Exeter Hall.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

This Evening (SATURDAY), "FAUST." Mephistopheles, M. Faure; Faust, Signor Gardoni; Valentine, Mr. Santley; Siebel, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Marguerite, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. Conductor, Signor Arditi.

MONDAY, June 20, "IL TROVATORE." Manrico, Signor Mongini; Il Conte di Luna, Mr. Santley; Fernando, Signor Ragoer; Ruiz, Signor Archinti; Un Zingaro, Signor Tagliafico; Inez, Madame Corsi; Azucena, Mdlle. Curi; and Leonora, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska (her second appearance in that character in London).

TUESDAY, June 21, Rossini's Opera, "OTELLO." Otello, Signor Mongini; Rodorigo, Signor Gardoni; Iago, M. Faure (his first appearance in that character); Elmiro, Signor Foli; Emilia, Mdlle. Curi; and Desdemona, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her first appearance in that character).

THURSDAY, June 23rd, "LES HUGUENOTS." Raoul di Nesgis, Signor Mongini; Il Conte di Sti. Bris, M. Faure; Il Conte di Nevers, Mr. Santley; Marcello, Signor Foli; Huguenot Soldier, Signor Rinaldini; Tavannes, Signor Archinti; De Coss, Mr. Lyall; Du Retz, Signor Treviso; Bevs, Signor Castelli; Maurevert, Signor Zoboli; Coprifuoco, Signor Tagliafico; Dame d'Oneve, Madame Corsi; Bohemienne, Mdlle. Fiorelli; Urbano, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Margarita di Valois, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; and Valentine de Rosier, Madame Barbot (her first appearance in London).

On SATURDAY, June 25, a favourite Opera, in which Mdlle. Christine Nilsson will appear.

Acting Manager ... ... MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

MADAME RUDERSDORFF has the honour to announce that she will give a MATINÉE MUSICALE, on TUESDAY, June 21st, 1870, at Three o'Clock, at 34, Dover Street, by kind permission of Mrs. Washington Hibbert, under the immediate Patronage of their R.H. the Prince and Princess Christian, H.R.H. the Duchess of Cleveland, H.R.H. the Princess May Adelaide, His Serene Highness the Prince of Teck, the Duchess of Buccleuch, Dowager Duchess of Cleveland, Duchess of Richmond, &c., &c. Artists—Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Madame Volpini, and Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Signor Bettini, and Signor Gardoni (by kind permission of G. Wood, Esq.); Madame Patey, Miss Alice Fairman, Miss Margaret Fairman, Mrs. Sunderland; Miss Edith Wynne; Mr. Osborne-Goodall; Mr. Lefort, Mr. Arthur Byron, Mr. Patey, and Signor Rossi. Pianos—The Misses Kinloch, and Signor Randegger. Violoncello—Signor Bazzini. Conductors—Messrs. Benedict, Fiori, and A. Randegger. Tickets, 15s. each; to be had of Madame Rudersdorff, at her Residence, 34, Dover Street, Piccadilly; 1, Hanover Road, St. John's Wood; and at Mr. Mitchell's Royal Library, 33, Old Bond Street.

MR. ALFRED BAYLIS'S MATINEE MUSICALE, on the 23rd, at his Residence, under Distinguished Patronage. Miss K. Poyntz and Mdlle. Colnaghi; MM. Lewis Thomas, H. Thomas, Paque, and Benedict. Mr Baylis will sing, "The Death of General Wolfe," and "Sir Ralph Abercrombie" (Braham). Tickets, 10s. 6d., to be had at 18, Lower Seymour Street, Portman Square.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S FOURTH and LAST GRAND CONCERT this Season, MONDAY Evening, June 20th, at St. James's Hall, commencing at Half-past Two. Soloists—Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Madame Sinico, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Gardoni, Signor Foli, Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, and Mr. Sims Reeves, who will make his only appearance in Sacred Music during the London Season. Conductor—Mr. Henry Leslie. Reserved Sofa Stalls, £1 1s.; Area Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Balcony Stalls (front row), 10s.; Balcony Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Area, 5s.; Balcony, 5s.; Upper Balcony, 2s. 6d. Tickets may be obtained of Cramer & Co., 201, Regent Street, and 43, Moorgate Street, City; Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; Chappell & Co., 50, New Bond Street; Mr. Mitchell, 33, Old Bond Street; Olivier, 19, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co., 48, Cheapside; A. Hays, 4, Royal Exchange Buildings; and Austin's Office, St. James's Hall, 28, Piccadilly.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. Conductor — Mr. W. G. Cusins. LAST CONCERT but ONE, MONDAY Evening, June 20th, St. James's Hall, Eight o'clock. Stalls, 10s. 6d. and 7s.; Tickets, 5s. and 2s. 6d.—Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; Chappell's; Mitchell's; R. Olivier's; Keith, Prowse's; A. Hays; and Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

THE CHEVALIER ANTOINE DE KONTSKI, Pianist, has the honour to announce his GRAND CONCERT, at St. James's Hall, on FRIDAY Evening, June 24th. Vocalists—Mdlle. Lichtnert and Madame Patey (Pupils of Benedict); Madame Nailini Dewert, Madame Doni, Mdlle. Lani, and Madame Cruelle-Fyne; Herr Reichardt and Mr. Trelawny Cobham; Signor Monteilli and Signor Chiabrin; Mons. Waldeck, Herr Daak, and Mons. Jules Lefort. Instrumentalists: Violin—M. Sainton; Violoncello—M. Alberti; Pianoforte—Signor Tito Mattei and Chevalier de Kontski. A Selection of Part Songs will be sung by a German Choral Society. Conductors—Mr. Benedict, Herr Ganz, Signor Catalani, and Herr Lehmeyer. Fauteuils, £1 1s.; Stalls (No. 8a), 10s. 6d.; Area and Balcony, 5s.; Tickets, 3s. Tickets of Austin, St. James's Hall; Mr. Mowey & Co., Holles Street; and the Chevalier de Kontski, 56, Queen Anne Street, W.

MR. OBERTHÜR'S MATINÉE.

UNDER the Immediate Patronage of HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF WELLINGTON. MR. OBERTHÜR'S MATINEE MUSICALE, on WEDNESDAY, June 29th, at his Residence, 74, Talbot Road, Westbourne Park. Artists—Mdlle. Orgeni, Miss E. Armstrong, Miss. Osborne Williams, M. J. Lefort, Chevalier A. de Kontski, Herr L. Straus, M. Albert, Mr. Hallett Sheppard, Herr Lehmeyer, Mr. Oberthür. Tickets, 10s. 6d., to be had at Lonsdale's, Schott's, or of Mr. Oberthür.

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT, JUNE 22, at the St. James's Hall, under the immediate patronage of the Royal Family. Artists already engaged—Mesdames Christine Nilsson, Volpini, Lucombe, Mitchell, Lewitzky, Reboux, Carola, Orgeni, Duval, Rudersdorff, Liebhart, Edith Wynne, Ilma di Murska, and Patey; Mdlle. Marie Krebs; Mr. Cummings, Osborne Williams, and Madame Trebelli-Bettini.—Doors open at 12.30; to commence at 1.30 precisely, and terminate at 6 o'clock.

JUNE 22ND.—MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT.—MM. Mongini, Gardoni, Bettini, Reichardt, George Perren, W. H. Cummings, Faure, Foli, Verger, Bossi, G. Garcia, Jules Lefort, Waldeck, Patey, and Santley.—Tickets at the principal Libraries and Musicsellers; and at Mr. Austin's Ticket Office.

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT, WEDNESDAY Next, June 22nd.—Instrumentalists—Madame Arabella Goddard, MM. Lindsay Sloper, Benedict, F. H. Cowen, Sig. Randegger, Pezzi, Herr Aug. Wolff, Mdlle. Castellan; Sig. Piatti and M. Paque; Mr. John Thomas and Mdlle. Volckmann. Conductors—MM. Costa, Benedict, Sullivan, Emile Berger, W. Carter, and Randegger. Tickets of Mr. Benedict, 2, Manchester Square, W.

MONDAY NEXT.—MR. GANZ'S ANNUAL GRAND MORNING CONCERT, at St. James's Hall. Doors open at One; commence at Two o'Clock. Artists—Mesdames Adelina Patti, Madigan, Scalchi, Monbelli, Trebelli-Bettini, Liebhart, Enequist, Carola, Leon Duval, Orgeni, Edith Wynne, Patey; MM. Reichardt, G. Perren, Rosiaud, Bagshaw, Bettini, Foli, Lefort, Patey, De Kontski, Paque, Bertgrand, Randegger, Lehmeyer. Mattei, Ganz. Sofa Stalls, 21s.; Balcony Stalls and Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Area and Orchestra, 5s.; Admission, 2s. Tickets at the principal Musicsellers; and at Austin's Ticket Office; and of Mr. Ganz, 15, Queen Anne Street, W.

MR. IGNACE GIBSONE begs to announce that his THIRD RECITAL will take place at St. George's Hall, on WEDNESDAY, June 22nd, to commence at Three o'clock. Vocalists—Miss Katherine Poyntz, Miss Pontroost, and Miss Poole. Conductor—Signor Tito Mattei. Mr. Gibsone will play Book 3 of his Meditations for Piano. Tickets of Mesars. Ashdown & Parry, 18, Hanover Square; Hutchings & Romer, 9, Conduit Street; and the Hall.

MDME. MONTSERRAT has the honour to announce that her ANNUAL EVENING CONCERT, under the patronage of Lady Marian Alford, and Lady Elizabeth Cust, will take place at St. George's Hall, July 5th. Full particulars and names of Artists will be duly announced.—10, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W.

MDLLE. DRASDIL was encored in singing (First Time) "HE IS UPON THE LONELY DEEP" (new song by the composer of "The Weaver"), at St. James's Hall, 23rd inst., and will repeat it on the following dates:—June 20th, 22nd, 23rd, 27th; July 7th.

MISS BANKS will sing "AH! MY HEART IS WEARY" (new song by the composer of "The Weaver"), at Miss Walton's Concert, Hanover Square Rooms, June 21th.

Digitized by Google

MR. JULES LEFORT will sing OBERTHUR'S admired song, "JE VOUDRAIS ETRE" (accompanied on the Harp by the composer), at Mr. Oberthür's Matinée Musicale, June 20th.

MDME. MONTSERRAT (Contralto) is open to Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, etc For Terms, and Lessons, Address, 16, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD will sing at the Concert of Le Chevalier Antoine de Kontski, St. James's Hall, June 24th, the grand air, DU SOMMEIL, from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," and a new song by Le Chevalier de Kontski, accompanied by the Composer.

MISS MARGARET GALLOWAY (Soprano) will sing in London on the 16th, 21st, 27th, and 30th June; and in Sudbury (Suffolk), at the Agricultural Festival, July 8th. Address, care of Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT'S Fantaisie-Overture, "PARADISE AND THE PERI," for a Pianoforte Duet. To be performed at the Philharmonic Concert on Monday Next. Just published, price 5s., LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street, W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. EMANUEL'S new song, "THE CHARM," Hanover Square Rooms, 24th; City, 30th; Hanover Square Rooms, July 7th; and at his other principal Engagements. Address' for Concerts, Oratorios, &c., 29, Old Bond Street.

MISS POYNTZ, MR. G. PERREN, and MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing RAVENSCROFT'S popular trio, "I NAVIGANTI," at Mr. F. Arden's Concert, Hanover Square Rooms, 24th.

MISS POYNTZ, MR. CUMMINGS, and MR. HARLEY VINNING, will sing RAVENSCROFT'S popular trio, "I NAVIGANTI," at Miss Poyntz's Concert, Hanover Square Rooms, July 7th.

COMMUNICATIONS for MISS FENNELL respecting Concerts and other Musical Engagements may be addressed for her to Messrs. Chappell, 50, New Bond Street, or to Miss Fennell's Residence, 92, Lower Baggot Street, Dublin. Miss Fennell hopes to be in London on the 20th of June, and will remain for one month.

MISS BANKS will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP," and WELLINGTON GURNEY'S romance, "A SUMMER EVE," at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Miss Elizabeth Walton's Grand Concert, June 27th.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP," at the Beethoven Rooms, June 18th (THIS DAY), at Miss E. Walton's Matinée.

MR. ALFRED BAYLIS will sing ASCHER'S popular romance, "ALICE, WHERE ART THOU?" BENEDICT'S "NULLA DA TEL ANGELO," and the tenor part of RAVENSCROFT'S trio, "I NAVIGANTI," at the Beethoven Rooms, June 18th (THIS DAY).

CONCERTS, Bazaars, Hebrew Weddings, Readings, Meetings, and Balls.—The QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square. Early application is invited for securing available days. Apply to Mr. Hall.
ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC Scholarships and musical advantages. Students' Concert, Hanover Square, June 26th.—Norfolk Road, Bayswater. F. WESER, Sec.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL, REGENT STREET. The Hall and Theatre are to let for Concerts, Operatic and Dramatic Entertainments, Public Meetings, and Lectures. The Hall can be hired by the night or for a term.
N.B. All the Afternoons are free up to July. For terms, apply to Mr. Wilkinson, Manager. Office, 4, Langham Place, Regent Street.

SIGNOR GUSTAVE GARCIA begs to announce his arrival in Town for the Season. Address, 9, Mortimer Road, Greville Road, St. John's Wood.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for Instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 30, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

Now Ready,

SACRED CANTATA, "BLOW YE THE TRUMPET IN ZION," by C. WARWICK JORDAN, Mus. Bac., Oxon. Price, handsomely bound, 6s.; in paper covers, 3s. Suitable for Choral Societies. Advantageous terms may be made with the composer for large quantities, and the Band parts obtained. NOVELLO & Co., London.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

SITUATION WANTED.

MUSIC TRADE.—A Young Lady desires a SITUATION in a Music Shop. Fully understands Sheet Music, Letting and Selling Pianos, &c. Five years' experience. "Viola," Messrs Slatter & Rose, High Street, Oxford.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG,

DEDICATED TO MDLLE. NILSSON.

"I LOVE AND I AM LOV'D"

("J'aime, je suis aimé").

Sung with distinguished success in Paris and London. Sent for 24 stamps.

DUFF & STEWART, 147, Oxford Street.

Where may be had A. REICHARDT'S celebrated song,

"LOVE'S REQUEST,"

In C, E Flat, and F.

Also Arranged for the Pianoforte by

BRINLEY RICHARDS AND W. KUHE.

NEW SONG BY CIRO PINSUTI.

"I HEARD A VOICE."

The Words by LOUISA GRAY.

Mr. Cummings will sing this song at Concerts, June 17th, 18th, 23rd, 27th.

LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Published This Day,

"OLGA,"

PENSÉE POUR PIANO.

PAR

LOUIS DIEHL.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THE WILD ROSEBUD,"

SONG.

Sung by Miss EDITH WYNNE. The Words by GOETHE.

The Music by JOSEPHINE WILLIAMS, B.A.M.

Price 3s.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Digitized by Google

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Amateurs of opera owe a good deal to the managerial habit of announcing beforehand exactly what novelties are selected for production. A proof of this has just been supplied by Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, who, if they had played the childish game of "Open your mouth and shut your eyes, and take what Heaven may send you," would have excited great expectations, and entailed proportionate disappointment. Knowing that some, but not what, novelty was forthcoming, the public might naturally have reasoned after this fashion: "Any work chosen by the managers of one of the chief lyric theatres in the world as an addition to its répertoire is bound to have great and distinguished claims." The logic is irrefragable, and it can easily be imagined how the curious anticipator would have passed in review the array of great works never yet heard at Covent Garden, and estimated the pretensions of each—satisfied all the time that, in any case, one would be forthcoming. Not less easy is it to picture the revulsion caused by an ultimate announcement that choice had fallen upon Signor Campana's Esmeralda, a work the history of which grew only of three representations at St. Petersburgh, some months ago; while his connection with lyric drama in England is represented by Almina, an opera played also for three nights at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1860. But, happily, Signor Campana's new work was announced in the prospectus of the season, time being thus given to prepare for it, and to investigate the reasons for its choice. We think those reasons hard of discovery. The opera could scarcely have been brought out on account of Signor Campana's reputation, the interest of the story (always a secondary matter in opera) or the unchallengeable merit of the music; and we are driven to conclude that a new part for Madame Patti was the chief, if not the sole, desideratum. Even this is unsatisfactory; because, granting, as we do most readily, that an extension of Madame Patti's repertoire was desirable, it by no means follows that Esmeralda alone could supply the means. Esmeralda has supplied the means, nevertheless; and we may as well quit the field of speculation for that of fact.

Signor Campana has been fortunate in his subject, and in the skill of his literary co-worker. There is no need to discuss here the romantic interest of Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris, or its special adaptation to purposes connected with the lyric drama. Few who read the novel fail either to appreciate both, or to wonder that operatic success desirable, it by no means follows that Esmeralda alone could supply the means. Esmeralda has supplied the means, nevertheless; and we may as well quit the field of speculation for that of fact.

Signor Campana has been fortunate in his subject, and in the skill of his literary co-worker. There is no need to discuss here the romantic interest of Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris, or its special adaptation to purposes connected with the lyric drama. Few who read the novel fail either to appreciate both, or to wonder that operatic success could be achieved by the story in the hands of composers who are not great. So far, fortune has been on the side of Signor Campana, who, in securing the assistance of Signor Cimino as librettist, obtained another advantage of special importance. To dramatise a novel is not a task of ordinary difficulty; but to adapt a complicated story for operatic purposes can hardly be done with other than a remote prospect of success. Signor Cimino may fairly be congratulated upon his treatment of Notre Dame de Paris, a work which will render the task of possible respect is due to the original. True, he has suppressed Quasimodo; but who would care to have such a character prominent in opera? True, also, he has magnified Estella into another revenge-ful Ameena; but who will complain, seeing that a contrast, and not dramatic interest has thus been provided? Once admit the operatic adaptation of a story, and it is impossible to overlook the exigencies involved—on which ground Signor Cimino stands acquitted of all treason, high or low, against the majesty of Victor Hugo. Notre Dame de Paris is so well known that a recital of the plot of Esmeralda may be superfluous; we, nevertheless, insert it as given by the translator of the libretto, Mr. J. P. Williams.

"Esmeralda, a young girl of singular grace and beauty, who has, when a child, been stolen from her parents and brought up by gipsies, is loved with an irrepressible passion by Claude Frollo, the Archdeacon of Notre Dame. The innocent girl is protected from the unrelenting pursuit of the guilty priest by Phœbus de Chateaupers, a handsome young captain in the Scotch Archers, a corps which—as all readers of Sir Walter Scott will remember—was then in the service of the French monarch. For the young Phœbus, Esmeralda conceives an absorbing affection, which the soldier returns with equal ardour. Claude Frollo surprises the lovers during one of their secret interviews; maddened by furious jealousy, he stabs his rival in the back, and escapes unperceived. Esmeralda, who is discovered near the dead body of her lover, is accused of having murdered him, and a variety of circumstances tending to convict her of the crime, the hapless maiden is arrested and condemned to death. Claude Frollo offers her the means of escape, on condition that she shall consent to his guilty proposals—an offer which Esmeralda rejects with scorn. After a brief interview with her mother—whom she has only just discovered, and for whom she has so long and so ardently sought—the unhappy girl is dragged to the scaffold and executed, while Claude Frollo, tortured by grief and remorse, commits suicide, and expires at the foot of the scaffold."

How much a composer of genius might do with this story, we need not say; and there is, consequently, all the more cause for regret that it fell into the hands of Signor Campana, who scarcely rises even once to the height of its argument. As a matter of fact, the libretto was too good for the composer; because, at the lowest estimate, it might have challenged the genius of Signor Verdi, with whom Signor Campana has little in common, save nationality. This being the case, we shall not go through the opera number by number, wasting time and space upon the minute criticism warranted only when works of merit are considered. There are, however, some salient features it may be necessary to point out, pour encourager les autres—those, we mean, who are striving to attain Signor Campana's end with no more than Signor Campana's means. To begin, even free-thinkers on questions of harmony may find matter for objection in nearly every page of the work. Signor Campana stands not upon the order of his modulations, but modulates at once; with a disregard of proprieties which would be sublime if it were not something else. The smallest details of grammar, moreover, are so coolly set at defiance that we well-nigh incline to believe grammar has lost its blinding power. This might be pardoned if outweighed by original themes, masterly development, and dramatic force; but for such things we look through the opera almost in vain. In fact, we might apply to Esmeralda the familiar remark, "What is good is not new, and what is new is not good." As an example of the former, take the concerted piece immediately following the revelation of Esmeralda's nationality, wherein Signor Campana suggests La Favorita and Lucia with astonishing fidelity. As regards the latter, we may give a general direction to take the first number that involves no reminiscences, confident in the assurance of its bearing out our remark. Briefly, Esmeralda is the work of a composer whose ambition has outgrown his powers and placed him in a false position. If it be asked, Has, then, Esmeralda no merit at all? we answer that, however it may appear from a lower stand-point, regarded as a serious attempt at writing serious opera, it must be pronounced the failure we have described.

Forgive, though denying Signor Campana the ability to write a great work, determined, with her usual capriciousness, to indulge him in other ways. Rarely, for example, has any opera been brought out under such advantageous conditions as Esmeralda. With Madame Patti as the heroine, supported by Mdlle. Scalchi (Estella), Signor Naudin (Phœbus), and Signor Graziani (Claude), the opera, were it worse than it is, would be endowed for a time with life. No wonder, therefore, that applause was frequent, that the artists were often recalled, and that the audience demanded a sight of the composer. Madame Patti, by virtue of singing which for facility and brilliance challenged comparison, and of acting such as is rarely witnessed on the lyric stage, might alone have produced these results. Her Esmeralda, we fancy, will live, when Signor Campana's music is forgotten, becoming, in fact, the Esmeralda of the enduring romance, rather than of the opera. To enumerate all Madame Patti's successes would be tedious, and it must, therefore, suffice to say that whether as the gay and fantastic, the love-stricken maiden, or the victim of judicial error, she was interesting and attractive to the highest degree. Mdlle. Scalchi, as Estella, appeared laudably anxious to do justice to her part, in which task she succeeded well enough to continually remind us of a better known gipsy mother. Signor Graziani was sufficiently melodramatic as Claude, and sang throughout with as much energy as he acted. Yet higher praise belongs to Signor Naudin, who won an encore for a "soldier's song," doing all his work, moreover, in a fashion as conscientious as it was able. Signor Caravoglia took the small part of Tristan, Signor Fallar that of a priest, and both band and chorus were efficient under Signor Vianesi's direction. The mise-en-scène, for the most part familiar, was good enough for a better work.

THADDEUS EGG.

DORNBACHT.—The Society for the Promotion of Musical Art lately gave an exultant performance of Spohr's oratorio, Die letzten Dinge, and of Mendelssohn's music to Athalie.

COLOGNE.—The Association for Male Voices, "Lieder-Kranz"—which carried off the first prize at Brussels—gave, a short time since, its first concert this season, before an audience of above four thousand persons. The pieces most highly applauded were Mendelssohn's setting of the Festgesang an die Künstler, and Deutscher Schwur und deutsches Gebet, by Möhring.

MONTENEGRO.—It appears that the difference existing between Mdme. Mallinger and the management of the Stadttheater arose from a cause not entirely unknown in operatic circles.

"Hoarse, sirs, or not hoarse?"
—That was all the question."

Mdme. Mallinger says she was hoarse; so does Mdme. Mallinger's husband; and so do the medical men called in by them. The management, supported by their own medical man, affirms that she was no such thing. "A very pretty quarrel," as Sir Lucius would have observed.

Digitized by Google

Charles Dickens.

While his life's lamp seemed clearest, most intense,
A light of wit and love to great and small,
By the dark angel he is summoned hence,
To solve the mightiest mystery of all!

Hearing that he has passed beyond the veil,
Before the Judge who metes to men their dues,
Men's cheeks, through English-speaking lands, turn pale,
For as the speaking wires can bear the news—

Blanched at this sudden snapping of a life,
That seemed of all our lives to hold a share;
So were our memories with his fancies rife,
So much of his thought our thoughts seemed to bear.

Charles Dickens dead! It is as if a light
In every English home were quenched to-day;
As if a face all knew had passed from sight,
A hand all loved to press were turned to clay.

Question who will his power, its range, its height,
His wisdom, insight,—this at least we know:
All in his love's warmth and his humour's light
Rejoiced and revelled,—old, young, high or low—

Learnèd, unlearnèd—from the boy at school
To the judge on the bench, none read but owned
The large heart o'er which the large brain held rule,
The fancy by whose side clear sense sat throned.

The observation that made all its own,
The shaping faculty that breathed life's breath
In types, all felt they knew and still had known,
Life-like, except that they are safe from death.

Since Shakspere's, where the pen that so hath lent
Substance to airy nothings of the brain,
His fancies seem with men's experience blent,
Till to take each for other we are fain?

And who that ever wielded such a power
Used it so purely to such Christian end,
Used it to quicken the millennial hour,
When rich to poor shall be as friend to friend?

Who can say how much of that love's pure leaven
That leavens now the lump of this our world,
With influence as of a present Heaven,
Like light athwart chaotic darkness hurled,

May be traced up to springs by him unsealed,
To clods by him stirred round affection's roots
To hearts erst hard, but by his fires annealed
To softness whereof Love's works are the fruits?

Mourn, England, for another great one gone,
To join the great ones who have gone before—
And put a universal mourning on,
Where'er sea breaks on English-speaking shore.

His works survive him, and his works' work too—
Of love and kindness and good will to men,
Hate of the wrong, and reverence of the true,
And war on all that shuns truth's eagle-ken.

Earth's two chief nations mourners at his tomb:
Their memories for his monument: their love
For his reward!—Such is his glorious doom,
Whom mortal praise or blame no more shall move.

Punch.

Opera.—A series of Russian operatic performances will be given here during the months of July and August.

Stockholm.—Mdme. Clara Schumann has been created an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music.

Barcelona.—Mdme. Blume-Sauter has left Italy and been engaged as prima donna at the Teatro del Liceo of this town. She made her first appearance as Elisabeth in Verdi's Don Carlo.

Breslau.—A performance of Herr J. Vogl's oratorio, Die Auferweckung des Lazarus, was given a short time since, under the direction of Herr R. Thoma, in the church of St. Elisabeth, and afforded great satisfaction.

FUNERAL OF CHARLES DICKENS.

On Tuesday morning, at half-past nine, the remains of Charles Dickens were privately buried in Westminster Abbey. The body left Gadshill Place at six, and was conveyed in special train to the Charing Cross terminus. There the coffin was removed to a hearse, without feathers or trappings. Following were three plain mourning coaches, containing the members of the family and a few friends, as follows:—In the first coach were Mr. Charles Dickens, jun., Mr. Harry Dickens, Miss Dickens, Mrs. Charles Collins. In the second coach, Miss Hogarth, Mrs. Austin (Mr. Dickens's sister), Mrs. Charles Dickens, jun., Mr. John Forster. In the third coach, Mr. Frank Beard, Mr. Charles Collins, Mr Ouvry, Mr. Wilkie Collins, Mr. Edmund Dickens. None of the mourners wore bands or scarves, but were simply in plain deep black.

At a quarter past nine the cortège quitted the station, where it attracted little observation; the consent of the family to the interment in Westminster Abbey having only been obtained late on Monday, and then on condition that strict privacy was observed, and the ceremony should take place at a time when no crowd was likely. To these stipulations the Dean instantly consented; in fact, he had proffered them when making his urgent request to the family that the remains should be allowed to rest in Westminster Abbey. A grave had been prepared in the St. Mary's Chapel of Rochester Cathedral; but all will feel glad that Mr. Dickens's relatives, at the last moment, consented to gratify a national desire. The funeral procession reached Dean's Yard at half-past nine. The body was received by Dean Stanley, the canons, and other officials, and was conveyed through the western cloister door along the nave into the Chapel of St. Faith, better known as Poet's Corner. Here, after the Abbey was closed on Monday night, a grave had been dug, simply surrounded by a black cloth border to indicate the narrow opening. The grave is situated at the foot of the coffin of Handel, and at the head of the coffin of Sheridan, and between the coffins of Macready, the great tragedian, and the dramatic poet. Near to the side of Dickens, and towards his feet, lie Johnson and Garrick, while close to them reposes Campbell. The statue of Addison and the bust of Thackeray overlook the grave at its head. Shakspere's monument is not far from its foot; those of Goldsmith and the Duke of Argyll are on the left. The Dean read the Burial Service, which was over by ten, before any visitors were admitted. It was the Prayer Book Service, read, not chanted or intoned. Between prayers the organ played a soft voluntary. When the coffin, in plain oak, was lowered into the grave, and the service was over, it was strewn with wreaths and flowers by the female mourners; one large chaplet of white roses was placed at the head. The brass plate bore the simple inscription—

Charles Dickens,
Born February 7th, 1812.
Died June 9th, 1870.

During the day the grave was left open, and the news of the interment becoming known, thousands came to take a last look on the shell which holds the remains of one whose name will long be held in honour by Englishmen and all English-speaking nations.

PERSONAL OPERA.

We have heard a good deal lately about personal government, about the risk to society when its framework rests on the shoulders of one man, and about many other dangers flowing from the same source. All this has its analogy in opera, where we see what, after their fashion, are great and important enterprises, subject to the vagaries of, or the accidents that may happen to, a single prima donna. An illustrative case is immediately at hand, furnished us from Drury Lane Theatre, by means of the hoarseness which has attacked Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. Everybody knows that at the very outset of her present season in London the Swedish artist had to disappoint her admirers, and that ever since she has appeared only in fits and starts, not depended upon by the public, and not of much value to a manager. The result can hardly be hidden from those who have eyes to see; Drury Lane Theatre shows conspicuously empty benches; and not all the attraction of an admirable ensemble in which admirable artists take part, can atone for the absence of the reigning soprano. This is nothing short of humiliating; and we may well inquire into the case of such a result, that the burden of its responsibility may be laid on the right shoulders, and the secret of its removal discovered, if, haply, discovery is possible.

Digitized by Google

It is obvious, to begin with, that blame cannot attach to managers, who, by engaging favourite prime donne on absurdly high terms, do that which, though it may ruin them eventually, alone renders opera at all possible. Without in the least disparaging either and able artists, we may ask what would Covent Garden be in the absence of Mesdames Patti and Lucca more than Drury Lane has been in the absence of Mdlle. Nilsson? The most casual observer of such matters knows that an abandonment of the "star" system, would revolutionize opera altogether, and necessitate appeals (which would find but little response) to another public than that now sustaining the institution. Managers, if they must be managers, have, consequently, no choice but to bid high for favourites, and pay in hard and heavy cash for the pleasure of risking their all upon the delicate throats and yet more tender susceptibilities of foreign song birds. But if we must acquit the managers, who have nothing but Hobson's choice before them, neither can we blame the artists, who naturally improve their position to the utmost, and make prodigious quantities of hay during the possibly short time that their sun may shine. No doubt if these extremely lucky individuals—the artists we mean—were free from the shortcomings natural to humanity, they would use their power with greater regard for the interests of those who pay them so heavily. But they are not thus free; and, moreover, they possess, as a rule, all the illogical impulses which belong to the sex now trying so hard to become our masters. Hence we bear from time to time of capriciousness, thoughtlessness, or selfishness on the part of prime donne which are hard to tolerate, much more hard to forgive. Let us suppose, for example, that a favourite singer, in full view of a heavy season likely to make corresponding demands upon her powers, wastes her energies in superfluous work, begins the season in impaired health, and even then spends the strength belonging to her manager for the gratification of private and exalted circles. It is clear that this course lies within the bounds of possibility; and, therefore, we may well complain of a system that enables it to bring close upon ruin such a great art-enterprise as a first-class lyric theatre must necessarily be.

Upon the shoulders of the operatic public, and of the press at large, we fancy that responsibility in the matter of which we write must be placed. The former—those excepted who frequent the upper regions and encore all the best music, but who count least in a manager's estimate—are merely followers of a fashion they themselves, or their journalistic teachers, have made. Music stands for little, and Mozart may pour out his choicest strains in vain if the reigning favourite be absent. The illustration of this at Drury Lane on Saturday was most melancholy; crowds turned their back upon Le Nozze di Figaro supported by artists like Valpini, Lewitzky, Faure, and Santley, because one of its characters was not sustained by Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. All the more melancholy did this exhibition of bad taste appear as account of the helplessness of an immediate cure. The time will come perhaps—though we are by no means sanguine about it—when those who are the chief support of opera will regard a good ensemble as the chief operatic good; no longer looking upon everything as concentrated in the person of a single favourite artist. If this change for the better be possible the press can certainly hasten it by refusing to trumpet forth at enormous length the praises of reigning sopranos, while the just claims of other artists not so fashionable meet with scant attention. We commend this matter to those whom it most concerns, and who are quite intelligent enough to see, without exposition from us, in how a great a measure they ensure the continuance of personal specs.

THADDEUS EGG.

THE ORGAN PEDALIERA—A SUGGESTION.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Ever since the penny exhibition at the country fairs, a generation ago, of the celebrated Miss Biffin cutting devices in paper and card-board with her toes, and writing, besides, a very fluent current hand, the thought has been in my mind to suggest the possibility of a more economical pedal-board for the organ—economical with regard to expenditure of power and space; saving both time and strength, by adapting the keys to the toes instead of to the feet of the performer. I have been too much afraid of being laughed out of the project at the outset, to even mention my views. But recently what I have always regarded as a certainty has received such ample corroboration by the display of violin fantasias produced through the mediumship of the ten toes only, at one of the London music-halls, by a German musician who was born without arms, that it may be inferred that the time has arrived for giving my suggestion some sort of publicity by mentioning it in your journal.

The organ-builders might enter at my suggestion involving serious modifications of plans already thought to be perfect; but, when the numerous alterations in clavichords, from early times to now, are considered, it will be indeed stranger if some one amongst their number should not be courageous enough to brave prejudice in giving such a modification of the pedaliera as will admit of its being played with the toes, at least a trial. The saving of space would be such as to enable the whole key-board compass to be placed within the same space as the ordinary two-and-a-half octaves now in use. More than double the quantity of notes could be easily brought within reach; also two or three sets of pedal-keys, if required, could readily be made available. Then as to ease and comfort in playing, to say nothing of smoothness, grace, and beauty in delivering the music. Such a fugue as Bach's "Giant," and others of a like character, instead of being jolted and chattered out with noisy impetuosity could be presented with as much ease and fluency as the five-finger exercises are now played by the merest tyro on the pianoforte. If we look at the difficulty of the violin as compared with the pianoforte when only the hands are considered, the fact of fantasias being performed on the violin by means of the feet alone places beyond the reach of doubt the practicability of scale passages being performed upon a pedal-board made for the toes, with a very small amount of labour. Indeed I am convinced that it is only for some one to try the experiment, and he may very speedily demonstrate it for himself. I am aware that whatever is new is received at first with caution; and in this aspect of the question it would appear to rest with some of our organ-builders to essay the application of a new pedal-board to be played by the toes. I merely throw out the idea, leaving those interested to try it or not, as it may please them to entertain or reject the suggestion. The field that would thus be opened up for new effects appears to my mind almost unbounded.—Yours very truly,

Maidstone, June 1, 1870. GEORGE TOLHURST.

PROVINCIAL.

MALVERN.—We read in the Malvern News of last Saturday:—

"The musical and literary entertainment which took place at the Concert Hall on Tuesday last was a decided success, the attendance being large and satisfactory. The chorals, 'Let all men praise the Lord,' and 'Incline thine Ear,' solo, sung with great taste by Mr. J. W. Stoyle, were well received and warmly applauded. 'The Fields of Paradise' was effectively rendered by Miss Smith. The second part of the programme consisted of songs, glees, &c. 'Awake, Æolian Lyre,' was sung with much spirit, and 'The Dawn of Day,' was well rendered. Miss Davis, Messrs. Smith and Stoyle were encored in 'Oh, Stranger, lend the gentle Bark,' and other pieces were also sung in an admirable manner. Mr. J. Stoyle played Beethoven's romance in F, and Mr. J. T. Horniblow, of Tewkesbury Abbey Church, conducted the performances. The entertainment proved so far successful as to pay its expenses."

FINGEST (Henley-upon-Thames).—A correspondent writes us that:—

"An evening concert was given on Wednesday, June 8th, under the direction of Mdme. Marie d'Anfreta (towards the funds for placing a stained glass window in Fingest Church), in a 'barn,' kindly lent for the purpose by Mr. T. Hussey. The 'barn' was most tastefully decorated with paintings, flowers, moss banks, wreaths, &c., by Miss A. Swift, sister of Mdme. d'Annetta. Upwards of 400 persons obtained admission, while numbers were unable to get even standing room. The concert opened with the 'Gipsy Chorus' from Preciosa, sung with great precision by the Fingest Glee Choir, and followed by the overture to Guillaume Tell, capitally executed on the harmonium, by Mdme. d'Annetta. Mr. Greenwood sang 'M'appari' charmingly, although his splendid voice was not heard to advantage as he was suffering from hoarseness. His son, Willie, a little boy two years old, delighted every one present by his sweet clear voice, and his song, 'A Summer Evening,' just suited him. Miss E. Deane gave with great expression Wallace's 'Gentle Troubadour,' and was encored in a barcarolle with Mr. F. Greenwood, 'On the Blue Wave.' Miss Deane was recalled after 'Janet's Choice,' when she sang Glover's 'Gipsy Jane,' in capital style. Her sweet voice and unaffected manner greatly pleased the audience. Miss A. Gwit was encored in a very pretty song, 'Heartbroken' (by Marie d'Annetta), which she sang with genuine feeling. Mr. Pestell was enthusiastically encored in both his comic songs. A 'Grande Valse,' by Signor Tito Mattei, was excellently played by Mdme. d'Annetta and greatly applauded. Unfortunately, Count Beiff was not forthcoming, so Mr. Greenwood, at a moment's notice, undertook to sing the 'Little Wee Dog,' which he did extremely well, and was vociferously encored. An arrangement of operatic airs, for violin and piano, played by Mdme. d'Annetta and Miss A. Gwilt then followed, and pleased everyone. Mr. Pescud, of Henley, whose name, however, was not in the programme, volunteered a solo, in place of the trio announced. Arditi's 'Stirrup Cup' was encored, when he sang Roche's 'A thousand times good night,' both in his usual artistic manner. The National Anthem followed, and so closed one of the most successful country concerts ever given. We only hope that Mdme. d'Annetta can be prevailed upon shortly to give another. By-the-bye, I had almost omitted to mention Mrs. Hall's very artistic singing of 'The Blue Ribbon,' and Mr. Deane's gallant delivery of 'The Cambrian Plume' (Brinley Richards), an omission I should not have forgiven myself for, as they deserved and obtained the warm applause of the audience."

Digitized by Google

DUBLIN.—A correspondent writes to us as follows:—

"The Philharmonic Society have given an excellent performance of Mrs. Robinson's cantata, God is Love (which met with great success when produced last year). The principal vocalists were the Misses Herbert, Miss Fennell, Mr. R. Smith, and Mr. Peel, assisted by an excellent chorus. The obbligato violoncello accompaniments to several of the pieces were beautifully played by Herr Elsner, and the harp accompaniments by Herr Oberthür, to whom the credit of the excellent orchestration of the cantata is due, and of which the Daily Express writes:—'The masterly harp playing of Herr Charles Oberthür, that true artist and accomplished musician, constituted a great and legitimate attraction. Herr Oberthür, who had been judiciously retained for the harp obbligato of the cantata, played also a solo, accompanied by the orchestra, modestly entitled, "Concertina," abounding in melody and elegant passage writing, and moreover charmingly scored for the band. Herr Oberthür played admirably in Mrs. Robinson's cantata, and, of course, he did equally well in his interpretation of his own thoughts. The Concertina opens in G minor, modulates, among other keys, into G flat, in which there occurs a very graceful six-eight movement. The finale is in the tarantella form, with a short cantabile episode, and is wound up by a brilliant coda in G major.' The same journal writes also that—'There was one unusual item in the programme—namely, a piece for the organ alone, and more unusual still the piece was re-demanded, and the player, Dr. Stewart, obliged to return. Miss Fennell (the "star" of the Irish Academy of Music), was very successful in the contralto air "Cling to the Crucified," in Mrs. Robinson's cantata, and had to repeat Dr. Stewart's clever setting of "At the dead of night," from Dr. Walker's The Eve of St. John. Mr. Russell and Mrs. Robinson were called conductors, and Mr. Levey led the band. Their Excellencies the Earl and Countess Spencer were present, and remained until the conclusion of the concert.'"

LEEDS.—The Yorkshire Post says:—

"One of the most attractive of the Town Hall Popular Concerts took place on Saturday evening last. There were two vocalists, Miss Grace Armytage and Mr. H. C. Sanders. We sincerely hope the experiment of having the band of the 5th Dragoon Guards to play in conjunction with Dr. Spark at the organ will be repeated. The concert opened by a selection from Rossini's Stabat Mater, performed by the band and Dr. Spark. No less effective was a Shakspearian overture, arranged by Dr. Spark, introducing 'Come unto these yellow sands,' 'Where the bee sucks,' and Mendelssohn's 'Wedding March.' A pastoral fantasia of Lefebvre Wely's was the means of eliciting some marvellous organ effects. The composition was played as a solo by Dr. Spark. A grand fantasia on Faust was played with great taste; and at the close the band and organ combined performed the National Anthem and 'Rule, Britannia.' Mr. J. Sydney Jones, the regimental bandmaster, conducted in admirable style. Miss Armytage sang very sweetly and was encored in all her songs. The only song for Mr. Sanders was 'The Guard Ship,' and in this execution he acquitted himself satisfactorily."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Public authority has undertaken to purify our streets of the scandal of men dressed as women. Will the public sense of propriety purify our stage of the other scandal—women dressed as men?—Yours, —— Theatre, June 10. DECENCY.

INNSPRUCK.—Handel's Acis and Galatea, which, though so well known in unmusical England—to adopt the language of our foreign friends—is a comparative novelty here, has been lately performed to the great delight of all those Innspruckers who were fortunate enough to be present. The performance, indeed, was such a success that it will shortly be repeated.

CHURCH MUSIC IN LONDON—No. I.

ST. PAUL'S.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—It is with diffidence I approach you on a subject treated with so much unvarying apathy, both by the press and the public, as Church Music; an indifference positively culpable in those, like yourself, who undertake the responsibility of directing the public taste in matters concerning the Divine art. Your columns are, week by week, and year by year, filled with notices of performances that are but illustrations of the vanity of player and singer; but the execution of the music in our national Church, rarely receives recognition. Your critical genius is spent in compositions as ephemeral as the passing fashions of a lady's toilette, whilst our unique school of church music, that has been more or less worthily represented by English musicians for three centuries, is treated with the coldest neglect. Can music, when an adjunct to religion, be considered unworthy your consideration? Is not rather your beloved art more truly Divine when made the vehicle of prayer and praise,—the handmaid of holy Church?

The object of this letter, primarily, is to enlist your critical powers in a survey of the present condition of our ecclesiastical music, to enquire if it is adapted for its high functions, and if it fulfils its heavenly mission. I may be reproached by some for seeking aid and light from the outer musical world, when I may find a Diogenes within the Church's pale, but the rough hands of the present age tear away the garb of sanctity if it hides decay. For illness of body we send not for the priest but for the doctor; and I trust the new batch of "Mus. Doc." Oxford intends making, will be commissioned to vivify the languishing, stagnant, and lifeless choirs of our London churches. Amongst our churches stands first in order St. Paul's Cathedral. For, as the tall pale that lifts its head high above the stunted shrubs of an Eastern plain, so rises its glorious dome high above all in the surrounding wilderness of brick and stone, throwing into shadow the sprawling palaces of commerce. In towering majesty it demands from all observation and artistic homage, and invites all to enter and behold what it contributes, and be that enters may, with justice and bitter disappointment, exclaim:—

> "A pity builder made so thick a wall
> About so poor a treasure"

—for in spite of its dome of vast and harmonious proportions, a sense of coldness and crudeness pervades it—a miserable neglect made more apparent by spasmodic attempts to beautify. I once saw a lunatic whose notions of full dress consisted of a white waistcoat ornamented with brass buttons and soiled postage stamps; in truth some such idea of beauty the builder of our cathedral presents, with its patches of gilt and paint. The large organ over the south entrance is like unto the rest—it lacks a proper case, and looks like a gymnasium erected as a means to increase the organist's salary from the pockets of muscular visitors. The smaller and older organ built by Father Schmidt, that looked so noble when over the screen carved by Gibbon, is now stowed away in an arch of the choir. A few years ago a Japanese philosopher, in speaking to his countrymen of our churches, said, "they always place a huge ugly idol, without head, but with many mouths and voices, in their midst." Have our church authorities felt the justice of this criticism, and is this the cause of the organ being either crammed into a nook or buried in cellars out of sight? But I care not where the organ be placed so long as it answers its purpose of accompanying the choir; that it can better do so when it is placed between the decani and cantoris sides of the choir. The architect, however, has been of late in the ascendant, and has remorselessly sacrificed the ear to the eye. The useful but obtruding organ has been deposed; that, which is, is the sound to the worshippers, if the sight of columns and arches be uninterrupted to the gazers.

Previously to the removal of the screen the voices of the choir were much more condensed in space than now. Weak and ineffective as they were then, in point of numbers, yet the area was circumscribed to the choir proper, now that barrier is removed, and a much vaster space is supposed to come within the range of their voices, and thus the feebleness of their numbers is made more painfully apparent. Some dozen boys and ten men constitute the full choir, and this ridiculously small force is further weakened by its division into decani and cantoris sides, so that in great part of the service the voices of only six boys and five men can be heard. I need not attempt to describe the pitiable effect of such a number in a building so vast, and crowded, as it often is, by a congregation of many thousands. I would not willingly write a disparaging word concerning the vocal ability of any individual member of the choir. Some are, doubtless, good singers, and all may be considered fairly efficient—it is not the quality, but the quantity that I denounce as utterly incompetent. The efficiency of the choir is further reduced by a total absence of organization, the straggling entrance into Divine service of its members, one by one, illustrates its entire looseness and irregularity in all things. There are five vicars-choral, who form, with the organist, a corporate body, the rest are stipendiaries. The policy of the vicars-choral, after being "sworn in," usually is to proclaim entire irresponsibility, refusing subordination to the dean and the chapter, to claim the right to attend service only when they please, and to be subject to no authority how they perform their duties; in fact, for each member to be a dean and chapter unto himself. Surely I need not urge that government, necessary to the well working of any society, to the happiness of any household, should be exerted for the proper conduct of a public choir. I refrain at present from discussing the character of the music in our Cathedral Service; but I cannot withhold acknowledging the gratitude all lovers of the Divine Art must owe to Mr. Goss, the organist of St. Paul's, for the additions he has made to our repertoire of ecclesiastical music. Like his many predecessors, he has devoted his life to compositions for our church, and, unlike many of his sotemporaries, who waste their energies in attempts at oratorio, as ambitious as futile, his works, fragmentary as anthems and services necessarily must be, form a worthy sequel to those of Purcel, Blow, and Boyce, and are truly a noble development of our English sacred school. They have learning without crudeness, solidity without heaviness, manliness with tenderness, and power with geniality. Well would it be if our young musicians would take him as a model in their writings, for in his works they would find a natural healthy beauty of form that may lead them from imitating the instrumental draperies of the modern German school, which fantastic draperies they too often use, as "the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" did his veil, for the purpose of hiding deformity of features. The authorities of St. Paul's may be congratulated upon a servant of such earnest genius as their organist. Twenty now in their plea for not augmenting and improving their choir, but when in the possession of their immense revenues they did nothing, and if those revenues were again restored to them I fear little could be expected from dignitaries so ignored and indifferent to the musical art.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, P. G.

Digitized by Google

ORGAN NEWS.

The organ erected in St. Mary's Church, Horncastle, by Messrs. Gray & Davison, in 1861, has been rebuilt and enlarged by Mr. T. H. Nicholson, of Lincoln, and is now a very fine instrument. Additionel bellows and wind chests have been supplied, the action has been brushed, every pipe has been revoiced, and several stops added. The increased body of tone is something marvellous, the Bourdons especially adding to the fulness and grandeur of the instrument. The greatest praise is due to Mr. Nicholson for the thoroughness with which every part of the work has been done. The organ was opened by Mr. W. Wakelin, who unites to brilliant execution an exquisite taste in the management of the instrument. The services at the opening were choral throughout, and were in every respect successful. The following is a specification of the organ:—

GREAT ORGAN.

	feet.		feet.
1. Bourdon	16 tone.	7. Principal	4
9. Open Diapason	8	8. Fifteenth	2
3. Gemshorn	8	9. Twelfth	3
4. Stopped Diapason	8 tone.	10. Mixture (4 ranks).
5. Dulciana	8	11. Trumpet	8
6. Rohr Flute	4	12. Clarionette	8

SWELL ORGAN.

	feet.		feet.
1. Bourdon	16 tone.	6. Mixture (2 ranks).
2. Open Diapason	8	7. Horn	8
3. Stopped Diapason	8 tone.	8. Oboe	8
4. Principal	4	9. Clarion	4
5. Fifteenth	2

PEDAL ORGAN.

1. Open Diapason .... 16 feet.

COUPLERS.

1. Swell Octave.
2. Pedal Octave.
3. Pedal to Great.
4. Pedal to Swell.
5. Great to Swell.

N.B.—Soundboard, slides, and action are prepared for a Bourdon (16 feet tone) to be added to the Pedal at some future date.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

MY DEAR SIR,—I have just received a letter from Dr. Ferdinand Hiller in which he requests me to ask you to kindly correct a paragraph which has appeared in the Musical World—to the effect that Wagner has been invited to conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at Bonn—the fact being that Wagner is going to conduct at Vienna, Hiller himself, of course, conducting at Bonn.—Yours sincerely,

ALFRED H. LITTLETON.

1, Berners Street, W., June 16, 1870.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

"LE NOZZE" WITHOUT NILSSON.

The Graphic of June 11th thus refers to late events at Drury Lane:—

"Our readers may accept the official statement with regard to the popular Swedish artist as an absolute fact. Mdlle. Nilsson has overworked herself, and she now suffers the consequence that comes to all alike, be they prime donne or scene-shifters. Rest is essential in such a case, and rest Mdlle. Nilsson is taking, sorely against her will, we may be assured; and not less sorely against the interests of her manager. It must be said, however, that the manager suffers more than is creditable to the public. On Saturday last Mdlle. Nilsson was to have played the Countess in Le Nozze di Figaro, and her non-appearance enabled the observant to gauge the extent of prime donne worship among operatic audiences. Remembering that, with Mdlle. Nilsson absent, there yet remained such a group of artists as Volpini, Reboux, Lewitzky, Feure, and Santley—to say nothing of Mezart's unsurpassed music—the number who turned away forced upon us some unpleasant reflections. These defaulters were of all classes, but chiefly of the class well educated enough to know better. Elegant young ladies exclaimed, 'Oh, mamma, Nilsson doesn't sing. What is the use of staying?' Severe persons of both sexes waxed angry, and muttered, as they retired, that the conduct of 'These artists,' in being hoarse, was 'simply disgraceful;' while swells let fall their eye-glasses with the familiar 'click' of young Barnacle, and drawled, 'By Jove! you know, heaws a sell.' So Mozart's matchless opera, played after a fashion not to be surpassed in Europe, was given to a partially empty house, and all because one artist fell sick! To what conclusion the logic of this fact brings us we would rather not trust ourselves to say. During the present week Mdlle. Nilsson's name has not appeared in the bills; but the performances of Il Barbiere, Fausta, and Robert le Diable have taken place—Alice in the last-named opera being represented by Mdlle. Reboux, whose usefulness as Mdlle. Nilsson's substitute can hardly be overrated."

CONCERT AT SEA.—The correspondent of the Musical Bulletin of New York, a passenger on board the City of Baltimore, bound from New York to London, has forwarded us the following particulars:—

"A very interesting and pleasing incident characterized the voyage of the City of Baltimore from New York to Liverpool, 31st of May, 1870, in the shape of an amateur concert, embracing vocal music, readings, and recitations by the ladies and gentlemen among the cabin passengers. Mr. R. Turner and Mr. Louis Gerster were prominent in originating and bringing the matter to a happy and successful consummation. It was on Thursday eve, June 9th, after tea, while the good ship was speeding with smooth and rapid pace across the wasta of waters, when the merry ringing of a bell announced the hour for the opening of the concert. The dining-saloon, through the exertions of the committee and the stewards attached to the steamer, was elegantly arranged for the occasion, and the part appropriated to the performers by the simple adjustment of a crimson damask screen was conveniently partitioned off from the section in which the audience was seated. All the ladies on board attended in full dress, and no one was permitted to occupy a seat at the concert, neglected, neither by dread of sea-sickness or weariness, from being present. When the screen was drawn aside the appearance which the saloon presented was particularly attractive. The numerous lights reflected in the gilded mirrors, united to the bright and warm colors in the damask and plush-covered furniture, and the handsome dresses of the ladies, made quite a pretty picture. Mr. Turner opened the proceedings with a few remarks apologizing in advance for any shortcomings which might mark the concert, and hoping for a liberal indulgence from the audience. He stated the entertainment was for the benefit of the Liverpool Seamen's Orphans' Institution, and trusted each one would contribute as much as he could spare. The opening chorus, 'Hail, Columbia,' was sung by the company, all of whom being Americans it is needless to say justice was done to the national anthem. 'Angels Calling,' a pleasing little solo and chorus, was rendered by Messrs. L. Gerster and Moseley. 'The Man in the Moon,' a comic song, given by Dr. Hardy, created much amusement. A reading from William Tell by Mr. V. O'Connor followed. Contributed variations by J. Fennell were received with repeated applause. 'Larboard Watch,' duet, sung by Messrs. Turner and Moseley, was well received and applauded. 'Maggie's Secret,' by Miss M. Detterer, and a banjo solo by J. Fennell closed the first part. The collection was then taken up, the performers themselves being the first to contribute, and an unexpectedly large sum realized. The second part opened with 'Softly o'er the rippling Waters,' one of Thomas's beautiful ballads, sung by Mr. Moseley and chorus. 'Marco Bozzaris,' a recitation by Mr. Comley, was very effective, and in response to the call of the audience another ('Clarence's Dream') was given with decided éclat. A comic medley, made up of a verse or two from fifteen songs of the period, was given by Johnny Fennell. 'Life's Rosy Hours,' a ballad, the composition of Mr. L. Gerster, was sung by himself, with the company for chorus. It was loudly applauded. 'Charming young Widow,' sung by Dr. Hardy, made the audience laugh considerably. The performance closed with 'God save the Queen,' in which the audience joined. The unanimous expression was that nothing of a similar character was ever before rendered with so much spirit and harmony."

Digitized by Google

ST. JAMES'S HALL,
REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S
Beethoven Recitals.

1870.

This year being the Centenary of the birth of Beethoven, Mr. Hallé has considered it appropriate to devote his Recitals exclusively to the music of that illustrious composer.

The programmes, as on previous occasions, consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, p.m. Mr. Hallé is assisted at all the Recitals by

HERR STOCKHAUSEN.

Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the sonatas, accompany the programmes

THE EIGHTH RECITAL
WILL TAKE PLACE ON
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JUNE 24TH, 1870,
To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

SONATA, in E major, Op. 109 .. .. Beethoven.
SONG,—Herr STOCKHAUSEN .. ..
SONATA, in A flat major, Op. 110 .. .. Beethoven.
SONG,—Herr STOCKHAUSEN .. ..
SONATA, in C minor, Op. 111 .. .. Beethoven.

Prices of Admission—Sofa Stalls, 7s.; Balcony, 3s.; Area, 1s.
Tickets at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co.'s, 48, Cheapside; Hays, 4, Exchange Buildings; Austin's Ticket Office, 28, Piccadilly; and Mr. Charles Hallé, 11, Mansfield Street, Cavendish Square.

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1870.

THE BURIAL OF CHARLES DICKENS.

IT has passed into a proverb that Death levels all distinctions; but even if this were otherwise, we should offer no apology for making the illustrious author who has just passed from among us the theme of columns usually devoted to matters with which he had little connexion. Our business is not to write a eulogium upon the genius or the virtues of Charles Dickens. No such thing is needed; the keen sense of national and personal bereavement now afflicting the national and personal heart, being a tribute to the dead man's memory, transcending all words. We choose rather to speak in plain language of that which has added to the sharpness of sorrow by restraining its legitimate and honourable expression. On Tuesday morning last, the corpse of Charles Dickens was smuggled into its grave. We want to know why.

Of late years a fashion has sprung up which must have the sympathy of everybody with a soul above childish frippery—stars, garters, and the like—in which, however, so many grown-up men take pleasure. It is now the "correct thing" to ignore the undertaker's paraphernalia—that strange compound of grimness and stupidity—and to go down to the grave unattended by nodding plumes, gilt-headed truncheons, weepers, and red-nosed "mutes." So it should be. Death is far too sacred for hollow mockeries; and, sweeping them away, our generation has honoured itself not less than its departed. Charles Dickens, as was natural to one keenly sensitive on all matters connected with the dignity of human nature (like his illustrious contemporary, intimate friend, and enthusiastic admirer, W. M. Thackeray), set his face like flint against hired semblances of woe; and the unpretending cortège of Tuesday morning put a climax to the teaching of a life-time. So far all was well with the funeral of the best known Englishman of his day. That unadorned hearse, and those three plain coaches were enough;—the majesty of departed genius and the tribute of sorrowing millions did the rest. But why so much secrecy? Why were the mortal remains of our great novelist surreptitiously taken to the grave side, and buried with hurried rites and closed doors, as though he had been the scorn of his race instead of its ornament and pride? This, we fancy, is a very different matter; and with it, let us say at once, we have no sympathy.

That the wishes of the dead should be, as a rule, binding upon the survivors, nobody will dispute. There are times, however, when, out of regard for higher considerations, it is necessary to set them aside. This may easily be the case with illustrious men, whose innate modesty would defraud a nation of the privilege of paying them honour. Therefore, while yielding in none in our reverence for the departed author's wishes, we say that his funeral was a national matter, to be dealt with on national grounds. Public instinct decided thus, so soon as the public ear heard the sad news of death; and every man's imagination pictured Charles Dickens borne to Westminster Abbey through crowded and silent streets, and buried while thousands "made great lamentation over him." There could have been nothing repugnant in this to the deceased. Charles Dickens despised the hideous mockery of woe; but he had no contempt for a profound unaffected sorrow. We regret that any compromise should have been attempted between the conflicting wishes of the dead author and those of a mourning people. Had the remains been buried in the quiet churchyard of "Cloisterham"—Rochester, we mean—there would still have been cause for regret; but to accept Westminster Abbey; and to take possession of that glorious mausoleum by stratagem, was a course quite foreign to the nature of Charles Dickens, and one, we are confident, he would never have approved.

It was the Bishop of Worcester, not the Bishop of Winchester (as misprinted last week) who preached the sermon on behalf of the Charity, at St. Paul's, on Thursday afternoon, the 9th inst.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MDLLE. KRAUSS, according to the French papers, is engaged at the Grand Opéra, and will make her début there in M. Mermet's Jeanne d'Arc, perhaps the worst, certainly the noisiest, opera of modern times. Some hold that Mdlle. Krauss does unwisely to abandon the Italian Opera, where she has won her Parisian laurels; some hold the contrary; we hold off. On Verra. (Who's "On"?)

At a concert given four years ago by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, a printed apology for the possible absence or lateness of some of the orchestra was circulated. It appeared that many would have to come from "a considerable distance," and that in fear of accidents "by rail or by road" they did not feel sure they would reach St. James's Hall at the appointed hour. On reading this announcement it struck us that we must be at Vienna, and that the musicians had to come from Königgratz by the train which carried Dr. Russell at a mile and half an hour. But no; we were in London, Piccadilly on one hand, and Regent Street on the other. Where the musicians hailed from (who were afraid of reaching St. James's Hall only in time to be too late) was not made known. Nevertheless, owing to superhuman efforts, and a fortunate absence of accidents, they contrived to appear at a tolerable hour, and played Mr. Sullivan's symphony in E minor (No. 1—where is No. 2 in D major?).

Digitized by Google

A NEW theatre has been "inaugurated" at Genoa, under the name of the Politeamo Génovèse. The opera played was Signor Petrella's Promessi Sposi. Signor Bonola directed the orchestra. The town of Genoa has been endowed with this new and (it is said) beautiful monument by the brothers Chiarella (whoever they may happen to be). Everything is praised (of course) by the local papers, which declare that so complete and striking a representation had never before been witnessed at Genoa.

THERE is an "on dit," sufficiently pleasant to make all lovers of Schubert's music hope that it may turn out to be true. "On dit," then, that Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Jules Stockhausen are about to give a concert, in the course of next month, at which the whole of Schubert's twenty songs, entitled Die Schone Mullerin, will be introduced. A more interesting performance could scarcely be imagined. The idea of such music, interpreted by two such singers makes one's mouth water. But who is to be the accompanist?

A MORNING contemporary in its article on the production of Signor Campana's Esmeralda, at the Royal Italian Opera, has the following:—

"The work is placed on the stage with that splendour of costume and scenery which is peculiar to this establishment."

The "splendour of costume and scenery" is curious, seeing that there is nothing new in either department—nothing that had not been used for other purposes already.

THE subjoined is the letter about Herr Richard Wagner and his Walküre, addressed by Herr Esser to the editor of the Neue Freie Presse, at Vienna:—

"SIR,—Having written to ask Herr Richard Wagner whether there was any chance of the Walküre being produced at the Theatre Royal, Munich, and, if so, when that event would occur, and, also, whether he would himself take part in getting up his work, I received the following answer, a copy of which I append. As this answer was not intended for me alone, but for all who take an interest in the production of the Walküre, and as Herr Wagner not merely gave me the permission to get it published in some paper enjoying a large circulation, but, expressed a wish that it should be so published, I take the liberty of forwarding it to you for insertion. Begging you to fulfil, if possible, Herr Wagner's wish, I remain, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant.

"H. ESSER.

"Salzburg, 19th May, 1870."

CHARLES DICKENS lies in Westminster Abbey, with the great chiefs and peers of English literature. It is his proper place. His relatives have known how to unite a becoming regard for the simplicity and humility of mind which expressed itself in his funeral instructions with a recognition of the nation's title to pay him the highest posthumous honour. Dickens belonged to himself and to his family, but he belonged also to the English people, of whose life in the nineteenth century he was the truest interpreter. He painted them as they are, but in doing so showed them what they ought to be. A master in what may be called the realist school in art, his real was always on the background of a pure ideal. He was the most influential teacher of our day, although his teaching was not purely didactic, but addressed itself to the imagination and the feelings. It is creditable to the English of the nineteenth century, hard and materialistic as we reproach ourselves with being, that our favourite author should have been one whose pages are not more remarkable for genius than for earnest faith, cheerful and genial hope, large and penetrating charity. An age and a people which have understood and loved Dickens have a right to respect themselves. But we will not be betrayed into delivering, over his scarcely closed grave, one of those funeral orations to which he so strongly objected. His eulogy lies in the books which have delighted all readers, while purifying the moral and intellectual atmosphere we breathe. He is the author of far more than he wrote; and his works at once follow and remain behind him, to continue their beneficent influence. Vale, vale!

THE programme of the forthcoming Festival of the Three Choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, to be held this year at Hereford, so far as relates to the sacred performances at the Cathedral, is now arranged as follows:—The Festival opens on Tuesday, the 23rd August, with Mendelssohn's Elijah, which will occupy the whole of the first morning. In the evening, according to a new arrangement, there will be a performance of sacred music at the Cathedral, consisting of Haydn's Creation (Parts 1 and 2), and Mr. J. Barnby's Rebekah. On Wednesday morning Mr. Sullivan's Prodigal Son (written for last Worcester Festival), Spohr's Last Judgment, and Mozart's Twelfth Mass. Thursday is to be chiefly devoted to Mendelssohn and Handel—Reformation Symphony, the fragments from Christus, and 42nd Psalm, of the former; selections from Judas Maccabæus, Solomon, and Jephtha, with the anthem, "Zadok the Priest," and the Esther overture, of the latter being included. On the same morning, to make the programme still longer, as if it was not already long enough, a cantata by Mr. (Henry?) Holmes is to be performed. On Friday, as usual, Handel's Messiah. There are to be only two secular concerts at the Shire Hall. The programmes for these are not yet fully made out. The engagements include Mdlle. Tietjens, Miss Edith Wynne, Mesdames Sinico and Patey-Whytock, Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Montem Smith, Lewis Thomas, and Santley. Mr. Townshend Smith is (of course) to be conductor.

THOUGH it is a well-established fact that foreign potentates, from the Emperor of Russia down to the tiniest German princelet, are far from chary in distributing their various orders and decorations, the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar eclipses them all in this respect. He stands facile princeps; the acknowledged and unrivalled Peabody of decorative munificence. In consideration of the world-wide importance (!) of the late Musical Festival in his pleasant, but small capital, he has conferred the cross of the Order of the Falcon, first class, on Herren Ferdinand David, Friedr. Grützmacher, Joseph Hellmesberger, and Professor Riedel, at one fell swoop.

THE "model" Wagner-performances commence, on the 19th, at the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Weimar. The following is the order in which the operas will be given: On the 19th inst., Der Fliegende Holländer; on the 22nd, Tannhäuser; on the 26th, Lohengrin; and on the 27th, Die Meistersinger. Herr Niemann will sing the music of Tannhäuser and of Lohengrin; Herr Nachbaur, that of Walther von Stolzing; and Dr. Gunz, that of Eric. Mdme. Mallinger will be the representative of Elisabeth, Elsa, and Eva; Mdlle. Brandt, of the Royal Opernhouse, Berlin, will figure as Ortrud; while Mdlle. Reiss, a local favourite, will undertake the part of Senta. All the bass parts Daland, Landgraf, King Henry, and Pognor, will be sustained by Herr Scaria, of the Royal Opera, Dresden; and all the baritone parts, the Flying Dutchman, Wolfram, Telramund, and Hans Sachs, by Herr von Milde. Tristan und Isolde was to have been given, but could not, because some of the artists representing the principal parts are engaged in the Walküre, at Munich. Herr Wagner, too, was to have been present, but would not.—By the way, a rage for "model" performances appears to have attacked Baron von Loën, the Intendant of the Grand-Ducal Theatre. He intends giving, in 1871, seven "model" performances of operas by Mozart.

WHEN M. Sainte Beuve, a confirmed invalid, grievously tormented by the malady from which he died, received his appointment to the Senate, he addressed to the Emperor a graceful note of thanks. "You have given me, Sire," he wrote, "the right to be ill." The great critic had previously lived on the modest earnings of his pen, and never known the enjoyment of leisure and repose. The salary of a Senator might have enabled him to rest from literary labour; but his only wish was that it might enable him to bear his sufferings with a constant smile. It would seem that a prima donna is as little permitted to be unwell as men who write to live, and as Tom Hood said "find no tonic virtue in a steel pen." Since her arrival here, to fulfil an engagement at the Drury Lane Opera-house, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson has been seriously unwell; for a whole fortnight she was sentenced by her doctor to absolute retirement. Even a prima donna has a nervous system, and the wear and tear of a life of incessant strain will shake nerves of steel. No sooner had Mdlle. Nilsson completed her autumnal concert tour in England last year than she returned to Paris. During the four successive winter months she brought the largest receipts to the Académie Impériale, and besides her unceasing appearances at the Tuileries, the Hotel de Ville, private salons, and public concerts, she sang thirteen times for charitable purposes, and gave up the whole receipts of her final benefit at the Opéra to the relief of her poorer brothers and sisters in art. After such a campaign an interval of rest might not have been deemed unreasonable. But there is no rest for a prima donna in the maelstrom of her renown. From the last performance in Paris to the first in London was, as novelists say, "the affair of a moment;" and the result of this prodigality of exertion was collapse. A fortnight's silence seems eternal to a prima donna and an enthusiastic public, but on Tuesday night the audience at Drury Lane were happily repaid for their disappointment and anxiety by the re-appearance of their favourite in the full enjoyment of her splendid powers. Meanwhile, one Paris journal announces that Mdlle. Nilsson has lost her voice, and will never sing again; another modifies its information by the regret that, although the Swedish nightingale will sing again, her voice has lost—in a fortnight?—all its crystalline clearness and quality of tone, and that she is but a wreck of her former self. Thus the glories of the most brilliant darlings of the lyric stage are not without their shadows, and the envy that pursues them assumes a hundred ingenious disguises of sympathy and commiseration. But if not exempt from persecution, they are bound to know nothing even for a day, of ordinary ailments and infirmities. They must be always in health and spirits, and never unwell ("indisposed" is another thing) until they retire into private life.

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mr. Frederick Chatterton, the well-known harpist, gave a recital on Wednesday, at St. George's Hall, which was well attended by his friends and admirers. He played in his usual excellent style six harp solos, all of which were much applauded. Madame F. Lancia sang two of Chopin's mazurkas, encored, adapted by Viardot Garcia to Italian words, and also the grand air from William Tell, "Sombre Foret." Mdlles. Marie D'Etienne, Di Bletchli, Kate Lester, Messrs. Henry Gordon and Vinning also gave some favourite morceaux, and Mr. Frank Mori accompanied.

Mdlle. Annette Zuliani, a young and rising vocalist, gave a concert on Monday evening, at the Beethoven Rooms. She issued an attractive programme, which was performed by Madame Crellin-Pyne, Miss E. Jones, Miss Augusta Manning, Messrs. Perrie, Waldeck, Montelli, Chaplin Henry, Frederick Chatterton, and the young Italian pianist, Enrico Sattolis. Mdlle. Zuliani sang the "Tacea la notte" from Il Trovatore, "The Willow Song," from Otello (with Mr. Frederick Chatterton's harp obbligato), and a song by Bishop, in all of which she acquitted herself artistically. Messrs. Willing and Lehmeyer were the accompanists.

Mrs. Alexander Newton gave her matinée at the Beethoven Rooms on Wednesday week last, when a goodly number of her patrons and friends attended. Mrs. Newton sang "With verdure clad," the polacca from I Puritani, and a duet, with Signor Nappi, from Il Barbiere. Selections from the works of Mozart, Balfe, Shield, Bishop, and Cimarosa were well interpreted by Mesdames Fosbrooke, M. Severn, Arabella Smyth, Laverne, Messrs. E. Osborne, J. C. Ward, G. Smith, and Signor Nappi. Miss Madeline Cronin, the pianist, played Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo and Tito Mattei's fantasia in a brilliant manner, and Mr. John Cheshire one of his harp solos. Messrs. Van Noorden, Frank Mori, and Mr. J. C. Ward were announced as conductors.

Mr. Gibsone gave his second recital on Wednesday at St. George's Hall to an overflowing audience, who fully appreciated his legitimate and excellent pianoforte playing. His second Book of "Meditations," consisting of six morceaux, is a charming specimen of pianoforte music. A new sonata for pianoforte and violin, by Mr. Gibsone, in three movements, was played by the composer and Signor Risegari, and heard with much pleasure. Signor Risegari played an élegie of his own with much feeling. Miss Julia Elton and Mr. Maybrick were the vocalists. The latter sang a new song by Mr. John Barnett, "The Curfew bell was ringing," with effect. Signor Li Calzi was the accompanist. At Mr. Gibsone's next recital a new vocal cantata for female voices will be given.

Madame Celli (widow of the late Baron Celli), teacher of singing, gave a concert at the Beethoven Rooms last Saturday, and was well supported by her friends and patrons. Madame Celli provided a good programme, and all the pieces were received with more or less favour. Mr. George Perren gave, "Alice, where art thou?" in his usual style. Madame Florence Lancia, Mdlles. Zuhaur, Crellin-Pyne, and Herr Waldeck were the other vocalists. Miss Biagrove (pianoforte), Mr. Frederick Chatterton (harp), and Mr. Richard Blagrove (concertina), each contributed a solo. A young Italian pianist, from Verona, Signor Enrico Scattolis, gave with great precision and brilliancy two solos by Krause and Liszt, which were received with favour. Mr. F. Mori and Herr Lehmeyer conducted.

A MORNING CONCERT was given on Thursday, the 19th instant, at No. 19, Seymour Street, Portman Square, by the permission of Mrs. Owen Lewis, for the benefit of Lady Petre's Crèche or Day Nursery. The Mesdames L. Sherrington, C. and R. Doria, Herren Stockhausen and Waldeck were the vocalists; with Madame Sydney Pratten, Herr Strauss, and Mr. Charles Hallé as instrumentalists, the whole being conducted by M. Francesco Berger. The artists gave their services. Several popular and classical pieces by Beethoven, Mozart, Scarlatti, Pergolesi, Adam, Miller, and Handel, &c., made up a capital programme. Berger's pleasing duet, "Peace and Love," was sung with much taste by the Sisters Doria, who were loudly applauded.

Mr. G. Lansdowne Cottell's morning concert was given at Store Street Concert Hall, on Saturday, to a large audience. The vocalists and instrumentalists contained chiefly of the members and students of Mr. Cottell's Academy of Music, by whom selections were given from the works of Beethoven, Rossini, Thalberg, Donizetti, Mosart, Gounod, Henry Smart, John Barnett, W. Holmes, Duggan, Verdi, Balfe, Wallace, Archer, &c. Amongst the vocalists were Mdlles. D'Elise, Agnes Lyndhurst, the Sisters Demak, K. Heidemeng, Susan Donesworth, Ruth Rae, Messrs. W. C. Bell, L. Waldeck, W. Reeves, J. B. Bolton, Gerald Whitby, and the baritone, Mr. Sutcliffe, from Australia, who sang well "Wake, Linda, wake." Amongst the pianists we can name Miss Ellen Jarman, from Brighton, Miss Laura Vinette, Miss Alice Staunton, Miss Houget, and Miss Amy Perry, who one and all tried their "prentice han" with more or less success Mr. L. Cottell and C. Weber were conductors.

The excellent chef d'orchestre of the Drury Lane Opera gave his annual concert on Friday last in Drury Lane Theatre. There was an obvious propriety in the choice of place, and not less in that of artists and programme; all the vocal and instrumental resources of the establishment being brought to bear upon a selection of pieces for the most part operatic. It may easily be imagined that the result was every way satisfactory to those who have a taste for entertainments of the kind; and that whoever sat out the proceedings to the end must have gone away in the state of thorough contentment which leaves no faintest desire for anything more. The programme included thirty-one pieces, among which were an overture, Guillaume Tell; a pianoforte solo on airs from Martha (Mr. Wehli); a clarionet solo on airs from Rigoletto (Signor Bassi); and a violin solo (Herr Straus). The vocal selections were of diverse interest, among the most attractive being the charming duet, "Pianger tu mai," from Abu Hassan, sung by Madame Trebelli and Madame Monbelli; "Ombra leggiera," given with her usual effect by Mdlle. di Murska; Arditi's "Leggiero lavisble," and L'Estasi, sung excellently well by Madame Sinico; a romance, by Paqnis, "Sogno d'amore," in the horn obbligato to which the composer divided attention with the vocalist, Madame Trebelli; and Molloy's "Wandering Jew," which was rendered in perfect style by Mr. Santley. Besides the pieces already named, Mesdames Retoux, Lewitzky, Cari, Volpini, Vinta, MM. Mongini, Bettini, Gassier, Foli, Faure, Verger, and others of less note, took part in the concert. Signor Piatti played his own Adagio and Barcarole (Marino Faliero) in a style nothing short of marvellous; and the long entertainment was brought to a close by a portion of the last act of Rigoletto, in which Mdlle. di Murska appeared as Gilda, Madame Trebelli as Maddalena, Signor Mongini as the Duke, Mr. Santley as Rigoletto, and Signor Foli as Sparafucile. A large and fashionable audience was present, and Signor Arditi's reception afforded another proof of the esteem in which he is justly held.

Carlsruhe.—The theatre is closed until the beginning of August.

Munich.—The first performance of Herr R. Wagner's Walküre is definitively announced for the 26th inst.

The festival performance of Herr Richard Wagner's operas, to take place (as our readers have already been apprised) at Weimar, are arranged as follows:—On Sunday (the 19th inst.), the Fliegender Holländer; on Wednesday (the 22nd), Lohengrin; on Sunday (the 26th), Tannhäuser; and on Wednesday (the 29th), the Meistersinger. We shall, doubtless, be furnished (by "C. A. B.") with full particulars in due time.

Digitized by Google

JOSEPH HAYDN.*

Haydn was one of those great composers whose amiability has been unapproached, and whose kindness of heart is conspicuous in most of his transcendent works, which were dictated by the sole delight of affording happiness to others and giving real enjoyment to the world by his thoughtful compositions.

To record the origin of the Farewell Symphony (Abschieds Symphonie) we must go back to the year 1760, the time when Haydn accepted the appointment of Chapelmaster to Prince Esterhazy, with 400 florins per annum. For this small salary he was obliged to conduct the Prince's opera, concerts, and church music, and, besides, it was his duty to compose new music for their institutions, to rehearse, to instruct, and even to keep the piano in the orchestra in tune.†

No doubt this engagement gave him the opportunity of developing his talent to unlimited extent. He acknowledged with thankfulness the expeditions position he had achieved by saying: "My Sovereign is satisfied with my compositions, and I receive the highest approbation from him. I can now make musical experiments as conductor with my orchestra, by observing what produces or enfeebles the impression and the effect. I am able to ameliorate, to add, to venture, and being secluded from the outer world, nobody can distract or torment me, and to these circumstances taken together I assign the reason why I remain original." Here, at Eisenstadt, in Hungary, and, during the winter time, two or three months at Vienna, for the length of thirty years, till the establishment was broken up by the death of the Prince, Haydn composed the greater number of his symphonies; he himself registered 118, but most likely they reached nearer to 140. The greater number of his quartets were at least 83. During the same period he wrote 24 concertos and the same number of trios, 19 operas and his oratorio, Tobias, 15 masses, and other miscellaneous works, not including 163 compositions for the baritone,‡ the favourite instrument of the Prince.

Often, in referring to the great quantity of his compositions, Haydn used to say that he could not suggest a better epitaph for himself than the three following words: "Vixi, scripsi, dixi." Prince Esterhazy died in 1790, and the establishment was then broken up. This was the occasion which gave rise to the composition of the Farewell Symphony (Abschieds Symphonie), as the origin is perfectly well known by all who are acquainted with the life and works of our great maestro. It contains charming and beautiful ideas, and is scored as Haydn could only do it. The graphic and descriptive current of the symphony and the dissolution of the band is musically delineated in the last part. Each performer of the different instruments, one after another having finished his part, took his music and instrument, blew out his candles, and left the platform. At the finale, the first violin player was the only one left, he finished his part as the others had done, took his music, extinguished the only candles left burning in the orchestra, bowed to the assembly, and withdrew. There are different stories in circulation with regard to this symphony, but so far as my information is concerned, and after the tradition current in Germany about this composition, it relates to the dissolution of the musical establishments of Prince Esterhazy as communicated before.

The Children's Symphony (Kinder Symphonie) of Haydn is so naïve, and, I may say, so innocent a composition that it should be generally known. It falls proves that the great composer could enter into those harmless and joyful feelings which emane youth. The symphony is composed for two violins and violoncello, and as there are no difficulties to overcome, players of a limited advancement may perform it. The accompaniments of their children's toy-instruments are a drum, trumpet, cuckoo-rattle, cymbals, nightingale, and quail. These toy-instruments have small solos for their own parts, therefore it is necessary that the little folks should count the rests properly, and keep correct time. The symphony consists of three parts—Allegro, Trio and Minuet, and Finale, which is repeated twice, each time faster. In several parts of Germany the children form themselves into parties for the performance of this symphony at Christmas time. The allotment of the different instruments, and the rehearsals for which they assemble, make them busy for many a week. Then, during the Christmas season they visit their relations and friends and perform in their best style, not only amusing themselves, but creating joy and merriment around them in the most innocent manner imaginable.

Bernard Romberg has imitated the idea of Haydn, and has composed another Children's Symphony, with toy instruments, which is more ambitious, but very comical.‖

The origin of the so-called Ox Minuet (Ochsen Minuett), with its musical incidents, is as follows. One day a rich Hungarian cattle-dealer called upon Haydn. His housekeeper told him that she felt sorry he could not see her master, as he was busy composing, and she dared not interrupt him. He would not hear of the denial, but persisted to see and speak to him. She, however, declined again, saying that she could not comply with his demand. The cattle dealer, losing his temper, became exasperated, cracked his whip, shouted, hallooed out, and frightened the poor housekeeper nearly to death, Haydn, occupied in the next room, and disturbed by the great uproar, entered the ante-room, and, being somewhat of a timid disposition, became also frightened by seeing a big, stout fellow, raging like mad with a whip, and inquired what the disturbance was all about. The cattle-dealer, perceiving Haydn, saluted him very politely by taking off his hat, explained, and complained about the housekeeper, and said he wished to be informed if he could have the honour of speaking with the celebrated composer, and if so, he should have a great favour to ask of him. He told the amiable Haydn, who now listened with composure, that his daughter was about to be married, and for that happy event, he wished a new minuet composed by the great Haydn, adding that his circumstances would allow him to pay any price, but a minuet he must have. Haydn, who enjoyed the strenuous demand and comic surprise, gave him the promise to compose one and send it to him. Some time afterwards, Haydn heard a great noise before his windows, and upon looking out, saw a procession halting before his house, and in the midst of it one of the finest Hungarian oxen, ornamented with coloured ribbons, accompanied by a band performing the new minuet. Up came the cattle-dealer with his daughter and son-in-law, and presented them to Haydn, thanking him for the beautiful minuet, and begged the composer to accept the ox, assuring him that it was the finest beast he had in his stables. This is the origin of the Ox Minuet.

Many years ago, I saw this event dramatized on the stage at Berlin, in the form of an operetta, with all the music taken from Haydn's works. Our maestro, his housekeeper, the cattle-dealer, his daughter, and son-in-law were represented on the stage, with the procession at the end. I enjoyed the piece amazingly, and would prefer again to hear this music of the past than one of the operas with the so-called music of the future, which becomes so dangerous, we are told, that fire-engines may be required during the performances.

June, 1870. DR. FERDINAND RAHLES.

* "Farewell Symphony" (Abschieds Symphonie), "Children's Symphony" (Kinder Symphonie), and "Ox Minuet" (Ochsen Minuett).

† It was the custom at this period that the conductor should have a piano of limited compass before him, for the purpose of using it if required.

‡ The baritone was an instrument of a soft and melancholy tone, but now a long time out of use. It much resembled the viola di gamba, but had a broader touch-board with seven gut-strings, and, below, another set of 14 metal strings. The upper strings were played with a bow, the metal ones were only touched with the point of the thumb.

‖ Both symphonies are published at Berlin and Leipsic, also the arrangements as a solo or duet for the piano, with accompaniment of the above-mentioned children-instruments. These toy instruments, properly tuned in the usual pitch, may be had at the publishers, through those firms who are importers of foreign music.

A GRINNER'S WAIL.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I always do myself the pleasure of reading your account of the meeting of the Charity Children at St. Paul's, ever the breakfast table, to the family circle of which I form one: and by the by, next year I shall, at all events, get a good laugh; we all get ready for the cue, and the cue is Mr. Goss. Mr. Goss, no doubt, is a very respectable and clever gentleman, and his music is as respectable as himself, but why go through the stereotyped phrases year after year about the chants the Psalms were chanted to, simply for the purpose of dragging in mandlin praise of Dr. Goss; then follows the other bit of stereotype about "a beautiful and truly devotional service," &c. I have laughed over it a good many years, but, hang it, the joke is getting stale. Do ask your reporter next year to cut this part out, and just add a note—"What we have to say in praise of Mr. Goss will be the same as was stated the last and many preceding years." Most of your readers will know it by heart, and will have no occasion to refer back.—I remain, yours obediently,

ANTI-PLATITUDE.

["Anti-Platitude" should have signed himself "Anti-Gratitude." He has appreciated our remarks in the "hee-haw" fashion, which is, no doubt, natural to him; and now, tiring of the game, he abuses us. We are sorry, but the claims of justice are enduring, and the praise of a worthy object is the more agreeable because worthy objects are rare. These considerations, however, Anti-Platitude can scarcely be expected to appreciate. Let him take comfort; there are plenty of other good things in the world for him to grin at.—ED. M. W.]

WAIFS.

Mr. Balfe has arrived at his country seat, Rowney Abbey, Herts, from Paris.

The members of the volunteer choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, had a soirée last Friday evening!

At the lively little Athénée (which was to close on the 15th) the Toréador of the late Adolph Adam has been revived.

M. Montaubry, the tenor, is re-engaged by MM. Leuven and du Locle for a series of representations at the Opéra Comique.

M. Bagier of the Opéra Italien, has returned from Baden-Baden and is already occupying himself with the arrangements for his forthcoming season.

Vogt, or Frod? Which? Let M. Léon Escudier, the inconceivable director of L'Art Musical (who has brodé sur Vogt in his latest issue) explain.

Digitized by Google

M. Felicien David's Lalla Rookh was to be revived at the Opéra Comique this week, with some new ballet music for a new and (on dit) "ravissante danseuse."

Friday week was the sixteenth anniversary of the opening of the Crystal Palace. During the sixteen years it has been open it has been visited by 24,655,712 persons.

The ode for the installation of the Marquis of Salisbury, as Chancellor of the University of Oxford, has been composed by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra.

The value set by some ladies upon Beethoven's Sonatas may be estimated from the inconvenient in a contemporary that a correspondent wishes to barter a volume of them for a Prussian cat.

The seventh festival of the Doncaster Choral Union was held on Thursday week in the Parish Church of Doncaster. Nearly 600 choristers were present, and the Archbishop of York preached.

Madame Anna Bishop has had a very tempting offer to go all round the world again, positively for the last time. She is busily engaged in writing her memoirs; and an intensely interesting book may be expected.

The Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland has decided on granting a patent for a new lyrical theatre, to be built in Dublin, by the Messrs. Gunn, musicsellers. This has been long and anxiously wished for by the citizens.

The new opera by M. Flotow and M. St. Georges, entitled L'Ombre, is to be brought out immediately at the Opéra Comique. Let us hope that L'Ombre is not the ombre of Martha, L'Ame en peine, or Stradella.

Hervé has returned to Paris from London highly delighted with his successful invasion of our shores. He has netted (says a contemporary) 60,000 francs (£2,400) during his sojourn among us. O the tinire, and the manners!

The sum of £1000 was, a few days since, left at the bank of Messrs. Ransom, Bouverie, & Co., for the British Hospital for Diseases of the Skin, 56, Great Marlborough Street, W., and 13a, Finsbury Square, E.C., from V. S. T.

At the Choral Festival at Christchurch, Hants, the Bishop of Winchester delivered the sermon from the rood-loft, which enabled him to be heard much more distinctly throughout the vast nave than he could have been if he had preached from a low pulpit.

La Bohemienne (the Bohemian Girl) of W. M. Balfe, Esq., our compatriot toute St. George's Manche, was performed thirty-three times during the last summer of the Théatre Lyrique, for which M. Martinet, the present director, is already beating up recruits.

Mr. James Coward, of the Crystal Palace, has left England for his annual Swiss tour. During a portion of the time he is on the Alpine summits, his place on the scarcely less exalted organ-stool of Sydenham will be occupied by Mr. William Henry Thomas.

On Whit-Monday the sacred dramas of Joseph and his Brethren and David and Goliath were performed in the magnificent and stately ruins of Carew Castle, South Wales, by the young men of the Independent School, Narbeth.

Signor Merelli, director of the Italian Opera, Moscow, and General Gnedinoff, director of the Imperial Russian Theatre, were in London last week. The post of musical conductor, at Moscow, was offered to Signor Bevignani, but declined, in consequence of prior engagements made with Messrs. Gye and Mapleson for an autumn tour. We have reason to believe that Signor Li Calsi will accept the post at Moscow.

The Court Journal prints the following:—

"It is said that the onslaught on Lothair in Blackwood, is by Colonel Hamley; the article in Macmillan, which may be described as Blackwood and Water, is by Mr. Ilayward, the editor of the Quarterly Review; and the one in the Fortnightly, Mr. Kerrison's. In the forthcoming Edinburgh there is to be an article on Lothair by Lord Houghton. [The article in Blackwood is elsewhere attributed to Lawrence Oliphant, who some years ago became a Mormonite and lived in Utah, until a few months ago when he returned to this country and published Piccadilly.]

The Guardian prints some particulars about the approaching Bonn festival which will be read with interest:—

"The date of this festival is fixed for September 11; and the conductor will be Kapellmeister Ferdinand Hiller, who informed your correspondent, when at Cologne early this month, that the folk-wing would be the probable selection:—Overtures, Coriolanus, and Leonora No. 3; Symphony, the Eroica, the C minor, and the Ninth; the Violin Concerto (played by Joachim); the Missa Solemnis, etc. Preparations, anticipations, and speculations are already being made at the quiet little Rhenish town; and for a small logement near the University, let some years ago for some three pounds a month, seven thalers—or a guinea—per day was boldly asked for the festival period—a large sum for a German lodging. The building of the Beethoven Hall was progressing. The site, however, in the Vvirecks Platz, did not appear to be particularly favourable for a music-hall which is to be a permanent building. The architect is Herr Engelskirchen (name of good omen) of Bonn, and the first stone was laid about two months ago. The style is Basilican, and the following are the dimensions:—length, 140ft., breadth, 70ft., and height 40ft. The orchestra will accommodate 500 performers, and thereon an organ by Ibach of Bonn is to be erected, and the 'auditorium' is to contain about 2,000 persons."

The following advertisement tells us somewhat of the Beethoven Festival in New York, which was to take place this week:—

"The Great Beethoven Centennial Musical Jubilee.—Arrangements are perfected for the Great Beethoven Centennial Musical Jubilee, to take place in the city of New York at the American Institute Colliseum during the week, commencing June 13, 1870. The Colliseum will be altered and enlarged to give accommodation for twenty-two thousand persons. The occasion will be notable for presenting the most important choral societies in the country, aggregating over three thousand skilled singers. A grand jubilee orchestra of five hundred and fifty instrumental virtuosi, comprising the chief instrumentalists of the Continent. A magnificent ensemble of the stars, artists, and chorus of six grand opera companies, the four great regimental bands from this and neighbouring cities, aggregating two hundred brass and reed instrumentalists, and a colossal organ, together with numerous harmonic adjuncts, which it is believed will make this a musical event rarely equalled in the world. Especial pleasure is taken in announcing that the musical details are entrusted to Carl Bergmann, conductor of the Philharmonic Society; Max Maretzek, impresario, and conductor of grand Italian opera; George F. Bristow, choral maestro and conductor; and Patrick J. Gilmore, the renowned projector of the Great Peace Festival. To these will be added many eminent conductors of visiting choral societies."

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

DEVY & STEWART.—"There was a rose," song, by Berthold Tours.

DUFF & Co.—"The bright sun is shining," song, by Catherine Frew. Two songs by Sibyl.

MACMILLAN & Co.—"The Cultivation of the Speaking Voice." By John Hullah.

FOURTH BAGATELLE (Manchester).—"Moments of Pleasure," Nos. 1 to 6, by Louise Weiss.

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.—"Olga," pensée, pour le pianoforte, par Louis Diehl.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.

And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

		Poetry by	s.	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	...	LOUISA GRAY	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	...	JOHN OXENFORD	3	0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	...	...	3	0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	...	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	...	ITALIAN WORDS	3	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	...	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	...	THOMAS MOORE	3	0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	...	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad)	...	FLORENCE PERCY	3	0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	...	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0

And the Answer to it.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

WELSH MUSIC, arranged for the Pianoforte, by BRINLEY RICHARDS, published only by Robert Cocks & Co., New Burlington Street, where may be had his "Recollections of Wales," in numbers, 3s. each; "The Morgan March," 3s.; "The Bells of Aberdovey," 3s.; and a new edition of the "Ash Grove," 3s. All post free at Half-price. "The more we hear of the music of the Principality, the more we are surprised to think that such fine melodies should be so little known. Their present great popularity is unquestionably due to the skilful and interesting manner in which Mr. Brinley Richards has treated them."—From the Musical World.

"FAR AWAY." Song. By Miss M. LINDSAY (Mrs. J. W. Bliss). "There is great beauty in this Melody."—Vide Standard. "The melody is so sweet and plaintive."—Vide Brighton Gazette. The same for Pianoforte, by CARL LUIGI. Free by post for 19 stamps each.—London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS & Co.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Now Published,

"SUNSHINE,"

MARSHALL HALL BELL'S NEW SONG.

"SUNSHINE" was rapturously encored when sung at the composer's concert by Miss Robertine Henderson, and is published, price 3s., by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

TARANTELLE,

POUR LE PIANOFORTE.

By PAUL SEMLER.

Prix 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND AND MASTER, Z. BUCK, ESQ., MUS. DOC.

"FAREWELL,"

SONG.

Sung by Mrs. H. EGERTON MEEZA, the Words by LORD BYRON.

The Music by GEORGE GAFF.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Where may be obtained, Composed by GEORGE GAFF,

"MAIDEN, WRAP THY MANTLE ROUND THEE."

POEMS BY KIRKE WHITE.

Just Published,

"A SUMMER SONG,"

NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

By HENRY WALTON.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."

SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.

Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD.

By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,

PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.

LYON & HALL,

WARWICK MANSION.

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

CHAPPELL'S
Organ Journal

CONSISTING OF

FAVOURITE MOVEMENTS SELECTED FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS,

ARRANGED FOR

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY THE

MOST EMINENT ORGANISTS.

		COMPOSER.	ARRANGER.
No. 1.	SANCTUS from "Mass"	Rossini	Dr. Spark.
2.	DOMINE DEUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
3.	GRATIAS AGIMUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
4.	CRUCIFIXUS	Do.	Do.	Do.
5.	ADAGIO NON TROPPO	Mendelssohn	G. Cooper.
6.	ANDANTE from String Quartett	Mozart	Geo. R. Griffiths.

(To be continued.)

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS EACH.

THE

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO:

A SELECTION OF

Opening and Concluding Voluntaries

BY THE

MOST CELEBRATED COMPOSERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

ADAPTED CHIEFLY FOR THE USE OF AMATEURS BY

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Each Number contains from 7 to 12 favourite Voluntaries, including one arranged expressly with Pedal Obbligato.

Nos. 1 to 24 are now ready, price 3s. each; or in four Volumes, each containing Six Numbers, and bound in Cloth, price 12s. each.

A THEMATIC LIST OF CONTENTS

MAY BE HAD ON APPLICATION TO

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il follette (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasia Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	..
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valser). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

MESSRS. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

VOCAL.—No. 4.

		Poetry by	s.	d.
HAY (Walter)	"The story of the belle," song with chorus ad. lib.	E. C. Hall	3	0
Ditto	"The sky-lark," song.	The Ettrick Shepherd	4	0
Ditto	"The song we love so well" duettino		3	0
HAYES (Maria)	"I'm weary waiting"	Maria Hayes	3	0
Ditto	"Invitation," barcarolle, ...	ditto	3	0
HAGEMAN (F.)	Three duets for soprano voices	each	3	0
	No. 1. "The Invitation ;" No. 2. "The Quail ;" No. 3. "The Sisters."
HEINRICHSON (J.)	"Fleeting Joys."	J. J. Dilley	3	0
HERBEE (Rose) ...	"A day too late," ballad.	H. Herbee	3	0
HOLMES (W. H.) ..	"How beautiful is prayer," sacred song.	Mrs. M. V. Abbott	3	0
Ditto	"The song of the breeze"	Eleanor Dickenson	3	0
HORN (Charles)	"Dream not of me," Cavatina (violoncello, ad lib.) ..		3	0
HULLETT (C. H.)..	"Recollection"		3	0
JACKSON (John) ..	"Love and Beauty" (duet for ladies' voices).	Sir Walter Scott	3	0
Ditto	"The Savoyard's return," song.	H. Kirke White	3	0
JEUAN (W. Evans)	"Sing, sing"	Marian Barr	3	0
KEBLE (The Rev. J.)	Four Hymns, "Morning, evening, harvest, and wedding hymn," for soprano, mezzo, tenor, and bass (with a portrait of the Rev. J. Keble) ..		3	0
KINGSBURY (F.) ..	"Heil! Belgium" (La brabançonne) for one or four voices	W. Guernsey	3	0
KLOSS (W.)	"The Valiant Knight," song.	Knight Summers	4	0
KULLACK (C.)	"The Butterfly," Lied, (Schmetterling' Liuf'ges Ding.)	W. Guernsey	3	0
LACHNER (F.)	"A Morning Hymn" (soprano, alto, tenor, and bass) in score.	W. Guernsey	4	0
	Separate vocal parts to the above	each	0	6
LEALI (L.)	"In the woodlands," ballad.	Miss S.	3	0
L'EVESQUE (Bessie)	"The moon and the children," ballad.	Enchesin	4	0
Ditto	"O'er the blue ocean gleaming" (The Sailor's wife.)	Dr. Mackay	3	0
Ditto	"Far away," ballad		3	0
Ditto	"Where the sun shines brightest" (The bird's song.)	Rosa Anna Gunn	3	0
Ditto	"How beautiful is sunshine" (Serenade from the Spanish)		3	0
LINDBLAD	"My pretty bird, sing on" (No. 2 of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson's vocal répertoire, with a portrait of the celebrated singer). Ach! Betty! ah! ditt Betty		3	0
MAILLART (Aime)	"I was a bright blue flower" (Les fleurs d'automne). cantilene	W. Guernsey	3	0
MARAVIGLIA (G.)	"Bella, quel roseo aurora"		3	0
M'CARROLL (A.) ..	"My foreign home."	Rev. W. Norval, M.A.	3	0
MATHEWS (James)	"If I had but two little wings"	Coleridge	3	0
MEYERBEER (G.)..	"Joy to my heart," melody (Spring song).	W. Guernsey	3	0
MOLLER (C. C.)	"Upon the snowy mountain tops," Swedish melody, waltz (No. 1 of Mdlle. Nilsson's vocal répertoire, with a portrait of the celebrated singer) ..		3	0
MORGAN (Wilford)	"If you've a heart for me" (in C and E). F. Enoch		4	0
Ditto	"How long will thou forget me," with chorus, ad lib. (Xill Fenin)		4	0
MORLEY (H. Killick)	"Hope, the sailor's master," song. .. P. Benjamin		3	0
MONK (E. G.)	"Go, sit by the summer sea," old song, written about A.D. 1600		3	0
MULDER (R.)	"Lisbeth's polka," song by Mdlle. Liebhart (Vieni vieni, ognor fedel).	W. Guernsey	4	0
NESVILLD.	"Angel stars"	Adelaide A. Procter	4	0
Ditto	"Love, I fain would be"	do. ..	4	0
Ditto	"Links of a Golden Chain"	do. ..	4	0
NEWTON (William)	"Memory"	G. E. Newton	3	0
Ditto	"Come back again, darling"		3	0
Ditto	"Gem of my heart"	W. Hitchman, M.D.	3	0
NICOLAI (Otto)....	"One Word" (Ein mot un mot), duet (soprano and tenor)		3	0
OBERTHUR (C.)....	"The discovery," Lied, von Dr. Marx (Hat es ein Vogelein gesagt)	F. Romell	3	0
Ditto	"Love me," song	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"I would I were" (Je voudrais être), Romance, ...	L. Wray	3	0
	The above is also published with harp accompaniment		4	0
OFFENBACH (J.) ..	"I looked among the lily bells"		3	0
Ditto	"LISCUIS AND FANCHONS" operetta in one act complete		7	6
	Songs and duets separately :—
	No. 1. Song, "I'm hunted away" ..		3	0
	2. Song, "Little brooms come and buy" ..		4	0
	3. Duet, "I'm an Alsatian"		4	0
	4. Fable, "A city rat and a country rat" ..		3	0
	5. Duet (Finale), "Well, Frin, what's this"		4	0
PATTERSON (R. H.)	"The great sea calmly sleeping" ..		3	0

		Poetry by	s.	d.
PATTI (Adelina)....	"On parting" (The kiss, dear maid) (in D and E), ...	Lord Byron	4	0
PENNA (Frederic)..	"They named her name before me." Burlington Waltz		3	0
PHILOMELE.....	"Heaven-ward yearnings," sacred song		3	0
Ditto	"Stella's prophecy," song		3	0
Ditto	"Effie's bridal," ballad.	Francesca	3	0
Ditto	"Forlorn I wait," ballad		3	0
POOLE (F.)	"Tensive watching," serenade.. ..	H. J. St. Leger	3	0
PRENTICE (T. R.)..	"Queen of fresh flowers," a may song. Reginald Melner		3	0
Ditto	"Mother, blame me not for loving," ballad ..	L. M. Thornton	3	0
RANDEGGER (A.)..	"Medea," scena (sung by Mdlle. Thetjens at the Norwich Festival, and Madame Rudersdorff at the Gewandhaus Concerts)	Rudersdorff	7	0
REICHARDT (A.) ..	"Of thee I think" (Ich denke dein), Illustrated	J. Oxenford	4	0
RICCI (L. & F.)	"O peaceful night" (Bella siccome un angelo), romance from Ricci's opera, Crispino e la Comare	W. Guernsey	3	0
RICCI (F.)	"O bird of summer" (O rondinella che passi lo mare), ...		3	0
RICHARDS (Brinley)	"The Cambrian Pioneer," with chorus, ad lib. (in D and F)	H. Davies	4	0
Ditto	"The Cambrian war song,"	E. Gilbertson	4	0
ROECKEL (J. L.) ..	"Sunny Maid"		3	0
ROGERS (Edmund)	"Go, gentle breeze" (The winds' whisper)		3	0
ROSALINE	"Marita," song	W. Guernsey	3	0
ROSSINI (G.)	"Scenes wild and drear" (Selva opaca), in F. Romanza from the opera of Guglielmo Tell	W. Guernsey	3	0
RUSSELL (George)	"He hath remembered His mercy," sacred song (in E and G), from the 98th Psalm		3	0
SANDERSON (H.)	"The gipsies," duet, for soprano and mezzo, ...	K. Summers	4	0
SCHIRA (F.)	"Il Bello"		3	0
SCHUBERT (Franz)	"The sea shell" (Hers liebe gute mutter), ballad	W. Guernsey	3	0
SCHULTHES (W.)	"Song of the sea-fowler"	Mary Howitt	3	0
SCHLEYER (C. T.)	"Learn to live"		3	0
SMART (Henry).....	"The sunbeams," trio for soprano, mezzo, and contralto	Jessica Rankin	4	0
Ditto	"O breathe ye sweet roses," duet (contralto and baritone).	W. Guernsey	4	0
Ditto	"I wait to see the swallows come," duettino for soprano and mezzo	F. Enoch	4	0
Ditto	"The wind blows fresh from the land," duet for soprano and mezzo	F. Enoch	4	0
Ditto	"The fairy cricket," song	F. Enoch	3	0
Ditto	"Fly like a bird," song (in E and F) ..	F. Enoch	3	0
Ditto	"The roses I thought were mine," song (in B flat and D flat)	W. Guernsey	3	0
Ditto	"Go, whispering breeze"		3	0
Ditto	"Wake, Mary, wake" (sung by Mr. Santley).	J. Lacy	3	0
Ditto	"The echo of the lake," song (in A and F). F. Enoch		3	0
Ditto	"Stay, swallow, here," ballad.		3	0
Ditto	"The Abbess," song	W. H. Bellamy	3	0
Ditto	"O tell me not of sorrow"		3	0
Ditto	"The melting of the snow"	F. Enoch	3	0
Ditto	"Sir Roland"	Jessica Rankin	3	0
Ditto	"The Bird's Love Song"	do. Enoch	3	0
Ditto	"Star of the Valley"	do.	3	0
SMITH (F.)	"Not when lips are smiling"		3	0
SMITH (Miss).....	"A place in thy memory, dearest"		3	0
SNAITH (Walter)..	She never can be mine"	T. Loker	3	0
ST. LEGER (S. J.)..	"The tribute of a tear"	H. J. St. Leger	3	0
Ditto	"Hope on"	H. J. St. Leger	3	0
Ditto	"Ask not"	H. J. St. Leger	3	0
Ditto	"Doubt me not"	H. J. St. Leger	3	0
TAUBERT (W.)	"The meeting," Lied (Vom lichten Himmel Strahlet)	W. Guernsey	3	0
THORNTON (Cyril)	"The Wild Rose"		3	0
TOURS (Berthold)..	Three sacred songs .. .. .. each		3	0
	No. 1. "Faith ;" No. 2. "The Chapel ;" No. 3. "Isle of the Cross"
VALMENCY (R. de)	"Once more with thee" (Ancora lo son con te), duet for mezzo and baritone	Alicia J. Foot	4	0
WARD (Kate Lucy)	"The wearer"		4	0
WATTS (L. M.)	"Home to my heart"	Edward Noble	3	0
Ditto	"The Reason Why"	C. A. Doubble	3	0
WEBER (C. M. von)	"The spell" (Was sieht zu Deinem Zauberkreise)	H. J. St. Leger	3	0
WELLS (Wallace)..	"The sorrow of parting," ballad		3	0
WHITE (Clement)..	"When thou art far away," song. ..	J. Brougham	3	0
Ditto	"Those beautiful eyes"		3	0

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s. d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various kinds	7 6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	5 0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	2 6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonized in various ways, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard. ...	5 0
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7 6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 4s. each, or one vol., boards, 12s. This book, containing 53 Compositions, includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 59 of his best Pieces. ...	6 0
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 35. Six Books in one vol.	6 0
J. T. STONE'S ORGAN-BOOK, an arrangement of 18 Classical Compositions	6 0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.
46. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3—Op. 13, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
48. SONATAS, Op. 22—Op. 26—Op. 27, No. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
49. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastorale), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
50. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53—Op. 54 (Aparionata), and Op. 57.
51. SONATAS, Op. 78—Op. 79 (Characteristique)—Op. 81—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
52. SONATAS, Op. 106—Op. 109—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.
129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Op. 3), 4 (Fantasia and Sonata), 3, 2.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Complete in one volume, 6s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complete in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.
134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42). No. 2 (Op. 53.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 120.) No. 4 (Op. 122.) No. 6 (Op. 143.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 147.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, Nos. 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS FOR PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 48 to 80 pages, including Overture.

FIGARO	GRAND DUCHESS
ROBERT LE DIABLE	FIDELIO
DON JUAN	BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA
LUCREZIA BORGIA	SONNAMBULA
DER FREISCHUTZ	BALLO IN MASCHERA
CRISPINO E LA COMARE	TRAVIATA
TROVATORE	MARTHA
NORMA	WILLIAM TELL
DON PASQUALE	CROWN DIAMONDS
FRA DIAVOLO	MARANIELLO
RIGOLETTO	DOMINO NOIR
ZAMPA

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 6s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF
BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.
138. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and "Oh ownes vous aller ?"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY.
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VOLKSLIEDER for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring," "Soldaten Lied," "True Love," &c.
146. STEPHEN HELLER'S 24 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s.; post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.
94. 95. BATTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original composi tions, published in no other collection.
97. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BALFE, HAWES, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY, ALEXANDER LEE, &c.
83. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep," "My Pretty Page," "As it fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Lesson Duet," &c.
6. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
44. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
43. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
93. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET
Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.
1. TWENTY-FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CREATION, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S FIFTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND HESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS.
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, KUHE, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.

SHILLING BOOKS OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.
113. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
100. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
120. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LA ROSE, and LILLIE DALE
117. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete.
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
23. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
99. FRANZ SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS, and SIX MOMENS MUSICAUX. All complete.
97. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Fortanel," "Sonnambula," &c.
86. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Sacred Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
85. STEPHEN HELLER'S PROMENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
82. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
84. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS.
79. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Paries et Amamus," "Il Corricolo," &c.
33, 34, 35. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.	WALPURGIS NIGHT.
HAYDN'S IMPERIAL MASS.	BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.	ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.	MOZART'S REQUIEM.
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.	DETTINGEN TE DEUM
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.	ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE MESSIAH.	THE CREATION.

	s.	d.
BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees	2	0
BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 20 Glees	2	6
THE CHORALIST, 36 Part-songs. 1 vols. each	5	0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	1	0
The above Works, for Societies in quantity numbers.
THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs ...	6	0
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 86 Part-songs for village and school use	6	0

LONDON:
BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Printed by HENDERSON, RAIT, and FARROW, at No. 33, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex. Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, June 18, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART AFFRAIS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 20s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 3—No. 26. SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1870. PRICE { 6d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—GREAT ROSE SHOW.

Fashionable Promenade, and German Gymnastic Society's Display, THIS DAY. This is the most interesting of all the flower shows held during the season. The universal admiration of the national flower, its numberless varieties, ranging from purest white to table, its delicious odour, and the immense number of specimens collected, combine to render the Rose Show pre-eminent among the flower shows of the season. It was at the Crystal Palace that the first Rose Show was held, and each year some new attractive feature has been introduced.

The Display will take place in the Open Theatre, which will be handsomely fitted up as a dining room.

In the Concert Hall there will be an exhibition of articles suitable for table decoration, contributed by the following eminent manufacturers—Messrs. Powell & Sons, Copeland, H. Green & Son, and Mortlock.

The great stage will be specially decorated with fountains, foliage, statuary, &c.

Music is an important feature on these occasions; and, in addition to the usual performances during the day by the orchestral and military bands, at 4 o'clock, a grand combined performance will take place on the Great Handel Orchestra, conducted by Mr. MANN.

The Palace will be open, as usual, at 10; the Show will be open at about 12; the gardens of Rockhills will be open for promenade from 4 till 6:30.

The Coldstream Guards Band, under Mr. F. Godfrey, will play during the display.

Admission on st covers. 5s Guinea Season Tickets, free.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

This Evening (Saturday) Rossini's Opera, "OTELLO." Otello, Signor Mongini; Roderigo, Signor Gardoni; Iago, M. Faure (his second appearance in that character); Elmiro, Signor Foli; Emilia, Mdlle. Carl; and Desdemona, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her second appearance in that character). Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

Monday, June 27th, 3rd time, "LUCREZIA BORGIA." Maeel di Nanglis, Signor Mongini; Il Conte di St. Bris, M. FAURE; il Conte di Verona, Mr. Santley; Marcello, Signor Foli; Rugneson Gelbier, Signor Rinaldini; Tavannes, Signor Archini; Don Conni, Mr. Lyall; De Retz, Signor Mora, Signor Castelli; Maurevert, Signor Zobeli; Copetinoco, Signor Ragnor; Dama d'Onore, Madame Corsi; Bohemienne, Mdlle. Fiorelli; Urbano, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Margherita di Valois, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; and Valentina, Madame Barbot.

Tuesday, June 28, "LE NOZZE DI FIGARO." Il Conte, Mr. Santley; Figaro, M. Faure; Bartolo, Signor Castelli; Basilio, Signor Mongini; Signor Zobeli; Don Curzio, Signor Rinaldini; Marcellina, Madame Corsi; Cherubino, Mdlle. Pauline Lewinsky; Susanna, Madame Vilda Frigini, and Rosina, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her second appearance in that character).

Thursday, June 30, Mozart's Opera, "DON GIOVANNI." Don Giovanni, M. Faure; Don Ottavio, Signor Gardoni; Commendatore, Signor Foli; Masetto, Signor Rinelli; Leporello, Mr. Santley. The minuet will be danced by Mdlle. Fiorelli, Zerlina, Mdlle. Pauline Lewinsky (her first appearance in the character); Donna Anna, Madame Barbi-; and Donna Elvira, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

On SATURDAY, July 2, a favourite Opera, in which Mdlle. Christine Nilsson will appear.

Acting Manager .. .. Mr. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle 10 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s 6d.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Instituted 1822.—

Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1830.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CHRISTIAN.
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

President—The EARL OF DUDLEY.
Principal—PROFESSOR W. STERNDALE BENNETT.

The next STUDENTS' CONCERT, open to Subscribers, Members, and Associates, will take place at the Institution on TUESDAY Evening, the 30th June, commencing at Eight o'clock.

MR. OBERTHÜR'S MATINÉE.

UNDER the Immediate Patronage of HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF WELLINGTON. Mr. OBERTHUR'S MATINEE MUSICALE, on WEDNESDAY, June 29th, at his Residence, 14, Talbot Road, Westbourne Park. Artists—Mdlle. Orgeni, Miss E. Armstrong, Mdme. Osborne Williams, M. J. Ledvri, Chevalier A. de Kontski, Herr L. Straus, M. Albert, Mr. Hallett Sheppard, Herr Lehmeyer, Mr. Oberthur. Tickets, 10s. 6d., to be had at Lonsdale's, Schott's, or of Mr. Oberthür.

GAIETY THEATRE,

STRAND.

Sole Lessee and Manager . . . Mr. JOHN HOLLINGSHEAD.

MDLLE. GEORGI,

(From La Scala, Milan)

Has the honour to announce (under Royal and Distinguished Patronage)

A GRAND

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL MATINÉE

On WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29TH, 1870.

On which occasion the following Eminent Artists, amongst others, will appear :—

Madame VOLPINI, Mdlle. CONSTANCE GEORGI (by kind permission of Charles Reade, Esq.), and Mdlle. GEORGI; Mr. SANTLEY, Signor GARDONI, Signor VERGER, and Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER; Mr. J. L. TOOLE, Miss E. FARREN, Miss CONSTANCE LOSEBY, Mr. PERRINI, and other Members of the Gaiety Company.

The Performances will comprise :—AN OPERETTA, A POPULAR FARCE, A MISCELLANEOUS CONCERT, AN OPERATIC SCENE (with Mdlle. Georgi), A SCENE FROM A POPULAR DRAMA (with Mdlle. CONSTANCE GEORGI).

Doors open at Two. Performances to commence at 2 30. Carriages 5.30.

Prices :—Orchestral Stalls, 10s ; Balcony Stalls, 10s ; Upper Boxes, 3s ; Pit, 2s ; Amphitheatre, 1s ; Private Boxes, from £1 1s

The Musical Arrangements under the Direction of Herr MAYER LUTZ.

Stage Manager .. .. Mr. R. SOUTAR.

Places may be secured at once at the Theatre, the Chief Libraries, and at Mdlle. Georgi's Residence, 31, Harley Street.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S FOURTH and LAST GRAND CONCERT this season, MONDAY MORNING NEXT, June 27th, at St. James's Hall, commencing at half-past two. Soloists—Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Madame Sinico, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Gardoni, Signor Foli, Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, and Mr. Sims Reeves, who will make his only appearance in Sacred Music during the London season. Conductor—Mr. HENRY LESLIE.—Reserved sofa stalls, £1 1s; area stalls, 10s. 6d.; balcony stalls (front row), 10s.; balcony stalls, 10s. 6d.; unreserved area, 5s.; balcony, 3s; upper balcony, 2s. 6d. Tickets at Cramer & Co.'s, 201, Regent Street, and 43, Moorgate Street, City; and Austin's Office, St. James's Hall.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, Conductor, Mr. W. G. CUSINS.—"Honour to Beethoven."—LAST CONCERT, ST. JAMES'S HALL, Monday, July 4th, at Eight o'clock. Programme selected entirely from Beethoven's works, including symphonies No. 1 and No. 8 (choral); choral fantasia, pianoforte, Mdme Arabella Goddard; Berrichon' chorus; overture, Leonora, in C; &c. Stalls, 10s. 6d. and 7s. Tickets, 5s. and 2s. 6d.—Lambora Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; Mitchell's, Chappell's, Oliver's, Keith Prowse's; Alfred Hays; and Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

MUSIC PRACTICE FOR SALE.

A SUCCESSOR is wanted by a Gentleman. Income between £400 and £500 per annum, in one of the principal towns in Scotland. Terms—the amount of last year's income. A good musician would be certain to succeed. For further particulars address "Music," care of J. Pardie, 63, Princes Street, Edinburgh.

MISS BANKS will sing (first time) "AH! MY HEART IS WEARY" (new song by KATE LUCY WARD, composer of "The Weaver"), at Miss Walton's Concert, June 27th.—WESLEY & Co.

MDLLE. DRASDIL will sing "HE IS UPON THE LONELY DEEP" (new and successful song by KATE LUCY WARD, composer of "The Weaver"), on June 27th, and July 7th.—WESLEY & Co., 16, Hanover Street.

A PROFESSIONAL MAN, residing in a healthy and fashionable Watering Place, receives an ARTICLED PUPIL who has some knowledge of the Organ and Choral Singing. Moderate Premium. Splendid instrument and unusual Musical advantages. Address, J. D., Holmby House, London Road, Lower Clapton, London.

Digitized by Google

MONDAY, JULY 4th.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD begs to announce that her MATINEE MUSICALE will take place, by kind permission of the Marquis of Downshire, at 24, BELGRAVE SQUARE, on MONDAY, July 4th, to commence at Three o'clock. Further particulars will be duly announced.

CHARLES and ARTHUR LE JEUNE'S THIRD EVENING CONCERT will take place at the ARCHITECTURAL ROOMS, 9, Conduit Street, W., on TUESDAY Next, June 28th, at Eight o'clock. The programme will include original compositions for their Harmonium Combination, and two for the Pianoforte, first time of performance. They will also play on the new Americus Chamber Organ. Vocalist—Madame Talbot Cherer. Tickets to be had at Chappell's, 50, New Bond Street; and of Keith & Prowse, 48, Cheapside. No tickets at the Rooms.

MISS MARY ELIZABETH WALTON (of the Conservatoire, Leipsic) begs to announce her ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT, under the immediate Patronage of H.R.H. the Duchess of Cambridge, H.R.H. the Princess Mary Adelaide Princess Teck, His Grace the Archbishop of York and Mrs. Thomson, at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, MONDAY Next, commencing at Half-past Two. Artists—Mdlles. Liebhart, Katherine Poyntz, Thaddeus Wells, (Salisbury), Zuliani, Fairman, Osborne Williams, and Banks; Messrs. Alfred Baylis, Trelawny Cobham, Waldeck, and Maybrick. Pianoforte—Miss Mary Elizabeth Walton. Violin—Mr. H. Weist Hill. Violoncello—M. Albert. Conductors—Messrs. Kingsbury, Lehmeyer, Osborne Williams, Ganz, and Francesco Berger. Stalls, 10s. 6d. Family Tickets (admitting Three), One Guinea; to be obtained at the Rooms, and of Miss Walton, 37, Harley Street, W.

MDME. MONTSERRAT has the honour to announce that her ANNUAL EVENING CONCERT, under the patronage of Lady Marian Alford, and Lady Elizabeth Cust, will take place at ST. GEORGE'S HALL, July 6th. Full particulars and names of Artists will be duly announced.—16, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W.

MDME. MONTSERRAT (Contralto) is open to Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, etc. For Terms, and Lessons, Address, 16, Upper Berkeley Street West, Connaught Square, Hyde Park, W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. EMANUEL'S new song, "THE CHARM," this, 30th, Hanover Square Rooms, July 7th, and at his other principal Engagements. Address for Concerts, Oratorios, &c., 32, Old Bond Street.

MISS BANKS will sing BENEDICT'S "ROCK ME TO SLEEP," and WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S romance, "A SUMMER EVE," at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Miss Elizabeth Walton's Grand Concert, June 27th.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC. Scholarships and unusual advantages. Students' Concert, Hanover Square, THIS DAY, June 28th.—Norfolk Road, Bayswater. F. WEBB, Sec.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

Now Ready,

SACRED CANTATA, "BLOW YE THE TRUMPET IN ZION," by G. WARWICK JORDAN, Mus. Bac., Oxon. Price, handsomely bound, 5s.; in paper covers, 3s. Suitable for Choral Societies. Advantageous terms may be made with the composer for large quantities, and the Band parts obtained. NOVELLO & Co., London.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ARBOUR," sung by Miss ANYON, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC, just issued by ROBERT COCKS & CO., Publishers to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, and H.I.M. Napoleon III.

The Morgan March. Brinley Richards. 3s.
Andante in B flat (Mendelssohn). Johann Müller. 3s.
Le Triomphe (Galop di Bravura). Kornatzki. 4s.
The Ash Grove (New Edition). Brinley Richards. 3s.
Haydn's Gloria in Excelsis, from his Imperial Mass. Geo. F. West. 3s.
A Maiden's Dream (Nocturne). G. Lange. 3s.
Robert Cocks & Co.'s Musical Box. L. Liebich. The first he composed. 3s.
Rustling Leaves (Idylle). G. Lange. 4s.
God Bless the Prince of Wales. Brinley Richards. 4s.
All the above post free at Half-price.
London, New Burlington Street. Order everywhere.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS.
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

"." Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"LITTLE WILLIE."

"LITTLE WILLIE." By JULES BENEDICT. Sung with distinguished success by

MISS EDITH WYNNE,

at Mr. Benedict's Concerts, is published, price 3s., by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Published This Day,

"I FIND OUT WHOM I LOVE,"

SONG.

Words (by permission) from

"THE YOUNG LADIES OF GREAT BRITAIN."

Music by R. T. GIBBONS.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"OLGA,"

PENSÉE POUR PIANO.

PAR

LOUIS DIEHL.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THE WILD ROSEBUD,"

SONG.

Sung by Miss EDITH WYNNE. The Words by GOETHE.

The Music by JOSEPHINE WILLIAMS, R.A.M.

Price 3s.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

"CHILDREN'S SUMMER FEAST."

CHORUS IN UNISON.

The Words from "The Afterglow" (with the Author's permission).

The Music, composed expressly for Children, by

CIRO PINSUTI.

Price 6d.

Published by LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63 & 63, New Bond Street.

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND AND MASTER, E. BUCK, ESQ., MUS. DOC

"FAREWELL,"

SONG.

Sung by Mrs. H. EGERTON MUNRO, the Words by LORD BYRON.

The Music by GEORGE GAFF.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Where may be obtained, Composed by GEORGE GAFF,

"MAIDEN, WRAP THY MANTLE ROUND THEE."

BY KI TE.

Digitized by Google

THE ITALIAN OPERAS—COVENT GARDEN.

(From the "Saturday Review," June 18.)

Once again we are blessed with two establishments for the representation of opera in the Italian language. We say "of opera in the Italian language," because such an institution as a bond fide Italian opera, at which music and performers are exclusively Italian, is a thing of the past—gone, in all probability, never to return. Whether this be for good or for evil, we are hardly prepared to say; but with regard to the fact there cannot be a doubt. Even when the works of an illustrious Italian musician, Cherubini for example, are called upon to vary and enrich the repertory, what he composed for the Italian stage is never thought of, but what he composed for the French stage, to French libretti, is resorted to as a matter of course. A noticeable instance has been offered in Médée, and another is now promised in Les Deux Journées. About this question there is a good deal to say on both sides; but the present is not the time to discuss it. We have to treat of Italian opera under such conditions as are immediately vouchsafed to us.

The co-existence of two houses, whatever risk it may entail upon speculators, is an advantage to the public. Last season, when Messrs. Gye and Mapleson joined fortunes, the amount of enterprise was reduced to a minimum. The services of Sir Michael Costa, Signor Mario, Mdlle. Paulina Lucca, and others were dispensed with; Madame Adelina Patti appeared, evening after evening, in the same familiar parts; while Mdlle. Christine Nilsson was heard in one new opera—an opera which, like a single scene, would have stood little chance of permanent acceptance. In fact, so barren a season, with such resources at command, is unparalleled. The "coalition," however, can hardly be said even now to have broken up, Messrs. Gye and Mapleson being still the dominvitate at Covent Garden. But among the artistes who formed the Maplesonian contingent in 1869, when the much talked of alliance was ratified, one only of considerable importance belongs to the actual Covent Garden troop. We naturally refer to Mdlle. Tietjens. Mdlle. Scalchi is a contralto of more than average ability, but Mdlle. Bauermeister a fair comprimario. These named, however, all are named, excepting certain members of the orchestra and chorus (including Mr. Carrodus, leading violin) who went over to Covent Garden when Signor Arditi consented to share the office of conductor with Signor Li Calsi.

Notwithstanding the loss of several distinguished artists engaged to them last year, the directors of the Royal Italian Opera have still a generally efficient company. To encounter the formidable opposition at Drury Lane no little strength was demanded. The result is that we have got back Mdlle. Adelina Patti, Paoline Lucca and Signor Mario—a gain to frequenters of the theatre not to be lightly estimated. Then, as a matter of course, Madame Adelina Patti occupies the place which, for eight or nine years, she has held undisputed, as "Etoile des étoiles" among prime donne—the legitimate successor of Madame Angiolina Bosio, with a dramatic genius to which that accomplished vocalist could by no means pretend. Mdlle. Vanzini, too, the American—"comprimaria," at best, by right of natural gifts and ability, but prima donna, on occasion, when the "prima donna assoluta" take repose—again "finds" in the company, together with Madame Dell'Anese and Mdlle. Locatelli, who have for some years filled subordinate parts at the Covent Garden Opera. In the men's department, besides Signor Mario, already named, we have had—to complete the list of tenors—the German Formes, but it may be remembered as "created" Jason, in Medea, when Cherubini's tragic masterpiece was first produced, for Mdlle. Tietjens, at Her Majesty's Theatre; Herr Wachtel, another German, who, four years ago (his second trial in London), failed to make an impression that few ever dreamed of his adventuring among us again; Signor Mandin, the original Vasco di Gama of the Africaine, perhaps his chief distinction, though assuredly not his only one, if industry and versatility count for anything; and Signor Marino, the Hidalgo, very serviceable in his way, as we have been occasionally reminded this season. Of baritones and basses Messrs. Gye and Mapleson have enough and to spare, despite the loss of Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, &c., now attached to Drury Lane. But on the whole it must be admitted that, in their instance, quality hardly mates with quantity. Of Signor Graziani, with his fine though limited voice, and eager ambition to figure as an actor, we need say nothing; Signor Cotogni is a baritone of all trades—from Hamlet to Figaro; M. Petit in the Mephistophiles of M. Gounod's Faust, by right of his having been the original when that singularly over-estimated opera was produced at the Paris Théâtre Lyrique; Signor Bagagiolo, who has a voice which atones in some measure for lack of dramatic talent and certain deficiencies as a singer, in chief bass; and Signor Campi, a basso in his way, but only a secondo." With these are associated Signor Tagliafico, now nearly voiceless, yet more than ever intelligent, and as representative of small "characterparts," sui generis, unique; Signori Fallar, Casaboni, Caravoglia, and Rossi, subordinates; and, for buffo assoluto, Signor Ciampi, whose continued tenure of a place filled of old by such artists as Lablache and Ronconi, seeing that Signor Ciampi is not possessed of a single qualification for it, is one of the most significant existing indications of the decadence of Italian opera. The foregoing, with the unvarnished exception of Signor Caravoglia, all belonged to the old Covent Garden company. But, not content with these, Messrs. Gye and Mapleson prudently sought out reinforcements; and some singers unknown to London were engaged. We have had a new seconda donna —Mdlle. Olma; a new contralto—Mdlle. Cari; a new tenor—Signor Vizzani; a new comprimario—Miss Maddigan; and a new prima donna assoluta—Mdlle. Matilde Sessi. The seconda donna is so completely a novice that the mere fact of bringing her forward at such a theatre as the Royal Italian Opera shows an indifference to public appreciation almost without example. The contralto, after making a very good impression as Maffeo Orsini, in Lucrezia Borgia, was discarded and allowed to go over to the other theatre. The tenor has, up to this time, only appeared in one part (Manrico, in Il Trovatore), his performance giving rise to conflicting opinions. The soprano (Mdlle. Sessi), although at present little of an actress and hardly a singer of the first class, has done valuable service

How to pass from the stage to the orchestra: how well the new system of employing two conductors has answered may be gathered from the fact that, with two companies as well as two conductors, much less was done last year than previously, when one conductor held supreme authority. Nevertheless, although Signor Arditi has joined the rival establishment at Drury Lane, and Signor Li Calsi, for reasons unexplained, has seceded, we have once more two conductors at the Royal Italian Opera. One of them, Signor Vianesi, who directs the music at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburgh, is, if we may be allowed to judge from a short experience, expert and ready at his vocation; of the other, Signor Bevignani, as much cannot with truth be affirmed. Thus, what the able conductor may succeed in doing the less able conductor is as likely as possible to undo; and Signor Bevignani gives promise of being a perpetual a drawback to Signor Vianesi as Signor Li Calsi was, last year, to Signor Arditi. We have no wish to reconsider the differences which led to Sir Michael Costa's retiring from the post he used to occupy with such distinction; but we have little hesitation in saying that, with the excellent co-conductor to attend a performance and Signor Bevignani, he would find it difficult to recognize his aid and well-tried orchestra—once the most famous in Europe. On the other hand the chorus at the Royal Italian Opera is excellent—thanks to the foreign reinforcements brought to it by Mr. Mapleson. And yet there are not, at least so far as our information goes, two chorus-masters, any more than there two stage-managers, two ballet-masters, or, to adopt the conventional phrase, two "principal scenic artists"; though why not these—why not, in short, to exhaust the theory suggested by two orchestral conductors (and two directors), a double staff altogether, to emulate the rival Harlequins, Columbines, Clowns and Pantaloons in a Drury Lane pantomime—is, under the circumstances, difficult to understand.

Having set forth at length and in detail the resources, vocal and instrumental, at the disposal of Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, we have now to consider what has actually been done since the opening of the theatre. In the way of novelties there has been nothing to speak of. True, only two were announced in the prospectus—an opera, entitled Esmeralda, by Signor Campana, whose previous effort at Her Majesty's Theatre, in 1869, Il Guarany, reduced to Pecolomini, hardly justified the belief that he would again be put forth at one of our Italian lyric theatres as a champion of modern art, and Signor Verdi's often advertised Macbeth. The repertory of the Royal Italian Opera is, however, very extensive, consisting, on its official assumption of the matter, than forty-nine works, and within a period little exceeding two months the directors have been able to produce three-and-twenty of them in a more or less complete and satisfactory manner. Thus, one after another, there came Lucia di Lammermoor, the Huguenots, Guillaume Tell, Fidelio, Lucrezia Borgia, La Figlia del Reggimento, Il Flauto Magico, Les Travaiteurs, Medea (Cherubini's, of course), Masaniello (second and third acts only!),* Lucia di Lammermoor, the Huguenots, Guillaume Tell, Faust et Marguerite, the Sonnambula, the Favorita, Martha, Hamlet, the Africaine, Le Nozze di Figaro, Dinorah, the Trovatore, and Fra Diavolo. How these familiar works were cast, and how performed, may be gathered from the list of artists set forth in the preamble. We shall not be expected to go over old ground; and a word or two about some of the singers, more especially about Mdlle. Sessi, who, as a stranger, puts forth the highest pretensions, will suffice.

The opera which, to employ the conventional term, "inaugurated" the season was a well-worn one; but the chief character being allotted to a young soprano unknown to the English public, Lucia di Lammermoor was heard under conditions which nowadays alone can recommend it. How badly off must we be for dramatic composers when such a piece as this of Donizetti's—not to speak of half a dozen other pieces of like calibre—can hold the stage of Europe as it were in perpetuity! And yet Lucia in the shape of a prepossessing newcomer, with voice and artistic acquirements enabling her to go creditably through the part, must always, until better things are at hand, be welcomed. Mdlle. Matilde Sessi, if she does not warrant the enthusiastic laudation of French critics, boasts undeniable qualifications. Much has been said and written about her profusion of fair hair, the charm of which, unlike that of Horace's Pyrrha, is not so much in the binding up as in the letting loose; but she has other things besides an abundant natural head-dress to recommend her. Her voice is of agreeable quality, especially good in the upper tones, and flexible enough to cope with the most elaborate passages of the Italian school. The music of Donizetti seems to come to her quite naturally. Her most effective display, vocally considered, is that of Lucia's madness, her

* The idea of two acts from so genuine a masterpiece as Auber's Masaniello being made to serve as "tag" to La Figlia and Don Pasquale is another sign of decadence least effective, perhaps, that of the signing of the contract. Without going into further details, we may add that the impression created by Mdlle. Sessi has been generally favourable. She does not shine as an actress; nor are her personal endowments such as to lend poetical illusion to the scene. That she is small in stature, however, says nothing—Madame Patti and Mdlle. Lucca being equally under the middle size; but there is a want of mobility in her features, which under all circumstances wear a stereotyped expression. Though by no means ever-well supported by her associates, Mdlle. Sessi on the night of her first appearance was received with every token of encouragement. The few words of criticism we have given to her Lucia may apply with equal fairness to the various parts she has since undertaken, and which we leave her title to consideration. It has been asserted that Mdlle. Sessi shines more in comic than in serious opera. We confess our inability to see the distinction. She has no histrionic genius; and, were it not that neither actually represents anything, her comedy might be tragedy and her tragedy might be comedy. As Maria in La Figlia del Reggimento, or as Norina in Don Pasquale, her physiognomy is as perversely immobile and her gestures are as perversely conventional as in Lucia, Astrafiammante, or Ophelia. Yet about Mdlle. Sessi's versatility there cannot possibly be a question. Every part seems to come ready to her hands. She has not only successfully essayed the characters we have enumerated, but has added to them the lachrymose Violetta of Verdi's Traviata, and the lively Susanna in Mozart's Nozze di Figaro—furthermore, on a recent occasion, appearing substitute for Madame Adelina Patti, as Zerlina, in Don Giovanni, and issuing from the ordeal with untarnished laurels. That Mdlle. Sessi will ever be an actress is hard to believe; dramatic instinct seems to be denied her; but that she has the means of becoming, with perseverance, a singer of almost, if not absolutely, the first class, we are convinced. It has been within the province of few to execute the difficult bravura music of the "Queen of Night," in Mozart's Flauto Magico, and that of the operas of the modern Italian school with equal facility. Such, nevertheless, is Mdlle. Sessi; and as such it behoves amateurs to watch with interest her future career.

Digitized by Google

Years bring no improvement to Herr Wachtel, who is now just what he was on the occasion of his first visit to England (in June 1862), when, with Mdlle. Adeline Patti, he appeared in Lucia as "Arturo, voz et præterea nihil. In his best days Herr Wachtal could not sing; his pronunciation of the Italian language was unpardonable; and an occasionally vacant stare—as though he was (to quote the late Mr. Dickens) "looking intensely over" crowds up the stem, and not into his shifts and resources as an actor. Herr Wachtel's sudden retreat, on account of some supposed misunderstanding with Madame Patti, to which the daily papers have given a sort of vague publicity, cannot be looked upon as a misfortune for the Directors of the Royal Italian Opera. In Guglielmo Tell, in the Huguenots, and above all in Don Giovanni (as Don Ottavio), he had declared himself no less incompetent than in Lucia di Lammermoor. Dr. Gunz, who has also left us, simply because his engagement was for a short period, belongs to a different school. His voice is hard and ungrateful, but he is an artist, an artist of intelligence, which his performances as Jason (Medea) and Tamino (Il Flauto Magico) are enough to prove. Signor Marie's return has been hailed with unanimous satisfaction; for though his voice is now but a wreck of what it used to be, when he does (which is not seldom) sing a phrase in his old manner, it is a phrase sung as no other than Signor Marie can sing it; while, as an actor, at this moment he remains facile princeps, distancing all competitors—of which one scene in the Favorita not to name his striking impersonation of Raoul in the Huguenots, is sufficient, but impartial judges. It is cruelty to so brilliant a singer and consummate an actress as Madame Patti to bring her forward, evening after evening, with parts in which we have known and admired her almost from the outset of her career—Rosina, Amina, Zerlina (Don Giovanni), and so forth. Her almost only chance of new distinction this season has been afforded by Meyerbeer's Dinorah, in her assumption of the demented heroine of which, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska excepted, she is unrivalled. To Mdlle. Patti rather than to Mdlle. Sessi—who, by the way, has been taken from her many of her best characters, as Lucia, Norina (Don Pasquale), and Maria (La Figlia del Reggimento) among the rest—should have been assigned the part of Ophelia, as to the only singer who had a chance of equalling, if not, indeed, of surpassing, the remarkable impersonation of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, and thus of keeping upon the stage of Covent Garden (it cannot be given at Drury Lane, being the exclusive property of the rival theatre) the grave and elaborate opera of M. Ambroise Thomas. Mdlle. Pauline Lucca has returned with all those provoking imperfections, as singer and actress, which, while themselves exercising a certain indescribable fascination, prevent her from becoming what her great natural endowments ought to make her. That Mdlle. Lucca is a genius in her way, we are ready to admit; but that she can ever be a lyrical artist appears to us almost impossible. Even her best characters—Valentine, in the Huguenots, and Selika, in the Africaine of Meyerbeer—want something more to be unconditionally accepted as exemplifications of legitimate art; her Zerlina, in Fra Diavolo, in a sprightly piece of acting, and no more; her Leonora, in the Favorita, has one impressive scene (the last); her Margaret, in Faust is as full of blemishes as of beauties; her Cherubino, in the Nozze di Figaro, in a lively caricature at the best, showing, moreover, incapability to enter into the spirit of Mozart's music, music as Orpheus as it is unaffected, music utterly spoiled by such torturing of the time and overstrained expression as Mdlle. Lucca exhibits—for instance, in "Voi che sapete," which is nothing if not flowing. It is a pity that so much of good should find so much to counteract it, as in the talent of this lady, who possesses a soprano voice almost unparalleled in splendour; and if she could make herself mistress of the Italian language, might become an ornament to the Italian lyric boards.

Mdlle. Tietjens is now what Mdlle. Tietjens has been for some time—in certain respects the finest dramatic singer on the stage. It is no little to say of her that, when she retires, such operas as Fidelio and Medea must inevitably be laid upon the shelf. That this unquestionably great artist should have made herself so common by singing in and out of season is much to be regretted; and if she forms no longer the popular attraction she used to be it can only be thus explained. Mdlle. Tietjens, however, has earned new distinction recently by consenting to play the part of Gertrude in Hamlet—on Saturday of the first order. Last year, it is true, the Ophelia was Mdlle. Nilsson; this year it is Mdlle. Sessi; but Mdlle. Tietjens, in her own department, that of high tragedy, had as little to fear from Mdlle. Nilsson as she had to fear from Mdlle. Sessi. We have to ask to-day to probe the question further. Enough that Mdlle. Tietjens now represents the Queen, and represents it so admirably that she not only creates the strongest impression, but, in one scene (the great scene between Hamlet and his mother), almost, by force of example, makes an actor of Signor Cotogni—the Hamlet of the period.

On Tuesday night (since the foregoing observations were in type) Messrs. Gye and Mapleson's principal novelty for the season—the opera of Esmeralda —was produced. An article might with fairness be exclusively devoted to such an event; but in this instance we should have been compelled to manufacture the article out of nothing. Esmeralda is unquestionably the worst Italian opera ever produced in London since Almina, in 1860; and, as the composer of Almina is also the composer of Esmeralda, no comparison may, at least, be credited with consistency. What he was ten years earlier he is precisely now. He has neither receded nor advanced. We sympathize with Signor Cimino, an Italian author of some literary distinction, who has constructed, on the probably groundless hint cast out of M. Victor Hugo's well-known romance—though inevitably dispensing with Quasimode, next to Esmeralda the most interesting personage.* We sympathize still more with Madame Adelina Patti, who makes such an ideal character of the heroine as to excite regret that she has not been supplied with music as captivating as that to which Carlotta Grisi, still remembered as the pearl of "danseuses," had to mime and dance, a quarter of a century ago, at Her Majesty's Theatre, when, under the memorable direction of Mr. Lumley, the ballet was brought out his famous book of the opera. It is as well to state here that the reported success of Esmeralda at St. Petersburgh is a delusion. It was given three times only—with Madame Volpini (not Madame Patti) as the heroine. Madame Volpini is an extremely clever artist; but we doubt if she could have thrown half the spirit into the character, or invested it with half the poetical charm, which Madame Patti exhibits. Twice the genius of Madame Patti, however, would fail to secure an abiding success for music that is beneath criticism; and such is the music of Signor Campana—music as destitute of originality as it is destitute of grace. If a man has nothing to say, and yet cannot say it in polished language, we forgive him, because what he says, however linguistically ill-expressed, may be something we have not heard before; but if a man has nothing to say, and speaks at once both wisely and ungrammatically, we set him down as an unmitigated bore. It would serve no purpose whatever to attempt to bolster up Signor Campana's opera with this and that reservation. It is irredeemably bad, and should never have been accepted at such a theatre as the Royal Italian Opera. If it be true that Madame Patti was the cause of its being given, we entertain compliment her upon her taste; and for that reason we are less disposed to regret the inutility of the exertions she uses to captivate her audience. What the applause, "encores," and recalls "of "first nights," signify no one knows better than Madame Patti herself. The manner in which unsual on the occasion under notice. Mdlle. Scalchi who plays Estella, Esmeralda's mother (made disagreeably prominent by Signor Cimino the libretto), Signor Neudin who sings the music such as it is, allotted to Captain Phœbus wonderfully well, and Signor Graziani, whose Gaudi Frollo is about as mysterious as his Rigoletto or his Nelusko, are burdened with less responsibility, but claim consideration, inasmuch as they do all in their power to induce people to believe that they are in earnest. We must credit the Covent Garden directors with the fact that the expenditure they have bestowed upon the "getting up" of Esmeralda might be represented by the smallest imaginable amount. They have indeed, done nothing whatever for it in the way of "mise en scène;" and, seriously we cannot blame them. Our only complaint is that, under any circumstances, they should have thought it expedient to bring out such a work. Several operas by Verdi are unknown to England; or, if Verdi is looked upon as stale, there is his successor (and imitator) Signor Petrella, of whose music not a note is familiar here; or, again, if enough has been heard of Verdi and his school, and something fresh is indispensable, there are composers among us able to write twenty times better than Signor Campana. Such an opera as Esmeralda can only be ridiculed by musicians and connoisseurs; while the

* Our contemporary might also have taken notice of the absence of Gringoire, Esmeralda's improvized husband.—Ed. M. W.

Digitized by Google

chance of its winning favour with the general public is to the last degree remote.

Awaiting the next novelty—Verdi's Macbeth—we have no more to say at present about the Royal Italian Opera, which, certain deficiencies allowed for, still holds its own and may still proudly claim to be regarded as one of the first lyric theatres in Europe. Our next notice will be devoted to some account of what has been done, up to this time, at the rival establishment in Drury Lane Theatre.

BEETHOVEN AND J. J. ROUSSEAU COMPARED.

(From the "Guide Musical.")

According to La Fontaine's remark, Genius is like Fortune; in nearly every instance, it makes one pay very dearly for what it appears to give. Beethoven's share was immense; but he paid for it more dearly than anyone else for his, more dearly even than Mozart, whose only fine for being immortal was his dying at the age of thirty-six. Beethoven lived twenty-one years longer, but, during those twenty-one years, he entirely lost the faculty of hearing, and wrote the following lines full of sadness to Herr von Seyfried: "Art alone has kept me; it seemed to me impossible to leave the earth before producing all I felt I ought to produce. It is thus that I continued my miserable, ah! my very miserable, life, and with such a nervous organization that a mere nothing causes me to pass from a state of the utmost happiness to one of the greatest misery." What an organization of this kind, Beethoven did not require to be deaf in order to feel unhappy; let us put the matter clearly, however: unhappy, but enjoying, at the same time, those compensations and magnificent compensations for which the vulgar envy, and are justified in envying, the privileged, but which are not the far out in their appreciations. They have no notion of the pangs which may be occasioned by bringing forth such a work as the Symphony in C minor, or the Pastoral Symphony, but they feel very well that there must be some pleasure in conceiving, producing, and drawing these compositions from chaos. Such a pleasure really does exist; it is great and infinite even in its sufferings. "Art alone has kept me," Beethoven wrote, and art in this case is nothing more nor less than the pleasure above mentioned. Scattered up and down the world, there is a host of poor devils, quite as nervous, and quite as deaf as Beethoven, or more so, without art as a support, who drag on through their poverty and their sufferings as they best can, without the consolation of giving birth to a sublime symphony, or even of observing their silence and their solitude by the elaboration of the smallest polka.

Let us exaggerate nothing, neither the happiness nor the misery of a man of genius. Beethoven could not be happy after the fashion of a notary or a banker who makes a fortune and retires from business. Nor could he be so after the fashion of those artists whose work is extremely easy and with whom success keeps up, step for step, with their efforts. He inherited from nature an aspiration for what is great and new, difficult to find, and difficult to render intelligible. To procure emotions, he was under the necessity of inventing and creating, while so many others have simply to imitate and continue. Instead of being contented with first results, he entertained incredible difficulty in satisfying himself; he searched for a long time; he erased, corrected, and recommenced with the indefatigable tenacity that Jean-Jacques Rousseau displayed in the construction of his learned periods, and this is not the only trait of resemblance, revealed to us by a study of his character and of his genius, between him and the citizen of Geneva. We find in both the same natural uneasiness, the same quick susceptibility, the same misanthropy, and the same strong love of the country. Beethoven composed his finest masterpieces under the same circumstances that Rousseau wrote his Julie, his Lettre sur les spectacles, and his Emile. Both suffered from an infirmity which, though different in one case from what it was in the other, kept them equally as a distance from intercourse with the world. Both were in their heart, and lived without hope; Rousseau loved Mdme. d'Houdetot, and Beethoven, ladies of high rank, if we are to believe what Wegeler wrote: "Beethoven war nie ohne Liebe, und meistens von ihr in hohem Grade ergriffen" ("Beethoven was never without some passion, and mostly worked up to the highest pitch"). All the difference is that Beethoven did not marry, and had near him no Thérèse Levasseur, flanked by her hideous mother, to disturb the repose of his life and degrade his dignity; but, though unmarried, he, also, had the burdens and the annoyances of a family without its touching compensations.

Beethoven had several brothers; the widow of one of them, Carl, a cashier in the Bank of Austria, who made him the guardian of his son, a minor, would not give the boy up to him. Hence an action at law, that is to say, a night-mare which, for four years, weighed upon Beethoven's breast. How could any one ever guess the first annoyance this law-suit caused him. "This episode in the artist's life," says M. von Lenz,* "shrinks into the microscopic proportions of German existence. Thus it was commonly supposed at Vienna that the Dutch particle von, in Beethoven's name, was the German particle von, implying noble birth, especially when the composer's name was written in the abbreviated form, L. v. Beethoven. Beethoven carried his case before the Court that took cognisance of actions concerning nobles. The Court required the production of his patents of nobility. Beethoven carried his hand to his head and to his heart. The reader will easily believe that this proof could not have any value in a question of legal jurisdiction. The case was referred to the magistracy of Vienna. Will it be credited? This reference of the case to another court, though very natural, wounded Beethoven's feelings profoundly. He asserted that an exceptional tribunal ought to have been called upon to take cognisance of the affairs of genius, and that this notion had been forgotten in the code." The fact is, Beethoven was profoundly aristocratic, and that, too, without suspecting it. One day, he made the following assertion, reported by Schindler: "A man of a superior kind ought not to be confounded with a tradesman, and I have been so confounded." On another occasion, he heard Prince Lichnowski order his valet to wait upon him first, if he and the Prince happened to ring at the same time. Does the reader fancy that Beethoven was touched by this piece of attention? Quite the contrary; he instantly took a servant exclusively for himself. Hear again Herr von Lenz:—

"Beethoven passed his life among the high aristocracy of Vienna. He was partial to the diversion of dancing, a pleasure according with the simple manners of the period, when people still danced to a piano, but, incredible as it may seem, he could never manage to dance in time. He was awkward in his movements; he generally broke the things he touched; no piece of furniture at his own house, and least of all a piece of furniture of value, was safe from his attacks. How often his inkstand fell into the piano near which he was working! Beethoven was an integral part of the Lichnewski, Lobkowitz, Browne, Brunswick, Erdody, and Thun families. His pupil, the Arch-Duke Rudolph, set the example. An artist himself, he treated the greatest artist of the age as he ought to be treated, namely, as a special recipient of the bounty of heaven. Beethoven made his terms with the prince; he desired to be alone with him during his lessons of harmony and piano. The Prince kept the stipulation. Beethoven met on equal terms the Arch-Duke Rudolph, the hero of Aspern, to whom the Arch-Duke Rudolph knew he was partial. Whatever charm the intimacy of such distinguished persons may have possessed for the mind of the artist, the mere idea that the lesson was at hand sufficed to render him ill. . . . Beethoven never succeeded in subjecting himself to the least constraint. If you invited him to dinner, he did not forgive you for his having been a whole day the slave of your hour. The hour for him was a motive. He still entertained the singular idea that people should eat when they are hungry. A grand day arrives. Beethoven must be gave a dinner to Mesdames Sontag and Ungher. Under this dinner, however, lurked the Machiavelic idea of making the ladies believe that the difficulties of their parts, in the Symphony with Choruses, were less than they imagined, and to prove that it was utterly impossible to obtain anything like synthesis. . . .

For four years, the fatal law-suit, of which we spoke above, completely engrossed all Beethoven's attention. He considered his honour involved in it; he himself drew up all the deeds and memoirs. His counsel, the venerable barrister Bach, senior member of the bar, allowed him to do as he liked, fancying that any other course would drive him mad. Beethoven at last gained the day by an appeal from three previous judgments, which, perhaps, cost musical art a symphony and a few other marvels. When he had won, he thought of having his nephew to live with him, and of keeping house. The reader should see the letter the composer sent a neighbour, asking for information about the most essential things, of which he did not know a syllable. 1. What must you give two servants to eat, morning and evening, quantity and quality? 2. How often must they have meat? . . . etc. 3. How many pounds of meat for three persons? The neighbour ought merely to have replied: "Write symphonies!"

W. von Lenz thus finishes his curious narrative:—

"Money became an object with Beethoven from the moment that his nephew's existence was his own. For him—the young man, who bore his name—he saved. This nephew, the hostile element in the second portion of the life of the artist, who was cruelly punished for ever-estimating an uncle's duties, embittered the last ten years of his existence. Beethoven nearly lost his reason on the day the University of Vienna expelled, for misconduct, the adopted son on whom he had concentrated the impetuous necessity which he experienced all his life, of loving some one. The master's last love died the moment he saw his nephew abandon a literary career, to enter the Austrian army."

Let us leave this giddy profligate whom Beethoven constituted his heir, to reward him probably for not deigning to disturb himself and fetch a doctor, when his uncle, his benefactor, returned to Vienna (December 1826), a prey to the malady of which he was destined to die a few months later. But Beethoven had, also, a brother, a well-known apothecary in Vienna, who frequently drove about in a landau and four. This brother, by name Johann, was indebted to Ludwig, the artist, for his establishment as a druggist. Though living but a very short distance off, he never visited him, only sending him, on New Year's Day, his card with the words: "Johann van Beethoven, Guts-Besitzer" (that is to say, landed proprietor); and the artist wrote on the back, "Ludwig van Beethoven, Hirn-Besitzer" (that is to say, brain proprietor). The medical men ordered Ludwig van Beethoven hay baths, and, as Johann van Beethoven had plenty of hay and to spare, a message was naturally sent him to let his brother have some. Does the reader know the answer of the landed proprietor, who was a judge of herbs, and wanted to keep everything for himself? We do not think sordid avarice ever invented anything more sublimely native. Johann van Beethoven, the apothecary, replied that the hay from his estate was not good, and Ludwig van Beethoven was obliged to send elsewhere for some.

* Beethoven and his three Styles.

Digitized by Google

Such were family ties for the great artist; such was the manner in which those nearly related to him repayed his devotion and his sacrifices. Like Jean-Jacques Rousseau, however, Beethoven was himself frequently unjust and ungrateful, through being irritable and suspicious; he often rejected a benefit from an exaggerated sentiment of independence, or manifested only indignation and anger towards his benefactor. E. M.

The Grave of Charles Dickens.

He sleeps as he should sleep—among the great
In the old Abbey: sleeps amid the few
Of England's famous thousands whose high state
Is to lie with her monarchs—monarchs too.

Monarchs, who men's minds 'neath their sway could bring
By might of wit and humour, wisdom, lore,
Music of spoken line or sounded string,
Or Art that lives when artists are no more.

His grave is in this heart of England's heart,
This shrine within her shrine: and all around
Is no name but in Letters or in Art
Sounds as the names of the immortal sound.

Of some, the ashes lie beside his dust,
Of some, but marble forms and names are here:
But grave or cenotaph—remains or bust—
They will find place for thee, their latest peer.

Make room, oh tuneful Handel at thy feet;
Make room, oh witty Sheridan, at thy head;
Shift, Johnson, till they leave him grave-space meet;
Garrick, whose art he loved, press to him dead.

Macaulay, many-sided mind, receive
By thine, the frame that housed a mind as keen
To take an impress, or an impress leave,
From things, or on things, read or heard, or seen.

Welcome, oh Addison, with calm, wise face,
His coming, who has peopled English air
With types of humour, tenderness, and grace,
Than which thine own are less rich and more rare.

Thou, too, his brother of our time, last lost,
Thackeray, bend thy brow with kindly cheer
On him, thy comrade, wave-worn, tempest-tost,
Who, from life's voyage, comes to harbour here.

All the more welcome that he seeks his rest
Without the pomps that follow great ones' ends—
No mourners save the natural ones that prest
About the father's coffin or the friend's.

No sable train with plume, and plate, and pall;
No long parade of undertaker's woe;
Scarfed mutes, and feathered hearse, and coursers tall—
All that bemocks the grave with hollow show.

Humbly they brought him in the summer morn,
Humbly and hopefully they laid him down.
And on the plate that tells when dead, when born,
His children's love, like England's, lays a crown.*

Punch.

* Upon the coffin was a crown of green leaves and white roses. Many of those who came to look into the grave during the day it remained open threw flowers into it.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

The performance of Il Trovatore on Thursday week served to show Mdlle. Ilma di Murska in another phase of her unquestionable versatility. Whatever this lady undertakes she does after her own fashion, which, let us add, is full of originality and power, if not full of the charm, whatever it be, most congenial to the public taste. It was readily assumed, therefore, that her first appearance in Leonora would present striking points both of conception and execution. This the result amply sustained, for rarely has Verdi's heroine been impersonated with greater dramatic force, or his music sung with more intense and truthful expression. We need not, after Mdlle. di Murska's performance in detail, since to do so would be to recount many excellencies easily imagined. Certain features, however, had the attraction of that novelty for which we look when an artist so thoroughly original is concerned. No better example of these can be taken than Mdlle. di Murska's acting during Manrico's air, "Di quella pira"—acting which, for natural eloquence, the lyric stage would find it difficult to surpass. But the climax of the Hungarian lady's effort was properly reserved for the climax of the story—the famous "Miserere" scene—in which she exhibited powers, both as an actor and a singer, that should win for her the loftiest place open to an artist's ambition. There have been Leonoras many, not a few of sterling merit; among the latter, and high in the scale of excellence, must be placed that of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska. Upon Madame Trebelli's Azucena, Signor Mongini's Manrico, and Mr. Santley's Di Luna, comment would be superfluous, while it can easily be imagined to what a perfect ensemble each artist contributed.

On Saturday, Mdlle. Nilsson repeated her charming impersonation of Marguerite, in presence of a crowded and brilliant audience. We can add nothing to former remarks upon the Swedish lady's most characteristic effort, unless it be to change the terms employed for others more decidedly eulogistic. Few will be bold enough to question that Mdlle. Nilsson's Marguerite is a close approximation to the original Gretchen, that her working out of the character is distinguished by exceptional consistency, or that her singing wants nothing of expressive or executive power. Other artists may present other ideals, in praise of which much can be said; but Mdlle. Nilsson alone embodies the heroine both of the poet and the musician. As a matter of course, the favourite artist was applauded with frequency and warmth, her recall after the "Jewell Song" being specially demonstrative. Madame Trebelli, Signor Gardoni, Mr. Santley, and M. Faure took their accustomed parts; so that on Saturday, as on Thursday, the performance was distinguished by an ensemble hard to equal, scarcely possible to surpass.

T. E.

CHARLES DICKENS'S LAST LETTER.

(From the "Athenæum.")

Mr. Charles Kent has kindly consented to our printing what is in all probability the last letter that Mr. Dickens wrote. On Thursday, when Mr. Kent went to keep the appointment, Mr. Dickens was lying unconscious, within a few hours of his death. The "opal enjoyments" refer to the tints of the sky:—

"Gadshill Place, Higham-by-Rochester, Kent,
"Wednesday, the Eighth of June, 1870.

"My dear Kent,—To-morrow is a very bad day for me to make a call, as in addition to my usual office business, I have a mass of accounts to settle. But I hope I may be ready for you at 3 o'clock. If I can't be—why, then I shan't be. You must really get rid of those opal enjoyments. They are too overpowering:—

'These violent delights have violent ends.'

I think it was a father of your Church who made the wise remark to a young gentleman who got up early (or stayed out late) at Vienna.—Ever affectionately,

"To Charles Kent, Esq." "Charles Dickens.

Nuremberg.—Dr. Hans von Bülow lately gave two concerts on the same day—one here, and one at Fürth—in aid of the Hans Sachs Monument. He will shortly give a concert in Augsburgh, and another in Würzburg, for the same object, and then play no more publicly in Germany.

Mannheim.—The seventh Musical Festival of the Middle Rhine will take place on the 3rd and 4th July. The first day will be exclusively devoted to Beethoven, who will furnish the Weihe des Hauses, and the Missa Solemnis; on the second day the programme will contain works by Mendelssohn, Schumann, Lotti, Vittoria, Weber, Schubert, and Beethoven. The artists already engaged are Mdlle. W. Rüter, of Munich; Mdme. Ulrich-Rohn, of Mannheim; Mdlle. Pappenheim, of Brunswick; Herr Vogl, of Munich; and Herr Hill of Schwerin.

Digitized by Google

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The Huguenots was repeated on Thursday week, with certain important changes in the cast; Madame Lucca replacing Mdlle. Tietjens as Valentine, Mdlle. Sessi appearing as Marguerite de Valois, vice Mdlle. Vanzini, and Signor Mario succeeding Herr Wachtel as Raoul. On the whole, these changes were improvements; but, without entering upon proverbially odious comparisons, we may say of the performance that it had features of distinguishing merit. Madame Lucca's Valentine has not lost in forceful impulsiveness by greater elaboration, and is still, what it was when she first appeared before an English audience, a striking dramatic effect. In this respect little was wanting to the great duet with Raoul, throughout which Madame Lucca's acting satisfied even those who most strictly insist upon energy without rant, and truthfulness without exaggeration. Mdlle. Sessi was admirably suited by the part of Marguerite, which required her to sing well and little more. Mdlle. Sessi sang well, and kept to the "little more" with praiseworthy self-control—a course some may have found agreeable after experience of many ambitious efforts. Signor Mario, so far as acting goes, was the inimitable Raoul of more years than it is pleasant to remember. Whether the audience, watching him through the great duet, lamented the action of time upon his vocal powers we know not; but even the sensitive on this matter must have been enraptured with the superb exhibition of dramatic skill to which they were treated. Apart from Signor Mario, there is no such acting on the lyric stage, and for its sake we could almost be content to have the character presented in dumb-show. So felt the audience, if any special significance belongs to specially enthusiastic applause. The other parts were filled as on previous occasions, and may be dismissed with a brief testimony to their general acceptableness.

On Saturday Lucrezia Borgia was repeated, with Mdlle. Tietjens in the character now as much hers as Beethoven's Leonora or Cherubini's Medea. Once more this great artist displayed the ability which, under certain conditions, amounts to supremacy. As Lucrezia, at all events, Mdlle. Tietjens is the accepted and, so far as we can see, the final link in a long chain of great dramatic soprano. Gennaro was represented by Signor Vizzani, whose voice and style Donizetti must have better suited than that of Verdi. The new tenor will undoubtedly be useful to a certain extent, and within a certain range of parts. His second appearance, however, confirmed the impression made by his first, that neither in compass and quality of voice, nor in dramatic ability, is he qualified to take the highest place. Signor Graziani once more presented his peculiar version of Don Alfonso; and the part of Maffio was taken with considerable success by Mdlle. Scalchi, whose rendering of "Il segreto" obtained much and deserved applause.

T. E.

PROVINCIAL.

LEEDS.—The following is condensed from the Yorkshire Post of Tuesday, June 21st:—

"To-day Dr. Spark, the borough organist, gives his last organ recital for the present. Among the pieces played during the season for the first time were the following:—

"Concerto in C, Grand Fugues in F minor and C minor (No. 7, Vol. 15), Trio in F—J. S. Bach; Fugues in F minor, Mozart; Hosannah nach Arcadelt, Liszt; Fest-Präludium, Fink; Nachspiel, F. Weber; Concert-Fantasie, S. Müller; Allegretto in B minor, Chorus in D, Christmas Offertoire in B flat, Morceau Dramatique in C minor, Alex. Guilmant; Offertoires and other pieces, Batiste; ditto, Lefébure Wely; Andante in C, Introduction and Fugue in D, Melody in C—E. Silas; Postlude in C, Andante in A, Andante Grazioso in G, Henry Smart; Concert-Fantasia in D, Stewart; Sonata in C—G. A. Macfarren; Pastorale in G, and Triple Fugue in G minor, Merkel; Communion and Allegro (Alla Marcia) in E flat, Batiste; Fantasia in C minor and major, Philipp Tietz; Elegy in E minor, Leo Kerbusch; Offertoire in G, Kühmstedt; Andante and Allegro in D minor and D major, W. Spark; two selections from Rossini's Messa Solennelle, adagios, andantes, &c., from symphonies, sonatas, airs with variations, &c., by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven; selections from Barnett's Ancient Mariner, Sullivan's Prodigal Son, and Barnby's Rebekah; marches by Mendelssohn, Schumann, Schubert, Meyerbeer, C. A. Barry, Smart, Spark, &c.; overtures by Cherubini, Spohr, Mercadante, Spontini, Rossini, W. S. Bennett, Gounod, &c.

"Besides these, Dr. Spark has introduced vocal trios, duets, songs, &c. He is now, we understand, about to visit Germany, and will, doubtless, find many new things in the course of his travels, to present to the public on the renewal of his recitals in August."

MUSICAL ANTITHESIS.—The music of Wagner, which is "the music of the future," and "la musique d'Adam," which, evidently, must be of the past.—N.B. To prevent mistakes, it is as well to say we allude to the compositions of Adolphe Adam.—Punch.

MADAME PAREPA-ROSA IN AMERICA.

(From the Boston "Daily Advertiser," May 31.)

The performance of Don Giovanni at the Music Hall last evening was quite a good one. Speaking generally of the impersonations, they might be called good, and Madame Rosa as Donna Anna, by her superb singing and dignified action, and Mr. Nordblom as Don Octavio, by his refinement and spirit, were worthy of especial mention. Miss Hersee as Zerlina was, on the whole, highly acceptable, and in "Vedrai Carino" she was thoroughly charming and artistic; her youth and comparative unfamiliarity with the part would abundantly account for a certain lack of the subtile and sympathetic quality which is essential to the satisfactory interpretation of the most delicate operatic music ever written.

We have spoken personally of Madame Parepa-Rosa and Mr. Nordblom, but must retrace our steps to say that the great musical feature of the evening was Madame Rosa's rendering of the famous "letter aria," "Non mi dir," which has been seldom heard in Boston for a long time, and which has not been well performed for at least eighteen years, except, possibly by Madame Rosa herself. The difficulties of this wonderful melody all seemed to vanish under the lady's easy skill, and the rendering was remarkable both for its delicious sweetness, its fine execution, and its pure and true expression. Mr. Nordblom's Don Ottavio was surprisingly good. The part demands no special exertion for its acting, but it requires, and it received at the hands of Mr. Nordblom, just and dignified treatment, while the singing of the performer in the part seemed to us the best which has ever given in Boston. The "Masken' Trio," the finale of the first act, and the quartet, "Non ti fidar," being noticeably and exceptionally good. The "Masken' Trio," indeed, has seldom been better sung in Boston, and its enthusiastic encore was thoroughly deserved. The choruses were excellently rendered, and the orchestral work would have been highly satisfactory if the musicians had yielded to Carl Rosa's repeated solicitations for a more piano style in the accompaniments. As a whole, then, it is to be said that Don Giovanni—the most difficult of operas in many ways—was very well given, and its representation made a worthy termination of the last season of the Parepa-Rosa troupe in America. For this and for very many other most noble, artistic, and inspiring performances, we are under obligations to this company of admirable artists, and with every one of them we would part—if it were possible—with an "au revoir" instead of an "adieu."

MISS KELLOGG AMONG THE LUNATICS.

We do not remember to have heard of a more interesting episode in the life of any artist since the days of the great Jenny Lind than that of Miss Kellogg at the State Lunatic Asylum a few days since. The circumstance speaks volumes for the kindness of heart and genuine humanity of this great artist.

Not content, as some of the genus irritabile of a lower order of art would have been, to dole out a few notes to the better class of patients that could be assembled for the purpose, she asked the doctor to be allowed to penetrate to the interior and sing to the more disturbed classes. Accompanied by two of the faculty, their ladies and the matron, and armed only with her guitar, she started like an ancient troubadour on her novel journey.

Arrived in the departments devoted to the more disturbed of this unfortunate class, she was not long in making her power felt. A few notes from her wonderful voice were sufficient to call order out of the wildest confusion, and to still the troubled waters of the soul. In a moment all was hushed, and, except the voice of the cantatrice, the hall was silent as the house of death. After the first song, they gathered about her like little children, wondering apparently what angel from heaven had dropped down so suddenly and unexpectedly among them. They examined her minutely and literally from the crown of her head to the sole of her foot; for one desired to be allowed to "see the pretty little boot with which she kept time to her own music." This was submitted to, and not only this, but every article of dress and jewelry about her person she suffered to be freely overhauled. She was turned about by these crazy ladies like a merchant's lay figure, much to her amusement, and little apparently to her annoyance. Even when they proposed to kiss her, she not only submitted gracefully, but tremulous, not with fear, but with genuine emotion, she turned to the greeting in each instance.

Such is Clara Louise Kellogg, and such also is the power of music and kindness on the disturbed mind.—Cincinnati Morning Herald.

Words for Music.*

Ay, years do bring the philosophic mind,
Wordsworth is right. As men in life advance,
They smile, or sigh, to think that, having dined,
Young fellows can be fools enough to dance.
Who underneath the table keeps his feet,
His stomach's lead site lightly on its throne;
Eat capers, but cut none, friend, after meat,
Disturb his meals who will; digest your own.

PUNCH.

* Copyright.

Digitized by Google

MARRIAGE.

On the 2nd inst., at Booterstown, Dublin, Mr. EDWARD CADDICK, of Edgbaston, to HARRIETTE, youngest daughter of Mr. HENRY BUSSELL, Professor of Music and Musiceller, Dublin.

DEATH.

On the 16th inst., NELSON, son of Mr. WEIPPERT, Musiceller, Regent Street—aged six years.

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1870.

FINE OLD TUNES.

IT is not always a bad thing to have what Mr. Samuel Weller would call "limited wision." In the case of Mr. Weller himself it prevented his seeing, through a flight of stairs and several closed doors, what might have been to the detriment of our dear old friend, Pickwick. In the case of some others it concentrates attention upon a small space, and extracts therefrom lessons otherwise in danger of being overlooked. Le Maistre's Voyage autour de ma Chambre is a noteworthy illustration of what we mean. From the ordinary fittings of the room to which he was confined the French philosopher drew matter for speculation, the interest of which will never be exhausted. But limited vision, as a rule, is not always useful. Upon the average man its effect is to make him exaggerate the merits and importance of what he can see, and to depreciate all that lies beyond, creating out of his visible surroundings a little world apart, wherein very small things are relatively very great. Only thus do we account for a phenomenon connected with Church musicians, who are always talking of "Brown in A," "Jones in B," and "Robinson in C"—as other men talk of the Nozze di Figaro, Fidelio, and Medea.

We suppose that organists and people who frequent "quires, and places where they sing," are more or less affected by the narrowing influence of sacerdotalism. If not exactly a "sacerdotal caste," they are sufficiently like the article to make the church their world. Looking upon Church music as a thing apart, they come eventually to regard it as unaffected by considerations which touch music secular, and as only to be judged by the low standard of its own low average merit. On no other grounds are we able to explain the reverence felt for what are sometimes called "fine old tunes," and for the importance attached to works which, out of the church, would promptly make their way to the huckster's, as waste paper. Let us add that we do not consider this to involve any censure upon Church musicians. Between their music and secular music there must exist, in any case, a broad line of demarcation; and, naturally, that to which they are, in a measure, shut up, acquires a fictitious value. But it is needful, for the sake of Church music itself, to ask those who have to do with the thing whether they should not throw upon it a little light from the outside world. If this were effected, we cannot but think that the ecclesiastical lumber-room would soon have an extensive addition to its contents. How many, for example, of the chants now used would be used any longer? There are places where the substitution, say, of "Crotch in C" for "Jones in D," or, vice versa, on a particular occasion, would be matter of grave import. Looked at as music simply, either or both would be "basketed" without compunction. Then, again, as to the "Services," we are tempted to ask—Can it be that the intelligent among Church musicians really believe the majority of such concoctions at all worthy the importance assigned to them? Those who hear Church "Services" with unaccustomed ears are simply repelled by their formalism, their want of expressive and descriptive power, and their exceedingly small musical pretensions. To a large extent the case is the same with anthems, not a few of which are worthy the style in which they are sung—about the severest sentence it is possible to pass upon them. These are strong assertions, but not stronger than the thoughts of outside musicians whenever English Church music is named. All who are not "to the manner born" know that within the ecclesiastical pale—by way of consistency with surroundings, we presume—there has grown up a style of music utterly unworthy of its object, and which is the artistic counterpart of the twaddle that passes current for an average sermon.

The sooner all these things are looked into the shorter will be the existence of "fine old tunes."

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MR. CHARLES MATTHEWS, as popular at Melbourne as in most places, after being entertained by the Yorick and Athenæum Clubs, was performing with success at the Theatre Royal. The theatrical news, however, from Melbourne is not satisfactory. A dispute has arisen with regard to the use of the Haymarket Theatre, and the building is in a state of siege. A trustee for the bondholders holds possession of the gallery, with a policeman and a bulldog. Messrs. Harwood, Coppin, & Co., who hold the lease, have taken possession of the stage, where they are obliged to keep and feed some forty or fifty men, who amuse themselves with impromptu acting, and chaffing the policeman in the gallery. It was expected that an attack on the policeman and dog was imminent. The policeman has a big stick and the dog looks preternaturally savage; so that if the performances take place, they are likely to be of a tragic nature.

WE know to our cost what effects may be produced by a railway whistle sounded for the amusement of engine-driver and stoker on a bridge above the heads of horses in public thoroughfares; but startling as these are they are nothing compared with the scream of a great tragedian. When Mrs. Siddons (on 15th of June, 1784) bade adieu to Scotland, she uttered a scream in Portpatrick. At the place of embarkment she raised her eyes to throw a parting look at Scotland, and to the utter astonishment of all present, she emitted one of her wild cries. The rocks, the shore, and the concave in which the village of Portpatrick stands conveyed the echoes. There was a general rush from the houses scattered along the beach. Seeing men, women, and children so alarmed, Mrs. Siddons herself became more terrified, and screamed aloud. It was mournful, but piercingly loud. In a moment, as if by some sudden shock through the influence of supernatural agency, the whole people sobbed aloud. "Such a scene," says the Rev. Dr. Mackenzie (our authority), "I never witnessed."

[We believe him.—A. S. S.]

THE latest we hear of Howard Glover, the well-known composer and critic is that he is officiating as conductor of the Parepa-Rosa English Opera troupe in America. The following tribute to his merits is from the Cincinnati Enquirer:—

"The orchestra was led by Howard Glover, himself a composer of note, his Roy Blas, Amiata, and many of his later works being well known in this country. The beautiful song which was so well given by Mr. Lawrence in Oberon last Wednesday evening was adapted by Mr. Glover from Weber's music; and the manner in which he wielded his bâton last night proved that the enthusiasm of a younger artistic composer was not diminished by the more practical skill of a thoroughly scientific musician."

Another journal, the Cleveland Gazette, remarks:—

"It would be unjust not to make favourable mention of the extensive and admirable orchestra which is made to do most excellent execution under the direction of Howard Glover."

Digitized by Google

At the Oxford Commemoration, which has occupied so much attention during the week, one of the most distinguished among those upon whom was conferred the degree of D.C.L. was our great musician, William Sterndale Bennett (Professor of Music at the Cambridge University). That the announcement of his honoured name should have been received with loud and unanimous applause will surprise no one.

"H. S. O." has addressed to the Guardian of June 15, a long account of the recent Festival of the Lower Rhine, held this year at Aix-la-Chapelle, which a correspondent has invited us to reproduce in our columns. We must simply decline to do so. The tendencies of "H. S. O." are by this time pretty well known to our readers, though not better known than our own entire disagreement with them. That in the programme of this festival in honour of Beethoven, not even a little song bearing the name of a man who did more to promulgate the love for Beethoven, as he did more to propagate the love for J. S. Bach, than any other German who ever lived—we, of course, mean the late Mendelssohn Bartholdy (who composed his St. Paul for the anniversary of 1836)—is a disgrace to every one connected with the management of it. Schumann himself, vain as he was, and jealous above all of the superior genius and far greater eminence of Mendelssohn, would have faintly objected. Imagine two pieces by Schumann on such an occasion, and nothing by Mendelssohn!

We regret to have to announce the death of a well-known veteran of the orchestra, Mr. Chipp, which took place on Sunday morning. Mr. Chipp's last appearance in the places behind the Tympani—where he was always looked for, and always did excellent service, was at the Worcester Festival of 1866. From that time till his death he lived in honourably earned retirement—a retirement too brief to reward the labours of much more than half a century. It may not be generally known that Mr. Chipp was the composer of many meritorious quartets, trios, &c.; that he was a good pianist, and a sufficiently clever harpist to hold that instrument in Sir Henry Bishop's orchestra at Covent Gardan for seventeen consecutive years. It deserves to be mentioned, also, that Mr. Chipp took part at the memorable production of Weber's Oberon, in 1826. Losing him, therefore, we lose one of the few remaining links connecting the present with the past.

A CORRESPONDENT temporarily residing at Munich writes to us from the Bavarian capital as follows:—

"Shortly after the appearance of these lines, Herr R. Wagner's newest contribution to the sister arts of poetry (?) and music (?) will have been produced at the Theatre Royal, at least if the bills posted up in front of the Theatre Royal are to be believed. It is true that some one once has said: Nulla fides frontis. In this case, however, we are inclined to think the announcement will be realised, if only that singers, musicians, scene-painters, and scene-shifters, may be relieved from further rehearsals. By the way, the interest in Herr R. Wagner's effusions has died out wonderfully since the failure of Rheingold last summer. Months before the production of Rheingold, that event formed the permanent staple of conversation. But no one, except those engaged in it, ever talks about Die Walküre. There is now a splendid chance for a certain noble duke and his fellow amateur firemen. They might get enrolled in the extra fire-brigade which the Intendant has thought (t absolutely necessary to engage for every night the Walküre is played. The danger to which the theatre will be exposed is described as something very great."

THE contributions towards erecting a monument at Brunswick over the late Albert Methfessel amounted, in April last, to the magnificent sum of one hundred and ninety-eight thalers in all. Considering that Albert Methfessel was, in his time, one of the most popular writers of folk's songs in Germany, and that the members of the countless vocal associations there still profess to be enthusiastic about him, we should say their enthusiasm is of a very mild description, not unadulterated with humbug; exceedingly weak enthusiasm; enthusiasm below proof—directly the proof is raised to the level of the breeches-pocket.

THE Forty-seventh Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine was duly celebrated at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 5th, 6th, and 7th inst. The works performed on the first day were Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica and Missa Solennis. Herr Franz Lachner conducted. Meademes Joachim, Orgeni, Herren Vogl, and Bletzacher were the vocalists. Herr Joachim took the solo violin part. How he played the "Benedictus" it is superfluous to say. Among the compositions performed on the second day were Beethoven's third overture to Leonore, and Handel's oratorio of Deborah. The latter had not been heard at Aix-la-Chapelle for thirty-six years. The concert on the third evening was of a miscellaneous character. The programme included two overtures by Beethoven: zur Weihe des Hauses, and that to Coriolan; and finale from Fidelio; the final chorus from Christus am Oelberge, and the Violin Concerto, the last being, of course, performed by Herr Joachim—as only Herr Joachim can perform it.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

A CONCERT was given recently at Mrs. Gladstone's Convalescent Home, Woodford, by the Wanstead Musical Union, an amateur society of ladies and gentlemen in the neighbourhood. The object was to raise a sum to purchase for the institution an harmonium—and proof was afforded in the attendance that the charity is winning sympathy. Thanks to Mr. Serjeant Tindal Atkinson, who suggested the concert, and his friends, the performance was above the average; and Mrs. Gladstone begged Dr. Andrew Clarke to convey the thanks of the committee to the performers as well as to the audience. In responding to this call Dr. Clarke gave a history of the Woodford Convalescent Home, and drew attention to the advantages of its nearness to the East London population and to the London Hospital, whose out-going patients constitute a large proportion of the Home.

MADAME AUSPITZ KOLAR, whose playing we have several times had to praise, gave a concert at Dudley House, Park Lane on Monday last, and secured the attendance of a fashionable audience. The programme included a number of classical works, among them being Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, Rameau's Suite de Pièces in A minor, Schumann's Andantino and variations, Chopin's Impromptu (Op. 51) in G flat major, and Mendelssohn's Scherzo in E minor. All these works were played in artistic fashion, and confirmed Madame Kolar's reputation as an executant of much more than average ability. As a rule, we are not eager admirers of the crowd of German adventurers who swarm in London concert-rooms during the season. Many of them have great pretensions and small ability, and but few succeed in overcoming English prejudice in favour of foreigners they would go back worse off than they come. When, therefore, an artist of ability does arrive, there is a peculiar pleasure in awarding that reception which shows that art itself has no nationality. Madame Kolar was assisted by Mdlle. Drasdil, Herr Stockhausen, and M. Demunck (violoncello), Herr Gans acting as accompanist.

MR. W. CARTER, the well-known pianist and teacher, gave his annual concert on Monday week in St. James's Hall, supported by a number of eminent artists. The programme consisted of such selections as that at morning benefit entertainments. It included, for example, Hummel's septet in D minor, played by Messrs. Carter, Young, Horton, Mann, Blagrove, Petitt, and Severn; Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo, well executed by Master Puddicombe; and selections from Chopin and Schumann, chosen by the concert-giver as his solos. The vocalists were Mdme. Sherrington, who sang "Angels ever bright and fair;" and Carter's "Beautiful Clouds;" Mdlle. Drasdil, whose rendering of a Bohemian song, and of Lucy Ward's "She is upon the lonely deep," gave much satisfaction; Mr. Sims Reeves, about whose "Waft her angels," and "Adelaide" nothing too good can be said; Miss Minnie Tempest, a beginner, who may do something worth notice by and by; and Herr Carl Bergen, who is not a beginner, and into whose future we hardly look expectantly. A glee party of male voices also contributed to the undoubted success of the concert.

THE third and last of Mr. Ignace Gibsone's recitals took place on Wednesday, at St. George's Hall. Mr. Gibsone never played better. His third book of "Meditations," consisting of seven pieces of different character, was loudly and deservedly applauded, as was also his solo, "Dancing Water." The second part consisted of a new cantata for ladies' voices, written by Mr. Frederick Enoch, entitled The Elfin Knight. It consists of an introduction with solos, duets, and choruses It is a highly interesting work, and was most excellently performed The solo vocalists were Miss Poole, Miss Katherine Poynts, and Miss Fosbroke. Miss Poole in "The Elfin Knight," and the duet with Miss Fosbroke, "The Cuckoo kept calling," was loudly applauded, as was also Miss Katherine Poynts in "Flow, flow, river, and go." The libretto has been cleverly adapted by Mr. Enoch, and runs smoothly; the music is dramatic in the extreme, and will add considerably to Mr. Ignace Gibsone's reputation. The whole was accompanied by Signor Tito Mattei, with the utmost care.

Digitized by Google

THE fifth and last concert of the Schubert Society's fourth season took place on Thursday week in the Beethoven Rooms, and was given for the benefit of the director, Herr Schuberth. A large number of performers were engaged, and the programme was lengthy and well chosen. Schubert's quintet in C major, played by MM. Ludwig, Jung, Bernhardt, Lubeck, and Schuberth, after which came a series of vocal pieces varied by instrumental solos. Among the more noticeable of the former were—" Uno voce," sung by Miss Blanche Reeves; Schumann's "Abendlied," and Weber's "O Fatima" (encored), sung by Mdlle. Drasdil; Reichardt's "J'aime, je suis aimé," rendered by the composer, and Rossini's "Le Carita," in which the society's choir of ladies took part. With regard to some other vocal performances we may question whether they were calculated to do the society much good. The instrumental solos were nearly all satisfactory. Herr Hause, Miss Kate Gordon, and Herr Schrattenholz each gave a pianoforte solo with effect; the director's Nocturne for two violoncellos, performed by himself and Herr Lubeck, gave much satisfaction; Herr Ludwig played the favourite adagio from Spohr's ninth concert and one of Bach's preludes in good style, and Mdlle. Tayan, a very young lady violinist from the Paris Conservatoire, delighted the audience with a fantasia on airs from La Dame Blanche. We gather from a note to the programme that the season just ended has been the most prosperous of all. This is well.

MR. GANZ'S annual concert—invariably one of the most important of its kind—took place in St. James's Hall on Monday last, and attracted a very large as well as a very fashionable audience. The programme had been taken in selecting artists from both operas and elsewhere; while the programme, if it presented nothing new, contained much that was good. The lady vocalists who chiefly contributed to the success of the concert were Madame Adeline Patti, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Madame Trebelli, Mdlle. Scalchi, Mdlle. Orgeni, Mdlle. Enequist, Mdlle. Carola, Madame Patey, and Mdlle. Liebhart; the more prominent gentlemen singers being MM. Bettini, Graziani, Foli, Reichardt, Julien Lefort, and Ilma Kolo. To mention what share each of these artists took in a programme of thirty-six pieces would occupy far more space than we can give. Enough that the audience relished, more or less, everything put before them—most of all, let us add, that with which Madame Patti had to do. The concert-giver took the fairly prominent part in what was done, playing, first of all, Beethoven's sonata in F major (Op. 17), for piano and horn (M. Willmann); next, the opening movement of Hummel's concerto in A minor (with string septet accompaniments); and, lastly, his own fantasia on Rossini's Mery Wives. In all Herr Ganz exhibited qualities which have given him his present position. The other instrumentalists were M. Paque and M. Antoine de Kontski.

THE opera concert announced to take place in the Floral Hall, Covent Garden, was given on Saturday afternoon, and attracted a very large and fashionable assemblage. Whether the building be, or be not, a good place for musical purposes is a question that, we imagine, hardly affected the attendance either for better or worse. The idea was not novel, and the programme a long selection of familiar works, executed by the artists of the Royal Italian Opera. Such a combination not only deserved, but could command, success; and we may be permitted to wonder that it has not more often complemented the legitimate work of Messrs. Gye and Mapleson's troupe. Opera managers must, of course, be assumed to know their own business better than the outside public; but, as in this great city, there are thousands to whom the opera itself is inconvenient or distasteful, concerts like that of Saturday afford the most obvious policy imaginable. So far as criticism is concerned, the Floral Hall doings present little scope for remark. Well-known pieces were sung by well-known artists in a style not less familiar than either; and our duty thus narrows itself to the duty of a chronicler—being concerned rather with the What than the How. We shall not pretend to discharge even this limited mission with minute fidelity; a passing reference to certain notable doings being all that is necessary. Madame Adelina Patti—the "particular star" in everything omitted with the Royal Italian Opera — was recalled at the close of "Let the bright Seraphim;" to the success of which Mr. T. Harper's trumpet obbligato in no small degree contributed. Similar honours followed her rendering of "Ombra leggiera" and "Within a mile of Edinboro' town;" the latter after singing "Qui est homo," with Madame Lucca (most rare conjunction!) she twice acknowledged the enthusiastic applause. Mdlle. Tietjens added another to the long roll of triumphs gained by her rendering of "Softly sighs" Der Freischütz, and won an encore for "The Meeting of the Waters," to which she responded by an exceedingly fine performance of "The Last Rose of Summer." Mdlle. Lucca's solo, "Qual notte, O ciel" from the Domino Noir, led to a recall; Mdlle. Sessi easily winning a like honour with Proch's "Variations pour la Voix." Mesdames Vanzini and Scalchi, MM. Mario, Graziani, Bagagiolo, Cotogni, Ciampi, Tagliafico, and Capponi also contributed in no small degree to the success of a very successful concert. Between the parts the prayer from Mosaniello was sung by the opera chorus. MM. Vianesi and Bevignani conducted.

MR. BARNLEY RICHARDS's concert, given in the Hanover Square Rooms, on Friday, was of a character easy to anticipate. We will not go so far as to say that Mr. Richards is nothing if not Welsh; but it is a fact that his greatest successes have been made in connection with Welsh minstrelsy, of which he is among the foremost representative. The music of Wales, therefore, naturally had a prominent place, and attracted a congenial and highly sympathetic audience, who seemed to appreciate it above all other. Among the pieces specially acceptable were John Thomas's choral arrangement of the beautiful "Ash Grove," sung by a choir of eighty voices; Mr. Richards's arrangement of "The Vale of Towy," charmingly rendered by Miss Edmonds; a pianoforte solo introducing "The Ash Grove" a second time (few can hear it too often), and the "Morgan March," in the latter of which was united with none the less pleasure because its Cambrian origin is a matter of dispute. Mr. Richards played both in his well-known style, and obtained an enthusiastic encore. The concert-giver being a prolific composer, nobody was surprised to find his works largely represented. Two part-songs—a setting of Herbert's "Sweet day, so cool," and a "Boat Song"—showed to advantage how Mr. Richards can write choral music; as did "The Christian Soldier" (first time), and a new and pretty song, with chorus, "We are nymphs of the ocean," admirably given by Madame Patey. Mr. Richards's "Cambrian War Song" was rendered by Mr. Lewis Thomas with all the dash and energy its theme would be likely to excite in the possessor of such a thoroughly Welsh name; while Mr. Cummings, though a Sassenach, delivered "The Cambrian Plume" spiritedly enough to win an encore. Mr. Richards was still further represented by his trio, "Up, quit thy bower," by the latest among recognized national airs, "God bless the Prince of Wales," by a sacred song, with violoncello obbligato, "Pilgrim's Path," for which Miss Wynne's exquisite singing obtained an encore; and by a setting of Bishop Middleton's "As o'er the past," wherein Madame Patey was heard to special advantage. The balance of the programme included Mendelssohn's Andante and Presto Agitato, and Scarlatti's "Cat's Fugue," both played by Mr. Richards; a due concertante, for piano and violoncello (MM. Richards and Paque), the work of Mr. Arthur Sullivan; Pinsuti's song, "I heard a voice," sung by perfection by Mr. Cummings; and "Lasgo al Cacciatore," given with characteristic spirit and considerable humour by Mr. Lewis Thomas. Mr. Callcott was a very efficient accompanist.

AMID the increasant demands upon our attention we had almost overlooked the excellent concerts given in St. James's Hall by the London Glee and Madrigal Union, under the direction of Mr. Land. To lovers of vocal music, and of vocal music in its genuine form, no entertainments are more interesting than those referred to, especially as the works selected are always well performed by the artists whose ensemble, thanks to constant working together, is perfect. The fifth and last concert of the series took place on Wednesday week and was attended by the appreciative audience always attracted on these occasions. A specially good programme had been prepared, beginning with Bishop's "Tho' he be now a gray friar," sung by the members of the Union—Miss Jane Wells, Miss Eyles, Messrs Baxter, Coates, Land, and Lawler. Hindle's Glee, "Queen of the Silver Bow," followed, and was succeeded in the order of mention by Horsley's "When shall we three meet again?" the success which a madrigal, "Lady, see on every side," Callcott's "With sighs, sweet rose!" Hatton's "Homeward Watch," and Elliot's "Come, see what pleasures." The concerted pieces in the second part were Clarke's "Is it the roar of Teviot's tide?" Parker's "Bright clear bugle," Goss's very favourite glee, "There's beauty on the mountains," a part-song, by Truhn, "The Three Chafers," (the Union should keep free from German part-songs of which we have enough elsewhere), and Bishop's concection, "O! by rivers." We enumerate all these madrigal, in order to show how judiciously ancient and modern examples are blended, and what a good taste presides over the selections made. That all were well sung it is superfluous to mention. The solos in the programme were not less good in their way. Miss Eyles sang Bishop's "Madonna," Mr. Baxter gave Hobbs's "Phillis is my only joy," and Mr. Byrom (pianoforte) and Mr. Edward Howell (violoncello) each contributed a solo. Mr. Land accompanied with his usual ability.

"FREISCHÜTZ."—The sixth Baden Musical Festival for Men's Choral Associations was celebrated here on the 5th and 6th inst.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Miss Minnie Hauck has appeared very successfully at the Stadttheater in Don Juan, and M. Gounod's Faust.

HOMBURG.—The season has begun. A French operatic company, including Mesdames Bataille, Singalée, MM. Capoul, du Wast, and Bataille are engaged up to the end of July. They will play the most popular works by Auber, Boieldieu, Adam, Halévy, Héroid, and Rioci. The Italian operatic season commences in the beginning of August and lasts till September. Mesdames Adelina Patti, Trebelli, MM. Bettini, Berger, and Bagagiolo are mentioned as belonging to the company.

Digitized by Google

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

Mdlle. Christine Nilsson's restoration to health has given new life and spirit to the proceedings at the Drury Lane Opera. That after her lengthened indisposition, she would have come forward as the Countess Almaviva, in Mozart's Nozze di Figaro—a part which, to a London audience at least her proficiency to sustain with due effect had yet to be tried—proved, as it turned out, a happy circumstance. One more entirely fitted for the character, whether in a dramatic or a musical sense, has not been known to the generation of opera-goers. Mdlle. Nilsson wears the aspect of the placid but jealous and affronted lady to admiration, and histrionically delineates her like the perfect artist with whom we are acquainted. Nothing can be more pure and expressive than her delivery of the soliloquies in which the Countess, once so happy, now inconsolable, confesses herself, as it were, to the audience. In fact, to sing those two beautiful airs, "Forgi amor" and "Dove sono," better would be scarcely possible. But a peculiarity in Mdlle. Nilsson which has won and must always retain for her the esteem of true amateurs is the conscientious study she bestows on every part intrusted to her. Whatever she comes forward in she has thoroughly mastered; and we not only recognise a performance admirable as a whole, but finished in all its details. That this, and this only, can be legitimate art is apparently Mdlle. Nilsson's conviction; and we share it with her, as we share it with her renowned contemporary, Madame Patti, who has invariably been noted for a similarly ardent devotion to her calling.

What has raised Mdlle. Nilsson higher, however, than she stood before in the estimation of English connoisseurs is neither the Countess Almaviva, nor Alice (Robert le Diable), her first two new parts this season, but Desdemona in Otello, her enthusiastic reception in which on Tuesday night was recorded in a sentence yesterday. Notwithstanding all that she had previously done to merit the unanimous acceptance she has obtained among us, few expected that she would be able to show herself such a consummate mistress of the earnest style of Rossini, which, being imitated so successfully by Donizetti and other masters, until Signor Verdi came to alter the whole state of things with his simply dramatic declamations and unornate melody, may be said to have exclusively ruled the domain of operatic art. Our operagoing readers need not be reminded that the music of Otello (composed at Naples in 1816, between the Barbiere and La Cenerentola—a gush of tears between two roars of laughter—when Rossini was in his 25th year) combines in an eminent degree the "florid" with the "expressive." Those who affect to rail against the florid style entirely overlook the fact that in employing it—inventing it rather, with a view of extirpating the absurd custom of leaving all embellishment to the imagination and skill of the vocalist—this most highly gifted of Italian composers possessed the secret of making florid "bravura" speak as eloquently as the simplest "cantilena." All through the opera of Otello (which we are not going to describe for the 20th time) this is markedly observable. The difficulty has been to find singers equal to the task of vocalizing with fluency and taste combined. The greatest representatives of Desdemona, because endowed with this rare capacity, were Malibran Grisi (in her best day), Sophie Cruvelli, and one or two others of less note, unnecessary to specify; and when we add that Mdlle. Nilsson has proved herself a worthy associate of those distinguished artists we have paid her the highest compliment in our power. The first Desdemona belongs to more than two generations back;* but those we have named, even the earliest of them, have not passed out of the remembrance of amateurs of long standing. Mdlle. Nilsson has grasped to the life the character of Shakspere's gentle and long-suffering heroine—the one personage of the drama, by the way, whom Totola, Rossini's librettist, has not utterly perverted. In the first scene she judiciously dispenses with the so often interpolated cavatina, which has nothing to do with the piece, contenting herself with the dialogue-duet, "Quanto son fieri i palpiti," in which Emilia (we may say at once gracefully and unaffectedly represented by Mdlle. Cari) endeavours to console Desdemona—a far more becoming prelude to what ensues. Her acting and singing were all that could be desired in the noble finale to the first act, which contains two of Rossini's most striking morceaux d'ensemble, and in which the sudden appearance of Othello, at the back of the stage, just as Elmiro, Desdemona's father, is endeavouring to arrange matters satisfactorily between Rodrigo and his daughter, constitutes a situation not unlike that of the second finale to Donizetti's Lucia. A dramatic force was here exhibited for which those who had watched Mdlle. Nilsson's progress superficially were not prepared. But finer still, because rising with the impressiveness of the situation, was the finale to the second act, where the unhappy Desdemona is alternately contemned by her jealous husband, commiserated by her faithful confident and indignantly reproached by her unrelenting father. Each situation is striking, and in each Mdlle. Nilsson showed herself fully equal to the occasion. Her delivery of the famous solo—"Che smania! ohnè, che affanno!"—was admirable from first to last, as pathetic in the touching preamble as it was animated in the brilliant sequel. Not less striking was the passage, "L'error d'un infelice," in which Desdemona supplicates Elmira's pity. The curtain fell amid the loudest demonstrations of approval, ending with two successive calls for Mdlle. Nilsson. The last act—a masterpiece which Rossini himself, by no means a self-adulator, thought was one of those passages among his numerous works destined possibly "to live"—was best of all. The incidents are familiar. The beautiful music of this—including the celebrated "willow song" ("Assisa a pie d'un salice"), with which poor Desdemona, after hearing the voice of the gondolier outside, vainly endeavours to soothe her agonised feelings—was sung to absolute perfection, the concluding verse, when the singer becomes overpowered by emotion, surpassing the rest in touching expressiveness. The whole scene, moreover, comprising the affecting prayer—"Deh, calma, O Ciel!"—the terrible interview with Othello, and its terrible catastrophe, was acted with singular force and meaning. The defience of her husband ("Uccidimi pur vuoi, perfido, ingrato"), when, proud in her conscious innocence, Desdemona defies her accuser, which Rossini in his earlier manner, has set to a vigorous bravura, was not only superbly declaimed but superbly "looked." And thence to the climax, there was nothing but what strengthened the effect that had been produced. The applause at the conclusion was uproarious. Mdlle. Nilsson had revealed herself for the first time (it was perhaps, indeed, the first opportunity afforded her) as a tragedian; and the audience saw and recognized this new phase in her talent. Desdemona is unquestionably her greatest success

Signor Mongini's Othello was acknowledged, ten years ago, when he played the character at Her Majesty's Theatre (under the direction of Mr. E. T. Smith), one of his most striking performances. No voice was ever better suited than this gentleman's to give effect to the opening address to the Senate ("Vincemmo o padri"), or its florid "cabaletta" ("Deh Amor"); and surely none to impart the requisite vigour to the celebrated duet with Iago, when the wily "Ancient" cajoles Othello, and works up his jealousy to desperation by means of the letter and the handkerchief. Signor Mongini's associate in this duet was M Faure, whose Iago is worthy his repute as a dramatic singer of the first class. The voice of M. Faure was distinctly audible even while his partner was exerting himself to the utmost; and Signor Mongini gave out the high "C sharp," made celebrated here by Signor Tamberlik, with stentorian force that took the house by storm. The duet created a "furore," and being unanimously encored, the last verse of the quick movement (with the great "high C" as loud and penetrating as before) repeated. The singers were twice called back at the end. In the soliloquy of the bedroom scene Signor Mongini should restrain his powers. Desdemona might awake before Othello intended it—which would be dramatically inconvenient. Signor Gardoni was the Roderigo, and a better could not be wished; Signor Foll played the part of Elmiro with his accustomed intelligence, but with too uniform a practice of dragging the time and singing "staccato," which especially in the quintet, "Incerta l'anima" (finale to Act 1), spoils the general effect. Signor Foli will do well to correct these faults—which he can easily do with a little reflection. The general performance of chorus and orchestra, under the skilful guidance of Signor Arditi, was admirable. This revival of one of Rossini's most genuine early works may be regarded as the event of Mr. Wood's first season.

* The original representatives of the principal parts in Otello were Colbrand (afterwards Madame Rossini), Nozzari, David, and Benedetti.

Digitized by Google

Shuber Silber across "Il Trovatore."

In Les vieux Garçons, the author, wishing to show the extreme to which naïveté can go, makes his ingénue come from a performance of the Trovatore with the impression that the incidents in that drama are taken from real life, and the characters real characters. "It really happened, I am sure it did!" cries the enthusiastic school girl; an exclamation which seems to prove that if "great wit to madness nearly is allied," ingenuousness is separated by a very narrow line from idiocy. It must be difficult to make anything dramatic. All that can be done to relieve the character of its staginess is to introduce sentiment into the music; and that is precisely what is done by Mdlle. di Murska. It is the duty of the actress to take the same impossible view of the part which is cherished by the young lady referred to. But Leonora belongs neither to time nor place, and the Leonora's representative always shows by her costume (which usually differs by several centuries from that of her two lovers) that she is conscious of her independent position. Some day we hope to see the whole chronology of the Trovatore called in question—set to rights it can never be. The manner in which Leonora attires herself after the fashion of the present day, without regard to the Count di Luna—the only personage in the piece whose dress belongs to a recognised period—is but the expression of despair in the matter of costume. The prima donna knows that troubadours were wandering minstrels of the eleventh, twelfth, at latest thirteenth century, whereas gypsies did not penetrate into Europe until the fifteenth. Azucena and Manrico could not have been found in Europe at the same time. Manrico went out before Azucena came in. Now, even if troubadours and gypsies had flourished contemporaneously, can one fancy the adopted child of a gypsy becoming a troubadour. The other troubadours, crusaders, and associates of crusaders, would not have liked it. Once, however, admit the chronology of the Trovatore, and inconsistencies of other kinds are trifles. Between the troubadours and the gypsy a certain analogy no doubt existed, though the troubadour was everywhere welcomed, the gypsy driven away. But they are about the same in the eyes of that prond aristocrat the Count di Luna, who treats them equally as vagabonds. The other difficulties in the Trovatore could be explained we should still like to know who is Leonora. Where are her relations? Has she a father, a brother, a sister, a mother? Was she proprietress in her own right, living in her feudal castle with no society she could avow but that of the confidente to whom she addresses her cavatina? Of all mysterious operas the most mysterious is the Trovatore. Die Zauberflöte is sufficiently unintelligible; but in Die Zauberflöte we meet with human beings, and Die Zauberflöte is a fantastic opera. The Trovatore, Verdi's most successful work, is such by its situations very dramatic in the theatrical sense of the word, and well-devised for conventional purposes. The interest, too, is distributed among the four principal personages.

Shuber Silber.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The attractions of the Crystal Palace during June and July are neither few nor far between, fireworks, concerts, floral exhibitions, operas, &c., being each in turn the leading feature. This week the exhibition of dogs has been held and £1000 distributed in prizes. The show opened on Tuesday, and continued to Friday. On the first day more than 3000 boys were reviewed by the Prince and Princess of Teck. The review was arranged by the Society of Arts, and proved of great interest to visitors. On Wednesday, the Tonic Sol-fa Association gave one of its great concerts of 5000 children; and to-day, the great Rose Show of the season is being held. Special musical arrangements are made, and as an additional feature, the German Gymnastic Society gives its annual display in the Great Transept. Next week is full of attractive entertainments, including on Coronation Day, June 28, a grand display of fireworks. From July 7th to 9th inclusive, the annual archery meeting is held. From July 16th to the 29th, an exhibition of church furniture and church decorations will take place; and on July 25, a French excursion gives occasion for a popular fête. It is in contemplation to give, at an early date, an extraordinary display of fireworks similar to those supplied by command of the Sultan, and which were to have been exhibited in Constantinople at about the time of the great fire at Pera. Various devices, on a scale of extreme magnificence, will render this one of the grandest pyrotechnic displays ever seen at the Crystal Palace.

BADEN.—The first Musical Soirée of the series given by the Administration, introduced Mdlles. Duval, Secretain, Herren Rohfeld and Léon, to the public. The programme was not particularly well chosen.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Pall Mall Gazette, of the 23rd inst., has the following sensible observations upon Mdlle. Christine Nilsson's recent illness:—

"Stories of Mdlle. Nilsson's indisposition have been repeated and exaggerated in French newspapers as pertinaciously as though the report could influence the state of the Funds. The only funds affected by the fact, if true, would be those of Mdlle. Nilsson herself, and those of the directors to whom she is engaged. Almost as remarkable as the tales of Mdlle. Nilsson's having lost her voice have been the speculations as to why, not having absolutely lost her voice, she was for a week or two unable to sing. It is understood that, in the changeable weather of an English June, an ordinary person may be attacked with bronchitis—but not a prima donna, of a malady which would be allowed in a town crier, or a dustman, is scarcely permitted to one whose delicate voice might naturally be accepted as a sign of delicate organisation. Herr Wachtel sings in all weathers. What right, then, has Mdlle. Nilsson to feel indisposed? She has come back to us, however, with her voice in as perfect condition as ever; while Herr Wachtel, hurt by treatment surpassing in unkindness that 'wintry wind' which gave Mdlle. Nilsson bronchitis in the month of June, has gone to Berlin—not soon (it is feared) to return to this ungrateful country."

"ST. ELISABETH."

The Athenæum thus comments upon Abbé Liszt's extraordinary work:—

"Dr. Wylde is a bold man; else would he not have dared to bring out the Abbé Liszt's Legend of St. Elisabeth at his last concert of the season. The Legend has been more than once referred to in these columns—but guardedly; for, hitherto, it has been unhesitatingly condemned by many. It has been extolled to the skies by the large party of worshippers who, believing in the divinity of Herr Wagner, look upon the Abbé Liszt as his chief prophet. We would fain speak with respect and deference of the greatest executive genius of the age—but, to say sooth, we feel some difficulty in using, at all temperate language the sensations awakened by a first hearing of St. Elisabeth. If the work had been written, according to a musical scale totally at variance with that in use in civilized Europe, the effect could scarcely have been more appalling. It is idle to criticise, according to the generally accepted canons of criticism, a work composed in defiance of them. If we ventured to suggest that much of the Legend was to our ears hideously cacophonous, the disciples of the new school would probably maintain that every chord was dictated by a subtle meaning, and that to penetrate the order in disorder of the master's design is given to none but the humble believers in his genius. To us, whose faith it is that every work of Art should in itself be beautiful, such arguments have no force. We are, at all events, not alone in our judgment; for the performance of the first part of the Legend—last attempted at a concert by Dr. Wylde—was followed by a volley of hearty, unmistakable hisses. Mdlle. Tietjens laboured hard at her thankless task; Herr Stockhausen declaimed admirably; and the choruses, sung in German, were given, to quote the words of the programme, 'with a result as satisfactory as could be anticipated.' It was right to give the Abbé's oratorio once; it would be absurd to repeat it."

The Standard takes another view of the work, and says:—

"The legend of St. Elisabeth is well known through Professor Kingsley's Saint's Tragedy and Montalembert's Vie de St. Elisabeth, but the poem which the Abbé Liszt has set to music is probably less familiar. It is the composition of Herr Otto Roquette who drew his inspirations (it is said) from the exquisite frescoes at Wartburg, executed by Moritz Schwind. The Abbé Liszt's aim has evidently been to illustrate the principal events in the life of St. Elisabeth by means of music, rather than to set the poem to vocal phrases in the ordinary way. His efforts in this direction have previously been remarkable, as may be instanced by his Ihunnenschlacht, inspired by Kaulbach's cartoon, by his Faust symphony, and his Symphonische Dichtungen, works of acknowledged merit on the Continent, but which no one has ventured to bring before an English public for reasons which it would serve no good purpose at present to discuss. The music to St. Elisabeth having the advantage of a poem to elucidate it, it was hoped would have paved the way for a patient hearing of other works of the kind by the chief master of the new school of music in Germany. But if, with the advantage of a key to composers' fancies, English audiences are indisposed to form an opinion of the suitability of the expression to the ideas desired to be portrayed, there is little chance of those less favoured being listened to more patiently. The performance of the legend on Wednesday evening brought together a large number of the advocates and opponents of the school called ironically the "Music of the Future," who expressed themselves according to the light within them in a very decided manner. If such a period were possible when the strains of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and their acknowledged compeers must give way to the imaginings of Herr Richard Wagner, the Abbé Liszt, and others, it would behove every true musician to endeavour to defer it as much as lies in his power. But there is no fear for the future of our great composers. Their work will ever be cherished whilst there are minds capable of appreciating the true and beautiful in art; and there is, therefore, no need to limit the boundary of musical thought. Every work containing original ideas honestly outwrought should be hailed with enthusiasm in whatever school it is written, instead of being permitted to be cried down by the ignorant. Apart from the merits of the work itself, the audience seemed on Wednesday evening to be unanimous in their appreciation of the manner in which it was executed. Both the orchestra and choir were heavily taxed, but accomplished wonders. With Herr Henselet's assistance even the difficulties of the pronunciation for the choir were in a great measure overcome, and his interesting translation enabled the audience to have some insight into the composer's meaning. Mdlle. Tietjens' rôle was the most difficult, perhaps, she has ever been asked to fulfil. No other artist is so gifted with an organ capable of sustaining the long declamatory passages which occur in the legend, and scarcely any other would have cared to have exerted herself so much for the art's sake, seeing that nowhere does the music offer the least opportunity for display. Herr Stockhausen had the best rôle of the two, and his splendid voice was heard to every advantage, whilst his admirable musicianship was apparent all through the performance. On the conclusion of the legend the conductor, Professor Wylde, was called for, and unanimity prevailed in acknowledging the merits of such a remarkable performance."

Digitized by Google

" EMERALDA."

The Sunday Times of last week contains the following remarks upon Signor Campana's new opera :—

"Before hearing the new opera produced at Covent Garden on Tuesday we might have been pardoned for wondering at its choice. Signor Campana's Esmeralda, the prospectus told us, would form one of the two novelties of the season, whereupon the question very naturally arose—Who is Signor Campana, and what are the claims of his opera? It may safely be stated that the general public knew nothing of either, and that only within a small circle was it remembered how the favoured Italian gentleman brought out a work at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1869, which ran three nights and has not since been heard of, and how Esmeralda itself was the chosen of three performances at the Imperial Opera, St. Petersburgh, during the last season. Hence the wonder to which we have referred remained an abiding thing, and led to all sorts of speculations. How came it that an insignificant Anglo-Italian composer and teacher found means to get his work accepted at our greatest Anglo-Italian theatre? How was a question at the solution of which even could only guess, at which they did guess in a way, possibly, unjust, certainly pertinent. Not a few have assumed that the production of Esmeralda is due to Madame Adelina Patti, who found in it a rôle of very ad captandum quality, both in a musical and dramatic sense. They may not be far right, but, at any rate, they have hit upon a motive sufficiently powerful, which cannot be found elsewhere, search as we may. Having heard the work the embarrassment felt by us at the outset is redoubled."

* * * * * *

"We are unfeignedly sorry that the music of Esmeralda must be pronounced bad without qualification. Though there are plenty of good operas lying neglected and almost forgotten, there is still room for one. The department of art can be too rich; and all art-lovers are, therefore, eager to welcome every addition, let it come from wheresoever it may. Hence, though disappointment has nothing to do with the matter—Signor Campana not having been expected to produce more than the worthlessness of Esmeralda is a cause of regret. We must positively decline to analyze the music in detail, because, on no account, would the result benefit our readers. General observations will suffice; and the first we have to make is that the opera shows an almost entire want of originality. The melodies, where there are not of a flimsy, conventional, Italian type, are more or less suggestive of other composers; while in the construction of his concerted movements Signor Campana well nigh lays himself open to the charge of direct plagiarism. There are times when one fancies that Verdi is speaking through an unfortunable medium; at others Donizetti seems to take up his parable, and so on through the list of prominent Italian musicians. But worse than this can be said of Esmeralda without going beyond the limits of truth. We have rarely met with music at once so pretentious and so ungrammatical. It would appear, indeed, either that Signor Campana does not know the simplest rules of his art, or that, knowing them, he, for some purpose or other, sets them at defiance. Whatever the fact may be, it is our duty to point out faults of the glaring character we have described, and to protest against such music being forced upon a public which too often swallows what is given it without very critical examination. Now we return to the point whence we started and ask with tenfold emphasis—How came Esmeralda to find a place in the répertoire of Covent Garden Theatre? If anybody can give us a satisfactory answer, we should like to have it as soon as possible."

Of Signor Cimino's libretto, our Sunday contemporary speaks with more favour and says:—

"An examination of Signor Cimino's libretto must lead to his acquittal on all charges of unnecessarily altering Victor Hugo's story. The resolve to make a libretto out of it at all may have been wrong, but, granting that the task had to be done, the exigencies of opera demanded consideration over and above fidelity to the author. We, therefore, do not complain that Quasimodo appears only once in dumb show, that Estella has been made into a personage of first-class importance, or that in other respects Notre Dame de Paris has been violated. What most concerns us is that Signor Cimino's book deserves praise for its dramatic construction, the clearness of its plot, and the well-balanced variety of its characters and incidents. Let us here express our regret that the libretto did not fall into the hands of a composer able to do it justice. Signor Verdi would have revelled in its incidents, and his undoubted dramatic genius would have risen to the height of its argument without effort. But all such talk is vain."

The Athenæum contains the following :—

"This week's Musical Union concert was excellent, alike in selection and performance. Schubert's exquisite D minor quartet, Mendelssohn's posthumous Andante and Scherzo, and Schumann's quintet in E flat, were all finely and carefully played. Herr Auer has gained in fulness of tone and decision of playing, and he now exhibits an enthusiasm which used to be foreign to his style. Why cannot Mr. Ella allow his artists to make their own way with the public, unimpeded by his damaging puffs? Of the violinist, M. Jean de Gran, he actually writes in this week's programme, 'I regret to state that his rapid and sudden growth (measuring six feet in height—seventeen years old) gives cause for uneasiness in respect to his health.—J. E.' No wonder that many artists object to being described in this fashion—as though they were horses entered for a race."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—To my letter in your last week's impression, which you have described as a "Grüner's Wall," you have appended some remarks in reply thereto. I do not in the least object to this, for even "a worm will turn;" &c., but within four lines of type you make two most opposite statements. In the first place, you say, "the praise of a worthy object is more agreeable because worthy objects are rare;" immediately after which you say, "Let him take comfort, there are plenty of other good things in the world for him to grin at;" how an object can be rare and yet be a plenty my "hoe-haw" capacity fails to see; this, of course, has really nothing to do with the matter in hand, and I merely bring it forward to show that the spirit of elegiasm naturally produces inconsistencies—in fact I have known persons suffering from an extra infusion of this spirit not to have the least judgment as to what they see or what they hear. You say I have appreciated your remarks in the "hoe-haw" fashion, which is, no doubt, habitual to me; you are quite wrong in this supposition; it is not my habitual character at all, and though in my letter I only referred to the satirical part of my feelings, I might have added that I also feel the greatest indignation to find any one treat with contempt the simple old tune as Jones's in D, a tune that your reputed Mendelssohn was thought much of by Haydn, and forming one of a class of tunes that has given to the Church of England, as to its music, a sort of character peculiar to itself. This tune, and others like it, I consider as being the concentrated essence of the genius of the several composers who have left them to us as precious heir-looms; these composers may have each composed fifty or hundred chants, and one here and there have come down to us because of their superior excellence, and then to hear a man pooh-pooh a composition of this genius, and push them on one side, as a dandy would remove some common object which he thought might soil his dainty fingers, I have very little patience, and not much of the "hoe-haw" is left in me.—I remain, yours faithfully, ANTI-PLATITUDE.

London, June 21, 1870.

[The nonsense talked about "Jones in D," "Crotch in C," and other perpetrations of the sort, brings music and musicians into utter contempt. A smatterer can easily pick out such commonplaces on the pianoforte, write them down, and fancy himself a composer. We wish to know what we should not much care if all the existing copies of ninety-nine out of a hundred of these so-called "fine old tunes" were consigned to a bon-fire. The "plenty of other good things in the world," thrown in our teeth by "Anti-Platitude," does not necessarily imply musical compositions. "Anti-Platitude's" head is so crammed with "fine old tunes," that an apter signature for him would be "Pro-Platitude." "Fine old tunes"—indeed!—fine old fiddlesticks! Any twaddler can write a chant more or less acceptable to twaddlers; and, indeed, our Church music is weighed down with such a monstrous heap of rubbish, that few who care for music in the abstract care a straw for our Church music.—A. S. S.]

THE death at Copenhagen of Johan Ole Emil Horneman—composer of the once popular Danish song, "Der Tappre Landsoldat"—is just announced.

FLORENCE.—A grand concert lately given in the Principe Umberto Theatre, by Dr. Hans von Bülow, has created quite a sensation. Works by Cherubini, Mozart, Rossini, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and von Bülow, were executed by an orchestra of a hundred performers. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which had never before been given here on so grand a scale, produced a deep impression on all present. The concert may justly be said to be a triumph for German classical music in Italy.—The Boccherini Quartet Association celebrated Beethoven's Centenary by a performance of the Quintet in C major; the "Kreutzer" Sonata; selections from Fidelio; and the Septet.

Digitized by Google

THE LATE MR. CHARLES DICKENS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I cannot refrain from humbly expressing my hearty concurrence in the view so heartily expressed in your leading article last week on the funeral of Charles Dickens. If ever a public servant was public property he was. All was fit and proper as it was, no doubt; still the extreme rarity of a whole community being moved with one thought is such as to call forth an expression of love; and if love had no "expression," love would soon die, or take its flight to other spheres. Our art, more perhaps than any other, keeps before us that when words are insufficient for extremes of joy or woe, we have recourse to music. "The heart full of joy instinctively sings," and full of woe, as involuntarily mourns in strains of tuneful sobbing. Your genial tone reminds one that "it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting,"—for why? because "the living will lay it to his heart." A word or two addressed by Charles Dickens, to one who was then but a stripling I will extract from one of his letters, thinking it may not be uninteresting to hear of one other instance of his overflowing sympathy with all whom he chanced to come near:—"I hope you will well consider what thorny, dark, and toilsome roads stretch out into the greater world of letters and of learning, and how many young men have fallen dead upon them, or turned back too late."—Yours very truly, G. T.

WAIFS.

The Lady's Newspaper says that Tom Taylor is engaged on a new play for Mrs. Roussby, in which the actress is to personate Joan of Arc.

The new opéra-bouffe by Hervé which is to be produced at the Variétés during the month of October, is entitled Le Trone d'Ecosse.

Mr. Fechter has been engaged for five years at Selwyn's Theatre, Boston U. S, at a very considerable salary.

Visitors to the Polytechnic will be amply gratified with a life-like portrait of Mr. Charles Dickens, which is introduced into one of the entertainments.

We observe an announcement of the death of Adolph Hofmeister editor of the most complete musical bibliography extant. Shall we never have a complete catalogue of English music?

Mr. Ayrton declined to decide whether all the Turners in the National Gallery were worthy of it. The question was evidently put to "draw" him; and, though not his most fervent admirer, Mr. Punch is glad that he would not be drawn.—Punch's "Essence of Parliament."

The pictures and other objects of art belonging to Mr. Dickens are to be sold at auction by Messrs. Christie & Manson. The library is left to his eldest son. His manuscripts and papers are in the hands of his executors, Mr. Forster and Miss Hogarth.

We are authorized to say that Mr. Dickens has left The Mystery of Edwin Drood in a very advanced state, but that, as if he had a presentiment of his decease, he had at the outset arranged terms of accommodation in case the novel were stopped before completed.

Mdlle. Kraus is said to have been engaged by M. Perrin for the purpose of appearing at the Grand Opéra in M. Mermet's Jeanne d'Arc. Personally at least she is well suited to the character, and she has much dramatic energy.

Mr. Lowe, on a little Budget debate, was sportive, and said that the case of a day and night occupancy by different persons was precisely the case of Box and Cox. It would have enlivened the proceedings had he favoured the House with one of Mr Arthur Sullivan's capital songs.—Punch's "Essence of Parliament."

Mr. J. Towers is preparing for publication a memoir of Beethoven, based upon Schindler, Ries, Wieseler, and Thayer, to which will be attached an exact chronological list of his works. Considering the confusion that attends the chronology of the composer's works, this list ought to be valuable.

Our losses of great men in the ranks of literature and art have been very great within the last few years. Most of us can recollect the brilliant little committee, consisting of twenty-six gentlemen who organized the celebrated performances "In memory of Douglas Jerrold" thirteen years ago: out of the twenty-two we have lost ten since the performances took place. Their names are—Charles Dickens, William Makepeace Thackeray, John Leech, Albert Smith, David Maclise, Clarkson Stanfield, Mark Lemon, Sir Joseph Paxton, Peter Cunningham, and Arthur Smith (Albert's brother) who officiated as the indefatigable secretary of the whole affair.

The proprietor of the Rosherville Gardens has unwittingly incurred the displeasure of the ladies of Rosherville by the maintenance of secrecy in reference to the visit of the Prince of Wales and Prince Teck to the Gardens on Saturday last. Rosherville being the garden of flowers the ladies and all regret that they were denied the opportunity of presenting his Royal Highness with a bouquet of roses for the Princess.

M. Félicien David has written some new ballet-music to Lalla Roukh for the benefit of a young danseuse who was to appear in last week's reprise of the opera. M. Montaubry, who used to sing so charmingly in the principal tenor part, and who since then has unsuccessfully tried management, is to re-appear on the boards of the Opéra Comique in a round of his best characters.

Madame Clara Schumann has been nominated Honorary Member of the Royal Academy of Music in Stockholm. The Grand Duke of Hesse has, we read, sent to Herr Betz, the singer, the golden medal "for Art and Science." We are not sure that these distinctions confer any great amount of kudos on the recipients, but the prodigality with which orders are scattered among foreigners is in startling contrast to the rigid care exercised in their distribution among English artists.

A contemporary says:—

"The Dean and Chapter of Peterborough at their last Chapter meeting decided that the Cathedral organ should be rebuilt and enlarged at a cost of £700, the amount of the estimate sent in by Messrs. Hill the London builders. The present organ is the old GG scale, with a very poor fiddle G, swell, and only one octave of pedal pipes, and miserable reeds both in the swell and great organ. The new swell is to contain 13 stops, amongst which are 6 reeds. There are to be 5 stops on the pedal, and the whole organ made to the CC scale. Several important arrangements also were made in connexion with the choir which, it is hoped, will be the means of greatly improving the musical part of the services. Hitherto there have been several masters (at least during the past ten years), and now that the organist has the chief control of the choir we hope, adds our correspondent, that it may no longer be said that 'the choir of Peterborough is one of the worst in the country.'"

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

LAMBORN COCKS & Co.—"The Wild Rosebud," song, by Josephine Williams. LONSDALE.—"Sleeping and Waking," song, by Mrs. A. C. Wilson; "I'll wait thee there," song, by E. Reyloff; "The Sparkle," serenata by Stella; "My Native Land," song, by Dr. Ferdinand Rahles; "Farrano gloia intera," chorus, by Handel; "I wait for thee, my only love," serenade, by Stella.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
OF
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.
And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,
HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

A STRINGENT LOZENGES OF THE RED GUM OF AUSTRALIA.—For Relaxed Throat, in Bottles, 2s.
NURIATE OF AMMONIA LOZENGES, in Bottles, 2s. Useful for Bronchitis, by loosening the phlegm and preventing violent fits of coughing.
F. & F. W. SQUIRE, Chemists on the Establishment in Ordinary to the Queen (Granted August 8th, 1837—December 31st, 1861) 277, Oxford Street, London.

Just Published,
TARANTELLE,
POUR LE PIANOFORTE.
Par PAUL SEMLER.
Prix 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,
"A SUMMER SONG,"
NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By HENRY WALTON.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to secure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	£	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3	0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	... ...	3	0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	4	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Stanley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	3	0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad) ... ... And the Answer to it.	FLORENCE PERCY ...	3	0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3	0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Now Published,

"SUNSHINE,"

MARSHALL HALL BELL'S NEW SONG.

"SUNSHINE" was rapturously encored when sung at the composer's concert by Miss Robertine Henderson, and is published, price 3s., by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: CRAMER & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."

SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.

Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Reberso and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD.

By BERNARD FAREBROTHER.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

"GOD PROVIDETH FOR THE MORROW."

A SACRED SONG.

Words by BISHOP HEBER.

Music by Mrs. MOUNSEY BARTHOLOMEW.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"GO, GENTLE BREEZE"

("The Wind's Whisper").

The Words by the Rev. H. W. PULLEN.

The Music by EDMUND ROGERS.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

THREE PIANOFORTE PIECES BY A. GOLLMICK.

"MERRY THOUGHTS." Morceau de salon .. .. 4s.
"ADELINE." Pensée .. .. 3s.
"BELLE HUMEUR." Pièce .. .. 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to call all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably." — Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

CAMPANA'S

NEW OPERA,

ESMERALDA,

PERFORMED AT

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

WITH IMMENSE SUCCESS.

All the favourite Songs, Duets, Trios, &c., sung by Mdlles. Patti, Scalchi, Signors Graziani and Naudin, are now published.

ALSO,

	s.	d.
The Full Score	25	0
All the Favourite Airs, by F. Nava	5	0
W. S. Rockstro's Gipsy Rondo	4	0
" " Bolero	4	0
" " Brindisi	4	0
" " Grand Fantasia	5	0
Kuhe's Grand Fantasia	4	0
Brinley Richards' Bolero	3	6
Goodban's Fantasia	3	6
Rimbault's Gems of "Esmeralda," easily arranged each	2	0

No. 1. The Bolero. | No. 3. The Quartet.
" 2. The Brindisi. | " 4. The Grand Duet.

DANCE MUSIC

By DAN GODFREY is in the press.

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Sola.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconda Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	0 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	9 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Una Perla (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie).	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	..

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	..
Non tornò (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	..
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	..
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	..
Teraèra (Romanza)	4 0	..
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valser). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	..
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Printed by HENDERSON, KAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex. Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, June 25, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHICH EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 20s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Stre ondon, W.

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 27. SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1870. PRICE { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. st }

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY.—GRAND SUMMER CONCERT and FASHIONABLE PROMENADE. Vocalists—Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Mdlle. Pauline Lewitzky, Mdlle. Carl; Signor Bettini, Signor Vergere, Signor Foli. Crystal Palace Choir. Solo Violin, Mdlle. Teresa Liebe (first appearance).

These delightful Concerts have the advantage of complete orchestral accompaniment, the full Saturday's instrumental Band being engaged, conducted by Mr. MANN.

They are thus far superior to any concert on a large scale accompanied by pianofortes only; they take place in the Centre Transept—the most agreeable locale imaginable for concerts in hot summer weather for enjoyment of music is considerably enhanced by such surroundings as are found here; groups of statuary and banks of flowers meet the eye at every turn. The ear and the eye are equally delighted, and the airiness and general comfort of this vast concert hall are beyond comparison with the heated atmosphere and closeness experienced in London theatres and concert halls.

Half-Crown Admission Tickets and Guinea Season Tickets at all Agents. These, and 5s. 3d. Stall Tickets also, at the Palace, and 2, Exeter Hall. Stalls should forthwith be secured.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

This Evening (SATURDAY), Meyerbeer's Opera "DINORAH." Corsolino, Signor Gardoni; Hoel, Mr. Santley; Un Mendiaco, Signor Rinaldini; Un Cacciatore, Signor Ragour; Due Caproi, Mdlle. Vinta and Mdlle. Briani; Una Capraï, Madame Corsi; Un Capraio, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Dinorah, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska. Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

MONDAY, July 4, Weber's "ABOU HASSAN." Hassan, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Omar, Signor Castelli; il Califo, Signor Ragour; Mesrur, Signor Trevero; Zemrud, Madame Corsi; Zobeida, Mdlle. Briani; and Fatima, Madame Monbelli. To be followed by Bellini's Opera, "LA SONNAMBULA." Elvino, Signor Mongini; il Conte Rodolfo, Signor Foli; Alessio, Signor Zoboli; Un Notaro, Signor Architti; Teresa, Madame Corsi; Lisa, Mdlle. Vinta; and Amina, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.

TUESDAY, July 5, will be produced (third time in England) Ambroise Thomas's Opera, in four acts, "MIGNON." The libretto by MM. Michele Carré and G. Barbier; the Italian translation by Signor Giuseppe Zaffira. Guglielmo, Signor Bettini; Lothario, M. Faure; Laerte, Signor Ginotti; Giarno, Signor Ragour; Ziegfredo, Mdlle. Fioretti; Frederico, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Filina, Madame Volpini; and Mignon, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

THURSDAY, July 7, Meyerbeer's Opera, "OTELLO." Otello, Signor Mongini; Rodorigo, Signor Gardoni; Iago, M. Faure (his third appearance in that character); Elmiro, Signor Foli; Emilia, Mdlle. Carl; and Desdemona, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (her third appearance in that character).

On SATURDAY, July 9, an Opera, in which Mdlle. Christine Nilsson will appear.

Acting Manager .. .. Mr. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—IMPORTANT NOTICE.—The Directors of the Philharmonic Society being most anxious to make the concert in "HONOUR OF BEETHOVEN" as attractive as possible, have, in consequence of various unforeseen circumstances, determined to POSTPONE it until the following MONDAY, JULY 11th, at St. James's HALL, when Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Miss Edith Wynne, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Santley and Mdme. Arbuthnot Godfrey will appear.

They feel sure that these arrangements will meet the approbation of the Subscribers. All Tickets issued for MONDAY, July 4th, will be available for this occasion. Stalls, 10s. 6d. and 7s. Tickets, 5s. and 2s. 6d.

By Order,

STANLEY LUCAS,
Secretary.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC. (Average number of Students 600.) Concerts Fortnightly, Town and Country.—Inclusive Fees, Guinea. For the Free Scholarships must attend the Academy Saturdays, from Twelve to Seven, and in return for Lessons, will have to perform in Public when required. Further particulars, and opinions of the Press, may be had of C. Warren, Sec., Norfolk Road, Haywaiter.

ORGANIST WANTED.

WANTED an ORGANIST for Upton Church, Torquay. Salary, £40 per annum. Apply to Rev. R. R. Wolfe, Furze Park, Torquay.

MADAME PATEY will sing RANDEGGER'S popular Song, "PEACEFULLY SLUMBER," at the State Concert, Buckingham Palace, next Wednesday evening, July 6th.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Institute 1822.—Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1830.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CHRISTIAN,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

President—The EARL OF DUDLEY.
Principal—Professor W. STERNDALE BENNETT.

The PUBLIC CONCERT of the Institution will take place at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, HANOVER SQUARE, on SATURDAY the 23rd inst, commencing at Two o'clock.

There will be a complete Orchestra and Chorus, formed by the Professors and the late and present Students of the Academy.

Conductor—Mr. JOHN HULLAH.

Single tickets, 5s.; family tickets, to admit four persons, 16s.; to be had of the Musicsellers, at the Hanover Square Rooms; and at the Academy, 4 Tenterden Street, Hanover Square. By Order, JOHN GILL, Secretary.

THE ANEMOIC UNION (under the direction of Mr. LLEARD) consists of the following eminent instrumentalists from the Opera Orchestras, Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies, &c.:—Flute, Mr. Henry Nicholson; Oboe, M. Barret; Clarionet, Mr. Lazarus; Horn, Mr. T. E. Mason; Bassoon, Mr. J. Hutchins; and Pianoforte, Mr. W. Shakspeare, R.A.M. Vocalists, Madame Thaddeus Wells. Mr. Lazarus begs to inform Secretaries of Musical Societies, Library and Scientific Institutions, Directors of Orchestral Concerts, Concert Agents, &c., that the Fourth Annual Tour of the Anemoic Union will commence in September, 1870. Complete Programmes can be given, or Mr. Lazarus will be happy to offer the services of the Anemoic Union to assist in full Orchestral Performances, or in Chamber Concerted Music. Terms for one or more Concerts may be known on application to

Mr. HENRY NICHOLSON,
19, Halford Street, Leicester.

UNDER the Immediate Patronage of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge. Mr. FERDINAND LUDWIG will give his FIRST CONCERT, in the Hanover Square Rooms, in the beginning of July. Further particulars will be duly announced.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL, August 23rd, 24th, 25th, and 26th, 1870. Mdlle. Titiens, Miss Edith Wynne, and Madame Sinico; Madame Patey and Miss Marian Severn; Mr. Vernon Rigby and Mr. Montem Smith; Mr. Lewis Thomas and Mr. Santley. Conductor—Mr. Townshend Smith.

MISS ELLEN JARMAN (Associate of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell's Academy of Music) has the honour to announce her ANNUAL CONCERT, July 7th, at Half-past Two, at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, when she will be assisted by the most Eminent Artists in London, and the Students of Mr. Cottell's Academy.

MONDAY, July 4th.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD begs to announce that her MATINEE MUSICALE will take place, by kind permission of the Marquis of Downshire, at 24, BELGRAVE SQUARE, on Monday, July 4th, to commence at Three o'clock. Further particulars will be duly announced.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ'S ANNUAL EVENING CONCERT, on THURSDAY evening, July 7th, QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square, at 8 o'clock, Miss Katherine Poyntz, Mdme. Osborne Williams, and Mdlle. Drasdil; Mr. W. H. Hiller and Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Harley Vinning. Concertina—Mr. Richard Blagrove. Harp—Mr. Bedeyne Reeves. Pianoforte—Mrs. Richard Blagrove and Mr. Walter Bache, Master of the Music to Her Majesty the Queen). Conductors—Mr. Osborne Williams, Mr. Hallett Sheppard, and Mr. Francesco Berger. Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Family tickets, to admit three, one guinea; unreserved, 5s.; Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square; and at Miss Katherine Poyntz's residence, 25, Oxford Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

A PROFESSIONAL MAN, residing in a healthy and fashionable Watering place, receives an ARTICLED PUPIL who has some knowledge of the Organ and Choral Singing. Moderate Premium. Splendid Instrument and unusual Musical advantages. Address, J. D., Holmby House, London Road, Lower Clapton, London.

Digitized by Google

MISS BANKS will sing "AH! MY HEART IS WEARY" (new song by KATE LUCY WARD, composer of "The Weaver") at Store Street Rooms, 4th July.—WESSEL & Co., 16, Hanover Street.

MDLLE. DRASDIL will sing "HE IS UPON THE LONELY DEEP" (new song by KATE LUCY WARD, composer of "The Weaver"), at Miss Katherine Poyntz's Concert, Hanover Square Rooms, July 7th.—WESSEL & Co.

MR. R. BERRINGER will play his admired "VALSE DE BRAVOURE," at the Crystal Palace, on Tuesday next, and during the week.

MISS FANNY CHATFIELD (Mezzo-Soprano), from the Conservatoire, Cologne, is open to Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, Fairlawn House, Forest Hill, S.E.

MR. HENRY GORDON and MDLLE. MARIE D'ETIENNE will sing NICOLAI'S duet, "DIS MOI UN MOT" ("One Word"), at the Portland Rooms, on Wednesday Evening, July 13th.

MISS AGNES LYNDHURST will sing on the 7th inst., at the Queen's Concert Rooms (Miss Ellen Jarman's Concert), WEST-BROOK GUERRERO'S popular waltz song, "THE NAIADES."

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. EMANUEL'S new song, "THE CHARM," Hanover Square Rooms, July 7th; and at his other principal Engagements. Address for Concerts, Oratorios, &c., 28, Old Bond Street.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 30, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

TIRED.—SACRED SONG.

"But what we are especially pleased with is a pathetic little ballad, or sacred song, by Miss Lindsay, the poetry by Miss Helen Burnside 'Tired.' This is so plaintive and so sweet that it conveys the idea of patient and perfect resignation:—

'I'm ready to go to rest at last
Ready to say 'Good Night.
The sunset glory darkens fast
To-morrow will bring me light!'

The music well supports the idea expressed in the words and the hope of a worn and weary spirit:

'With never a dream and never a fear
To wake in the morning light!'

This song threatens to tread closely in popularity upon the heels of Miss Lindsay's 'Far Away.'"—Sunday Advertiser.

No. 1 in D flat, No. 2 in D. Each free by post for 18 stamps.
ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street London.

"LITTLE WILLIE."

"LITTLE WILLIE." By JULES BENEDICT. Sung with distinguished success by
MISS EDITH WYNNE.
at Mr. Benedict's Concert, is published, price 3s., by
DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Just Published,

"I FIND OUT WHOM I LOVE,"
SONG.
Words (by permission) from
"THE YOUNG LADIES OF GREAT BRITAIN."
Music by R. T. GIBBONS.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"OLGA,"
PENSÉE POUR PIANO.
PAR
LOUIS DIEHL.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG,

DEDICATED TO MDLLE. NILSSON.

"I LOVE AND I AM LOV'D"

("J'aime, je suis aimé").

PUBLISHED IN A, C, AND D.

Sung with distinguished success in Paris and London. Also transcribed for the Piano by

E. L. HIME.

Each sent for 24 stamps.

DUFF & STEWART, 147, Oxford Street,

Where may be had A. REICHARDT'S celebrated song,

"LOVE'S REQUEST,"

In C, E Flat, and F.

Also Arranged for the Pianoforte by

BRINLEY RICHARDS AND W. KUHE.

Just Published,

"THE WILD ROSEBUD,"
SONG.
Sung by Miss EDITH WYNNE. The Words by GOETHE.
The Music by JOSEPHINE WILLIAMS, B.A.M.
Price 3s.
London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

"CHILDREN'S SUMMER FEAST."
CHORUS IN UNISON.
The Words from "The Afterglow" (with the Author's permission).
The Music, composed expressly for Children, by CIRO PINSUTI.
Price 6d.
Published by LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63 & 63, New Bond Street.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE."
SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to
MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,
By BERNARD FARRENCTHER.
London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

Digitized by Google

MUSICAL QUARRELS.

GLUCK, PICCINNI, GRETRY, LA HARPE.*

About 1770, the honest citizen, on awaking in the morning, had not, as we have, to consult his paper, in order to learn what to hope or to fear from political events. France was then quiet, but Paris was bored; the gazettes had nothing to do, and the news-collectors made frequent excursions behind the scenes of the Opera, whence they brought back, every day, some sort of booty or other. Now, as we know, a journey to the Opera is not a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and, consequently, the intelligence obtained there was not always very edifying. On what day Madlle. Arnould had received the Duc de * * *; on what night the Marquis de * * * had found at Mdlle. Has's, someone in a costume but slightly conformable to the exigencies of propriety; how the Count de * * * had dismissed his stage nymph; and how some stage nymph had dismissed the Chevalier de * * *; the colour of Mdlle. Guimard's livery at the last Longchamps; her petits soupers, beginning by the light of a hundred wax tapers, and finishing in an obscurity, of which morality was certainly justified in complaining; thousands of jokes at the expense of the Farmers General—a perfect godsend for the young ladies of the Opera, who emptied strong chests with a quickness bordering upon the miraculous; anecdotes about MM. Colardeau and de Carmontelle, the paid poets of the most celebrated courtesans of the epoch; the misadventures of Poinsinet, and his boasting stories, together with this history of his four hundred and fifty mistresses—all these trifling details attracted the attention of the public, but only for an instant. They did not excite the same interest as a new piece and long controversy. When, therefore, the journalists perceived a possibility of reviving the quarrels of musicians, by means of the antagonism between Gluck and Piccinni, great was the joy in the camp. Not only did the pamphleteers fling themselves head into the strife, but even the princes of criticism flew to arms, and prepared to begin the campaign.

The contest, more violent than that which had marked Rameau's score, sprang into existence in the pit of the Opera. Piccicci's Dido, interpreted by Mdme. de Saint-Huberty with an amount of talent to which all contemporary writers rendered homage, was as successful as it was possible to desire. The partisans of Italian music invoked this work; the Gluckists pointed to Iphigénie. Soon afterwards, in the orchestra, the King's Corner, and the Queen's Corner, which had preserved their old denominations, defied each other mutually, and, very frequently, as in the time of Rameau, recrimination was followed up by fisticuffs. If a Piccinnist returned home, separated from the main body of his army, he was immediately surrounded by a group of Gluckists, who accompanied him, singing the melodies which were hateful to his ears. The Piccinnists retaliated in the same way, whenever an unfortunate Gluckist fell into their hands. The former lodged Gluck in the "Rue du Grand-Hurleur," the latter said that Piccinni's proper address was the "Rue des Petits-Chants." The idle collected like so much precious manna, the innumerable jokes made on the pit-benches, and retailed them in the salons, giving their hearers to understand that they were their own.

La Harpe was a determined Piccinnist; in his Essai sur l'Opéra he strongly depreciates the talent of the German master, while he addresses the most honeyed praises to Piccinni. Rousseau, who bravely took his place among composers, displayed considerable coldness for Gluck. Rousseau cried up Italian music. It was with perfect sincerity that he believed he had composed, in the Devin du Village Italian music to French words. He was quite as right as the composers of the 12th century, who fancied they had recovered the music of the Greeks.

Grétry, who united perfidy to smooth words, and was so envious that he would not enter the theatre till the very moment when, at the termination of a work by Mehnl, one of his own operas was about to begin, was no more able than Rousseau and La Harpe, to like Gluck. Let us hear what La Harpe has to say:—

"It was in this last" (the opera of Roland) "that he" (Piccinni) "proved that music might possess strong expression, without ceasing to be melodious, and can shake our soul without shocking our ear by those odieux cris which are so frequent in Alceste and Iphigénie en Tauride, and which all amateurs consider a fault in Gluck's music."

Further on he adds:—

"Gluck carried to excess the din of voices, rendered still greater by that of the orchestra. . . . . I am not surprised that Traetta, on hearing the acclamations of our pit at the Opera, exclaimed—I Francesi hanno le orrachie di carno" (the French have ears made of horn)."

Gluck's deafening (étourdissant) orchestra displeased the celebrated critic, who thought the post assigned it by the composer was too important, and that the voices were exhausted in struggling against such an uproar. He is moved to pity by the fate of the singers, whom the new system must inevitably doom to a premature death, and he advises Gluck to meditate seriously on Marmontel's verses:—

> Et mes poumons? demanda Rosalie,
> Soyez tranquille, ils vous seront payés;
> Sur mon état ils seront employés;
> Rien n'est plus juste, et la règle établie
> Veut qu'en dépense on porte à l'Opéra.
> Tous les chanteurs que monsieur crèvera.

In his opinion, moreover, Armide and Alceste are very insipid productions.

"In this instance, it is a drama, it is Iphigénie, or Alceste, that I see and hear, and when their songs bore and stun me, I am to ask the instruments, am I, what the personages ought to have told me, but which they did not tell me? Why, if that is the case, do not let us have any singing at all. There is a shorter method than singing; let them take to pantomime, and let the orchestra play the piece. If all you can do is to make violins sing, why make actresses scream? Let them keep to gestures, and you will spare their lungs and our ears."

O terrible critic, return to your own profession; employ your experienced scalpel in dissecting literary works, but do not touch our gods. Poor man! What the sublime lamentations of Alcestis, contrasting so mournfully with the joyous accents of the fête; the pathetic scenes of Armida, where all the fury of her hatred is overcome by the omnipotence of her love—these are things that bore and stun you, eh? Return to the Didon that is so dear to you, and gather up at least her ashes, for, despite her charms, the flames have consumed her.

It is true, however, that Alceste was not successful in Paris. A part of the public shared the opinions of La Harpe; Mozart, the only person in the house, perhaps, capable of comprehending such music, could not refrain from exclaiming, as he embraced Gluck: "Those Parisians possess neither outrails nor heart. Heaven preserve me from ever writing anything for them!" Thus we have, on the authority of Mozart, a public without entrails or heart; while, according to Signor Traetta, it is blessed with ears of horn. I am very willing to side with Mozart, even against the public and La Harpe. I believe the public did quite right in welcoming Iphigénie with enthusiasm, but were quite wrong in rejecting Alceste. When we behold such masterpieces treated so cavalierly, it is easy to say to whom belong the ears of Nero, speaking politely, and eschewing a term more energetic than that employed by Traetta, but better calculated to convey my thought.

Grétry, too, as I have said, had no great partiality for Gluck's music. The greatness of Gluck's glory galled him. He knew very well that the brilliant star would cause his own more modest light to pale. He does not imitate La Harpe, it is true; he does not attack the colossus with a club, but he does not spare his envenomed epigrams. On reading his remarks cursorily, we do not immediately perceive his malignant intention, but we find afterwards that, under every piece of praise he lavishes on the great master, there lurks some ill-natured restriction, very artfully disguised. It is the poisoned sage, mentioned by Boccaccio, which possessed every characteristic of a harmless fiower, and yet, for all that, produced death. La Harpe was at least frank in his attacks. Grétry is slyer; he works in the dark; he hangs, so to speak, about his rival's domain, endeavouring to find his way into it through some gap or other, and stealing off directly he is discovered. Not wishing to attack openly, he directs his remarks against the Opera, and against French music, exalting Italian compositions, because he considers them incapable of competing with his own.*

"I do not hesitate saying that, sooner or later, the artists of the Paris Opera will be obliged to sing without screaming, to sing as people sing in Italy, if they would have their performances witnessed. The spectators partici-

* The proverb telling us that "charity begins at home, is exceedingly applicable in the generality of cases, and therefore we feel inclined to wish that the said visitor stepped now and then beyond one's own threshold. It seldom did so in Grétry's case. He wrote three volumes of Memoirs, in a rather incorrect style, stuffed with lustanes of philosophical redundancy, the scraps saved from his conversations with Diderot and Co., and thickly strewn with paradoxes. They contained, however, some curious and pungent details, for Grétry was very witty. In these Memoirs all his attention is devoted to the details, even the slightest ones, of his own scores. In one particular opera, two or three notes on the bassoon indicate, we are informed, the expression assumed by someone who is jealous; in another, a series of circular notes trace materially upon paper the chain suiting a loving couple. He tells us that the object of such and such a prescription is to clear his brain of the vapours which affect it, and fit him for producing masterpieces; in a word, he is always talking at great length of himself; but of Mozart's works, for instance, he never says a word, though he cannot deny they are perfection. It is true, also, that Grétry's music did not produce any very great impression upon the composer of Idomeneo.

* From the Guide Musical.

Digitized by Google

pate too largely in the pangs suffered by a singer who screams. Pleasure is changed into a horrible torment, and the finest organs are destroyed in a very short time. Gluck's music is fine (he acknowledges this) "but it has the defect of frequently exceeding all human strength as far as the voice is concerned. No voice can ever compete without risk against eighty or a hundred instruments, played as loudly as they can be played."

Grétry knew perfectly well that Gluck never gave the voice an accompaniment of eighty instruments, played as loudly as they can be played. He was aware that Gluck employed principally stringed instruments; that such instruments can play in the gentlest piece of gradation, and that wind instruments are rarely combined with them in Gluck's compositions. Grétry knew this, but preferred not to let it be known it. He preferred inciting in the same blama tha theatre, the singers, and every great work that disquieted his self-pride.

Having mentioned above the name of Marmontel, I may, to his great glory, and as tending to increase the authority of literary men's judgments in music, add that, in his eyes, "Gluck is a howling barbarian, a Teutonic Orpheus, a Bohemian juggler." As we see, he rivals La Harpe, who designates those charming pieces: "Jamais dans ces beaux lieux," and "Volet la charmante retraite," as "airs fit for a wine shop or a galanteo-show," and calls Don Juan "Germanic clatter."

The subalterns of criticism observed even less propriety in their attacks. Compared to old music, Gluck's music was "a filthy stable paralleled to a palace"; Arcesta sang not like an enchantress, "but like a witch"; Alcestis "howled like a ressuscitée," etc. Gluck found some difficulty in bearing these criticisms, which degenerated into insults. With his friends, but not in public, for that would have compromised his dignity as an artist, he cannibalized bitterly of the rabble of the press; his rough and impressionable nature was betrayed in accents of rage and indignation. Like the wounded bull, he shook violently these banderillas, which, thank heaven, merely grazed the cuticle; but they did not sting the less for all that. The set of paper-stainers need up oceans of ink not in combating but in vilifying a great genius. For one bee, what thousands of wasps, as anyone fond of comparisons might say; for one man of genius, how many miserable literary adventurers who live—or who lived then—only by outrages lavished on all that was worthy of respect and admiration!

Like those generals who first allow their troops to engage, before taking part personally in the strife, Gluck and Piccinni began by adopting a reserved line of conduct, but they very soon left cover to the lists. Gluck, rather pettily, reproached Piccinni with organizing his successes at the Marquis of Caraccioli's dinners. Piccinni, who possessed a more gentle nature, entertained a great terror of his rival's machinations. He was, moreover, little fitted for this kind of war. When he left his family, to attend the first performance of Roland, every one, himself included, burst into tears. He considered a failure inevitable. His fears were, happily, not realized, for the piece was very successful, and his friends praised it to the skies. Iphigénie en Tauride, the subject being the same as that which Gluck had treated, met with no success. The German master's superiority was too evident. Moreover, a strange occurrence settled the fate of the piece at the very first representation.* The advantage remained, therefore, with Gluck, but he had still more than one storm to encounter. Italian music was receiving reinforcements. Sacchini came to Paris with works more developed and more dramatic than Piccinni's. His style, though still retaining that Italian melodiousness, so highly appreciated by a great number of persons, assumed, in certain pieces, a character of strength, reminding us of the German style. Despite its merit, however, Sacchini's music does not strike us as possessing the freshness of melody remarkable in Piccinni, nor as attaining Gluck's energy. This is often the case with all works of transition or eclecticism. (Edipe à Colonne was the work of Sacchini's which achieved the greatest success, and revived controversies on the point of dying out.

But if Gluck was sharply attacked, he found fanatical defenders; violence provokes violence. Thus, thousands of pamphlets were published, tearing to shreds the reputation of the Italian composers. One of the most violent was that entitled Brigandage de la Musique Italienne. I would have quoted some passages from it, were it not written in an unreadable style. It contains curious details concerning the different theatres of Italy. We learn from it that the custom of recalls and encores, so mortal a foe to dramatic truth, was the fashion then as it is now.

Such were the famous disputes, so difficult of comprehension at the present day. Time has not been favourable to the Italian compositions. Despite some genuine beauties, they have not been able to maintain their reputation. Hurriedly written, solely for the purpose of satisfying the passing passions of the public, they do not bear that stamp of severe beauty which defies the caprices of fashion. In Piccinni, and in Sacchini, we meet with admirable isolated bits, but it would be difficult to make the public accept, now-a-days, whole acts of these works, while the fine scenes of Armide and Orphée still enchant us. How short has been the duration of the many reputations created during this century! We might compare dramatic productions to vessels buffeted by the sea; one wave of opinion overwhelms, and another raises them again. Alceste, Don Juan, and Il Barbiere were failures on the first night. Fedon and Roland proved marvellous successes. While a few noble vessels have entered the port, with all their sails spread, and triumphing over the storm, of how many frailer crafts which have perished, though not without a glorious struggle, do we discover, with sorrow, the fragments on the silent and deserted shore!

L. K.

* When Iphigenia appeared, there was an unusual movement in the pit. Instead of coming on the stage in a manner befitting the daughter of a king of kings, she rushed on, with an inflamed face, knocking herself against each wing, and now casting her eyes on the ground, now directing the most anxious —the most despairing looks to the borders. Piccinni turned pale in his box, and the audience burst out into inextinguishable laughter. Iphigenia was intoxicated. Someone in the pit cried out that the piece ought not to be designated Iphigénie en Tauride, but Iphigénie en Champagne. The most singular fact is that Mdlle. Laguerre, who played Piccinni this scurry trick, sang with perfect correctness in the midst of her incoherent pantomime. The piece could not survive the accident, and still less the epigram. It was the time when a joke launched from the pit sufficed to ruin any piece.

ON "OVERDOING IT."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—'Twas when the English Mozart wielded the baton at Covent Garden—by the way, it is both instructive as well as amusing to note in a musical report (I think in the Chronicle) of that period, how signal was the failure of that long-since, widely celebrated glee, "Mynheer Vandunck," especially to remark also the failure of the young gentleman who sang the song; that was no other than Henry Phillips—the music to Guy Mannering was being rehearsed. At the chorus, "The Clough and Crow," the passage occurring (upon which so many young vocal aspirants have subsequently "cut their teeth") to the words, "Shrick on their murky way," a very decided ritardo was introduced by the "young gentleman who sang the bass." "Stop, stop," jerked out the chef d'orchestre, saying something in an undertone to the innocent offender, only the last words of which ("I have provided for that afterwards; to retard there is like buttering beans") reached those near. Suppressed mirth amongst the insubordinate subordinates soon gave place to general admiration of their master's forethought when they arrived at the phrase, so well worthy of Bishop's genius, to the words, "And use it as ye may." Brief as it is, it is genial and expressive, and withal a capital hint—by "use" for an opera chorus—worthy of notice with very little trouble—(en passant, the "divine" Mozart wrote his opera choruses absurdly easy; composers are not so absurd now; oh, no; they "know a trick worth two of that")—and evidently, having set his heart on this sublime little climax, he did not wish the ground cut from under his feet by the time he knew it three bars of adagio would have on the audience by any previous "spreading abroad" of the tempo for the exclusive advantage of but a single voice; two diminutions would be "overdoing" it. When there are over four p.s, or more than six f.s, there is "overdoing" it. When there are more than sixty minutes per diem to kaleidescopic exercises for the development exclusively of the manual acroteria, that is "overdoing" it. Let it by no means be imagined that there are no other modes of "overdoing" it. The most fatal has escaped ignorance as well as all we hold dear is exemplified in the lives of many of our studious men; most of all in our young musicians. They attempt too much. Not that their "flights of fancy" are too exalted, nor their ambition too ardent; but by going about their business with the set purpose of getting as much "out of themselves" as possible, they do not offer "a clear," like the "vaulting ambition," of which the good dramatist speaks. There seems, to poor human ken, no reason why we should lose such men as Gottschalk, Wely, and Dreyschock, at about the age of forty years; and such as Weber, Chopin, Mendelssohn, and Mozart at even earlier years. It is of no use "running a tilt" at fate. Getting into a pet about it will assuredly do no good; but obtaining a light for the future from the ashes of the past—would it not be worth while to inquire whether the system of "forcing" both musical education, more particularly in that rigid training through which our experienced men so rigorously put themselves of their own free will, after, it might be said, they had left "school," in order to obtain a place in the race for honours, is altogether too much for human endurance. Life cannot be kept within the limits of its day under such treatment, in other words, the soul grows so fast that it soon disdains earthly swaddlings, and so, bidding adieu to material surroundings, takes its place amongst its more immediate peers. Poetry and dreaming aside, life is valuable; it was not bequeathed us to be squandered. The immaterial spirit must not be driven out of its earthly habitation too soon by reason of too much mental work—this is "overdoing" it. If, for instance, a pianist of the first class plays every morning, as many do—as all have done—for, say, three hours; and then writes for three hours; and then spends another three hours in evening performances (either listening or playing; some minds are so active that they are almost as busy when engaged in the one as the other), is he not in danger of "overdoing"? But in all these points a still deeper shade might not untruthfully be dropped in. Some play five or six hours; then write for as long a period; and then stay out till past midnight. What must be the result? The very high degree of culture demanded of the modern musician impels a youth with any pride about him to urge his powers, physical and mental, to the very top of their speed. "A thousand notes a minute," by the metronome, at the very least; nothing less will suffice. Unerring accuracy, or he will get "pluck't." He must commit to memory faithfully, and be, in everything, "note perfect." Not only in one author, but in a hundred must he be "well up," though each of the composers played little else, perhaps, than their own "compositions," or stripling must be familiar with them all; he must have them all at his fingers' ends, from Corelli to De Kontski—task enough for half a lifetime surely; still, if the musician takes care of himself, and of his powers, there is no reason why he should not, like many of the most honoured in an honourable profession, "make old bones." He might not become a centenarian It is true, as did De Lorme and Lopez; but it will be remembered that amongst a very numerous rôle of distinguished musicians who reached "a good old age," the names of Haydn, Spohr, and Handel, are to be found purposely approaching four score; Cramer Novello, and Cherubini exceeded four score. These were by no means idle people. I am inclined to think they "got out of themselves" nearly all that it is possible for any created being to get out of himself during his period of probation. Noble workers all of them! No grass grew under their feet; nor did they "foot it featly" in gilded saloons during the "wee sma' hours ayont the twal." What was the secret of their strength or vitality? Who shall presume to say? Is there any "elixir" can alter the decrees of that wisdom that "setteth up one and putteth down another?" Assuredly not. Still let me plead a moment. I think it is the difference in the hours mainly. We should stand aghast were anyone to work a horse belonging to us for as many hours as we habitually work ourselves. A very great authority (whose name just now lingers upon every tongue) spoke as many hours of physical exercise as he did of mental application. This he held necessary to maintain a just and fair balance of his powers. It has, however, turned out that had he taken more recreation, he would only be following the best advice of one of his best friends. Not to multiply instances, illustrations, it was once to see when Mr. Mark Lemon was personating Falstaff, which he did so unctuously and so well, that he was "overdoing" it. It was remarked last autumn, when he was "doing" the character in the Provinces, by one who has the reputation for reflection, that it "could not last." If he did not quit drawing on his powers at that exhaustive rate he would soon not have the choice left him. And so it proved. If I am probing too near the quick, it is because I feel it is necessary to utter a word of warning in the ear of the "coming generation," among whom I am now a growing factor—I am afraid, said, vice—to light, as it were, the candle of life at both ends. It takes a long apprenticeship to make a man a consummate actor; and even when it is acquired there is no calling with which I am acquainted that draws so persistently, or so deeply, on the "vitality." To play well at night, the best part will tell you requires the utmost care of yourself by day. Some, like Macready, adopt the one course and live on; others, like Edmund Kean, adopt the reverse, and do not live out half their days. It is too near the mean themselves to mention their names. I have always held, for instance, that many pianists (and very proud I was to be allowed to do so), men of whom it was said they practised fifteen hours a day, and continued that severe training for years. One clever musician was reputed to have played the violin for seven hours and the piano for seven of every day—"doing" it, as they say, "overdoing" it. When not playing he was composing. He wrote Maritana and Lurline, and then without reaching the prime of life, or attaining to the best results of the powers that were within him, became a "wreck." We would be glad to have spared him in the one capacity either as violinist or pianist or both, as a soloist, if he had given us another opera. Who would not be willing to forego few reminiscences of Paganini or Thalberg in exchange for another Lurline. In a word, it is quite plain that no man can become an epitome of executive talent of varied orders; though, mentally, men may be found who are endowed with a universal grasp and almost a universal sympathy. Let the young student then beware of "overdoing" it. No one man can do everything. If his talent lie in any one direction, playing, for instance, let him keep mainly to one instrument; and if it incline to writing or composing, let him make the desk his chief concern. To expect one man to both compose a concerto and to play it is scarcely wise. For to compose one concerto well he must be in the full fruition of mind for composing concertos generally. This can only be acquired by "improving the shining hours" over the inkstand for a great portion of the day. And supposing our young exuberant composer has anticipated the dawn (having had the courage on the previous evening to withstand the undeniable attractions of the "best of all good company," always open to the genuine artist, as, indeed, is all good company to its peer) and "preventing the night watches"—supposing him to have taken, ere the matutinal reflection is announced, his customary two or three hours' dose of "Kaleidoscopics," in what state of mind will our "patient" be for composing at that time? Will the endless devices of his "five finger exercises" promote the receptiveness and growth of the ideal within him? I rather think the reverse; in fact that the two procedures are utterly inimical to each other, and that instead of anything appreciable being gained, everything will assuredly be stalled, and will, perhaps, as the die may turn, be eventually entirely lost both to himself and to posterity by thus "overdoing" it.—Yours very truly,

Digitized by Google

June 15th, 1870. IDEALIZER.

MISS KELLOGG AT HOME.

The following criticism appeared lately in Watson's Art Journal, Apropos of Miss Kellogg's Paulina (Il Poliuto):—

"The rôle of Paulina has always been considered a part requiring first-class powers. The character itself is peculiarly trying from its constant unrest; so full of conflict are the passions it exhibits from the opening to the closing scene, that the situations absolutely admit of no repose. There is consequently little opportunity for the finer shades of artistic contrast, the emotions being strung to the highest pitch throughout. Accustomed as we have been to the strong and broad interpretation of this part by the prominent dramatic singers who have assumed it—to the pre-eminence so extravagant, and to the singing so overwhelming in its physical development, verging closely upon ranting, it seems hardly possible that Piccolomini and Kellogg, the very opposite of those singers, should produce effects as powerful. Yet so it is, and proves that the same end may be attained by means entirely different, and that effects as broad and striking can be produced by artistic contrast, as by the strongest development of physical power.

"Miss Kellogg is terribly earnest in the character of Paulina, for although the weakness of the woman's nature will stand out there is a constant struggle between it and her intolerant detestation of her husband's professed faith in the new Christian doctrine. She will plead for him, it is true; will strive to save him, but his impiety revolts her, until, overcome by that simple devotion which seems to rob death of all its horrors, she believes in the true God, and goes forth to the bloody arena with the calm fortitude of a martyr. Miss Kellogg's acting throughout was truthful and impassioned; she did not lose sight of the situation for an instant, but kept the cord tightened, until irrepressible enthusiasm severed the strands, and her heart poured out in a burst of passionate song, the words, 'Oh, Santa Melodia! Celeste volutta!' So finely and truthfully was that rendered that it excited a furore of admiration, and it had to be repeated amid shouts of bravos and thunders of applause. It was a supreme moment for the artist. Miss Kellogg's gestures were purely classic; they demonstrated the emotion with striking fidelity; every movement was beautiful, and so eloquent that her action was unmistakable in its meaning. Her poses were classic and graceful, and were in some cases as beautiful as statuesque as those of Rachel. There was a world of expression alone in those shapely arms, and those little hands, which seemed to plead, command, entreat, and defy by turns. She sang the music splendidly, from the first note to the last. Her phrasing was admirable, impressive, without mannerism, and effective without rant. Her finish is most elaborate; it is hardly possible to detect a blemish in her intonation, articulation, or execution. It was pure, beautiful, and honest singing from the beginning to the end, and we were gratified to hear the repeated and irrepressible murmurs of bravo, bravo, which greeted her as each part appeared in strong relief. Her voice was in superb order; it was full, melodious, and sympathetic; and ran out in passages of force, with metallic power which surprised while it delighted every one present. We must name Paulina as the grandest of all the characters that Miss Kellogg has yet achieved; in its interpretation she has developed high histrionic powers, and has boldly taken her stand among the dominant artists of the day. It is a proud position which Miss Kellogg has reached by indomitable perseverance; long may she retain it, adding new laurels to the crown of honour which she so justly wears."

BADEN.—Madame Viardot-Garcia has returned to this fashionable watering-place, and resumed her Musical Matinées, which are patronized by the Queen of Prussia, at present stopping here.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Friedrich Wagner, bandmaster of the Royal Saxon Garde-Reiter Regiment, and a distinguished virtuoso on the trumpet, is about to undertake, with the band of trumpeters under his orders, a tour in the Rhine Provinces and Holland.

INSBRUCK.—In consequence of the great success attending the first performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea, a second and equally successful performance has just been given. A hand-some wreath was presented to Herr M. Nagiller, the conductor, by the artists under him. Herr Nagiller has done a great deal to raise the standard of music in the Tyrol. It was he who first introduced Handel two years ago, into that country, Samson being the work then selected.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The total receipts of the late Musical Festival amounted to eight hundred thalers. It is believed that, after the expenses are defrayed, there will be a surplus. This surplus the committee propose distributing among the members of the orchestra, and musicians in necessitous circumstances. Considering the number of both classes of the intended recipients, especially of the second class, it must strike an impartial observer that the share of each individual recipient will not be much.

Digitized by Google

A LETTER OF FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

By Frederick Thomae, Ph. D.

"Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost."—St. John vi. 12.

Under date of the 27th July, 1843, Vincent Novello presented a collection of manuscripts, most of them autographs of Beethoven, Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, W. A. Mozart, father and son, and Neukomm, to the British Museum. Bound now together, they form a separate volume of thirty-seven sheets of very different size, numbered from No. 1 to 37 (Manuscript Music, 402. Additional Manuscripts, 14,396. Pinteus[a] CXCii. A.). In the following, the single sheet will be marked by fol., its front by the letter a, its back by the letter b added to its No. There cannot be any doubt of the authenticity of Mendelssohn's letter which we intend publishing herewith. The MS. shows his well-known handwriting, elegant and graceful, but free from all flourishes, and, therefore, plain and clear, involuntarily reminding the spectator of W. A. Mozart's handwriting. The size is note paper 8vo, viz., four inches in breadth, and six inches four lines in length. The letter is contained from the beginning to the word original, inclusive, on fol. 31*a*,—from the words with all its, to the end, on fol. 31*b*.[b] Neither the letter nor the composition following it show any date stamp; however, the former, on several places repaired and done over with paper, may have borne such a one before. Postage stamps, on the other hand, did not come into operation in England, where they were first used, before the 6th May, 1840.[c] On the lower part of fol. 31*a*, which is the last page of the composition, there is still to be seen a white wafer, nearly five lines in diameter, proving the use of a cross-ruled stamp, the meeting points of two lines marked in it by a somewhat deeper stitch. According to the date subjoined at foot, the letter is written in Mendelssohn's twenty-fifth year during the master's third stay in England,[d] which lasted from the 25th April, 1833, till the 25th August of the same year. It was interrupted from soon after the 15th May till the 8th June, by an excursion to Dusseldorf-on-the-Rhine,[e] where he had, on Whitsun holidays—Whit-Sunday fell in 1833 on the 26th May—to conduct the 15th of the great Lower-Rhine Musical Festivals,[f] remarkable in the history of music by Handel's Israel in Egypt being first introduced into the repertory of German music feasts.[g] It will perhaps, be interesting to note that the first public performances of this oratorio in England had taken place on the 4th of April, 1739.[h] To turn back to our letter.—Vincent Novello, to whom it is addressed, was an intimate London acquaintance of Mendelssohn, as well as Thomas Attwood, the organist, of whom we shall have to speak more; Sterndale Bennett, the composer; Ignaz Moscheles, the pianist, after Ludwig Berger, in 1824, for some time his instructor in pianoforte playing; William Horsley, the connoisseur of theory, history, and bibliography of music; and that faithful friend of German art and poetry, Karl Klingemann,[i] late Secretary to the Hanoverian Legation. Born in London in 1781, Vincent Novello held the office of organist at the Portuguese Embassy's Chapel, was distinguished as a careful author and editor of a great many organ and piano compositions and transcriptions, and highly esteemed for the earnestness with which he pursued the interests of his art. His eldest son, Joseph Alfred, was the founder of the publishing London music firm of Novello, Ewer, & Co., now far renowned over the three kingdoms; and his second daughter, Clara, afterwards, when married to an Italian nobleman (Count-ess Gigliucci), became one of the brightest stars on the sky of singing art. In 1849 he left London and retired to Nice in Italy, where he died in 1861.[k] A true monument of filial piety, equally removed from mere insignificance as from exaggerated eulogies, has been put to Vincent Novello by the loving hand of his eldest daughter, Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke,[l] the well-known author and editor of Shakspere's works, in a little book sacred to his memory.

As the simple generation of 1833 was not so luxurious as the present in regard of gummed envelopes, the direction of Mendelssohn's letter is written outside the letter itself. It is as follows:—"V. Novello, Esq., 67, Frith Street, Soho Sqre." In this place, in 1833, Jos. Alfred Novello, Musiceller, carried on business,[1] very modest in its beginning and appearance, and Vincent Novello lived with his family from 1830 till 1834.[m] I hope the publication of the letter will be of interest from two reasons. First of all, it gives us some hints about a period of Mendelssohn's life rather important for his acknowledgment as a virtuoso and his development as a composer, but little known about, as the published letters give only few or no news at all out of that time—at least, in the letters edited by Paul Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Dr. Carl Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.[n] A letter of the 6th April, 1833, is followed by one of the 6th September, 1833; and Devrient's Recollections give, after a short notice of Mendelssohn's visit to London, a letter of the 7th September, 1833. The smaller collections of letters, published by Nohl[o] and Polko,[p] do not come into consideration at all. Secondly this letter is a specimen of Mendelssohn's English style, the first one published, I suppose. Benedict[q] tells us that Mendelssohn was well up in English literature, and that the works of Shakspere and the other eminent British poets were quite as familiar to him as those of his own country, and that he wrote as well as spoke the English language with great facility and purity, although his accent was slightly tinctured by his German origin. I do not think the English reader will be able, by many phrases in the letter, to point out the foreign writer; unusual, perhaps, are the expressions, wants in the meaning of deficiencies, cuttings for blottings or erasings, and the short Prae, i.e., Praeludium, just before Postludium, current in German. The letter runs thus:—

"My dear Sir,—As Mr. Attwood tells me that he does not intend going to St. Paul's next Sunday,[r] I fear I shall have no opportunity before my return from the Rhine of playing to you the organ fugue which I wrote for you at Berlin, and I beg, therefore, you will accept it as it is, although I have not yet tried it on the organ, and do not know whether it is not too[s] great a trifle to be offered to you. But I liked it when I wrote it, and, on that account, I hope you will excuse the wants in it, and my sending you, instead of a copy in better writing, the original with all its alterations, cuttings, etc. I intended to finish here the Praeludium which I have begun for this fugue, but could not yet find time for it, and beg you will excuse its coming some weeks later, and being then, instead of a Prae, a Postludium.

"I hope to meet you this morning, in order to thank you in person for the kind presents you again have made me, and for which the influenza prevented me last week from saying my thanks to you.—Believe me, my dear Sir, very truly yours, 103, Portland Street, 10*th May*. Felix Mendelssohn."

(To be continued.)

Wrexham.—The following is a "c'rect card," as they say at the races, of the artists who will take part this season in the Kursaal Concerts given by the Administration. 1. On the 24th June, Mdme. A. Leclerc-Ubrich, soprano; Herr Betz, baritone; and Herr Léonard, violinist; Mdlle. Pauline de Smet, pianist. 2. On the 15th July, Mdme. Peschka-Leutner, from Leipsic, soprano; Herr Scheyer, from the Royal Opershouse, Berlin, baritone; Mdlle. Pauline Fichtner, from Paris, pianist; Herr Jules de Swert, from Berlin, violoncello. 3. On the 5th August, Mdme. Mathilde Mallinger, from the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, soprano; Herr Georg Müller, from the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, tenor; Herr and Mdme. Jaell, from Paris, pianists; Mdlle. Thérèse Liebe, from Paris, violinist. 4. On the 19th August, Mdme. Monbelli, from Agia, vocalist; Mdme. Arabella Goddard, from London, pianist; Herr Auer, Professor at the Imperial Conservatory, St. Petersburgh, violinist. 5. On the 12th September, Mdme. Marie Battu, from the Grand Opéra, Paris, soprano; Herr Nachbaur, from the Royal Opershouse, Munich, tenor; Herr August Wilhelmj, violinist; Mdlle. von Dohjansky, from Paris, pianist. The well-known band, under Herr W. Jahn, will, as usual, take part in all the concerts.

[a] Pinteus, short Pint., Latin for cupboard. Pinteus CXCii, A., is the library language means, Cupboard, No. 192, first rank.

[b] Fol. 32*a* is empty.

[c] See Journal of the Statistical Society of London. Vol. IV. [London, 1841], p. 97.

[d] First visit to England, 1829, second, 1832. See Jules Benedict, Sketch of the Life and Works of the late Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Second Edition. [London, 1853.] P. 11 ff., p. 19 ff.

[e] W. A. Lampadius, Felix Mendelssohn, Bartholdy [Leipzig, 1848], p. 34 ff.

[f] Niederrheinische Musikzeitung. Vol. XI. [Cöln, 1863], p. 177.

[g] Edward Devrient, Meine Erinnerungen an Felix Mendelssohn, Bartholdy, und seine Briefe an mich [Leipzig, 1869], p. 158.

[h] Friedrich Chrysander, G. F. Handel. Vol. III. [Leipzig, 1867], p. 89.

[i] See Karl Klingemann, in Ferdinand Hiller's Aus dem Tonleben unserer Zeit [Leipzig, 1868], Vol. II., p. 95–100.

[k] Felix is mistaken in saying: "Novello est mort à Londres vers 1845."

[l] The Life and Labours of Vincent Novello. London. [1864.]

[1] The Post Office London Directory for 1833, p. 295.

[m] Mary Cowden Clarke, pp. 34, 35.

[n] Briefe aus den Jahren, 1830, bis, 1847, von Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. 2 voll. Leipzig. [1861—63.]

[o] Ludwig Nohl, Musiker—Briefe. Leipzig. [1867.]

[p] Elise Polko, Erinnerungen an Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Leipzig. [1868.]

[q] Sketch, &c., p. 18. [r] "St. Paul's," MS. [s] "To," MS.

Digitized by Google

MR. CLAY'S GENTLEMAN IN BLACK.

The accident of this amusing piece having been brought out at an ordinarily non-musical theatre seems to have blinded some of our contemporaries to the fact that it is, to all intents and purposes, a comic opera. True, there is spoken dialogue, but there is also much more music in it than in the drama with songs, which we were wont to dignify by the appellation of English Opera. The Gentleman in Black has the rare merit of being original. The subject is fantastic enough to have been imagined by Hoffmann, but it is also quaint and droll enough to be worthy of its real author, Mr. Gilbert. Equally original are the merry strains with which Mr. Frederic Clay has brightened the story. The themes are of that decided and tuneful character which M. Offenbach has found universally popular, but there is no direct plagiarism. The smart and "catching" melodies which abound are admirably adapted to be committed to memory by actors who make no pretensions to a profoundly technical education; and music of this description is equally acceptable to a general audience. A telling "subject," however, by no means precludes elaborate treatment—witness the finale to the first act, wherein a capital theme is thrown to and fro from orchestra to singers, taken up by one voice, finished by another, and altogether so cleverly worked that the movement grows in interest until the curtain falls. We would further note some couplets built on an Offenbachian modal, and disclosing genuine humour: also a graceful soprano ballad, scored with admirable tact. Mr. Clay, indeed, has evidently taken unusual pains with his orchestration, knowing probably that he would have to rely greatly on his band. The actors, however, acquit themselves more than creditably of their unfamiliar task, singing with such correctness of accent and general intelligence as more ambitious artists often fail to exhibit. We welcome The Gentleman in Black, as an agreeable substitute for the burlesques with which we have all been long afflicted—halting verses, lamed by tedious word-torturings, joined to tunes stolen from the music-halls; and we are duly grateful to Mr. Clay, as well as to the compact little company of the Charing Cross Theatre, for setting a good example to their contemporaries. C. C.

THE BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL AT NEW YORK.

The great musical festival which is to astonish New York and the neighbouring States, is steadily moving on to the day of its consummation. We hear of immense things in store for the admiration and the wonder of our citizens, and if but half the indications become facts, the New York festival of June, 1870, will cause Boston to blush, and wipe England and Germany out altogether. The engagements made are already multifarious, comprising almost every name known to fame in this country. It must cost a fortune alone to secure the services of the artists embodied in the list. The chorus is to be of immense proportions. The Handel and Haydn Society of Boston are coming, to a man, together with copious societies from New Jersey, Connecticut, other parts of New England, and from some of the up-the-river towns and cities. These, and with what may be got in New York, will build up an immense chorus, counting by the thousands. With such material, New York need fear no competition. It took Boston nine months to produce her great Musical Jubilee, and still some of the respectable fossils of this city and Boston pronounced the whole thing an artistic failure. New York will show them that a Festival can be got up by the vital energy of New York capitalists, in two weeks, that will be approved of, not only by the old fogies of both cities, but by the vigorous and gushing writers of the press. It can be done, it will be done, it must be done. The great conductors of the country have been engaged, and will organize the several departments, and be responsible for the uttermost perfection of performance. Thus, Max Maretzek will temporize with the Italian operatic element, and harmonise them into exquisite and picturesque ensembles; Carl Bergmann will invoke the tuneful spirits of Liszt and Wagner, and pay some attention to the dark, colossal ghost of Beethoven, who, it is expected, will be present, as he is invited to accompany General Grant, he having consented to give up his cigar for this occasion only; Dr. James Pech will wield the baton, and bring into line the miscellaneous choral coberts to attack Haydn and Handel in their tenderest points, and overcome them with a multitudinous power; Carl Berthalm will wheel the Handel and Haydn Society to the front, and treat Mendelssohn mercifully and with distinguished consideration; and Jubilee Gilmore, in command of the ordance department, will strengthen the weak points, if there be any, and bring the whole to a happy conclusion in a blaze of glory.—Watson.

MUNICH.—It is proposed to get up a Beethoven Festival here, as in other places. Herr von Perfall, chairman of the committee, has offered to contribute, at the Theatre Royal, to the programme a performance of Prometheus, Fidelio, and Die Ruinen von Athen, with a new text by Herr Paul Heyse. The musical direction of the whole Festival is to be offered to Herr Franz Lachner.

CHARLES DICKENS IS DEAD.

(An American Elegy.)

Many a sad word has to be written in fulfilment of the duties of journalism; but sadder words have never been written than those that head this paragraph. The great heart, that beat with love and sympathy with all mankind, is stilled forever. The great mind, that has laboured to make the world happy by making it good, is at rest. This loss will come home to the hearts of thousands as a personal calamity. To read the writings of Charles Dickens was to love the man. Apart from the splendid imagination, the inventive power, the airy fancy, the infinite capacity of realising and reproducing forms of character, and the beautiful, powerful, and absorbing style of writing, there is a celestial spirit in those works—of pity for the sinful, tolerance for the weak, tenderness for all human infirmities, heartfelt desire to save, and cheer, and lead onward —which wins every sensitive nature to the most affectionate attainment. Many great men have been admired; but around the grave of Charles Dickens the world will stand with stricken hearts and tear-dimmed eyes; for he had won the love of all mankind. It has lost a benefactor, a leader, a good, true and great man,—in himself an immortal proof of the innate divinity of human nature. Charles Dickens has been taken from us suddenly—but not before his work was well and nobly done. English literature will cherish forever the illustrious name that is this day written in the book of death. The meagre news—enough, however, slight as it is, "to eclipse the gaiety of nations"—tells us that he perished suddenly, while at dinner, stricken by paralysis. With like suddenness the grim angel came to Thackeray and to Hawthorne—companions of this grand and sweet soul, in the noble walk of letters. Not without fitness, though, is the visitation of sudden death that takes away the leaders of human thought from the very pinnacle of their greatness. They vanish from us at once—all their splendour unsullied by decay, and all their grandeur solid and perfect in the eyes of fame.—New York Weekly Review.

ON CHARLES DICKENS.

(By one of the multitude.)

The death of Charles Dickens concerns musicians—yes—as it concerns the professors of every art, and the practitioners of every craft, among us. He was the most universal man of the present century. What he wrote concerned the whole world of humanity. He made us all, if not good, at least better for what he wrote. We feared the giant intellect of Thackeray; but we loved and sympathised to the core with the gentle eloquence of Dickens. Both were loveable men. We loved Thackeray as a cumini sector; we loved Dickens as a consoler and comforter. We were always apprehensive of the stern reproach of the one, always sure of the sympathy of the other for what in us was human, and therefore not faultless. These were two great teachers of our time—because they taught, each in his peculiar way, through real types of humanity. What is Mills to them? What Bulwer (with his ——). What the astronomers?—what Lyell—what Darwin—what Goldwin Smith, or Mr. Disraeli?

Dickens is gone. We are not going to speak of his characters, though how much might be said about them all, from Mrs. Gamp to little Emily. And, then, with all these extraordinary endowments—the man himself, simple, and hearty, and communicative, and genial as a child. This was as the people —the great and universal people of the British dominions—saw "C. D."

"EE-HAW."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—As one of the true Jerusalem tribe, I write to take exception to the way in which you, and your co-editor, whose superscription is "A.S.S.," spell "ee-haw."

Our tribe never aspirate, or even use the h in the first syllable. To what tribe do you and yours belong?

Our "ee" is a long piaanissimo; and, when heard in the calm immensity and mystic silence of a dewy summer heve, sounds like the lulling note of a tempting angel, and produces a sensation as though the ear was being surrounded by a transparency of rubies, diamonds, jasper, chrysoprase, and many nectars of voluptuous flavour, and bright and golden use: but our "haw" is a roarer; and is no sooner brayed forth than away fly lulling notes, angel temptings, rubies, diamonds, jasper, chrysoprase, hays and chrysolite, and bargate, and beryl, and voluptuous nectars into the bargain, and the soul shivers off its luscious dream swift as a meteor's flash, and, ere the haw has reached its climax, you know where you are.—Believe me, as ever, muchly yours,

DONKEY.

June 27, 1870. (You know what follows).

P.S.—Lest you should be in doubt, it is ASS, without the initial punctuation.

[Our correspondent need not have explained; his letter fully entitles him to dispense with what he calls "initial punctuation," and to sign himself "ASS" without reserve.—A. S. S.]

Digitized by Google

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

VAN H. (Weymouth).—No Southern Times has come to hand. Will our correspondent favour us with another copy.

INQUIRER.—Schubert, beyond comparison, in the first instance; Rossini, beyond comparison, in the second; Auber, beyond comparison, in the third: Mendelssohn, beyond comparison, in the fourth; and Sterndale Bennett, beyond comparison, in the fifth. With regard to the second question—J. S. Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. In such an argument Spohr and Schumann are out of the question. Cherubini is more difficult to dispose of.

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1870.

"DE RETZ" SPEAKETH.

DE RETZ says little, and that little commands no particular attention. He is a convenient underling of Saint Bris, and, doubtless, a zealous,—charity forbids us to say an unscrupulous—partizan. But were he knocked on the head by a "Rataplan" buff-coat, nobody would care, even if anybody missed him. Such is De Retz of the Huguenots; but "every man in his time plays many parts," and De Retz turns up occasionally as London correspondent of the Paris Ménéstrel, in the columns of which journal he disports himself after the manner of a vivacious whale, playing truant from "school." In this capacity he is much more amusing than as a Catholic nobleman of sanguinary propensities. He exhibits a liveliness of imagination which amounts to the faculty of seeing, and believing in, things that are not—as when, a few weeks ago, he spoke gravely of twenty Hansoms waiting outside Drury Lane Theatre to convey members of the press from one operahouse to another. For this alone, De Retz off the stage is vastly more entertaining than De Retz on it, and we hope he may long defer his exit.

De Retz's last letter to the favoured Parisian print is funnier than the average of his communications. From first to last it runs a grotesque "mnek" with which one's risible muscles have an instinctive sympathy, though the onslaught be upon actual facts. De Retz begins by referring to Mdlle. Nilsson's "position exceptionelle," and quotes a part of our recent article on "Personal Opera," acknowledging the extract as from the Musical World—"journal d'opposition musical très avancée, et par conséquent tout dévouée à Drury Lane." To what are we in opposition, most sapient De Retz?—and how does being in opposition involve perfect devotion to Drury Lane? The conclusion pointed at is, of course, that we are antagonistic to Covent Garden—a conclusion the readers of the Musical World know to be false, if the readers of Le Ménéstrel do not; and, therefore, we are careless about refuting it. De Retz next goes on to describe our article as "le plus grand hommage rendu à l'influence artistique de Mdlle. Nilsson." With all respect to so sharp-sighted an individual, it was nothing of the kind. Mdlle. Nilsson's artistic influence must not be confounded with the influence of fashion. The two are distinct things, although they may happen to be in accord; and our remarks were a complaint, not against such a legitimate power as the former, but against a phenomenon having no raison d'être except Society's "Let it be."

De Retz then turns to Signor Campana's Esmeralda, and out of that barren work gets enough material for the bulk of his letter. There are several minor points in his remarks from which amusement might be obtained; as when, for example, he bursts into apostrophe about MM. Naudin and Graziani ("cet illustre baryton") exclaiming "quels artistes!"; as when he speaks of crowded houses, created by his own exuberant faucy; as when he imagines that somebody has depreciatingly termed Esmeralda nothing but an "Album de Mélodies," which nobody would think of doing; and as when he styles Signor Campana "avant tout un mélodiste." But De Retz is mainly concerned about the press. He witnessed the enthusiastic reception of Esmeralda, and he read the criticisms upon it, since when he seems to have been in a state of daze, owing to the impossibility of reconciling opinions so diverse. At one time he cannot account for newspaper hostility to Esmeralda, without going far beyond reasonable limits; yet, immediately after, he discovers the reason to lie in the very title of the work. Such reverence have the English critics for Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris, and such concern do they feel for its integrity, that they rushed away from the theatre to call Signor Campana's music ungrammatical. The logic of this course is not clear to ordinary intelligence, though De Retz may see it plainly enough. If, however, the facts are as stated, then not De Retz, but the critics, must be demented; nay, more, their madness must be madness without method; since when Signor Pugni's ballet of Esmeralda was produced (in 1841), they received it with a chorus of praise. But why trouble ourselves with questions of De Reta's logic, or, in other words, essay the solution of problems in Imaginary Quantities? De Retz wishes to attribute the failure of bad music to ulterior considerations; and when a man has set his mind upon a thing he is not deterred by the necessity of being illogical. One more word, and we have done with de Retz till next time. He gave this as a translation of a passage from the Times:—"Si la perfection du chant, unie à la perfection du jeu des acteurs, peut assurer à un nouvel ouvrage un permanent succès, nous le prédisons avec certitude à la nouvelle Esmeralda." Here is the original:—"If consummate singing, united with acting as consummate could alone ensure permanent success for a new work, permanent success might fairly be reckoned upon for Esmeralda."* Bah!—Monsieur de Retz, you could see the twenty press Hansoms which had no existence, and yet failed to perceive the word "alone," which really did exist! The upshot of the whole matter is, as saith the proverb—Ne sutor ultra crepidam.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

IF anything could make up to the numberless readers of our admirable contemporary, Punch, for the loss of Mark Lemon, it would be the fact that the editorial chair which Mark Lemon filled so long and so worthily is now occupied by Mr. Shirley Brooks. Mr. Shirley Brooks also may be said to occupy another chair, formerly in possession of William Makepeace Thackeray—that of Editor of good taste, as the most refined and accomplished master of a particular branch of our literature which, since the days of Addison and Steele, has been one of its chiefest glories. He who has written the Essence of Parliament (not to speak of other things), has written that which will endure as long as the English language. Some great statesman said that his knowledge of English history was derived from Shakspere's historical plays; we own candidly that much of our knowledge of what goes on in the Houses of Lords and Commons is derived (and how pleasantly!) from the Essence of Parliament, with which our excellent Punch has charmed us for so many years.

* The "consummate singing, united with acting as consummate"—(as De Retz might have gathered from the context)—referred exclusively to the singing and acting of Madame Patti.

Digitized by Google

MR. J. S. DWIGHT, Editor of the Boston Journal of Music (Massachusetts), is entertaining his readers with a somewhat loose translation of that miserable piece of egotistical coxcombry and absolute nonsense, the pamphlet called Ueber das Dirigiren, by Herr Richard Wagner. What, in the name of Music, does any sensible American care about such stuff?

AT a recent performance of Robert le Diable at Cassel, an incident took place not provided for either by librettist or composer. During the trio, the tenor hissed the prima donna, and the bass retorted by seizing the tenor throat-wise—obtaining, for the first time in his life, unanimous applause. We manage such matters better in England. Here, when artists quarrel on the stage, one performs the "happy despatch," and cuts away—home. But each country has its manners.

BUT for death supervening, the horse brought down to one grain of corn per day would have settled the question whether the least possible something is better than nothing. At present evidence is in favour of the least possible something, because we find the theatre at Arcidosso (Grosseto) willing to accept a subvention of 10 francs per year. Compared with this establishment, the theatres of Adghiari (30 francs) and Barbara (75 francs) are rolling in riches.

MDLLE. NILSSON has experienced something like the sensations of those who see their own death announced in the papers, and who have the great felicity of turning sorrow into joy—tears into laughter. She has just written to the employés of the Grand Opéra, thanking them for the sympathy shown on the occasion of the reported loss of her voice. As sympathy was not confined to the Grand Opéra (how many prime donne shared it, for example), Mdlle. Nilsson should advertise what the Yankees style, "a card."

Don Giovanni was produced at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, on Thursday night—with Faure, Castelli, Gardoni, Zoboli, Foli, Reboux, Lewitzky, and Nilsson, in the principal characters. All we can say at present is that the Donna Elvira of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson was, both musically and dramatically, the most perfect and beautiful representation of that character in our experience.

WE are glad to know, and our readers will be glad to know, that Professor Sterndale Bennett's beautiful overture, Paradise and the Peri, composed for the Jubilee Concert of the Philharmonic Society, has been published by Lamborn Cock & Co. as a pianoforte duet.

M. HERVÉ has written, and the Variétés will shortly produce, a new work, entitled the Trone d'Ecosse, out of which, apart from the music, some fun will probably be got. The names of the characters—all we know so far—are highly promising. Le Duc de Buckingham appears, and so do Louis XIV., Georges XV. (whoever he may be), Mac-Razor, and Flora Mac-Razor (shade of brave Flora Macdonald, can this be meant for you?), and "Julia Good Morning!" The last eminently Scotch patronymic is delicious, and M. Victor Hugo must look to his laurels.

A CABINET crisis has taken place at the Paris Italiens. Upon what rock the Alary administration came to grief, we know not; but it is certain that M. Alary is "out," and M. Emmanuel Muzio is "in." Not only so, but his Majesty Bagier I. has suppressed the "Direction du Chant," and decreed a "Direction de la Musique," with heavy responsibilities, including those connected with the choices of operas, artists, and the conduct of the orchestra. M. Muzio has entered upon his duties with zeal. After visiting London, to hear Esmeralda, and look out for artists, he next starts, or has already started for Italy, prepared to make a grand battue upon the accomplished singers and beautiful new operas with which that country notoriously abounds. The appointment of M. Muzio leaves his Highness the Khedive without a chef d'orchestre. Here is a fine opening for knights of the bâton in the land of Saladin.

A CURIOUS bit of news comes to us from Ancona. Two persons of different opinions, about an opera entitled Fiammella, referred the dispute to an arbitrator, M. le Sabre, and fought it out to an end which might have been bitter, but was not. Herein is a suggestive idea:—When success is contested at Covent Garden or Drury Lane (which never happens, because our public accept anything), let each side choose a champion, and each champion have at the other with all due formality, the first placed hors de combat to determine the matter. We would insist, however, that the composers should fight their own battles, if possible; the chance of getting rid of them being much too good to be lost.

IN 1860, when Big Ben the Second was cracked, it was feared that some day, in striking, it might bring clock-works and clock-weights pell-mell to the bottom of the clock-tower. Forty tons of metal, falling from a height of 210 feet would shake the foundations of the tower to the centre. As the clock-weights, too, might of themselves fall, Mr. Edward Barry was consulted in 1861 as to precautions. His scheme was a bed of sand, ten feet deep, under the weights. This was rejected by the Board of Works, who decided for a scientific "cushion" of jute and cocoa-nut matting, a pile of which materials was accordingly raised in proximity to the fine. Seven years ago, at three in the afternoon, this "cushion" took fire, doing some damage and causing more alarm. In spite of warning, it was allowed to remain. On Monday week it again caught fire. Surely there are elements of danger enough in the roof of Lords and Commons without materials for a bonfire in the tower—materials liable to spontaneous combustion, and perpetually in danger from a heated flue.

THE Oneida Indians (Wisconsin) have organized a brass band and purchased twenty-five instruments. When they get into practice it is expected that music will arise. Pity that no German band in our crowded city has taken advantage of this movement, and gone to the prairie and forest, where they might put themselves at the head of the tribe, and make noises without injuring anybody! Music has charms to soothe the savage breast; but it has also charms which, when dinned into unwilling ears, turn civilised men into savages. Unmingled with the jingling of vehicles over the stones, it may have an opposite effect, and turn savages into civilized men. Anyhow, this new fancy of the Oneida Indians opens a field for the ambition of street musicians, of which we trust they will take advantage. If brass bands are not enough we can spare our barrel-organs; and vocal music is in demand we would send our Ethiopian serenaders. In the same spirit of liberality with which, as Christians, we have showered gin, rum, &c., on savage tribes, we would gladly let the Oneida Indians have our music halls; and last, not least, in a true missionary spirit, we are prepared to send them even the Alhambra. If this little token from Leicester Square does not satisfy them, nothing will.

A THREE ACT romantic opera, Vineta, has just been produced at Prague. It is a feeble attempt, on the model of Herr R. Wagner's Tannhäuser. The composer is Herr Skraup. Though that gentleman was called for, on the first night, after each act, Vineta will probably soon be forgotten; as completely forgotten as if the opera, the composer, the musicians, and the singers were all actually at the bottom of the sea, in which cool locality the hero makes love alternately to Vineta and a virtuous young Christian beauty, just as the nymphs, gnomes, and other interesting personages disport themselves below the surface of the Rhine, in Herr R. Wagner's Rheingold.

THE members of the operatic company at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, have two months' holidays, commencing on the 30th June. In order, however, that the numerous visitors to this capital may have an opportunity of seeing the interior of the magnificent building by gaslight, during the above period, there will be three ballet-performances every week.—Some little time since, it was reported that Herr Joseph Strauss had been taken very ill at Warsaw. According to the statement then put forth, Herr Strauss was suddenly attacked, while conducting, and, having fainted, fell violently backwards. In doing this, he was said to have seriously injured the back of his head, which came in contact with a music-stand. The Tagblatt, however, gives a different version of the matter. If that paper is well informed, Herr Stranss was grossly insulted, a week or two ago, during the performance, by a Russian officer, and, being in a weak state of health, felt the shock so deeply that a serious illness is the result. The affair has created a deep sensation in Warsaw.

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE annual juvenile choral festival in connection with the Tonic Sol-fa Association was held at the Crystal Palace on Wednesday week. This is always one of the popular days of the year, the friends of the youngsters mustering in great force. The choir numbered about 5,000, principally children, strengthened by a few tenors and basses. The first part of the programme was devoted to sacred pieces. Attwood's "Teach me, O Lord," and Kent's "Thioe, O Lord," were two of the anthems given. Two or three of the part-songs were sung with spirit and in good time and tune. The others did not go so well, but the audience were too pleased or too loyal to the system of which the choir were exponents, to be critical, and all the pieces were received with applause, three of them being encored.

MR. FREDERICK ARCHER'S concert took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Friday evening, June 24th, commencing with Mendelssohn's trio in D minor. Miss Dalmaine, whose voice was in good tune, sang Gounod's "Quand tu chantes." Miss Poyntz was much applauded in "In quercu semplice," and Mrs. Lindsay Sloper and Mr. Peuna gava great pleasure by their excellent rendering of Verdi's "Si la stanchezza." Herr Carl Stepan sang exceedingly well "Oh, ruddier than the cherry." Mr. Archer played with MM. Risegari and Paque the above-named trio, also three posthumous studies of Mendelssohn. A printed apology for the absence, through illness, of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Nelson Varley were distributed among the audience. H. L.

MR. ALFRED BAYLIS gave a matinée at his residence, 18, Lower Seymour Street, which was fashionably attended. His song "Adelaide," "Alice, where art thou?" and Benedict's "Nulla da te bel augelo," accompanied by the composer, in all of which he received much applause. Miss K. Poyntz gave an air of Bishop's, and Benedict's "Rokeby to sleep," most successfully. Mr. Lewis Thomas displayed his fine voice to advantage in "Ah non avea," and Tito Mattei's "La Pesca." Mdlle. Colmache, a pianist, played two solos most brilliantly. Mr. John Thomas gave Parish Alvars' harp solo, "The Mandoline," and (with Mr. Benedict) their grand duet airs from Faust. M. Paque played two of his solos in his usual excellent style. Mr. Henry Thomas, Herr Lehmeyer, and Mr. Benedict were the conductors.

MR. G. LANSDOWNE COTTELL gave his twelfth concert on Thursday to a crowded audience. Mr. Cottell was assisted by the Mdlles. R. and C. Doria, who well sang "A riverside song," and added solos by popular and classical composers, which were well received. Mesdames Montserrait, Agnes Lyndhurst, Ellen Jarman, d'Elise, Amy Perry, Henyet, De Barry, Mardoni, Demani, with Messrs. W. Reeves, Bell, Waldeck, and Bolton, sang and played an attractive programme selected from the works of Mendelssohn, Weber, Mozart, Meyerbeer, John Barnett, Henry Smart, &c., all of which were received with more or less favour by the audience. Mdlle. d'Elise in John Barnett's new romance, "The parted," sang it with so much grace and finish as to create quite a furore, as did also Mr. W. Reeves in a new song by Mr. Cottell, "Thy image o'er my pillow beams." Messrs. Weber, Lehmeyer, Cottell, and Francesco Berger accompanied.

THE concert given by Madame Rudersdorff took place on Tuesday week, at the residence of Mrs. Washington Hibbert, Dover Street, and attracted an audience both numerous and fashionable. Very little part was taken in the proceedings by the bénéficiaire herself, whose great and universally acknowledged talents may account for this, and the speciality of the occasion—might have justified her in doing a great deal. Madame Rudersdorff made but two appearances; singing first, with Madame Trebelli and chorus, Gounod's cantique, "Noel;" and, next, a new canzone (MS.), entitled "Bienvenu," by Signor Randegger. The latter, even more than the former, exhibited the high artistic qualities that invariably distinguish Madame Rudersdorff's singing; and is, in itself, a charming composition. Among the vocalists who supported the concert-giver were Madame Volpini, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Miss Alice Fairman, Signor Gardoni, M. Jules Lefort, Mr. Patey, Signor Bossi, and Signor Bettini, with some of Madame Rudersdorff's clever and promising pupils. It would serve no purpose to mention the more or less familiar pieces selected by each artist, and we need only make the general remark that the choice was, in most instances, good, and the result satisfactory. The vocal pieces were relieved by several instrumental solos, among them being two morceaux, wall played by Signor Alfred Rendano; Boccherini's violoncello sonata, executed in his usual style, by Signor Pease; a duet, Impromptu, by Reinecke, for two pianos; and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," both played by the Misses Kingdom. Mr. Benedict gava to several pieces the charm of his masterly accompaniment.

THE annual concert of Mdlle. Nathilda Enequest was given at St. George's Hall, on the 23rd June, under the immediate patronage of the Ambassador of Sweden and Norway. The vocalists were Mdlle. Jocequest and Mdlle. Drasdil, Messrs. Cummings and Penna, and M. Jules Lefort. Mdlle. Enequest was encored in "Coma per me sereno," from La Sonnambula, and was much applauded in Edward Land's "La Gitana," and in Kücken's "Der Himmel." She also received applause in some new Swedish melodies. Mdlle. Drasdil gained an encore in Miss Kate Ward's "He is upon the lonely deep," and Mr. Cummings was similarly honoured in Mr. O'Leary's ballad, "Ask not why I love." Mr. Penna was recalled after "The Old English Gentleman," and M. Jules Lefort sang, as usual, with great effect. The instrumentalists were Herr Ganz, M. Telesinski and M. Paque, who played several concerted pieces with considerable effect. M. Telesinski created quite a sensation in M. Alard's fantasia upon airs from La Muette, which he performed upon the violin with great skill. The concert was very fashionably attended. H. L.

MISS MARY E. WALTON'S annual morning concert took place last Monday, and drew a full audiance. The concert opened with Randegger's trio, "I Naviganti," sung by Madame Thaddeus Wells, Alfred Baylis and Maybrick; after which Miss Walton played Mendelssohn's caprice in B minor, in a most efficient manner. In the course of the concert she gava Chopin's ballade in A flat (Op. 47), and (with Mr. Weist Hill and M. Albert) Lady Thompson's grand trio in D minor, which received every justice at the hands of the executants. Mr. H. Weist Hill played his own solo on airs from Wallace's Maritana, which was loudly applauded. Miss Katherine Poynta sang Francesco Berger's song, "The Syren," with effect, as did Miss Banks the pretence "A Summer Eve" (encored). Madame Liebhart, Thaddeus Wells, Osborne Williams, with Messrs Maybrick, Trelawny Cobham, and Alfred Baylis gave several popular songs, duets, and concerted pieces. In Beethoven's "Adelaide," sung by the last-named gentleman and well accompanied by Miss Walton, both artists received much applause. The concert was a great success. Messrs. Kingsbury, Lehmeyer, and Osborne Williams accompanied.

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT.—A gigantic gathering of artists to sing and play through a programme which might almost be measured by the yard, took place in St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, and attracted a crowded audience. The proceedings began at half-past one, and ended, we imagine, at a time which gava peculiar appropriateness to the last piece—"When evening's twilight gathers round." Fifty-six pieces were in the programme, the artists announced to appear being fifty-five. It is obvious, therefore that a bare mention of what was done would exhaust the reader's patience long before the end, while it would be no more interesting than calling over the roll of a regiment. Even if we were the reader's patience equal to that of Job, and were a matter of no concern, there would be little need for such particulars, very many of the selections, having no interest whatever save in the actual performance. What boots it, for example, to tell that Signor Gardoni sang his often repeated "Mandolinata?" or that Madama Volpini gava, once again, "O luce di quest' anima?" All such things may be passed over in absolute silence. There were, however, several features of interest which demand special notice: among them certain pieces were composed expressly for the occasion. One of these, "The Mother and the Angel," sung by Madame Patey, and written by Mr. Benedict, is a charming example of the pathetic ballad, and will, if we mistake not, become extensively popular. Another novelty was Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Italian duet, "La Condenna," which, as sung by Mdlle. Lewitzky and Mdlle. Cari, had a fair measure of success. Mr. F. H. Cowen's new quartet for four performers on two pianos was decidedly well received. It is based upon themes from Il Flauto Magico (not a bad base either) and is admirably wrought out for the production of the effect belonging to this class of works. The executants were Mr. Benedict, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, Mr. G. Osborne, and the composer himself, in whose hands it lost nothing. Another successful novelty was Arthur Sullivan's "Cantiamo d'amore," composed for Mr. Santley, and by Mdlle. Christine Nilsson and Madame Trebelli, and unanimously encored. The music possesses the gracefulness apparent in most of the author's works, and we need hardly say all its beauty was displayed by the artists associated in its execution. Other familiar works were in the programme, such as the quartet, "O ciel que faire," from Méhul's I. Irato, but upon these we have no space to dwell. The chief vocal successes were gained by Mdlle. Nilsson, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Madame Trebelli, Madame Monbelli, M. Faure, and Mr. Santley, all of whom were encored, re-called, or applauded with special heartiness.

Digitized by Google

Among the instrumental eclolists was Madame Arabella Goddard, whose remarkable performance of Mr. Benedict's fantasia on Der Freischutz excited something as near like enthusiasm as a morning audience can show. It will be assumed that Mr. Benedict himself was received with all the honours due to his position and long service in the cause of art.

GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.

A new and very amusing little piece, written by Mr. W. S. Gilbert, set to music by Mr. German Reed, and entitled Our Island Home, was produced on Monday week with success. Like some of its predecessors it enlists the interest almost from the commencement, so that the gratified audience are introduced, say, to Mrs. German Reed as Mrs. German Reed, not as a fictitious character, and see her in situations, agreeable and the reverse, which are never likely to become actualities. The plot of Our Island Home is simple:—Mr. and Mrs. Reed, Miss Holland, and Mr. Cecil start round the world with their entertainment, Ages Ago, and are thrown by shipwreck upon an island, which they divide into four equal shares. The only fertile part falls to the lot of Mr. Cecil, who uses the power thus given him in a variety of clever and funny ways which we shall leave the reader to discover for himself. Eventually a pirate (Mr. Corney Grain) bound by a oath to kill every body he meets, joins the quartet of islanders. This unwelcome gentleman, who turns out to be the long-lost son of Mr. and Mrs. Reed, is, by the ingenuity of Mr. Cecil, released from the obligations of his oath, so that all ends happily. It can hardly be necessary to say that Mr. Gilbert's dialogue is bright and full of point, that Mr. German Reed's music serves its purpose very well, or that Our Island Home passes away an hour in the pleasantest manner. The last named result is largely due to a capital performance, Mr. and Mrs. Reed being as vivacious as ever, Mr. Cecil doing his burlesque business admirably, and Miss Holland lending the grace and charm of her singing to an ensemble they help not a little to perfect. The new piece will, doubtless, have what it deserves—a long run.

FINE OLD TUNES.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I must ask space for just a few lines in answer to your remarks at the end of my letter, and also to your leader on the same subject, and then I have done. I have to say that I agree with you that "our church music is weighed down with such a monstrous heap of rubbish that few who care for music in the abstract care a straw for our church music;" and I would suggest (to go further than you) that the whole of it should be consigned to a bonfire—the fine old tunes, fine young tunes, the whole lot together. If it were possible, burn every copy and destroy every plate, and what should we find? Why, that the fine old tunes were engraved in people's hearts. Copies would soon be forthcoming again, whereas the dull miserable things, both old and new, that afflict the soul would continue in their well-merited oblivion. There would be no notes to remind us of them, and they never having entered the ear or the heart, would remain dead, and we should feel how much better it would have been had they never been born;—there would be the test. We should soon find bristling into life, "Jones in D," "Crotch in C," and the other fine old tunes which you name "perpetrations," and are easy to compose by "twaddlers." I frequently hear people (and especially those who have never done anything) say what they can do; but I judge by what I really see they have done, and by this standard ae to chants—well, the less we say the better.—I remain, yours faithfully,

London, June 28, 1870. ANTI-PLATITUDE.

["Jones in D" and "Crotch in C" be blowed! Nevertheless, "Anti-Platitude" is a very clever and agreeable fellow. Let him write to us on some other subject. He will be right welcome.—A. S. S.]

TOM-TITS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—The small "tom-tit" is generally supposed to feed exclusively on the young buds of plants; but the following circumstance will prove the contrary. A pair have built in my garden wall, and reared eight young ones; recently one fell from the nest and was killed. On opening its mouth I found it full of the green Aphis fly, and grubs of various kinds, evidently collected from the adjoining plants. I have slaughtered many of these innocent tom-tits, but shall in future strictly preserve them.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Eagle Lodge, Derbyshire. SPARROW HAWK.

SALZBURG.—A new opera, Blanche, by Baron von Tschiderer has been successfully produced. The performers were all amateurs, the principal one being the Countess Hedwig von Gatterburg.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS.

The simplest, yet the most emphatic expression of a great national sorrow is called for on the part of those who wish to offer a farewell to Charles Dickens. There was no man who turned aside with more distinct aversion than he did from everything that was time-serving or specious, or indirect, in the making of his way to fortune and the keeping of his hold on the public; no man more averse than himself to the false praise or hectic sympathy and parade which belong to the lovers of notoriety. Therefore, no great genius has gone to rest in our times (or, indeed, at any time) whose fame needs so little apology or exaggeration.

As regards the literary life of Charles Dickens, there is small need for recapitulation of its facts,—less still for comment upon them, so universal and heart-his popularity. But as regards the sequence, the catalogus should be clear, and I think it is not yet quite complete. It has been assumed and presumed that the Sketches by Boz began in the Morning Chronicle. But Dickens wrote elsewhere at that early time of his life. I think that at the time to which I refer, he was willing to help the editor of the Monthly (or London?) Magazine, then under the short-lived control of a certain Capt. Holland.

To tell how Dickens subsequently, and at no distant period, rose into favour with the public, would be to write the history of book publishers cataloguing—of cheap and dear books—the History, in short, of every one who cares for Fiction, and, yet more, who cares for truth. After the Sketches by Boz came The Pickwick Papers; then Nicholas Nickleby (with its immortal Mrs. Nickleby:—The name began with B—, and ended with G—. Perhaps it was Waters"). Later, Oliver Twist (commenced for Bentley's Miscellany) and Master Humphrey's Clock, which contained the histories of The Old Curiosity Shop and of Barnaby Rudge. The Memoirs of Grimaldi, which made a small sign, and are forgotten, belong to this period.

Next came that first book on America—fruit of a visit to the Land of Promise—which caused its writer to be so coarsely attacked, and which caused its readers to mitigate the habits therein reproved. Then followed Martin Chuzzlewit (as fruits of an Italian holiday) the Pictures from Italy; later, the five Christmas Books (and how these quickened the charity of many a hard-hearted and hard-headed man is not to be told); then Dombey and Son, David Copperfield (its master's master-work), Bleak House, Little Dorrit, A Tale of Two Cities, and Great Expectations, which may be rated among the highest of his novels; in its force, as grand and simple as Defoe's; in its characteristic simplicity, like the scenery round his home, which framed (so to say) the story. Lastly, came Our Mutual Friend, full of minute touches and clever rescings of character, which would have sufficed to make the reputations of fifty meaner men. Of his minor tales and sketches, flung out during these years of constant work and excitement, it is impossible to offer a list. One only may be mentioned—the story of Little Dorrille, in one of his Christmas books for All the Year Round, which is as perfect in its pathos and local colour as any creation that ever came from the hand of man. Of Edwin Drood, his last, unfinished mystery, there will be time to speak presently.

Such is the list of the works that have taken pen in hand has done more to vindicate the dignity of the literary character than Charles Dickens. He had the ball of social success at his feet; and being endowed with every instinct for every enjoyment that luxury, or taste, or high breeding could minister, it is not desirable to recall with what a quiet unanswerable, curiously distinct from irritable or arrogant inocilence, he held himself apart from, and above, the temptations which the great world is only too eager to offer to every one who is new and brilliant and amusing. When Pickwick came out, that great wit, Sydney Smith, said in my hearing—"There's a hundred some pounds!" But, from the first, as to the last, Dickens was not to be cajoled by the persons of quality who desired to make an exhibition of possibly the most original English writer of English domestic fiction who has ever been seen. He kept himself and his life apart, and for this reason it was, during a certain period, the fashion to misjudge him—as a writer vulgarly democratic, who had expressed pleasure in defying the privileged ones of the earth. He was even called "low-lived," because he did not hang on staircases, and make mirth for dinner parties, and join in the exhausted humour of a society the essentials of which are to be found in the novels of the Regency period—happily dead and buried—by putting coronets on the heads of vapid characters, and by ransacking the dictionary of Court Jargon and Millinery for their dialogue. It has been said that he could not draw gentlemen and ladies (as footmen understand the designation). This is false. The characters of Sir Leicester Dedlock, in Bleak House, that of Mrs. Steerforth, in David Copperfield, and fifty indications more, may be cited in disproof. That he found greater pleasure in selecting and marking out figures where the traits were less smothered or effaced by the varnish of polite society than in picturing those of a world where the expression of individual characters becomes less marked, is true. To each man his own field. An essay could be recalled, written to prove that Scott was an miserable creature, because his imagination delighted in the legends and traditions of feudal times, with their lords and their retainers. And yet Scott gave us the fisher-folk in The Antiquary, and Jeanie Deans. But though as "a man of the people" Dickens loved to draw the people in all their varieties and humour and incomplete ambitions; and though he was by nature and experience a shrewd redresser of abuses—tracing them back to their primal causes—he was in no respect the destroyer it was for awhile the whim of fools of quality and the faded people who hang on their skirts to consider him. One who redresses grievances is not, therefore, an overthrower of thrones. The life and the works of Dickens expressed a living protest against Disorder—no matter what the Order.

Digitized by Google

His toleration was great for everything save falsity and oppression—one point excepted. He was too apt to assume that asceticism in religion must be hypocrisy. He was too unwilling to make allowance for narrower natures than his own, only kept to the rule of duty by the constraint of self-restraint, and those formalisms which he abhorred. In the very intensity of his own convictions, he was not always sufficiently forbearing towards those less deeply thoughtful, less profoundly gifted than himself, but possibly not therefore less sincere.

Those who were admitted to knew Charles Dickens in the intimacy of his own home cannot—without such emotion as almost incapacitates the heart and hand—recall the charm of his bounteous and genial hospitality. Nothing can be conceived more perfect in tact, more freely equal, whatever the rank of his guests, than was his warm welcome. The frank grasp of his hand—the bright smile on his manly face—the cheery greeting—are things not to be forgotten while life and reason last by those who were privileged to share them. Then, his exquisite practical knowledge and punctuality gave him time—even when most busily at work for himself or others—to care for and to consider the pleasure of all whom he harboured beneath his roof. It is some comfort to think that he drew enjoyment from these great qualities, and the effect produced by them on his guests. As a talker (not a conversery) at his own table—as one who could tell a good story, or give a tolerant hearing to another—whatever might be the subject—as one who could hit the nail on the head, no matter who was present, and yet who never domineered by a hair's breadth over the most domineering of guests—for lightness, for discreteness, for keen intelligence (freaked, but very sparingly, by the strong antipathies of those who have as strong sympathies)—Dickens was incomparable. There was no possibility of anything passing, where he was which the most experienced woman or the simplest child might not have heard. All was safe for every guest, the smallest as the greatest, perfect ease and security in the shelter of his house.

Whatever he did, he did with all his heart and soul and strength. The munificent sacrifices he made of time, money, and sympathy to men of letters to artists, to obscure persons who had not the shadow of a shade of a claim on him will never be summed up. There are thousands of persons living who could bear grateful testimony to this boundless generosity of his nature. But his geniality was as great as his generosity. Whether the matter in hand was a country walk through the district which his residence has made haunted ground to so many persons of all countries,—or a fireside game,—or the coming out of some poor play in which he had been induced to interest himself,—nothing was to be done by halves,—nothing affectedly: and such youth and vivacity were doubly surprising in a man whose life was passed under the grave responsibility of many cares and burdens, and who prepared and completed what he gave to the world—whether in his works or in his personal intercourse with the public —with an honest care and earnestness which should put to shame all such rash and random persons as, on the strength of a few fancies and much impertinence, conceive themselves artists. When the story of his life shall come to be told on some distant day, then, and not till then, this amazing vitality, which set him apart from every human being I have approached, will present itself as one of the most remarkable features in the life and works of one of the greatest and most beneficent men of genius England has produced since the days of Shakspere.

It was his wish that all his letters should be destroyed. He was wont to say, in a spirit akin to that of Wren's noble epitaph in St. Paul's—that a man was sufficiently represented in his works. So should it be. But the brightness, the directness, the playfulness, of every page he wrote to those whom he trusted, cannot be overstated,—cannot be forgotten, by any one attempting the slightest sketch of his genuine and endearing qualities, with the slightest competent knowledge.

What more remains to be done here for the moment? Surely, no attempt made to designate or descant on the especial merits and qualities of Charles Dickens as a literary man:—surely, no marshalling of his recollections that come in crowds,—to be set, in the the instant of his departure, before the public. On a future day, I may endeavour to fill up the blanks in a sketch, the miserable incompleteness of which can be felt by no one more keenly than the writer.

HENRY F. CHORLEY.

ITALIAN FIDDLE STRINGS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Could you kindly inform me in your Musical World where the best Italian strings are to be had for the violin? F. A.

[Perhaps some connoisseurs among our many readers who play the fiddle will obligingly confer the desired information.—ED.]

DARMSTADT.—Mdlle. Erl, a daughter of the celebrated Vienna tenor of the same name, has appeared at the Theatre here so successfully, that she will, in all probability, be permanently engaged in the place of Mdlle. Mahlknecht, who secedes from the company.

WAIFS.

The Philharmonic Concert, originally announced for Monday, July 4th, is postponed to Monday, July 11th. The whole of the programme is to be devoted to Beethoven. Mdlle. Christine Nilsson is to sing, and Madame Arabella Goddard to play.

Madame Barbot has returned to the Continent.

The first representation of Herr Wagner's Walküre was to take place at Munich on Monday last.

M. Flotow's Ombre is now expected during the first days of July. When next? and next?

Herr Litolff has finished a new operetta—La Bolte de Pandore. It is said that the music is very original. Let us hope so.

Good news for the million:—M. Offenbach is reported, from Ems, as quite well again.

There is not likely to be Italian opera at Constantinople next winter. The Naum theatre having been burnt down in the late fire.

The Zarzuela theatre at Madrid has been injured by fire—damages, 300,000 francs.

Miss Minnie Hauck has been playing at Frankfort with—so it is said—much success.

A Beethoven festival is in preparation at Geneva, to take place on the actual birthday of the great composer—December 16th.

The Paris theatres and concert-rooms received, during May, the sum of 1,225,392 francs, 95 centimes.

Some ornamental lightning-conductors have been affixed to the new Operahouse, at Paris; apropos of which Le Ménéstrel asks if they are meant to preserve the theatre from the music of Wagner.

Five hundred chorus singers are advertised for the Gaîté, in Paris, for Offenbach's new opera, in July. One of the effects must be to blow the roof off with sweet and concentrated sound.

A notice has been posted at Baden, reassuring the public mind about Mdlle. Nilsson's illness, and confirming the arrangement under which she sings there next year.

M. Ambroise Thomas, the composer, and M. Hengel, the proprietor of the opera of Mignon, to be produced at Drury Lane on Tuesday next, are in London.

The Princess of Wales has accepted the dedication of Mr. John Francis Barnett's new cantata, Paradise and the Peri, composed expressly for the approaching Birmingham Festival.

Mr. John Barnett has arrived in town from Cheltenham for the season. The composer of the Mountain Sylph, &c., looks in good health and spirits.

SERENADE TO MADAME PAREPA-ROSA.—The New York Herald of Friday, June 17, informs us that Madame Parepa-Rosa was the recipient of the very high honour of a serenade on the evening of the Thursday previous, from Gilmore's magnificent band, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

At the Florence Pelliteama, recently, two ladies got themselves into trouble by taking the box next to Victor Emanuel, and trying to engage him in conversation. Were they English tourists suffering from royalty-fever?

We have authority to state that, in consequence of the death of the Earl of Clarendon, the Queen's State Concert at Buckingham Palace, announced for Wednesday, the 29th ult., has been postponed until Wednesday, the 6th July.

M. Hervé, composer of Chilpéric, received a telegram on Saturday, desiring his immediate presence in Paris, the English servant he had left there in charge having, it is reported, absconded with a large sum of money and many valuable articles.

The revival of the Domino Noir of Auber has been postponed till Monday, Mdlle. Madigan (!) not being ready with her part (that of Brigitte). A pretty condition fer a great theatre like the Royal Italian Opera.

Draněht Bey, the Khedive's superintendent of theatres, has engaged the following artists for the next Cairo season:—Prime donne, Ganioli, Vitali, Grossi, Sarolta, Giovannoni; tenors, Emilio, Naudin; baritones, Colonnese and Boccolini; buffo, Fioravanti; bass, Medina; premières danseuse, Clandine Cucchi; musical and scenic director, M. Nichole Lablache; chef d'orchestre, Signor Di Giosa.

The Milan Scala has at length found an impresario, one Signor Antonio Cattaneo, behind whom, says gossip, is Signor Brunello, backed by a theatrical costumier, who is, in turn, supported by a music publisher, and so on. The new manager opened negotiations with Fraschini and Nicolini to no purpose; but he has since caught Tiberini and Ortolani, as a beginning.

Digitized by Google

The dramatic performance by Sir Charles Stirling and other distinguished amateurs, in aid of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, will positively take place (it has been once postponed) on Wednesday, the 13th inst. The performance is on behalf of a society doing much towards raising the intelligence of the working classes, and, therefore, ought to be supported.

The London Glee and Madrigal Union, under the direction of Mr. Land, had the honour of performing the following programme before Her Majesty the Queen, and Court, at Windsor Castle, on the 24th ult.:—Madrigal, "Now is the Month," Morley, A.D. 1570; glee, "When the wind blows," W. Horsley; part song, "O, who will o'er the downs," Pearsall; madrigal, "Come, let us join the roundelay," W. Beale; glee, "Here in cool grot," Lord Mornington; glee, "Sleep, gentle lady," and "Forresters, sound the cheerful horn," Sir H. Bishop; part song, "O hills, O vales," Mendelssohn; madrigals, "Down in a flow'ry vale," Festa, 1541; "Who shall win," Pearsall; glee, "Sweet is evening's tranquil time," W. Horsley; and madrigal, "O, by rivers," Ford and Savil, 1667.

The "Tonic Sol fa" College held its summer session during the past week. Mr. Curwen, in his opening address, referred to the progress of the method in Hong Kong, Beyrout, Madagascar, Spain, and at home. He exhibited an Arabic "Sol-fa" tune book, and two Chinese "Sol-fa" books, one of instructions, the other of exercises. The speech of Mr. Wilkins, secretary of Council on Education in New South Wales, whose method has been adopted by the government, and is taught in every school, created considerable interest. Mr. Wilkins described how the "Tonic Sol-fa" method had been chosen after much deliberation and experiment. The other proceedings included lectures and lessons on voice training, teaching time, harmonies, Helmholtz's discoveries, practical hints to organists, music in worship, the elements of success in teaching, etc. It was announced that, at the recent Society of Arts' music examinations, the large majority of successful candidates were again "Tonic Sol-faists."

The Rev. J. G. Wood, the well-known naturalist, whose musical tastes are evidenced by the fact that he is Precentor of the Canterbury Choral Union, has devoted an interesting article in the Banner to the consideration of the nightingale's song. Attacking the popular belief, which in this, as in many other cases, turns out to be a mere superstition, Mr. Wood declares that these famous songsters sing at all hours of the day as well as of the night, and that the best receipt for attracting them to any particular spot is to give three long-drawn slow whistles pour the upper A, or as near it as possible, and this being the challenge note of the males it will be speedily answered. "By repeating this call judiciously, the bird can be induced to approach closer and closer until he is within a few yards. He will then utter one phrase of his song and pause for a reply. Imitate it as well as possible, and in this way the nightingale can be induced to put forth his utmost resources until at last he utters a lovely rippling phrase of sound that no human lips can approach, and repeats the victorious melody over and over again."—Choir.

We are glad to see that our contemporary, the Musical World, adds a note of regret to the announcement that the Princess of Wales was present at the first performance of Mdme. Schneider, at the Folies Dramatiques. Whatever opinion may be held as to the wisdom of showing unlimited encouragement to the light and trivial productions of the versatile Offenbach, when high musical art is comparatively neglected by our Court, there can, we think, be little question that the attention thus given by Her Royal Highness to the vagaries of the notorious "Grande Duchesse" is greatly to be deplored. When we see the French Emperor going out of the beaten track to encourage the ouvriers in the pianoforte manufactories of Paris, and other Continental monarchs showing unmistakably their preference for the higher forms of art, and for conscientious artists, we confess to a feeling of deep regret that in England the opposite should be the case. Without any desire to curtail the liberty of the English stage, we believe that such performances as those alluded to are a positive disgrace to our theatres; and as music is made the excuse for the attendant indecencies which characterize Mdme. Schneider's performances, we have a fair ground for raising a protest against the encouragement offered to her by the Royal family and the aristocracy.—Choir.

Leipsic.—Herr Bartholf Senff is about to publish a work entitled The State of Music in Russia, with especial Reference to St. Petersburgh. It is from the pen of Herr Siegfried Salomon.

Advertisements.

NEW SONG BY CIRO PINSUTI.

"I HEARD A VOICE."

The Words by LOUISA GRAY.

Sung by Mr. Cummings at all the Principal Concerts.

Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

THE VOICE & SINGING

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.

And may be obtained of Signor Ferrari, at his residence, 22, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

Has maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

Just Published,

TARANTELLE,

POUR LE PIANOFORTE.

Par PAUL SEMLER.

Price 4s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"A SUMMER SONG,"

NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

By HENRY WALTON.

Price 3s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

The following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s.	d.
LITTLE WILLIE	Louisa Gray ...	3	0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER ...	John Oxenford ...	3	0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	... ...	3	0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	Wellington Guernsey	3	0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations) ...	Italian Words ...	3	0
SIGHING FOR THEE	Wellington Guernsey	3	0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	Thomas Moore ...	3
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	Wellington Guernsey	3	0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad)	Florence Percy ...	3	0
And the Answer to it.
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	Wellington Guernsey	3	0

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

SIGNOR FOLI'S NEW SONG,

"OVER THE ROLLING SEA,"

Composed by E. REYLOFF.

INTRODUCED WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

Price 3s.

London: Cramer & Co., Limited, 201, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

THREE PIANOFORTE PIECES BY A. GOLLMICK.

"MERRY THOUGHTS." Morceau de salon .. .. 4s.

"ADELINE." Pensée .. .. 3s.

BELLE HUMEUR." Pièce .. .. 3s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (da Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissement)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Ecc di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Una Perla (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	..
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnai-). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torne (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Torrera (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Cariotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Ecsajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably." — Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s. d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various kinds	7 6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	5 0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	2 6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonized in various ways, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard. ...	5 0
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7 6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 4s. each, or one vol., boards, 12s. This book, containing 53 Compositions, includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 52 of his best Pieces. ...	6 0
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 35. Six Books in one vol.	6 0
J. T. STONES ORGAN-BOOK, an arrangement of 18 Classical Compositions	6 0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

48. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3.—Op. 13, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
46. SONATAS, Op. 22—Op. 26—Op. 27, No. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
45. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastoral), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
44. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53—Op. 54 (Appassionata), and Op. 57.
43. SONATAS, Op. 78—Op. 79 (Caractéristique)—Op. 81—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
42. SONATAS, Op. 106—Op. 109—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Fantasia and Sonata), 2, 3.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Complete in one volume, 5s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complete in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42.) No. 2 (Op. 53.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 120.) No. 4 (Op. 122.) No. 5 (Op. 143.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 147.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, Nos. 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS FOR PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 48 to 80 pages, including Overtures.

FIGARO	GRAND DUCHESS
ROBERT LE DIABLE	FIDELIO
DON JUAN	BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA
LUCREZIA BORGIA	SONNAMBULA
DER FREISCHUTZ	BALLO IN MASCHERA
CRISPINO E LA COMARE	TRAVIATA
TROVATORE	MARTHA
NORMA	WILLIAM TELL
DON PASQUALE	CROWN DIAMONDS
FRA DIAVOLO	MASANIELLO
RIGOLETTO	DOMINO NOIR
ZAMPA

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 4s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.

138. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and " Oh voules vous aller?"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY.
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VOLKSLIEDER for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring," "Schlafen Lied," "True Love," &c.
140. STEPHEN HELLER'S 24 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s.; post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

98. SANTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original compositions, published in no other collection.
77. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BELLE BAKER, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY, ALEXANDER LEE, &c.
83. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep," "My Pretty Page," "As ill fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Lovely Dust," &c.
6. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
44. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
43. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
93. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.

1. TWENTY-FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CREATION, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S TWENTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTOIRES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND HESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, KÜHE, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM,

SHILLING BOOKS OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.

113. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
100. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
120. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LAST ROSE, and LILLIE DALE
117. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
23. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
99. FRANZ SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS, and SIX MOMENS MUSICAUX. All complete.
87. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Fortuni," "Bonnambuls," &c.
86. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Musical Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
85. STEPHEN HELLER'S PR-MENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
80. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
84. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS.
78. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Perles et Diamans," "Il Corricolo," &c
33, 34, 35. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.	WALPURGIS NIGHT.
HAYN'S IMPERIAL MASS.	BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.	ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.	MOZART'S REQUIEM.
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.	DETTINGER'S TE DEUM
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.	ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE MESSIAH.	THE CREATION.

BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees

	s.	d.
BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 56 Glees	2	0
THE CHORALIST, 96 Part-songs, 2 vols, each	5	0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	1	0

The above Works, for 8-octettes in penny numbers.

THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs 6 0
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 60 Part-songs for village and school use 6 0

LONDON:
BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Digitized by Google

CAMPANA'S

NEW OPERA,

ESMERALDA,

PERFORMED AT

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

WITH IMMENSE SUCCESS.

All the favourite Songs, Duets, Trios, &c., sung by Mdlles. Patti, Scalchi, Signors Graziani and Naudin, are now published.

	ALSO,	s.	d.
The Full Score	- - - -	25	0
All the Favourite Airs, by F. Nava		5	0
W. S. Rockstro's Gipsy Rondo	-	4	0
" "	Bolero - - -	4	0
" "	Brindisi - - -	4	0
" "	Grand Fantasia -	5	0
Kuhe's Grand Fantasia	- - -	4	0
Brinley Richards' Bolero	- - -	3	6
Goodban's Fantasia	- - -	3	6
Rimbault's Gems of "Esmeralda," easily arranged	- - - each	2	0

No. 1. The Bolero. | No. 3. The Quartet.
" 2. The Brindisi. | " 4. The Grand Duet.

Dan Godfrey's Esmeralda Galop - 3 0

A QUADRILLE AND WALTZ
By DAN GODFREY are in the press.

CHAPPELL & CO.,
50, New Bond Street, London.

To be performed for the First Time in England, on TUESDAY NEXT,
AT THE
ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE,

"MIGNON,"

OPERA, IN THREE ACTS,
BY AMBROISE THOMAS.

		s.	d.
PIANOFORTE SOLOS.
G. BIZET	The Opera complete	10	0
Ditto	Overture	6	0
Ditto	Six transcriptions...each 4s. to	6	0
AUG. BAZILLE	Entr'acte-gavotte	5	0
ALFRED HENRY	Valse sentimentale	7	6
L. L. DELAHAYE	Souvenirs-transcriptions	6	0
H. ROSELLEN	Polonaise	6	0
W. KRUGER	Fantaisie-transcription	7	6
CH. B. LYSBERG	Fantaisie variée	7	6
CH. NEUSTEDT	Fantaisie-transcription	6	0
E. KETTERER	Fantaisie variée	7	6
Ditto	Romance et duo des Hirondelles	7	6
D. KRUG	Grande Fantaisie	7	6
J. CH. HESS	Styrienne de Mignon	5	0
TH. OESTEN	Fantaisie élégante	6	0
G. TREDRE	Romance de Mignon	7	6
EASY PIANOFORTE SOLOS.
S. CRAMER	Bouquet de mélodies, 2 suites...each	7	0
J. L. BATTMANN	Petite fantaisie	5	0
A. GODARD	3 petites transcriptions ...each	3	0
H. VALIQUET	2 petites fantaisies ...each	3	0
A. CROISEZ	Fantaisie facile (Styrienne)	6	0
D. KRUG	Petite fantaisie	6	0
DANCE MUSIC.
STRAUSS	1er Quadrille à 2 et 4 mains	4	6
Ditto	Grande valse	4	6
Ditto	Polka	4	6
ARBAN	2e Quadrille	4	6
A. MEY	3e Quadrille	4	6
OLIVIER METRA	Suite de Valses	6	0
EM. DESGRANGES	Polka des Hirondelles	4	6
F. ZIKOFF	Mignon Polka (entr'acte)	4	6
PIANOFORTE DUETS.
AMBROISE THOMAS.	Overture	7	6
PAUL BERNARD	Deux suites concertantes ...each	8	0
G. W. MARKS	Pot-Pourri	7	6
AUG. BAZILLE	Entr'acte gavotte	6	0
J. RUMMEL	Deux Mosaïques ...each	7	6
G. METRA	Valse de Mignon	7	6
ALSO,
AMBROISE THOMAS.	The Opera of Mignon complete, with Italian and French words	20	0

And all the Songs, Duets, &c., separately, with Italian or French words.

Editions de MM. HEUGEL & CIE., Paris.

LONDON:
DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.,
244, REGENT STREET, W.

Printed by HENDERSON, BAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON, at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, July 2, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART AFFEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street London, W.

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 28. SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1870. PRICE { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY (Saturday).—Half-crown Day.—Extra Opera.—Gounod's "FAUST," under the direction of Mr. E. T. Sterne. Faust, Mr. Vernon Rigby; Valentine, Mr. Aynsley Cook; Wagner, Mr. Wakefield; Siebel, Miss Aurde Thirlwall; Mephistopheles, Mr. Henry Corri; Martha, Mrs. Aynsley Cook; Margarita, Miss Hillarche Cole. Students, Soldiers, People, Spirits, &c.

Full Orchestra and Chorus. Conductor—Mr. MANNS.

After the Opera, Brilliant Match, 1,000 up, will be played between Messrs. Cook and Bogaert. The table will be placed immediately in front of the Handel Orchestra. Stalls for Opera, 2s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 1s.

NOTE.—This is not included in the Serial Stall Subscription.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

The Nights of Performance Next Week will be—TUESDAY, WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, and SATURDAY.

This Evening (SATURDAY), will be produced (second time in England) Ambroise Thomas's Opera, in four acts, "MIGNON." The libretto by MM. Michele Carré and G. Barbier; the Italian translation by Signor Giuseppe Zaffira. Guglielmo, Signor Bettini; Lotario, M. Faure; Laerte, Signor Gassier; Giarno, Signor Ragner; Zingarella, Mdlle. Fiorelli; Frederico, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Filina, Madame Volpini; and Mignon, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. Conductor, Signor Arditi.

TUESDAY, July 12, Rossini's Opera, "OTELLO." Otello, Signor Mongini; Roderigo, Signor Gardoni; Iago, M. Faure; Elmiro, Signor Foli; Emilia, Mdlle. Carl; and Desdemona, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

WEDNESDAY, July 13, "RIGOLETTO." Il Duca, Signor Mongini; Rigoletto, Mr. Santley; Sparafucile, Signor Foli; Monterone, Signor Ragner; Marullo, Signor Zoboli; Borsa, Signor Archibaldi; Ciprinae, Signor Tecroe; La Contessa, Mdlle. Brunl; Giovanni, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Madalena, Mdlle. Scalchi; and Gilda, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.

THURSDAY, July 14, a favourite Opera, in which Mdlle. Christine Nilsson will appear.

WEDNESDAY, July 20, a Morning Performance, when will be given Gounod's Opera, "FAUST." Faust, Signor Perotti (his first appearance); Mephistopheles, M. Faure; Valentine, Mr. Santley; Siebel, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Marguerite, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

Acting Manager .. .. MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Instituted 1822,—Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1830.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CHRISTIAN,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

President—THE EARL OF DUDLEY.

Principal—PROFESSOR W. STERNDALE BENNETT.

THE PUBLIC CONCERT of the Institution will take place at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, HANOVER SQUARE, on SATURDAY the 23rd inst. commencing at Two o'clock.

There will be a complete Orchestra and Chorus, formed by the Professors and the ate and present Students of the Academy.

Conductor—Mr. JOHN HILLIER.

Single tickets, 5s.; family tickets, to admit four persons, 16s.; to be had of the Musicsellers; at the Hanover Square Rooms; and at the Academy, 4 Tenterden Street, Hanover Square. By Order, JOHN GILL, Secretary.

THE ANEMOIC UNION (under the direction of Mr. LAZARUS) consists of the following eminent instrumentalists from the Opera Orchestras, Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies, &c.:—Flute, Mr. Henry Nicholson; Oboe, M. Barret; Clarionet, Mr. Lazarus; Horn, Mr. T. E. Mann; Bassoon, Mr. J. Hutchins; and Pianoforte, Mr. W. F. Shakspeare, R.A.M. Vocalist, Madame Bladeon Wells. Mr. Lazarus begs to inform Secretaries of Musical Societies, Literary and Scientific Institutions, Directors of Orchestral Concerts, Concert Agents, &c., that the Fourth Annual Tour of the Anemoic Union will commence in September, 1870. Complete Programmes can be given, or Mr. Lazarus will be happy to offer the services of the Anemoic Union to assist in full Orchestral Performances, or in Chamber Concerted Music. Terms for one or more Concerts may be known on application to MR. HENRY NICHOLSON,
19, Halford Street, Leicester.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC. (Average number of Students 100.) Concerts Fortnightly, Town and Country.—Inclusive Fees.—Candidates for the Free Scholarships must attend the Academy Saturdays, from Twelve to Seven, and in return for Lessons, will have to perform in Public when required. Further particulars, and opinions of the Press, may be had of C. WEBER, Sec., Norfolk Road, Haywater.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL, August 23rd, 24th, 25th, and 26th, 1870. Mdlle. Titiens, Miss Edith Wynne, and Madame Sinico; Madame Patey and Miss Marion Severn; Mr. Vernon Rigby and Mr. Modlen Smith; Mr. Lewis Thomas and Mr. Santley. Conductor—Mr. Townsend Smith.

MISS FANNY CHATFIELD (Mezzo-Soprano), from the Conservatoire, Cologne, is open to Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, Fairlawn House, Forest Hill, S.E.

MDLLE. MARIE D'ETIENNE and MR. HENRY GORDON will sing NICOLAI'S duet, "DIS MOI UN MOT" (= One Word "), at the Portland Rooms, on Wednesday Evening, July 13th.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. EMANUEL'S new song, "THE CHARM," at his principal Engagements. Address for Concerts, Oratorios, &c., 28, Old Bond Street.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA (Baritone) begs to announce his arrival from Italy, and that he will remain in London during the Season. Mr. Penna can accept Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, 44, Westbourne Park Road, W.

MDLLE. D'ELISE will sing on Saturday, July 16th, WELLINGTON GERMSER'S Waltz Aria, "THE NAIADES," at Store Street Rooms.

HARMONIUM FOR SALE.

HARMONIUM to be SOLD, a Bargain, splendid Instrument by Alexandre, in two of boys, 22 Stops, Rosewood Case, cost £90. Suitable for a large school, Chapel, or Professional Gentleman.—82, Chalk Farm Road, Haverstock Hill, N.W.

MUSIC PRACTICE FOR SALE.

A SUCCESSOR is wanted by a Gentleman. Income between £400 and £500 per annum, in one of the principal towns in Scotland. A good musician would be certain to succeed. For further particulars address "Music," care of J. Purdie, 83, Princes Street, Edinburgh.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for Instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 50, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ARBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

"LITTLE WILLIE."

"LITTLE WILLIE." By JULES BENEDICT. Sung with distinguished success by
MISS EDITH WYNNE,
at Mr. Benedict's Concert, is published, price 3s., by
DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

Just Published,

"I FIND OUT WHOM I LOVE,"

SONG.

Words (by permission) from

"THE YOUNG LADIES OF GREAT BRITAIN."

Music by R. T. GIBBONS.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"OLGA,"

PENSÉE POUR PIANO.

PAR

LOUIS DIEHL.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

THREE PIANOFORTE PIECES BY A. GOLLMICK.

"MERRY THOUGHTS." Morceau de salon .. .. 4s.
"ADELINE." Pensée .. .. 3s.
BELLE HUMEUR." Price .. .. 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

SUNG BY MISS BANKS,

"ONE MORNING, OH! SO EARLY,"

SONG.

The words from "Mopsa the Fairy," by JEAN INGELOW (by permission).

The Music by CHRISTABEL.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"THE REJECTED FLOWER,"

SONG.

The Poetry by Mrs. BRUCE.

The Music by DEWDROP.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG,

DEDICATED TO MDLLE. NILSSON.

"I LOVE AND I AM LOV'D"

("J'aime, je suis aimé").

PUBLISHED IN A, C, AND D.

Sung with distinguished success in Paris and London. Also transcribed for the Piano by

E. L. HIME.

Each sent for 24 stamps.

DUFF & STEWART, 147, Oxford Street,

"The charming singing of the composer himself—Herr Reichardt—and of M. Jules Lefort, has already won for this romantic song a considerable reputation. The style is such as we look for from the author of 'Thou art so near, and yet so far,' and is equally happy with that widely known and favourite ditty. No great compass is required—only from D below to E fourth space—and Herr Reichardt's newest song is conceived in so truly vocal a spirit, and is so effective in performance, that we have no hesitation in commending it to our readers—to every soprano or tenor. A word for Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, whose translation, free though it be, from the original French of M. Arnould, is a thing to be remembered. Nothing in its way more elegant, more refined, more truly poetical, has been seen for many a day, and the manner in which the spirit, if not the letter of the French is preserved is equally admirable."—The Queen.

Published This Day,

"THE REASON WHY,"

SONG.

The Words by Mrs. C. A. DOUBBLE.

The Music by L. M. WATTS.

(Composer of "Home of my Heart," song, price 3s.)

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

LATEST NOVELTIES JUST ISSUED BY

ROBERT COCKS AND CO.

All post-free at half price.

PIANOFORTE PIECES.

RUSTLING LEAVES. G. Lange. 4s.
FAIR MAID OF PERTH QUADRILLES. J. Buchanan. 4s.
THE MORGAN MARCH. R. Richards. 3s.
A MAIDEN'S DREAM. G. Lange. 3s.

SONGS.

TIRED. Sacred Song. Miss Lindsay. 3s.
OH, DOUBTING HEART. A. S. Gatty. 3s.
THE SNOWDROP. W. T. Wrighton. 3s.
THE SIGH AND THE SMILE. F. Abt. 3s.
MESSAGE OF THE CLOUDS. F. Abt. 3s.
MEETING IN HEAVEN. Sacred. W. T. Wrighton. 3s.
HUNTING THE WATERFLY. Miss Drage. 3s.
TIRED. Miss Lindsay. 3s.

London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street; order of all Musicsellers.

Just Published,

"A SUMMER SONG,"

NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

By HENRY WALTON.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been equalled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s. d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY	3 0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOAN GEERDOO	3 0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3 0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	3 0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad) ... ... And the Answer to it.	FLORENCE PERCY ...	3 0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,

PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS,

LYON & HALL,

WARWICK MANSION,

Digitized by Google

A LETTER OF FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

By Frederick Thomae, Ph. D.

(Continued from page 444.)

Thomas Attwood, whose name is mentioned in the beginning of the letter, is known as of one of the few pupils of W. A. Mozart. He was born in 1767,[a] and, after he had been a chorister at the Chapel Royal for five years, he was, in 1783, by the aid of George the Fourth, when Prince of Wales, enabled to study under the Neapolitan masters, Filippo Cinque (about 1760-90)[b] and Gaetano Latilla (1713—about 1788),[b] and, 1785, under Mozart, at Vienna.[c] How Mozart thought of Attwood himself, may best be learnt of Michael Kelly, the Irish tenor singer[d]:—

"Attwood was Mozart's favourite scholar, and it gives me great pleasure to record what Mozart said to me about him: his words were: 'Attwood is a young man for whom I have a sincere affection and esteem, he conducts himself with great propriety, and I feel much pleasure in telling you that he partakes more of my style than any scholar I ever had, and I predict that he will prove a sound musician.'"

Yet after his return to England, in 1786, friendly relations still continued between master and pupil.* Attwood enjoyed a high reputation as composer of a great many exceedingly popular songs, glees, trios, &c., and several operas, partly, at that time, stock pieces on the stage—a still higher one, however, on account of his sacred compositions. J. S. Bach's organ works were not known, at least not appreciated by him, before the youth Mendelssohn acquainted him as well as the English public in general, with the pedal fugues and the other organ music of the great German master. In 1795, Attwood succeeded Jones as organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, which function he kept till the time of his death in 1838. Besides, he held the offices of organist to the Chapels Royal, Composer to her Majesty, and a member of the State Band. Kelly calls his friend a worthy man, and an ornament to the musical world. To Thomas Attwood, Mendelssohn has, in 1837, dedicated his Three Preludes and Fugues for the Organ (Op. 37), in which he tried to fill up old forms with new ideas, and to which we shall have to return further on.

The influenza, mentioned at the conclusion, happened, just at that time, to be epidemic in London, as we observe from the contemporaneous London newspapers.[f]

For those who put an interest in the local question as to where Mendelssohn directed his letter from, the remark may be made that I dare not say anything for certain, as the name of "Portland Street" returns no less than six times[g] in the London Street Directory,[h] and, principal road and square and initials being wanting, cannot possibly be fixed; besides, one will have to bear in mind how often such little things as numbers of houses change in the course of from thirty to forty years.

The letter is followed (fol. 33a, fol. 33b, fol. 34a[i]), by the "Original MS. of the fugue by Mendelssohn, which he was so kind as to write expressly for me," as V. Novello has, with red pencil, remarked himself at the bottom of fol. 33a. The MS. is small 4to—and, principal length, and eight inches four lines in breadth. Each page, from fol. 33a to fol. 33b, inclusive, has sixteen staves. The very same fugue for two manuals and one pedal has been published as "Fuga No. 3," in Three Preludes and Fugues composed for the Organ, and dedicated to Thomas Attwood, Esq., Composer to Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. [London: J. Alfred Novello; Leipsic bei Breitkopf und Hartel], pp. 22, 23, 24. This copyright edition has not got an opus figure; if it was, in the above, cited as "Op. 37," published in 1837, I followed for the former statement the authorities of Julius Rietz, in his catalogue of all Mendelssohn's compositions,[j] and of the

[a] The Musical World. Vol. VIII. [London. 1838]. p. 220 f. p. 227 f. Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. Vol. VIII. [Leipzig, 1838], p. 138.

[b] The dates after Fétis, Biographie Universelle des Musiciens. Deuxième édition. [Paris, 1860-65.]

[c] Otto Jahn, W. A. Mozart. Zweite Auflage. [Leipzig, 1867.] I. p. 713 f.

[d] Reminiscences of the King's Theatre and Theatre Royal, Drury Lane. [London, 1826.] Vol. I. p. 228.

[e] C. F. Pohl, Mozart und Haydn in London. Erste Abtheilung. [Wien, 1867.] p. 139.

[f] e.g.—The Morning Post [London, April, 1833], Nos. 19,456, 19,462, and 19,465.

[g] Great Portland Street (W.), Little Portland Street (W.), Portland Street (E.), Portland Street, Soho (W.), Portland Street, Walworth Common (S. E.), Portland Street Mews, Soho (W.).

[h] Forming part of the Post Office London Directory, 1870.

[i] Vol. 34b is empty.

[j] Julius Rietz, Verzeichniss der sämmtlichen musikalischen, Compositionen von Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, added as a supplement to the Briefe von Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Vol. II. [Leipsic, 1863], p. 499-520.

Music Catalogue in the British Museum; for the latter, an advertisement in the Musical World of the 6th October, 1837,[k] where the "Three Preludes and Fugues," but without an opus figure, are recorded in the "Weekly List of New Publications." Breitkopf and Härtel, the Leipsic commissioners of the London publisher, advertised them soon after in their new catalogue for Michaelmas, 1837, here as Oeuvre 37.[l] They were, in a favourable sense, reviewed in the Musical World of 1838.[m]

(To be continued.)

MIGNON AT DRURY LANE.

(From the "Morning Post," July 7th.)

The performance last night of the opera of Mignon, composed by Ambroise Thomas, was the most brilliant event of the season, and as great a success as it is possible to desire. The part of Mignon is one that displays in an extraordinary and unexpected degree, not only all the known qualities of Mdlle. Nilsson as an actress and singer, but serves to develop a power hitherto only imagined, but now completely realized, of expressing in an intensified degree all the higher and unusual characteristics of a tragic genius of rare rank. In nearly every part in which she has appeared this season some individual qualities have been discovered and displayed by her, so that each performance has been to a certain extent an improvement upon a previous one, and has placed Mdlle. Nilsson, as an artist, upon the most elevated position it is possible for her to occupy, and she has strengthened that position by her thorough originality. In many of the characters played by her, her wonderful voice and style alone affect her hearers; but in Mignon the voice, singing, acting, appearance, and depth of pathos have all to be taken into account. The greatest homage was paid to her last night by the audience, not always by applause, but in many instances by a silence that was almost breathless. She was recalled, with the other artists associated with her, at the end of each act, and at the conclusion she appeared twice; the additional time thus dragging the composer upon the stage to share the plaudits with her, which honour he seemed to take unwillingly, as though he owned the successful reception of his work to the genius of the prima donna, and was unwilling to lessen the obligation he owed her. But great as Mdlle. Nilsson's success was, there were other artists whose exertions were as proportionately successful. Madame Volpini, as Filiana, a confirmed coquette, acted and sang most splendidly; and Mademoiselle Fabelli-Bettini, as Frederico, made a small part as completely interesting as possible. In the ballet or rather several ballets, which form no unimportant portion of the opera, Mdlle. Fioretti danced in a manner which gave great liveliness to the scene; and as Giarno, the chief of the strolling performers, Signor Lagier deserves a word of commendation for his effective acting and singing in a difficult part. Signor Gassier's Laertes was an excellent performance; his appearance in the costume of an ancient Greek was the summit of burlesque dressing. The singing of Signor Bettini was very pleasing and much more free and acceptable than his acting, which was stiff and unmeaning. The character which next to that of Mignon was most perfectly studied and satisfactorily rendered was M. Faure's Lothario. Grsceful and picturesque in his attitudes, effective and expressive in facial expression, the part was, like nearly everything that M. Faure undertakes, finished, correct, and artistic.

The chorus was very good, and the band, directed by Signor Arditi, performed their portion of the work in the most perfect style. The opera has been well put on the stage, and with some attention to correctness of costume. It may be, however, open to doubt whether the modern-pattern parasols were as generally known in the fast century, in which time the action is supposed to take place, as their liberal use in the opera would lead the audience to suppose. The scenic effects are in general excellent, and the whole opera is placed upon the stage in a creditable manner.

In the scoring of the music M. Thomas repeats many of the effects already familiar in his Hamlet, but as a rule the instrumentation is excellent and clever. There are many lively and taking melodies in the work, which will make it a perfect treasure to the "arrangers" of waltzes, galops, and other dance tunes. The concerted music is exceedingly weak, but many of the songs are beautifully constructed. M. Thomas is as fashionably original as most modern composers, and has succeeded in producing an opera which will always be pleasing when performed as it was last night. The story or plot has been considerably varied from Goethe's Wilhelm Meister's apprenticeship, one character being mixed with another in a most wonderful order, or disorder. It is enough to say that whether the idea be taken as Goethe's or as the free translation of Mesars. Carré and Barbier, it makes a plot of unusual power and interest, and has inspired M. Thomas to write music in the execution of which last night a combination of genius was displayed which makes the first performance of Mignon a most unusual event to chronicle.

BASLE.—The Beethoven Centenary will be celebrated here by a grand performance of some of the master's works in the month of November.

[k] Vol. VII., No. 87, p. 64.

[l] Intelligenz-Blatt zur Allgemeinen Musikalischen Zeitung. [Leipsic] November, 1837, No. 10, column 42.

[m] Vol. VIII. [London, 1838], p. 102.

Digitized by Google

ON THE ORIGIN OF MELODY.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—If, as some aver, the Angel of Death and the Angel of Birth are one; —if for everything that comes into existence some other thing must cease to exist;—from what adventitious surroundings springs melodic outline? As it comes into contact with the telegraph, the self-same bluebottle howling blast that screams and yells over moor and brake will breathe with gentle sadness a "seraphic strain" tunefully into the ear of anyone who listens at the wire-crowned post. If but the sense of hearing were enough enlarged it would surely recognize anather of those vast ocelian harps that link all nature with the "harmony of the spheres,"—those "morning (and evening) stars," which from all eternity have sung together. "Mes of thought" prove to us that there are sounds of living birds too acute, and cavernous echoes in nature too deep for the grasp of the human ear. The atmosphere holds alike in thrall the sweet twitter of the lark's highest cadence, and the lowest bellowings of the "idle wind." It withholds, in kindness to us, these extreme voices. Perhaps the rapture would be too great, or the terror (on the other hand) too dreadful, could we hear all the "profuse strains of unpremeditated art," of the most original of all composers, fresh from the confines of heaven itself; or take in all the hollow murmurings and groanings of chundor, earthquake, and volcano, whose deep vibrations draw so largely on our too slender faith as to all accord being "harmony not understood." At certainly as the harp of the ancients was limited to its seven strings, so is the acoustic nerve of man confined to its seven octaves, or so, of compass. The telegraph post will play "Over hill, over dale, thorough bush, thorough briar," or "Home, sweet home" (as the day may happen to be breezy or calm), in periodical pulsations, crescendo and diminnendo, with full accompaniments; so it is said by one who has listened for the airs (he had the "ear to hear"), just as plaisely and as spontaneously (or "spasmodically," I forget which) as the tabula rasa of the professed spiritist by means of rapping noises furnishes the expectant inquirer with reliable replies from departed friends in the "other life." Who said we got our tunes by telegraph? But it is wonderful what a deal of truth (or of its opposite) a man may hear if he only tries to hear it; and, even if he does not try, voices of varied line and import will come, asking nobody's leave, and, departing, photograph, though faintly, impressions that neither time nor traffic of more material associations across the ear will wholly efface. Melody, then, is of two kinds:—original or copied—imitative or creative. Who shall say what share in forming the melodies of nations the very birds have had—the pewit, mopoke, whip-poor-will, and the cuckoo. Nature may not have entirely denied to man a gift so lavishly bestowed on the feathered songsters of the woods; yet do we possess in a very limited degree the nightingale's faculty. The thrush, the linnet, the lark, are our masters in the matter of melody. As regards accuracy, originality of fancy, executive skill, in addition to a répertoire of "scales," which set all our measuring materials and "modes" at defiance, they are our masters. There is little doubt but that every singer of natural originality conceives and creates his own peculiar scale (a most important consideration with regard to melody). He is always better to tune than his accompaniment, be it even of the best. Into whatsoever relationship of the original key the music may modulate the voice of the favored one is always a little more than perfectly correct; it re-creates its own scales, and in these heaven-gifted modes reproduces the composer's thoughts; the "divisions" being all newly set by the singer in a "scale" more subtle than any known instrument of human make can as yet perfectly follow or written notes express. Therefore, then, should be imagined vocally; voice themes are better than instrumental themes; so much the best as almost to claim to be par excellence the only themes. Those themes we have best are those we can sing. To fast the moment a theme "strikes" in an especial manner the ear of the lover of music he wants to sing it; he does so. He apprehends the music, but the music, in a more emphatic sense "gets hold" of him. If no "melodic outline" is recognized there is no delight—not even satisfaction. A picture without an outline—impossible. Melody is the true sine qua non of music. Without melody music cannot exist. No amount of "preachment" from the any number of professors can cause any conglomeration of "horse-spurs" or "life-preservers" in the form and shape of crotchets and quavers to be accounted music if the ear fails to lay hold of any definite "melodic outline," and if this divine germ be there it can be buried in no amount of twaddling or incoherent poetry or words; it resists the most violent and determined efforts to kill it; scream it down, it speaks or sings still in the tongue; the melody remains a melody still, like a gem of the first water—bad setting cannot mar its lustre; like a star, it only shines the brighter the darker its surroundings. Of what paramount importance is a good melody? "See to it," said old Father Haydn, "that your air be good. Some modern critics have "pooh-poohed" his Creation (as Mendelssohn did), * but these generally were conscious of their sad deficiency with regard to this divine gift, and so borrowed wholesale from the melodies of those who had preceded them. They may rely that their wares are properly appreciated. It is amusing to notice the influence on the production of melodies by meo's avocations. The street cries, from "Caller Herring" to "White sand," have furnished themes for the innate musical sense to gradually build a tune on. The "mill wheel" has been the accredited medium of suggesting some rare "fit-bits" of genuine melodial inspiration. The "sailor's song" is phrased as the looker on may easily observe, according to the length of the tackle, or the stroke of the oar; the swing of the handspike in weighing anchor, or the pumping ship, or the trimming of the sails. Jack will adapt his tune to the number of men employed, and if its phrases are not found to suit, will change his melody or alter it until it does. In all this there is scope for the inventive faculty, every man exercises to the utmost his "right of judgment" in shaping up various forms of melody; yet how extremely rarely do we meet with anything really original and beautiful. If it be original it is rare; it is ten to one that the music is beautiful; if it be beautiful it is rarely original. These indicate a few of the sources of "melodic outline." Since its acknowledged sway over all hearts is so universal, an attempt to enquire from whence it comes can scarcely be without some interest to musical men. So evanescent a feature of the imagination can scarcely be pointed out; it cannot be caught and scalyzed; still, ie these days when light itself is being weighed, and its component parts being guessed at, on effort in the direction of bringing at will to our presence so lovely a handmaid as melody; impressing an enduring form upon a fleeting fancy is, to say the least, indulging in a "dream of joy" out of which few would wish to be prematurely waked. The first step I take it to be to the pursuit of melody, is to free oneself from the shackles of written scales (mentally) and then to listen for the inner divisions of notes and scales which will naturally present themselves if the singing birds are attentively regarded. Then, having attained to some ideal, be will assimilate the material, written or uttered music, with the imagined immateriality (but not less real existence) within him. Not seeking to shape the fancy in the means of expression, but seeking to draw up the means of expressing his fancy's swaddling as near as possible to his ideal creation. The means of communication, pen, ink, and paper, the written notes, should be made to convey as much of the imagined outline as can be achieved by written characters, to some permanent shape and form. If yet another thought might be added, let it be imagined the salient points of any acceptable melody always agree with themselves, and would, if picked out, make harmony; so the features of a secondary degree of interest will, if another selection be made, agree with themselves, and if yet further, the residue will produce a number of sounds which, if they could be made all at one moment, would be found to produce harmony. Modifications in fioriture of these supposed fundamental principles will of course evolve new thoughts, but will only prove more convincingly the soundness upon which this theory of melodial inspiration is humbly hazarded.—Yours, &c.,

IDEALIZER.

* This is new to us. Will "Idealizer" give us his authority?—ED. M. W.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The following appeared in the Sunday Times of the 3rd inst:—

"The Italian opera season is drawing towards a close, but without any indications of that success for which, we may safely assume, managers have been anxiously waiting and hoping. A cloud has hung over the fortunes of both houses from the beginning; and the public have been resolutely deaf to the voice of the charmer, though he has often charmed wisely. There is no denying the result, however obscure may be the cause. At Covent Garden Mesdames Patti and Lucca seem to have exerted far less than their old attraction; not even the former, in a pretty dress and a new part, being able to rouse an indifferent public to the desirable point of enthusiasm. At Drury Lane, a new prima singer—Mdlle. Johannsen—draws, and she led by in enforced idleness during the most precious weeks of the season. All the rest—Mursks, Volpini, Lewitzky, &c.—have sung to listless audiences more or less scanty in numbers. We cannot pretend to explain what to not a few must appear an inexplicable phenomenon. Whether the reason be that money is scarce; that the opera, as at present conducted, is losing its hold upon society; or that it is now passing through one of those reactionary stages which affect all things, are questions, we have neither time nor inclination to solve. This, however, is certain, that non-success does not result from any falling off in attraction. No city in the world can boast of an aggregation of talent like that which London persistently declines to appreciate. Nilsson, Patti, Lucca, Semi, Volpini, Tietjens, Muraka, Trebelli, Mario, Faure, Santley, Mongini, and a score of others, make up an array of artists able, one would imagine, to transform a city of Puritans into enthusiastic opera-goers. But London holds aloof, and guinea stalls are hawked in Bow Street at a fifth of their price. For some reason or another the present season of things is regretable; and it has features of a hopeful sort. If the fact be that opera has lost its exclusiveness and is, therefore, neglected by those whom its exclusiveness attracted, the beginning of the end has come, and the whole thing will have, eventually, to be re-established on a broader and more popular basis. In other words, the day of high prices and the artificial fabric those prices symbolize and sustain are numbered; and they may be followed by a system based upon the natural and healthy sympathies of an art-loving public. If this be so, let us say again the present condition of opera matters, however unpleasant for the time, may be represented by a dark cloud with a very bright lining."

DARMSTADT.—Herr Friedrich Grützmacher has, "in recognition of his distinguished artistic merit," been appointed Royal Chamber Virtuoso to the King of Saxony.

Digitized by Google

CHURCH MUSIC IN LONDON.—No. II.

CHAPEL ROYAL, ST. JAMES'S PALACE.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—The Court Journal, week by week, informs the ardently loyal and the musically curious what anthem regaled the ears of the Prince and Princess of Wales in the Divine service they usually attend at the Chapel Royal, and it also particularizes the solo singers and the organist honoured by being the executants. I cannot but think that if it published the forms and colours of dresses worn by the Court it would command more general interest; for surely millinery has more worshippers than music. Few care about the doings of Master Treble, or Messrs. Alto, Tenor, and Bass, but very many like to learn how they grades of charms the Princess presents when in blue, or pink, or white, and the diminutive congregation notices not the notes of the red-coated choristers or the pent-up tones of the huge bearded choirmen, whilst her sweet form is visible. Often have I seen the lips of her fellow-worshippers moving to words of prayer and praise, whilst their eyes were lost in admiration of her radiant face. I would venture to assert, the shrine of no Catholic saint has ever had more ardent observers than the ugly paved loft in which she most adored of our Royalty worships. Until her advent, the chapel at St. James's was but little visited by the Royal Family; for, since the mad youth, Oxford, shot at our then youthful Queen on leaving the chapel, her Majesty has never attended there except upon such State occasions as the marriage of the Princess Royal.

There are few places of greater historical interest to be found than this common looking chapel. Through its narrow stuffy portals have passed, like a gorgeous panorama, all the rulers of England for many centuries. Within its walls—like into an abiding frame—we may place picture after picture of the Courts of our Sovereigns of surpassing interest.

Thackeray has stretched his canvas there in sketching his Georges. He cynically draws his Gentleman George IV. "reeling into it to be married, and there hiccupping out his vows of fidelity." A more genial picture he gives of good George III., "who, fond of church music, showed skill in it, both as a performer, and as a preacher," who would beat time with his music-roll as they sang the anthem in the Chapel Royal, and if the page below was talkative or inattentive, down would come the music-roll on young scapegrace's powdered head." And what a soft, quiet, little "peep" he takes of his German George II., "whilst that godless old king is yawning under his canopy in his Chapel Royal, as the chaplain before him is discoursing about what?—about righteousness and judgment. Whilst the chaplain is preaching, the King is chattering in German almost as loud as the preacher."

Would that the same graphic pen had given us more such "peeps" of the preceding gracious Majesties at public worship. How well he knew St. James's in the reign of Anne, and how artistically could he have pictured them at prayers. Our Dialogs at prayers" would verily have been a subject worthy of his sham-devouring pen.

The leading and most honourable post in the choir for centuries has been that of "Composer to their Majesties." Three centuries ago Tallis and his pupil, Byrd, were appointed. They were the first laymen that ever held that honourable office. Since then we have had a perfect succession of composers, in which almost every English musician of eminence has been placed, including Blow, the great Purcell, Croft, and Goss, the last of the race, for with him the office dies, and the post becomes extinct. How interesting would be a history of these composers. Lord Campbell has written the lives of the Chancellors; Dean Hook is writing the lives of the Archbishops; have we no one to do the like by our "Composers to Royalty"? I would recommend the subject to the graphic pens of Mr. Thaddeus Egg or A. S. Sullivan, Esq., more especially to the latter. His courtly training and boyhood's experience give him every qualification, and he would thereby fulfil another expectation raised in me by him when he was one of the "children of Her Majesty's Chapel," arrayed in red coat and folding surplice, like a well boiled lobster bursting out of a night-dress.

When the Prince of Wales forfeited his establishment the Chapel, from its State character and contiguity to Marlborough House, became his place of worship; and great alterations were made, especially in the Morning Service, which was found sadly too long, not that the prayers were objected to, Oh! no; but the music was "long drawn out," chant succeeded chant, and anthem followed services for some two hours; till some such message was sent as that to the musicians of Cyprus:—"Masters, here's money for you; and the General so likes your music, that he desires you, for love's sake, to make no more noise with it. If you have any music that may not be heard, to't again; but as they say, to hear music the General does not greatly care."

Thus it came to pass that the greater portion of the Morning Service music has since been done, so as not to be heard, at least by the inmates of Marlborough House. The service is divided into halves; the first part commencing at ten o'clock, the second at twelve o'clock, the Court of the Prince usually attending the latter.

A Royal Commission was appointed, consisting of the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, and his Lordship the Dean, for the purpose of reconstituting the choir, and for the improvement of the music. The choir previously to that time consisted of sixteen men, eight of whom were supposed to be in attendance every alternate month. There were also two composers and two organists, who unitedly represented the organ-loft. It was determined by the Commissioners to reduce the choir to eight men, who should be in constant attendance; to suppress the office of composer; and to appoint one organist only, who should be held responsible for the service. These improvements were happily attended with economy to the State; for the event saw the uses of economy to Lord Chamberlains, when even they are practised on "gentlemen of her Majesty's household." The practical sense of the then Dean (Bishop Tait) hit the prime evil in the management of the music by deposing the non-musical clergyman from its government. The Sub-Dean up to that time ever had the selection of the music, and I need hardly say that often anthems were selected unworthy, and oftener unfit for such a place as the Chapel Royal. The worthy "Sub" may have possessed classical acquirement or theological ability; he may have been as amiable as orthodox —yet his absolute ignorance of the musical art disqualified him from being the musical director. Dean Tait saw this and altered it. When will the Deans and Chapters of our English cathedrals do the like? With the reclamation of the whole choir Mr. George Cooper was appointed Choirmaster, and made responsible for all matters musical, and the consequence has been most beneficial; anthems are now selected that are appropriate, and singers named to perform them that have the necessary specific talents for the parts. Sensibility, and not ability, used to fix the solo singers; and so for many years a man in full possession of his powers had to give place to one that age had deprived of the gift of vocalization, and to wait until his throat teeth were gone before he could demand to be fully heard. The character of the music selected is now in accordance with the taste of the age. Anthems and services by Smart, Macfarren, Sterndale, Bennat, Hopkins, and Goss, are now heard in fair proportion with the old writers—in fact, the desire to please by the most legitimate musical means has been the object, and success has certainly followed the conduct of the master. The choir always possessed good vocalists; but for many years its singing was not a very "dainty dish to set before a king." Now, it is led and accompanied by Mr. George Cooper, it certainly takes rank with the best in the kingdom. The Chapel itself is ill adapted for musical purposes. Its interior is somewhat like a huge omnibus, and is just as stuffy and dull for sound. The writer here let us inform an admiring world that the two compositions just named were the only selections from his works upon the grand monumental programme to the memory of Beethoven!

"Signor P. Brignoli, who is insured in the 'Mutual Preservation and Plunder Critical Consolidated Company,' sang his pet aria from Maritha (who wrote the 'Last Rose of Summer') to his usual manner, which generally pleases the public, and did so especially on this occasion, for his voice was in first-rate order. But he behaved very badly to Mozart. There was no occasion for him to attack the deceased composer in the way he did. If there had been any ill feeling between them in their youth it might have been buried in his grave. By the way where is Mozart's grave? Where is the body of one of the most gifted of God's creatures, who bequeathed an immortal name to the German people, and received in return almost a pauper's funeral and a nameless grave! Well, Signor Brignoli sang 'Il mio tesoro' very badly, indeed. He laboured and gasped through it in the most murmuring manner, making no point of intelligent interpretation; he, however, reserved himself for the grand closing note, which he struck vigorously, and immediately the public went into a fit of ecstasy, as it was proper it should do.

"Madame Anna Bishop was very cordially received by the public, and sang the well-known aria, 'Gratias Agimus,' with clarionet obbligato, in a very brilliant manner. Her execution was so dashing, and so true, and her enunciation so clear, that she won a unanimous encore, repeating, however, only the cadenza.

"Now Ludwig van Beethoven, respected and honoured master, if your manes be not appeased, if your apotheosis has not been grandly uttered, pray forgive these people, for they know not what they do."

MADAME PAREPA-ROSA'S DEPARTURE FROM AMERICA.

(From the "New York Daily Tribune," June 20.)

On Wednesday next Madame Parepa-Rosa and Mr. Carl Rosa will sail for England, bearing with them the hearts of the American public. Many a singer has won abundant popularity and wealth in the United States since this country became recognized as a legitimate field for musical enterprise, but none has ever endeared herself in such a peculiarly personal manner to her audiences as the accomplished and marvellous woman who is now about to leave us. When her handsome jovial face appears upon the stage, a smile of pleasure always runs around the hall. When the notes of that divine voice fall upon the ear every face settles into a look of content, and every musical want seems satisfied. We suppose Parepa must have left scattered all over this continent from New England to San Francisco, about two or three million personal friends, who never spoke to her in their lives and never expect to. She has been everywhere. She has conquered the most distant territories. She has turned even an Overland Stage Coach into a triumphal chariot, and carried her glorious song from Boston to the Great Salt Lake. What has she not done during her extraordinary American career? She tossed over a few English ballads, and we found in them a rare beauty we never suspected. She tried oratorio, and the spirit of the old composers filled her, and she gave such voice to their grandeur that we hardly to rate Handel now from any mouth but hers. Jubilees put her to the test, but she went on conquering. Ten thousand sang against her, cannon thundered at her side, five hundred musicians played their very loudest, and still above the multitudinous din soared that beautiful voice. Then she turned to the neglected opera, and straightway, with the best English company ever heard in this country, gave us masterpieces we never knew before, and added fresh leaves to her laurel crown. Mr. Rosa must also be numbered as one of the ablest of musicians, managers, and instrumental conductors, and shares with his wife the enviable reputation of keeping faith with the public and telling the truth—even on play-bills.

It is not the intention of Madame Rosa to sing during her visit to her native country, and all offers of an engagement have been refused. She will devote the summer to repose—for even with her extraordinary strength and vitality a little recuperation will not be amiss; and next season it is her purpose to be with us once more. With whatever plans she may come, whether the concert room, the oratorio, the English or Italian stage enlist her services, she will be affectionately welcomed in all parts of America.

HANOVER.—A grand concert will be given during the King of Prussia's visit here, by all the bands of the 10th Army Corps. There will be about 900 performers.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Reinecke has just completed a one-act comic opera, called Durch Nacht zum Licht. The libretto, taken from the French, is by Herr Grans, stage-manager at the Stadttheater.—Among the Billow-Gleisa-Otto collection of books, lately sold by auction, was a manuscript by Mendelssohn; that, namely, of an eight-part chorus, with full band, the subject being the 114th Psalm: "In Israel aus Egypten zog." It extends to fifty pages.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The fifth summer concert, given on Saturday last, was much more successful than any of its predecessors—a result logically arising out of the fact that it was much more attractive. There are charms necessarily belonging to any summer concert at the Crystal Palace, many of them independent both of music and its interpreters. Beautiful surroundings, ample room, air to which that of a London fog suggests, by contrast, the Black Hole of Calcutta, and a coup d'œil not to be surpassed are enough in themselves to attract crowds, even were the difficulty of hearing much greater than it is. Nevertheless, music and its interpreters have an influence, the extent of which can be measured by the overflowing audience of Saturday, which filled the transept from end to end with a compact mass, and occupied every "colgo of vantage" with eagerness. Perhaps only one operatic name could now draw such a crowd; and we, therefore, hardly need say that Mdlle. Christine Nilsson had been announced to take part in the concert. Strict faith was kept with the public, and the accomplished soprano's first appearance this season on a Crystal Palace platform was greeted as heartily as she herself could wish, even when in most exacting mood. Mdlle. Nilsson sang first Verdi's "Ernaol, involami," rendering both recitative and air with that perfect combination of technical skill and appropriate sentiment which is all her own. Whether she more excelled in one than in the other must be a matter of opinion: but assuredly we cannot imagine anything more powerful than her delivery of the recitative—a delivery to itself a proof of genius. Mdlle. Nilsson's second air was "Dove sono," the prelude to which divine example of Mozart's unfailing taste gave her another opportunity of exhibiting masterly declamation. With what tender expression and finished skill the air was sung may be imagined, not the least merit being a clearness of enunciation which, without undue effort, made every note audible wellnigh to the remotest listener. General applause and a recall followed each song as a matter of course. Mdlle. Lewitzky, who made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace, was recalled after a sparkling delivery of Gounod's "Air des bijoux" (Faust), in addition to which she gave "Come il bacio" (a selection from Mozart's Zaide now forming part of L'Oca del Cairo) and joined Signor Bettini in "Parigi o cara." Her début was in all respects successful, not without good and adequate reason. Mdlle. Carl, the young American contralto, who recently left Covent Garden for Drury Lane, to the advantage of the latter, executed in admirable style Mercadante's "Or la sull' onda," and took part with Signor Foli in "Bella immaga" (Semiramide); winning after each loud applause. Signor Bettini gave "Una fortiva lagrima;" Signor Verger was heard to advantage in "Il mio rimorso" (Favorita) and "Il balen;" and Signor Foli conferred all possible importance upon the unimportant air from Lucrezia Borgia, "Vieni; la mia vendetta." The solo instrumentalist was Mdlle. Terese Liebe, who played a movement from De Beriot's not very striking first concerto for violin, and exhibited powers of a high order. The lady's tone, style, and execution are good enough, we imagine, to secure for her as much favour as she can desire, even while Madame Norman-Neroda's success is yet fresh. Auber's Exhibition overture and Beethoven's Leonora were played in worthy style by the Crystal Palace Choir also taking part in the concert. Mr. Manns conducted.

PROVINCIAL.

HEDON.—The second festival of parochial choirs within the rural deanery of Hedon, was celebrated at St. Augustine's on 30th of June. The following is the programme of the music at Evensong:—Hymn before the service, "O God of Hosts, the mighty Lord," from the "Supplemental Hymn and Tune Book," edited by the Rev. R. Brown-Borthwick. The Psalms were sung respectively to single chants —Butterhill in G, the grand chant, Dr. E. F. Monk, in C, Gregorian 8th tone, 2nd coding. Dr. Monk also supplied the music for both the Magnificat and the Nunc Dimittis. The hymn after the third Collect was "Daily, daily, sing the praise," to a tune by the Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard; that before the sermon, "Hark the Sound of Holy Voices," to music by the Rev. J. B. Dykes, and that after the sermon, "Come, ye faithful, raise the anthem," arranged by W. R. Monk. An eloquent sermon on the importance of reverence and order in the conduct of Divine worship, was preached from Psalm cxxxvii. 4, by the Hon. and Rev. C. J. Willoughby, Rector of Wollaton-with-Cossel, Notts. The collection amounted to £7 10s. The voices numbered 156, and included the choirs of Hedon, Sproatley, Roor, Easington, Elsie, Elsterwick, Halsham, Burstwick, and Withernsea, and the singing was highly creditable.

BURNLEY.—On the 23rd June, the Theatre was burnt to the ground. The fire broke out a little after six o'clock in the evening, just as the doors had been opened for the admission of the public. It was occasioned by the gas in the chandelier suddenly flaring up, and setting light to the ceiling.

Digitized by Google

THE LATE JAMES BENNETT.

(From the "Manchester Courier.")

In our obituary recently, it was our sad province to record the death, at his residence in Brighton, of James Bennett, one of the last "Manchester worthies" of the past generation of Lancashire musicians. It will be very pleasant to his few survivors, and, perhaps not a little interesting to his successors in one of the "divine arts," to have before them a sheet sketch of his career from one who knew him well and intimately. He was born within the precincts of the "Old Church" (now the Cathedral). He knew Cheese, the blind organist, and as a chorister-boy, was the pupil of William Sudlow, the successor of Cheese as organist of old Father Smythe's beautiful organ, the whole of which is now dispersed, except that little choir organ now in the Derby Chapel and containing (or once containing) the exquisite vox humana stop, which Sudlow spoke of him as his "best lad—eh t' best lad by far." This "best lad by far" had to pass through that anxious period which tries the sweetest voices, and he came out a bright tenor. But in Bennett's case the Scriptural proverb was once more verified: He was not "a prophet" in his own country; and he tried "fresh fields and pastures new." He went to London. His won a certain appreciation there—at Exeter Hall. He attracted the attention of Lord Burgbersh, and was once named by the Duke of Wellington, as director, for that turn, of the concert of the Society of "Ancient Musicians" (now long since defunct). He acquitted himself so well that shortly afterwards he was engaged to sing at the (second?) Manchester Musical Festival, and at the Chester Festival (for which special occasion an organ was built by Wren & Beaton, of Manchester, which was afterwards placed in St. George's Church, Hulme, and is still there.)* After these events Bennett went to Italy and placed himself under a maestro, who had cultivated, in a very quiet way, some voices that afterwards were "known to fame." This instructor kept Bennett in his "scales," very much to the disgust of Bennett's vanity, but when the master had "done with his pupil" in this way, although he did not dismiss him with the assurance that he was the "finest tenor in Europe," as another professor in an earlier day had said to another pupil, who was destined to fill Europe with his fame, and made fame into money. Well, Bennett came home again; and then he entered into an engagement with Signor Crévelli, the eminent teacher on the Italian system. This first engagement lasted some time, until Braham built the St. James's Theatre, and formed an English opera company. Bennett, next to the great tenor himself, was the first tenor, and sang with great success. Though he did not, and could not, then pretend to be an actor. That adventure, as we all know, came to an untimely end, and the company was dispersed. About this time Mr. Richard Cudmore, at that time leader of the Manchester "Gentlemen's Concerts," composed and brought out The Martyr of Antioch, founded on the words of Dean Milman, of St. Paul's Cathedral. Cudmore brought down Bennett to take the principal tenor parts; and, in the Theatre Royal, then in Fountain Street, the oratorio was performed to a crowded and very enthusiastic audience—Bennett singing the beautiful tenor song—"Come, Margarita." James Bennett then returned to London—to his concert-singing and his teaching; and he married. He married a lady who was his pupil. She was a daughter of a Mr. Brown, who was an engineer, and superintended the dredging of the "Harlem Mere." By this lady he had a daughter, now the wife of Mr. Theodore Jansen, a painter residing in India, and a son, who died very shortly after the death of his mother, the first Mrs. Bennett. But we should mention that at about the time of this marriage, and in consequence of Bennett's success in Braham's company, the late Signor de Begnis engaged him to appear as first tenor in a series of Italian operas, which were represented in Bath, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Edinburgh, and Dublin. To the astonishment of his Manchester friends, the great Italian showman "underlined" Bennett in the bills, as "Signor Bennetti"! ("Ah! de Anglish vill not hav you if you com out as de Anglish Bennett," was the excuse of the Italian impresario). Bennett's sweet and remarkably well-cultivated tenor voice made him a great favourite wherever he appeared, but he had not sufficient experience to make him a finished actor. At Dublin he was attacked with typhus fever and he lost the sight of an eye, and was disabled for a long time in a leg. This proved to be the end of his career on the lyric stage. He returned to London, and devoted himself to his true vocation. He returned to his concert singing and his teaching. He rejoined Signor Crévelli and trained many pupils, some of whom afterwards made a name. He was appointed professor of singing at the Royal Academy of Music, and "a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, St. James's." He and Crévelli established singing classes, which were very successful until the powers of the former began to fail; and then Bennett joined "Tom Cook," the famous glee writer, and these "part and sight singing classes" produced quite a sensation among the higher classes for several seasons, and indeed, until his growing infirmities of bodily health compelled Cook to give up the enterprise. But Bennett persevered; and with the aid of his pupils, and some professional assistants, he was the first man to bring out in London, at his house in Charlotte Street, Portland Place, Rossini's Stabat Mater. He had seen, by mere accident, the MS. at D'Almaine's, and borrowed it, and, at considerable cost, obtained permission to produce it and perform it. There were present at this private performance the Marchioness of Townshend and daughters, the ex-Justice of the Queen's Bench, the present Sir John Coleridge and a great crowd of musical connoisseurs. It was a success, and, it may be, gave an impetus to the future fame of this (for London) unique work in this country. Still, Bennett stuck fast hold of that "Lancashire system in part and sight singing" in which he was trained as a boy. He drew up a lecture, which was delivered at the Marylebone Institute, at the Manchester Royal Institution, at the old "Meal House" in Hyde's Coach, and elsewhere, —still pursuing his instructions, in classes, at his private residence in London. In 1843, Messrs. Cramer, Addison, & Co., of Regent Street, published parts 1 and 2 of his "Practical Introduction to Part and Sight Singing;" but before that he had published, at the price of 12s., his "Elementary Exercises for the Cultivation of the Voice, arranged in accordance with the system of instruction successfully pursued by the author, professor of singing at the Royal Academy of Music." Bennett wrote many charming songs and duets, but he published only a very few—among these, his famous song, "The Exile's Farewell," the words by the late W. H. Bellamy, beginning "Daughter of beauty"—which he was accustomed to sing to his own beautiful accompaniment; "Lullaby," "Silent Tears"—a song with German and English words, and a charming duet, for tenor and contralto, "See the night comes." There are other compositions in MS., of equal merit, that have been sung in private, but have never yet been seen or heard by the outside public, and, perhaps, never will. Later in life Bennett married for his second wife (who survives him) Miss Gordon, who was well known and most highly respected by families of distinction in this city and its vicinities as the principal of a young ladies' boarding-school of high repute at Brighton. Such is the brief biography of a "Manchester worthy," now, unhappily, of a past generation. Full of the fervour of affection, tempered with a true and an earnest piety, James Bennett has gone to his rest, leaving but few surviving friends, but not one who will not cherish his memory.

* Afterwards a remarkably fine organ was built by Gray & Davison, and placed on the rood screen of Chester Cathedral, where it still remains.

ALL THE YEAR ROUND.

Mr. Charles Dickens, jun., publishes the following address to the readers of All the Year Round:—

"PERSONAL.

"It was my father's wish, expressed in writing only a week before his death, that I, his eldest son, and latterly his assistant Editor, should succeed him in the management of the Journal so long associated with his name. In accordance with this clearly-expressed desire, and strong in the hope inspired by so encouraging a mark of his confidence, I address myself to the fulfilment of the task which he appointed me to discharge. It is intended that the management of All the Year Round in the future shall be based on precisely the same principles as those on which it has up to this time been conducted. The same authors who have contributed to its columns in time past will contribute to them still. The same spirit which has in the past pervaded its pages will, so far as conscientious endeavour may render it possible, pervade them still. The same earnest desire to advocate what is right and true, and to oppose what is false and unworthy, which was the guiding principle of my father's career, and which has always characterised his management of All the Year Round, will, I most earnestly hope, continue to be apparent in its every word. So much, then, being the same, it may not be pre-sumptuous in me to hope that the same readers with whom this Journal, and that which preceded it, found favour for so many years may still care to see the familiar title page on their tables as of old. With this brief explanation of the course I propose to adopt, and omitting all reference whatever to my own personal feelings in connexion with the great sorrow which has rendered this statement necessary, I leave the future Journal to speak for itself. 'It is better that every kind of work, honestly undertaken and discharged, should speak for itself than be spoken for.' These were the words with which my father inaugurated the new series of All the Year Round. I cannot do better than repeat them in this place.

"CHARLES DICKENS, Jun."

WEIMAR.—The "model" performances as they are called, of Herr R. Wagner's operas began with Der Fliegende Holländer. The attendance was respectable, but nothing like what had been prophesied by the adherents of the Prophet. There were plenty of places to be had any time during the evening.

Puzzles.

No. I.

It is a puzzle to me that Pauline Lucca should, for so many years, have been generally accepted in London as a singer and actress of the first class—as one worthy, in short, to rank with Tietjens, Patti, and Nilsson (or Patti, Nilsson, and Tietjens; or Nilsson, Tietjens, and Patti).

An Ancient Dilettante.

Digitized by Google

MARRIAGE.

On the 25th ult., at St. Giles's Church, Camberwell, LIZZIE, youngest daughter of GEORGE PERREN, Esq., to Mr. THOMAS BENFIELD.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SEMELE.—Signor B——— sings tolerably well, but has not the remotest idea of imparting dramatic significance to any character he assumes. M. P.———'s French tone of voice and unhappy vibrato are hardly compensated by his other qualities. The stentorian Herr W———, who, after some years' absence, has unaccountably cropped up again, is, as he was formerly, in a histrionic sense, null. The voice is metallic in quality, powerful and telling in the higher notes, when its owner has hustanded his breath so as to take them effectively (which seldom happens), but by no means musical. Signor G———'s voice is in better condition than it was last season; but to expect him to use it with more art would be to look for Utopia. Louder singing than his has never been heard; and yet it is rarely effective, because it is throughout ill-balanced. In short, he is honestly neither singer nor actor, while his pronunciation of Italian is unique. These, at any rate, are our convictions, and they are much at the service of Madame "Semele."

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1870.

A QUEEN'S CONCERT.

"BY command of the Queen a State Concert was given last evening (Wednesday) at Buckingham Palace, to which a party of nearly 800 were invited." The programme was as follows:—

Overture, "The Men of Prometheus"	Beethoven
Chorus of Women, "The deep-red Sun" (Ulysses)	Gounod.
Trio, "The Hawthorn in the Glade" (The May-Queen), Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Signor Gardoni, and Mr. Santley	W. S. Bennett.
Arietta "Komunt ein schlanker Bursch" (Der Freischütz), Mdlle. Liebhart	Weber.
Aria, "Al raggio fulgente" (L'Oca del Cairo), Signor Gardoni	Mozart.
Cradle-Song, "Peacefully slumber," Madame Patey (Harp obbligato, Mr. John Thomas)	A. Randegger.
Duetto, "Sull' aria" (Le Nozze di Figaro), Mesdames Adelina Patti and Pauline Lucca	Mozart.
Romanza, "Astro gentil" (Tannhäuser), Mr. Santley ...	Wagner.
Cavatina, "Come per me" (La Sonnambula), Madame Monbelli	Bellini.
Part-Song, "As the Sunshine to the Flower"	W. G. Cusins.
Cavatina, "Ernani, involami" (Ernani), Mdlle. Christine Nilsson	Verdi.
Romanza, "Raggio d'amor" (Il Furioso), Signor Mario ...	Donizetti.
Romance, "Kennst du das Land?" (Mignon), Madame Pauline Lucca	A. Thomas.
Chanson de Magali, "La brise est douce" (Mireille), Madame Monbelli and Signor Gardoni	Gounod.
Aria, "Ah! fors' e lui" (Traviata), Madame Adelina Patti	Verdi.
Duo, "Ah! morir" (Ernani), Mdlle. Pauline Lucca and Signor Mario	Verdi.
Quartetto, "Mentre il pie" (Maria), Mesdames Adelina Patti and Patey, Signor Mario and Mr. Santley ...	Flotow.
March and Chorus, "With sheathed Swords" (Naaman), solo, Madame Patey	Sir. M. Costa.
God Save the Queen.

Conductor—Mr. W. G. Cusins.

"The band and chorus, consisting of upwards of 160 performers, were selected from the Italian Operas, the Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies, and her Majesty's private band."

Good. Nevertheless, take away Kings and Queens (not to speak of Emperors and Empresses), Princes and Princesses, Dukes and Duchesses, Marquises and Marchionesses, Earls, Viscounts, and Lords by courtesy (both sexes included), and we will wager 100 sovereigns of the realm against anyone pointing out the musical amateur, however ravenous, who would sit through such a programme. Happily, Kings, Queens (not to speak of Emperors), Princes, Dukes, and so forth (both sexes included), are generally disposed to talk all through the musical performance to which the "800" are usually invited. What a farce is the whole thing! What a way of treating an art that should be held sacred by those to whom, from their elevated position, all things that are sacred to our common humanity should be more or less sacred! Her Majesty the Queen discreetly kept aloof from the concert given to the "800" (the "600" at Balaklava were much better employed), and left the Prince and Princess of Wales to do the honours. With the fact that the Prince is a great musical connoisseur few are cognisant.

To what does the whole amount?—Simply to a scheme for putting so much money (the British nation's money) into the pockets of foreign artists, good, bad, and indifferent. True (as a consolation), there was, at least in the programme, a harp obbligato, played by a distinguished native of the "Principality," to a Cradle song, the composition of a foreigner; true, Mr. Santley—a stubborn Englishman if there was ever one—sang one of the most hideous foreign songs in existence (see programme); and true, there was a part-song by Mr. W. G. Cusins, conductor of her Majesty's private band. But even these, added to a trio from the May Queen, also by an Englishman (though meritorious, perhaps of less mark), confided to Christine Nilsson, Italo Gardoni, and Charles Santley, could hardly make up for——&c., &c., &c.

A. S. S.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE Figaro and the Gaulois are delighted with the story of Lady Godiva, which has just reached them through the International. From the enthusiasm inspired it is to be foreseen that the legend so poetically treated by Tennyson will ere long fall into the hands of Offenbach. "Tom Peeping," as he is called, will make a part for Dupuis, and Mdlle. Schneider the impersonator of grand duchesses will, of course, represent "la blonde Anglaise." One can fancy "le Comte de Caventry" drawn, by the creator of Lord Boum, as an eccentric mediæval nobleman, a grotesque embodiment of feudalism, a sort of British "Sire de Framboisy." But the scenes between Lady Godiva and "Tom Peeping," who will naturally be Lady Godiva's lover, are expected to form the remarkable incidents of the work.

THE Entr'acte of last week contained the following:—"A Drury Lane, Faure et Mdlle. Nilsson ont joué Otello. Pour la première fois, un baryton s'attaquait au rôle si dramatique d'Otello. Comme on le pense Faure l'a parfaitement interprété." If the making of errors proceed on the cumulative principle, our contemporary will next state that the part of Desdemona was brilliantly sustained by Signor Foli.

SIGNOR ALARY, the immortal mutilator of Don Giovanni (for Signor Mario, in 1858), has resigned his post at the Théâtre Italien, and is succeeded by Signor Muzio, who undertakes the general duties of musical conductor. Signor Muzio's claims rest partly on the fact of his being a friend, fellow townsman, and pupil of Verdi, partly on his having directed the orchestra at the Italian Opera established under the auspices of the Khedive at Cairo. Very recently, Signor Muzio, in company with M. Bagier, manager of the Théâtre Italien, visited London for the purpose of making engagements—when all be secured was the right of playing Signor Campana's Esmeralda. From London, manager and conductor were to proceed to Italy, to see if Italy still boasts of singers, and if the operas she continues to produce are worth reproducing. Hopes are entertained of Signor Petrella, the most successful maestro since Verdi, and composer of some twenty works, not one of which has been performed in France or England.

Digitized by Google

An event has just happened in Paris which illustrates the uselessness of crying out against paying large salaries to artists. Nicolini was in receipt of 108,000 francs per year, from M. Bagier; he asked for a rise of 24,000 francs; M. Bagier declined; an offer from Lisbon of 80,000 francs for five months was accepted; fifteen minutes after, M. Bagier conceded the augmentation.—Too late; and the impresario loses his tenor for standing out against exorbitant demands.

The Paris Entr'acte compliments M. Faure on the style in which he plays Otello at Drury Lane, and remarks that "this is the first time the part of Otello has been taken by a baritone." According to this view, it is Mongini, we suppose, who represents Iago; in which case our contemporary might add that "this is the first time the part of Iago has been taken by a tenor." Le Ménestrel informs us that Covent Garden is in future to be kept open all the year round; that there is a chance even of its being opened on Sundays for the performance of oratorios; and that steps have been taken with the view of obtaining permission for such performances (which, be it observed, are not unknown in some of our provincial towns).

M. Hervé's new opera, at the Variétés, is entitled Le Trone d'Ecosse; ou la difficulte de s'asseoir dessus. The heroine represented by Mdlle. Devéria, is one Jane Stuart; Mdlle. Aimée impersonates a Scotch girl, named "Flora MacRazor" who has an English rival—a sort of Rose Bradwardine, called "Julia Good-Morning." There is a pretender, styled "George the Fifteenth," and there are clansmen, belonging to "the clan of the Macs"—MacRaglan, MacAdam, and MacIntosh. If the music is half as good as the programme the piece may succeed. The Vienna papers speak of an opera by Mr. Benedict, the Old Man of the Mountain, as about to be brought out. At Ancona two amateurs fought a duel, without fatal result. One said that the opera Frimmella, was rubbish; the other contradicted him, and words were followed by blows. [The Old Man of the Mountain is simply the Crusaders, an opera for which, to a very clumsy book by the late Mr. Alfred Bunn, Mr. Benedict, in 1846, was ingenious enough to find beautiful music. Mr. Benedict's Don Quichotte was produced in the same year, immediately in advance of the Crusaders. —Our writers of "Occasionals" should be circumspect.—A. S. S.]

A shameful outrage is reported from Warsaw. Some Russian officers of the garrison there have brutally insulted and maltreated, even to danger of life, the Viennese orchestral director Strauss. A band of officers came at midnight to the Swiss Garden, took supper, and, after an hour's revel, required the proprietor to give them music. But the performers, at that hour, were scattered all over the city; and the landlord protested that it would be impossible to bring them together again. One of the officers, deputy-director of police, personally acquainted with Strauss, thereupon wrote a letter desiring him to come at once to the Garden. Strauss, though surprised, complied; and on arriving, at half-past one was asked for a little music. Strauss declining, an officer threw him a hundred-rouble note, saying—"Here; you will play for that, I know!"—Strauss again declining, the moneyed officer struck him on the face. More than this, the offending musician was knocked down, trampled under foot, and now lies in a dangerous state. The story conveys its own moral. In this scene we see reproduced that arrogant assertion of brute force, over culture, refinement, and the spirit of freedom, which has made Poland wretched for a century, and may even yet give proof that "in her ashes live her wonted fires."

It appears that the National Theatre at Pesth is in pecuniary difficulties, and that, unless the Government extends a helping hand, the artists will sigh in vain for their salaries next month. The Emperor, it is true, allows this theatre the same subvention that he allows each of the two Imperial Theatres in Vienna, but a portion of the money is set aside for erecting a new building. To all appearances, however, it will be necessary to set something aside for procuring a new company as well, seeing that the members of the present one stand a good chance of being starved to death.

The summer season is not that in which the showiest laurels are to be plucked on the French stage; but nevertheless, a certain M. Henri Becque, who once upon a time achieved a moderate success at the Théâtre du Vaudeville has contrived to make himself famous by a drama in five acts brought out at the Porte Saint-Martin with the title Michel Pauper. The difficulties surmounted by the author in rendering his piece visible to the public are doubtless to be enumerated among the causes of its good fortune. Michel Pauper had already been submitted to the Odéon where it was summarily rejected; but M. Becque, bearing in mind that the out-of-the-way temple of the legitimate drama receives a subvention from the government, argued within himself that he had duties as well as privileges, and that the duties involved the production of his play. He therefore laid his grievance before the Society of Dramatic Authors but these found the case beyond the pale of their jurisdiction. A bold measure was requisite, and a bold measure was taken. Determined to make the public the judge of his deserts, M. Becque hires the Porte St. Martin and engages a company of artists at his own expense. We are reminded of the exploit many years ago of the dramatic enthusiast, Mr. George Stevens, who brought out his Martinuzzi at the Lyceum. But whereas the Briton ridiculously failed, the Gaul is triumphant.

A peculiar practice is now introduced in every theatre of Russian Poland. At the conclusion of the performance the doors of the theatre are closed, like those of the English House of Commons previous to a division, and everyone is locked in. The curtain having been then raised, all the performers appear on the stage—the gentlemen in full-dress coats; the ladies in white—and bow before an illuminated painting, on which are the initials of the Emperor. The orchestra plays the Russian national hymn, and the whole audience, rising from their seats, take part in it. The police keep a sharp look-out to see that everyone contributes his or her share to this vocal tribute. It is not till the hymn is over that the doors are unlocked, and the audience at liberty to depart.

At Vienna, on the 22nd ult., Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser was, with a grand flourish of trumpets, seven grey horses (only three of the valiant knights in the suite of the Landgraf had the courage to mount their steeds), a host of mysterious creatures, supposed to represent falcons, and a respectable pack of dogs, duly transferred to the new Operahouse. Herr Richard Wagner himself, by the way, has written to correct the wonderful specimen of "euphemism:" "that he had, with grateful recognition of the honour done him, declined complying with the request of the Beethoven Festival Committee to conduct the Ninth Symphony." He states publicly that he never answered the Committee at all. He was, therefore, purposely unpolite—to use a mild expression—and now he boasts of his unpoliteness. It is, however, a well-known fact that he was never otherwise, that he never felt an interest for any living soul but his precious self, and this tremendous moral slap in the mouth, with everything connected therewith, is a well-merited punishment for the Society of the Friends of Music, who attempted to secure the services of the Lucerne Egoist. They have now had to put up with Franz Lachner's refusal to officiate. What conductor, grown grey in honour, would ever share the work with the writer of the pamphlet, On Conducting? That incomparable artist, Herr Joachim, also, after alluding in an unmistakable manner to the proposed conductor, refused his co-operation, so that the Society will, probably, have to depend entirely upon their own resources.—The Vienna Fremdenblatt says that the real motive why Herr R. Wagner did not choose to accede to the request of the Society was that among the members of the Festival Committee there are two gentlemen not frantic admirers of his music.

The grand rehearsal of Herr R. Wagner's latest effusion, Die Walküre, took place, at Munich, on the 24th June before a select few—about a thousand—who had received invitations. It lasted from twelve o'clock till a quarter past five, p.m. Of course, the Wagnerites present were in raptures—in ecstasies—in a frenzy of delight, but the majority of the audience were far from evincing a similar amount of undiluted enthusiasm. To tell the truth, they did exactly the reverse, and had the bad taste to manifest unmistakable signs of dissatisfaction. It was only after the first act that there was anything approaching hearty applause. During all the second act, which, laden with bombastic fustian, musical and verbal, dragged its slow length along, for one hour and a half, by Shrewsbury—and every other—clock, there was not a hand. At the conclusion of the third, and last, act, the audience were so thoroughly worn out that it was with difficulty they could muster strength and resolution to get up a call for their fellow-sufferers, the victims on the other side the foot-lights. The pains taken in mounting the work exceeds, in the opinion of very competent judges, anything previously known, even in the case of works by the Prophet of the Future himself. Every one, even the Prophet's most fanatic admirers, must acknowledge the untiring efforts of the Intendant, Baron von Perfall, and of the conductor Herr Wullner. Herr R. Wagner is deeply indebted to both, for, should the work succeed, its success will be attributable quite as much to the unflagging zeal and energy of these two gentlemen as to the mise-en-scène, splendid—and dangerous—though that is. As a German contemporary observes, Herr R. Wagner would experience some difficulty in meeting with another Intendant, who, after such gross attacks from a composer, would devote himself, from early morning to a late hour in the night, to ensuring the success of one whose aim it was morally to annihilate him.—The first regular performance took place on the 26th June. Of course, the Wagnerites declare it was a great success—a splendid triumph, but others not quite so blindly devoted to the master of Lucerne, are bold enough to differ, and, what is more, to say so publicly. There is, however, one fact connected with the first performance which cannot fail to gratify even Herr R. Wagner's most bitter foes: despite the "fire-effects"—effects which must strike terror into the hearts of those companies with whom the theatre is insured—the building was not burnt down—at least, not on the first night.—Das Rheingold is to be revived, and will alternate with Die Walküre.—The Berlin Echo says:—"For the general rehearsal of the first act of Die Walküre, the theatre was completely lighted up. The scene represents 'the interior of a dwelling,' in the midst of which a mighty oak rears itself. The roots of the 'hero-tree' are hid beneath the ground, but its leafy summit spreads over the roof, which slopes down from the trunk. A room is erected around the latter; this is Hunding's habitation, and, we may add, a magnificent specimen of the scene-painter's art. On the rising of the curtain, a fearful thunder-storm is raging, and a stranger seeks refuge in the hut. He is speedily captivated, 'in increasing smittenness,'* by the longing glances of Sie-gelinde, Hunding's wife, and, on the conclusion of the song—a love-song of an undisguisedly sensual character—'presses furiously to his breast' his hostess, in whom he has found and recognised his 'bride and sister'—his sister, too, by both the same parents. Upon this the 'curtain falls quickly.' This finale inhabitants of Munich already know, from having heard it as a concert at which Richard Wagner introduced himself to them, in December 1864, by giving fragments from his later works. In the second act, the famous 'ride of the Walkyres' will probably be remembered by the public of Vienna, from having been performed at one of the seven concerts given by Wagner during his residence in that capital, seven years ago. The dangerous fire-machinery in the second and the third acts, when the sleeping Brunhilde is surrounded by glowing flames, has been done away with, since, after all, people did not feel inclined to endanger the building, together with a number of human lives, even though it was for a 'Walkyre.' The Echo might have interpolated "most" before "dangerous." There are still enough fire-effects left to satisfy a Gnelre himself.

Digitized by Google

An idea is being ventilated which is worth consideration. It is proposed that the plan adopted throughout Italy of giving afternoon performances in open air theatres shall be tried in Paris. What reader of Dickens can have forgotten the sketch drawn in Pictures of Italy of the audience in an al-fresco amphitheatre seen from the novelist's house at Genoa? Was not something of the kind tried in the Pré-Catalan about ten years ago? If we are to have a succession of hot summers, the idea is worth entertaining, even for London. Our legislators may insist on sending us into theatres in July but they cannot prevent our making them cool.

* A pleasing Wagnerian neologism; Teutonice: Ergriffenheit.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The concert given by Miss Megan Watts at 41, Upper Brook Street, on Wednesday week was of a character which hardly calls for much remark. The bénéficiaire—whom we need not introduce to the reader as a young Welsh vocalist of considerable attainments—sang Glück's "Che faro," Macfarren's "Widow Bird" (violin obbligato, Mr. Henry Holmes); took part with Miss Wynne in a Welsh duet, and with MM. Dudley Thomas and Ciabatti in Randegger's perennial trio, "I Naviganti." Her expressive style and good voice were shown to advantage throughout, obtaining a true meed of appreciation. Miss Watts was assisted by, in addition to artists already named, Miss Severn, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Lewis Thomas, Mr. Köster, Mr. E. Silas, Mr. John Thomas, and Mr. Benedict, each of whom contributed one or more favourite pieces.

Mr. Ellis Roberts's harp concert was given on Tuesday week, and attracted to St. George's Hall a large audience. Mr. Ellis Roberts executed two of his popular harp solos with great effect. His first fantasia was encored, and after his second he had to return to acknowledge applause. Both are brilliant compositions, containing several charming variations and ingenious passages. The instrumental music was varied by the delightful singing of Madame Patey, who was encored, in "Always alone." Miss Adelaide Newton's agreeable voice and singing were also much applauded. She gave Sullivan's "Bird in the Night" and "Auld Robin Gray" with marked effect. Miss Ellen Glanville contributed Meyerbeer's "Roberto, o tu che adoro," and was no less successful. The pianist was the talented young artist, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who charmed the audience with Thalberg's "Home, sweet home," which she was called upon to repeat; and also displayed her classical taste in Mendelssohn's duo in D for pianoforte and violoncello, assisted by Mr. Edward Howell. The concert concluded with Benedict's trio, "My Lady the Countess," sung by Miss Alice Ryall, Miss Glanville, and Miss Adelaide Newton.

The Architectural Rooms in Conduit Street, the Walhalla of designers of human habitations, temples, and bridges were thrown open on the evening of the 28th ult., for the purpose of Masters Charles and Arthur Le Jeune's harmonium, organ, and pianoforte performances. The playing of these youths was quite up to the standard of their former concerts, and it is scarcely necessary to enlarge upon their skilful manipulation and tasteful rendering of the various pieces. A concerto with variations, the composition of Henry Smart, very much applauded, owing its success, not less to the composer's merit, than to the skill of Master Charles Le Jeune upon the American chamber organ. The singers were Madame Talbot-Cherer and Mr. Wallace Wells. The former gave a ballad from Balfe's Puck, re-arranged by Charles Salaman, and Linley's capital song, "Little Nell." The latter sang Mendelssohn's "The Stormy Spring," and Sullivan's "The snow lies white." The audience was large and fashionable.—H. L.

On Wednesday week the annual choral festival of the Metropolitan and Suburban Schools was celebrated upon the Handel Orchestra, and every available seat was occupied by the children and their teachers. At least 5000 voices responded to the baton of Mr. John Hullah, whose efforts to improve the singing in schools and seminaries throughout the country have long been acknowledged. The accuracy and precision with which the young vocalists sang several well-known choralea as well as some secular pieces, were the theme of general admiration. The sacred pieces included Dr. Croft's psalm, "Ye boundless realms of joy;" Rohanow's chant for the 10th Psalm; Scott's anthem, "Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem;" the prayer from Rossini's Moise; Handel's duet, "Oh, lovely peace;" the grand chorus by the same composer, "Sing unto the Lord;" and Hullah's "All things bright and beautiful." The secular music was no less admirably selected, and comprised Calicott's "Mark the merry elves;" Neithardt's "May-day;" "Hullah's "The birds;" "Auld lang syne,' harmonized in four parts; and some other well-known and effective part-songs and choruses.

The matinée given by Madame Nadine Nevidomski Dunord took place at the Marquis of Downshire's, Belgrave Square, on Monday. The vocalists on the occasion comprised Miss Amelia Smyth, Madame Crellin-Pyne, Miss Watts, Miss Enriques, Mr. Dudley Thomas, Signor Montelli, and M. Waldeck. S'los, on the harp by Mr. J. Thomas, and pianoforte by Signor Tito Mattei and Chevalier de Kontski, were also given, and warmly appreciated. Madame Dunord sang the well-known cavatina from Lucrezia, "Com è bello," with excellent taste and expression, and was deservedly applauded; she also obtained great applause in the "Valse Enchantresse," by M. de Kontski, and introduced a romance and Chanson Russe, composed by the Princess Koutchubel. Mdlle. Theresa Liebe, a young violinist, played a fantasia, by Vieuxtemps, on an air from I Lombardi. She possesses an agreeable tone and good executive skill. The accompaniments were supplied by Messrs. Benedict, Fiori, and Gana. Among the distinguished company present were the Princess Czernichefi, Miss Duff Gordon, and Baron Brunow, the Russian Ambassador.—T.

Digitized by Google

MRS. HENRY DAVIES gave a concert on Tuesday evening which attracted a full audience. Mrs. Henry Davies, who is an excellent pianist and harpist, displayed her abilities to advantage in Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor, Weber's Polacca, Mozart's sonata in D for two pianofortes (with Mr. Walter Macfarren); and in John Thomas's solo, "Autumn;" a duet from Somnambula, and a grand duet in E flat minor; in all of which she earned applause. Miss Edith Wynne, whom we were glad to see recovered from her late indisposition, sang some Welsh melodies, and was encored. Miss Elena Angele and Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Jules Lefort also took part. Mr. Walter Macfarren accompanied.

MADAME MOSSERHAT gave a concert at St. George's Hall on Tuesday evening. She sang G. W. Martin's new song, "Lothair," and an aria by Beethoven, in both of which she was encored. She was assisted by the Misses Doria, who sang Francesco Berger's duet, "A Warning echoes," in excellent style; Miss Julia Sydney, Miss Seagrave, Miss James, and Madame Deck, with Messrs. Steadman, Deck, C. Lane, Senderi, Albert and Herr Lehmeyer, contributed several vocal and instrumental solos; and Messrs. F. Berger, H. Parker, Vaschetti, and Lehmeyer accompanied.

MR. AND MRS. RICHARD BLAGROVE gave their sixth and last concert on Thursday evening, to a large and appreciative audience, larger and more appreciative probably than on former occasions. Miss Eleanor Armstrong sang twice and sang well. Miss Fosbrooke contributed "Dove," and was much applauded. Messrs. Balsir Chatterton and Cheshire played a harp duet which was particularly effective. Attempts were made to encore Mr. and Mrs. Blagrove in everything they performed, and certainly many more encores were given with far less reason than that presented by Mr. Blagrove's fantasia, Maria Padilla; Mr. Blagrove's Impromptu (Chopin), and "The Harmonious Blacksmith." Perhaps the performance which more than any revealed the attention of the audience, was the manuscript quintett by E. Silas, a composition of particular merit and beauty.—H. L.

MR. FRANK ELMORE'S fifth annual concert took place on the 10th ult., in St. James's Hall, and attracted a goodly audience by means of goodly artists and goodly pieces. As a matter of course, the bénéficiaire himself took a prominent part in the proceedings, singing, first of all, Bevignani's romance, "Amor che fa," and doing it so well as to win an encore, responding to which Mr. Elmore substituted "Non è ver." His next effort—a far more serious one—was made in connexion with "Deeper and deeper still." Here the concert-giver made a thoroughly legitimate success, the music also of recitative and air being given with a taste and intelligence deserving high praise. Mr. Elmore also appeared to advantage as a composer, his song, "The Woodman's Son," entrusted to Mr. Harley Vining, displaying more than ordinary merit. Mdlle. Maria Strindberg added much to the interest of the concert by playing Ries's pianoforte solo, "Elfenreigen" (encored), and Pfeiffer's "Quatrième Mazurka," both of which she gave excellently well. Miss Wynne, Mdlle. Liebhart, Madame Patey, and other artists also had a share in the programme.

MISS ANNIE STOCKEN gave a concert at the Horns' Assembly Rooms, Kennington Park, on the 30th ult., which attracted a very numerous and fashionable audience. The programme contained several pieces of a classical character, and was altogether of unusual interest. Miss Stocken's solo performances comprised Beethoven's sonata in F sharp major, Schubert's Impromptu, in F minor, and Vincent Wallace's "La Rapidité," after each of which she was warmly applauded, and honoured with a recall. She also displayed her high executive ability and refined taste in Beethoven's sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2), for piano and violin, and in a duo on Guillaume Tell, in both of which her coadjutor was Mr. Alfred Barnett. The latter of these pieces the audience insisted upon hearing repeated. In the vocal department, Mdlle. Romanelli, Agnes de Salewska, Frederica Taylor, and Messrs. Renwick and Hulert lent their assistance. Madame Dryden contributed a harp solo.

A PERFORMANCE, musical and dramatic, took place at the Gaiety Theatre on Saturday, for the benefit of Mdlle. Georgi, and resulted in success not less great than it was deserved. The programme opened with Offenbach's Rose of Auvergne, the characters sustained by Miss Loseby (Fleuretic), Mr. Bracy (Alphonse), and Mr. Perrini (Pierre). A brisker opening could not have been desired, and the gathering of such a numerous audience was expressed by a hearty recall of the performers. A concert of vocal and instrumental music followed, sustained by artists of established excellence. The Sisters Georgi sang the duet, Rossini's "Giorno d'orrore," with which their names are associated; Mr. Santley was encored in his capital rendering of Molloy's "Wandering Jew;" Signor Gardoni obtained a similar honour in Paladilhe's "Mandolinara," substituting "La Donna è Mobile;" and Messrs. Benedict and Sloper played a duet for two pianos; "in addition to all which other pieces interpreted by other artists added to the richness of the programme. Following the concert, came a scene from Black and White, ably sustained by Miss Constance Georgi, Miss Gresham, and Mr. Vernon, who were recalled and deservedly applauded. The next item was The Spitalfields Weaver, in which Miss Henrie, Messrs. Toole, Billington, Tweedale, Bolton, and Harvey represented their respective characters to the delight of an audience thoroughly able to appreciate the good things set before them. A part of the last act of Lucrezia Borgia brought the entertainment to a close, and enabled Mdlle. Constance Georgi to make a legitimate effect with "Il Segreto," which she sang in capital style.

A CONCERT was given in the Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday week by Miss Amy Percival, and fairly claims more attention than the average of benefit entertainments. Not only were the vocal selections made with unusual discrimination, but there was an allowance of classical instrumental music rare in its extent and, as a whole, excellent in quality. The works of Mr. Hamilton Clarke, a composer new to us, were largely drawn upon, the most important example being a trio in D minor (MS.) for violin (Herr Deichmann), violoncello (M. Paque), and piano (Mr. H. Clarke), which deserves favourable notice, as much for its promise as for the success actually achieved. Mr. Clarke is an earnest musician, who has studied largely, and whose natural ability enables him to turn his knowledge to good account. So much the trio proves beyond doubt, while it secures for its composer's future efforts a respectful attention. Mr. Clarke was still further represented by two songs, "A Wild March Day," sung by Miss Percival, and, "Lost Love," for which Madame Rudersdorff's expressive delivery obtained the rare distinction of a morning encore. Both are good examples of what such works should be. Other songs were sung by Miss M. Galloway, a young artist whose promise for the future is of the highest, and whose voice and style were displayed to advantage in Ganz's "Beautiful Echo," Miss Alice Fairman, who made a success in Randegger's pretty song, "Peacefully slumber," and Madame Rudersdorff, by whom the first-named composer's Canzone, Marinella—a graceful little work—was perfectly rendered. Mr. Lazarus added to the foregoing a capital fantasia for the clarionet, written by himself, and M. Paque contributed his own fantasia for violoncello on airs from Don Giovanni.

MR. OBERTHÜR, the accomplished harpist gave a matinée at his residence, on Wednesday, June 29, with the assistance of Mdlle. Orgéni, Miss Eleanor Armstrong, Madame Osborne-Williams, and M. Jules Lefort (vocalists); Le Chevalier de Kontski, Herr L. Straus, and M. Albert (instrumentalists). The matinée was under the patronage of the Duchess of Wellington, and the rooms were filled by a highly fashionable audience, evidently prepared to do justice to the programme and the performance. Mr. Oberthür, in his happiest vein (which says no little), played his own concerto in G for the harp to admiration, and the orchestral parts, adapted by the author for the pianoforte, were rendered to the practised hands of Mr. Hallett Sheppard. Mr. Oberthür's duo for piano and harp on airs from Oberon was also a marked success. In this the piano part was played by the Chevalier de Kontski, in the second part Mr. Oberthür gave his very effective piece, called Souvenir de Londres, besides playing the harp obligato accompaniments to his graceful romance, "Je voudrais être" (the popular M. Jules Lefort (sing the singer) to an "Ave Maria" by Mr. Hallett Sheppard, and the "Willow song," from Rossini's Otello. The best performance of Mr. Oberthür was his trio in C major for violin, violoncello, and harp, in which he enjoyed the valuable co-operation of Herr L. Straus and M. Albert as violinist and violoncellist. The trio (the second for the same instruments), written by Mr. Oberthür, and comprising an allegro, scherzo, andante, and finale, is a work alike able and interesting. Though the last piece on the programme, it was listened to with the utmost attention, and no less satisfaction throughout. Solos were also played by Le Chevalier de Kontski, M. Albert, and Herr L. Straus (the latter announced being especially successful in an andante, by the late regretted Ernst). The vocal music was accompanied by Messrs Hallett Sheppard and Parker, in a manner that left nothing to criticise; but both these gentlemen are "pianists" born and bred.

A CONCERT was given in the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday week for the benefit of the Consumption Hospital for Consumptives and Incurables. The programme included a cantata, by a Mrs. Joseph Robinson, of Dublin, entitled God is Love. The work is mainly a collection of hymns, by Bonar, Keble, Osler Warning, Heber, Waller, Monrell, Bakewell, &c., joined by means of the 104th Psalm, Tate and Brady's version. The authoress states in her preface that "The music of the cantata is an illustration of the words which express experience of the Christian life, its double consciousness of joy and sadness, hope and fear, and abiding sense, through all, of the changeless love of God. This general idea of the whole work is given in the prelude, where the sadness which belongs to the brief life of earth is contrasted with the joy that is created by the hope of an endless life beyond the grave." She also states, "If I can thus make my work the means of benefiting others, the design of its publication will be accomplished." We regret to state that as far as the Ascot Hospital is concerned, the funds will hardly be benefited, the attendance, notwithstanding the list of patrons and patronesses, being only moderate. The cantata opens with a prelude, which was well played by a small orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Weist Hill, and conducted by Mr. Joseph Robinson. The soloists were Miss Fennell, from Dublin, a promising contralto; Miss L. Horn, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. R. Smith. The last-named gentleman, who possesses a fine baritone voice, sang an air, "Life nor death shall us disever," in good style, as did Miss Fennell the solo, "Cling to the Crucified," Mr. Cummings, receiving an encore for his artistic delivery of "What are these like stars appearing?" a solo, with chorus of angels. Mr. Oberthür's harp playing in the accompaniments to two of the pieces added life to the cantata. The choruses were efficient and sang with spirit. We forgot to mention a trio for three female voices, "The meeting place," sung by the principal ladies, which was encored, perhaps, because so suggestive of Mendelssohn's "Lift up your eyes. We can hardly imagine that God is Love will become popular in London, though the merit of cleverness cannot be denied it. The second part was miscellaneous, opening with Attwood's quintet, "Ye all who breathe," sung by the Dublin glee and Madrigal Union, consisting of Miss Fennell, Messrs. Peel, Richard Smith, Hender, and G. T. Kelly; they also gave some questionably harmonized Irish melodies, ending with Dr. R. Stewart's capital arrangement of "The Cruiskeen Lawn." Their voices harmonized well and told with effect. Mr. Hallé played one of his solos in his usual manner, Mr. Oberthür gave his harp "Meditation," a pianoforte and violoncello duet, played by Mr. G. A. Osborne and Signor Piatti, obtained much applause; and Miss Fennell sang remarkably well Charles Salaman's "Oh! if then wert mine own love."

Digitized by Google

THE summer series of Mr. Leslie's concerts ended on Monday week with the performance of a miscellaneous sacred and secular programme in St. James's Hall. Mr. Sims Reeves excepted, all the artists were chosen from the Drury Lane opera troupe, and, as the selection of pieces was confined to special parts for favourites, we need hardly say that a very large audience assembled. The music being so well known, and so intimately associated with its interpreters, presents little occasion for critical remark, and our duty is confined almost wholly to that of reporting. Mr. Leslie's Choir, on the present, and, of course, on all important occasions, to hold its own against any combination of attractions. The concerted pieces included Leo's fine motett, "Tu es sacerdos," Smart's "Ave Maria," Henry Leslie's part-song, "The Pilgrim," Benedict's matchless "Ave Verum," Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," the solo in which was correctly but not expressively given by Madame Sinico, Macfarren's part-song, "You stole my love," Sullivan's "O, hush thee, my babie!" the sentimental prettiness of which always wins its way, and Fesca's madrigal, "Down in a flowery vale," Morley's "My Bonny Lass," and an arrangement of "Rule, Britannia," it will readily be believed that all were given in a style not far short of perfection, and that each won the loud applause of every amateur of choral music present. Among the solos those sung by Mdlle. Nilsson were of course, conspicuous. The favourite artist gave first, "Angels ever bright and fair;" following up that example of tender sentiment with the declamatory "Let the bright Seraphim," and "Spargi d'amore," and finally some of the quaint national melodies of her native land. Mdlle. Nilsson having presented these often, we are spared all criticism, and need only say that she delighted her audience beyond measure, and had to submit to "calls" and encores in the most indefatigable sort. Madame Sinico's solo already named, Madame Sinico gave a "Valse joyeuse" by Mattiotti, and joined Madame Trebelli and Signor Gardoni in "Ti prego." Madame Trebelli's solos were Stradella's "Se miei sospiri" and "Nobil Signor" (Les Huguenots), each being perfectly sung and much applauded. Mr. Sims Reeves contributed nothing but well known favourites such as "Deeper and deeper still," "In native worth," and "The Requital;" but to hear him sing these is a treat of the highest order, so faultlessly are they delivered. Signor Gardoni was heard in his often heard "Mandolinata," and Schubert's "Secret," Signor Foli's choice being confined to Rossini's "Sorgete" (Maometto) and a song from Schachner's Israel's Return, which he sang very well indeed. Mr. Leslie conducted and Mr Callcott efficiently acted as accompanist.

HANNOVER.—The King of Prussia will visit this city, on his way to and from the manœuvres to be shortly held in Holstein. A "Festival" performance is to be given in honour of the Royal visit, as the Stadttheater, and the work selected is a three-act comic opera, entitled Die Zieten'schen Husaren, by Herr W. Scholz. The present operatic company is anything but first-rate, so the manager has set out on a voyage of discovery, in the hopes of engaging some artists worthy of appearing before his Majesty of Prussia. The same opera will, also, be performed during the same monarch's approaching visit to Hanover. The composer is, no doubt, delighted at the idea of his work being chosen for performance on both occasions. Whether his Majesty will be equally pleased remains to be seen.

WAIFS.

Mr. E. Falconer has returned to England.

Herr Jules Stockhausen has left London for the Continent.

M. Ambroise Thomas and M. Heugel have returned to Paris.

Miss Adelaide Phillips and Mr. Levy, the cornetist, are in San Francisco.

Signor Muzio has been engaged by M. Bagier as chef d'orchestre of the Italiens in Paris.

An overture by Signor Bottesini has been played at Baden, and is highly spoken of by the critics.

Sir Michael Costa was present both at the general rehearsal and the first performance of Mignon at Drury Lane.

A French paper states that Madame Schneider is going to play Le Petit Faust, during her London engagement (!).

The sum subscribed towards a monument in honour of the late Lefébure-Wély now amounts to 5,877 francs.

The subscription to complete the restoration of Worcester Cathedral has advanced so rapidly that, already, £12,600 of the required £15,000 has been raised.

Mr. Villalonga's company for Spanish Opera, which has arrived at Panama from Mexico and San Francisco, is to play at Panama and in the cities of the South Coast.

M. Oscar Comettant, the distinguished musical critic of the Siècle, who came to London expressly to assist at the first performance of Mignon, has returned to Paris.

Mdlle. Schroeder has been attacked by a pitiable form of illness that too frequently leaves unwelcome notes of its visit. "Detail bon à noter" remarks Le Ménestrel—the frightful malady will leave no trace upon the countenance of the bewitching artist.

Mdlle. Terese Liebe, the young violinist, made a highly favourable début at the Crystal Palace concert last Saturday. She played a movement from De Beriot's first concerto, and exhibited considerable executive power and a fine quality of tone.

Madame Parepa-Rosa and M. Rosa have arrived in London. They left New York on Wednesday, 22nd June, at 2 o'clock, in the Scotia, and arrived at Liverpool on Friday, July 1, at twelve o'clock, making the run in the extraordinary short period of 8 days and 19 hours.

M. Ambroise Thomas, the composer, and M. Heugel, the publisher, of Mignon visited London, to assist at the production of that opera at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane. Both must have been highly gratified. They were accompanied by M. Oscar Commettant, the able and intelligent musical critic of the Siècle.

A grand fête and reception under distinguished patronage was given to M. de Lesseps at the Crystal Palace on Thursday evening, the 7th inst. The entertainments terminated with a magnificent display of fireworks. A moiety of tha net proceeds of the day was set apart by the Crystal Palace Company for the relief of sufferers by the late disastrous fire at Pera.

"Encore" of the "recalls" with which composers are honoured in Italy may be estimated from a report of the first performance of an opera called The Three Musketeers. "At half-past eight o'clock," says the critic of Il Trovatore, there were twenty-nine persons present, including myself. Towards the end a party of friends entered and called the composer four or five times before the curtain.

At the burning of the operahouse at Indianopolis a large audience had assembled, listening to a lecture by Gough. When the fire was discovered, instead of rushing upon the stage and shouting "fire," with the certainty of creating panic and causing loss of lives, the manager went to those nearest the door, and whispered them to go out, and so down the aisles till the building was cleared.

Watson's Art Journal contains the following amusing criticism on a Miss Goldsticker:—

"Miss Goldsticker will have to commence her studies over again. We will pass over her Freischütz, for we should be glad to forget it, and simply touch upon her singing of Eckert's 'Echo song,' rendered remarkable by the frantic efforts of Anschütz to hold the young lady somewhere near the pitch. The voice and the piano echoed each other; but alas! the echoes never agreed. No matter how Carl Anschütz pounded the piano, the echo came sharper and sharper, until the ear was literally agonized with the horrors of false intonation. We can imagine the suffering of the maestro; but he endured it with wonderful stoicism, and when a discerning and refined audience insisted upon an encore (they would have applauded a saw-grinder) he actually repeated those wonderful echoes which never agreed, voluntarily enduring and generously inflicting the keenest of that cruel auricular torture over again."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Howard Paul arrived in London on Saturday, after an extended tour in America. He was one of the projectors of the Beethoven Festival in New York, at which 65,000 persons were present—from the 13th to 16th of June. The gross receipts at these concerts reached 102,000 dollars. Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul returned to England to fulfil engagements at Scarborough, Brighton, and other watering-places during the summer.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT.—We learn that Mr. German Reed, in compliance with numerous requests, will give a few representations of the favourite entertainment, Ages Ago, in an abridged form, commencing on Monday next, July 11. A new musical sketch, by Mr. Corney Grain, and Mr. Momus will follow. This will make an excellent night's amusement, not too long. Ages Ago will conclude with the well-known picture scene.

We take the subject from a notice of a concert in Watson's Art Journal:—

"Towards the close of the programme a very handsome compliment was paid to the press proper by one of the managers of those concerts, for the generous way in which its members behaved towards the enterprise ; while the conduct of some reporters, who happen now and again to stumble into a musical atmosphere which they taint alike with their ignorance and presence, was roughly handled."

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—The Report of the Executive Committee, presented to the members at the 71st quarterly meeting, on the 5th inst., states that the receipts for the midsummer quarter were £36,693 14s. 3d., and the grand totals to the same period £1,546,666 8s. 2d. The £50 shares issued for the quarter were 618, making the total number of shares issued to midsummer, 1870, 34,274, a subscribed capital of £1,713,700 —the withdrawals amounting to £389,029 1s. 7d. The Reserve Fund amounted to £10,500, exclusive of office premises, furniture account, &c. The report added that the society's members had invested largely in the shares of the United Land Company Limited, estates purchased by which supplied the society with a large building advance business. As an illustration of the habits of saving by the members the report referred to the re-investment of their interest warrants, the amounts of which were added to their shares. The report was approved, and the usual vote of thanks passed to the Directors. The directors present were Viscount Ranelagh (chairman), Col. Brownlow Knox, Hon. and Rev. W. Talbot, Hon. R. Burke, M.P., Col. Jervis, M.P., Mr. Goodson, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Newcomen, Mr. Strode, Mr. Winstanley, Mr. C. L. Grumeisen (secretary), &c.

It may be interesting to give an account of the new Communion table in Henry VII.'s Chapel. The original altar at the head of Henry VII.'s tomb was the work of Torrigiano, and was intended, no doubt, by Henry VIII. to magnify his father's memory, placing it as nearly as possible on a level with that of the Confessor in the Chapel of the Plantageneta. Underneath this altar was afterwards buried Edward VI., probably by order of his sister Mary, to soothe her feeling with regard to the difficulty of the Protestant Service with which he was interred. This altar was totally destroyed, doubtless on account of its elaborate imagery, in the civil war—the only regal monument thus swept away by the Puritans being, by a singular paradox, that which stood over the grave of our only Puritan King. It was not till the spring of last year that the researches in the Regal vaults disclosed in the grave of Edward VI., lying across his coffin, a fragment of the frieze of his ancient marble altar. It was then determined to erect in the place of the temporary Communion table in Henry VII.'s Chapel one more worthy of the place, which should preserve this fragment of the ancient altar. The history of the new table is given in the inscription which runs round it (in the style of that which runs round the tomb of Henry VII.):—

Pro antiquo altari inter civilia odia vi diruto
In honorem Dei at in piam memoriam Edwardi Sexti Regis infra sepulti
Hanc sacram mensam in ultieri seculo
Instaurandam curavit Arthurus P. Stanley, S. T. P., Decanus Westmonast.
MDCCLXX.

This new Communion table, is of carved cedar wood, covered with a black marble slab, on which is placed the frieze of the ancient altar, and in which also are incorporated fragments of three other ruined altars —one of the high altar of Canterbury, burnt in the fire of 1174, of which it still bears the traces ; the second of the altar of the Greek Church at Damascus, which was destroyed in the troubles of 1860, when the Christian population crowded round it ; the third, of an Abyssinian altar, taken in 1868 from the ruins of Magdala.

The Liverpool Mail gives a very interesting account "communicated by a layman" of some proceedings in which the Dean of Chester (Dr Howson) took part, in the ruins of an old Roman Catholic Abbey near Llangollen. On Tuesday last the members of the Chester Cathedral Volunteer Choir, which has contributed to much of the success of the Sunday evening services in the nave, made an excursion to the lovely Vale of Llangollen. The programme of the day included a lecture by Dean Howson on the River Dee, and a geological ramble under the guidance of Canon Kingsley. But the grand interest of the day culminated in the visit or pilgrimage to Val Crucis Abbey, one of the most exquisite relics of monastic times. A short Office had been compiled for the occasion, and at 5.30 the entire party, numbering between two and three hundred, assembled within the sacred walls of this stately ruin. After a short interval for the inspection of its architectural beauties and graceful dilapidations, the choir was duly arranged on the decani and cantoris sides of the rood-lea chancel, the Very Rev. the Dean and the Rev. Precentor Dickle respectively, the latter being surpliced. Against the east wall a cross of evergreens and flowers indicated the position formerly occupied by the high altar. As the congregation instinctively fell upon their knees on the green sod, amid the graves of the good Cistercians, and surrounded by the memorials of their magnificent sanctuary, the scene was indescribably touching.

M. Fechter has closed an engagement at the French Theatre that would have been peculiarly successful, as it was artistically, if he had not been (says the New York Figaro) under engagement to one of the most unpopular men in New York—Eelman, the ticket-speculator, who has damped the enthusiasm and destroyed the delight of our theatre-goers by procuring exorbitant prices for seats at various places of amusement, especially at Maretzek's. "Shent per shent " "old c'o," opera shows at the catacombs. Such a man even if he does acquire a fortune cannot acquire the esteem of the public. Hence M. Fechter's season has been a financial fa ilure.

VIENNA.—Rienzi is to be produced next season at the Imperial Opera-house.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

NOVELLO, EWER, & Co.—The "Organist's Quarterly Journal" for July, edited by William Spark, Mus. Doc.

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.—"Links of a Broken Chain," song, by F. E. Neufeld ; "Those Happy Dreams," ballad, by Arthur Fox. "The Rejected Flower," song, by Dewdrop ; "The Reason Why," song, by L. M. Watts.

LAMBORN COCK & Co.—Two songs composed for and sung by Miss Annie Penman, of Newcastle-on-Tyne. Poetry by Elma F. Morris ; music by Charles Henry Shepherd.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
OF
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London : DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.
And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century ; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

A STRINGENT LOZENGES OF THE RED GUM OF AUSTRALIA.—For Relaxed Throat, in Bottles, 2s.
MURIATE OF AMMONIA LOZENGES, in Bottles, 2s. Useful for Bronchitis, by loosening the phlegm and preventing violent fits of coughing.
P. & F. W. SQUIRE, Chemists on the Establishment in Ordinary to the Queen (Gazetted August 8th, 1837—December 31st, 1867) 277, Oxford Street, London.

Just Published,
TARANTELLE,
POUR LE PIANOFORTE.
Par PAUL SEMLER.
Prix 3s.
London : DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,
"MY COTTAGE HOME."
BALLAD.
The Words by the Rev. W. NORVAL, M.A.
The Music by A. M'CARROLL.
London : DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Puritani (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il folletto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Mergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Bloom is on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Ece di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Une Perle (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie)	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torne (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Pardei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Tornèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuoi da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valzer). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Mergellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably." — Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

CAMPANA'S

NEW OPERA,

ESMERALDA,

PERFORMED AT

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

WITH IMMENSE SUCCESS.

All the favourite Songs, Duets, Trios, &c., sung by Mdlles. Patti, Scalchi, Signors Graziani and Naudin, are now published.

	s.	d.
ALSO,
The Full Score - - - -	25	0
All the Favourite Airs, by F. Nava	5	0
W. S. Rockstro's Gipsy Rondo -	4	0
" " Bolero - - -	4	0
" " Brindisi - -	4	0
" " Grand Fantasia -	5	0
Kuhe's Grand Fantasia - - -	4	0
Brinley Richards' Bolero - - -	3	6
Goodban's Fantasia - - -	3	6
Rimbault's Gems of "Esmeralda," easily arranged - - - each	2	0

No. 1. The Bolero. | No. 3. The Quartet.
" 2. The Brindisi. | " 4. The Grand Duet.

Dan Godfrey's Esmeralda Galop -	3	0

A QUADRILLE AND WALTZ
By DAN GODFREY are in the press.

CHAPPELL & CO.,
50, New Bond Street, London.

GREAT SUCCESS OF THE NEW OPERA.

AS PERFORMED AT THE

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE,

"MIGNON,"

OPERA, IN THREE ACTS,

BY

AMBROISE THOMAS.

PIANOFORTE SOLOS.		s.	d.
G. BIZET	The Opera complete	10	0
Ditto	Overture	6	0
Ditto	Six transcriptions.....each 4s. to	6	0
AUG. BAZILLE	Entr'acte-gavotte	5	0
ALFRED HENRY	Valse sentimentale	7	6
L. L. DELAHAYE	Souvenirs-transcriptions	6	0
H. ROSELLEN	Polonaise	6	0
W. KRUGER	Fantaisie-transcription	7	6
CH. B. LYSBERG	Fantaisie variée	7	6
CH. NEUSTEDT	Fantaisie-transcription	6	0
E. KETTERER	Fantaisie variée	7	6
Ditto	Romance et duo des Hirondelles	7	6
D. KRUG	Grande fantaisie	7	6
J. CH. HESS	Styrienne de Mignon	5	0
TH. OESTEN	Fantaisie élégante	6	0
O. TREDRE	Romance de Mignon	7	6

EASY PIANOFORTE SOLOS.
S. CRAMER	Bouquet de mélodies, 2 suites.....each	7	0
J. L. BATTMANN	Petite fantaisie	5	0
A. GODARD	3 petites transcriptions .....each	3	0
H. VALIQUET	2 petites fantaisies .....each	5	0
A. CROISEZ	Fantaisie facile (Styrienne)	6	0
D. KRUG	Petite fantaisie	6	0

DANCE MUSIC.
STRAUSS	1er Quadrille à 2 et 4 mains	4	6
Ditto	Grande valse	4	6
Ditto	Polka	4	6
ARBAN	2e Quadrille	4	6
A. MEY	3e Quadrille	4	6
OLIVIER METRA	Suite de Valses	6	0
EM. DESGRANGES	Polka des Hirondelles	4	6
F. ZIKOFF	Mignon Polka (entr'acte)	4	6

PIANOFORTE DUETS.
AMBROISE THOMAS.	Overture	7	6
PAUL BERNARD	Deux suites concertantes.....each	9	0
G. W. MARKS	Pot-Pourri	7	6
AUG. BAZILLE	Entr'acte gavotte	6	0
J. RUMMEL	Deux Mosaïques .....each	7	6
O. METRA	Valse de Mignon	7	6

ALSO,

AMBROISE THOMAS.	The Opera of Mignon complete, with Italian and French words	20	0

And all the Songs, Duets, &c., separately, with Italian or French words.

Editions de MM. HEUGEL & CIE., Paris.

LONDON:

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.,
244, REGENT STREET, W.

Digitized by Google

"MIGNON,"

OPERA IN THREE ACTS,

BY

AMBROISE THOMAS.

As sung at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, by Mlles. NILSSON, VOLPINI, TREBELLI, and MM. FAURE, BETTINI, and GASSIER.

THE OPERA COMPLETE, FOR VOICE AND PIANO, WITH ITALIAN AND FRENCH WORDS, 20s.

ATTO I.

No. 1. Stanse (per Basso). Price 3s.

No. 2. Aria (per Tenore). Price 6s.

No. 2 bis. Lo Stesso (per Baritono). Price 6s.

No. 3. (Romanza di Mignon (per Mezzo-Soprano). Price 5s.

No. 3 bis. La Stessa (per Soprano o Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 3 ter. La Stessa (per Contralto o Baritono). Price 5s.

No. 4. Duetto dei Rondinelle. Price 5s.

No. 4 bis. Lo Stesso (per Soprano o Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 4 ter. Lo Stesso (per Contralto o Baritono). Price 5s.

No. 5. Trio. Price 5s.

No. 6. Strofe (per Soprano) Price 5s.

ATTO II.

Intermezzo. Gavotta per Piano Solo Price 4s. 6d.

No. 7. Madrigale (per Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 7 bis. Lo Stesso (per Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 8. Duetto (per Soprano e Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 9 Valsa del duetto. Price 6s.

No. 9 bis La Stessa (per Mezzo-Soprano). Price 6s.

No. 10 Stiriana (per Mezzo-Soprano). Price 5s.

No. 10 bis. La Stessa (per Contralto o Soprano) con Variante. Price 5s.

No. 10 ter.

No. 10 quater. Stiriana Rondo. Price 6s.

Cantata dalla Signora Christina NILSSON.

Aria o Gavotta eseguite a Londra dalle Signore VOLPINI e TREBELLI-BETTINI.

Aria (Filina) . . Signora VOLPINI. Price 6s.

No. 11. Melodia (per Tenore). Price 5s.

Ad - - dio Mig - non - - - - -

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

Vol. 48.—No. 29. SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1870. Price { 6d. Unstamped. 6d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY.—Combined Attractions.—GRAND SUMMER CONCERT and FASHIONABLE PROMENADE. MAGNIFICENT DISPLAY of FIREWORKS, and GRAND ILLUMINATION of FOUNTAINS. Military Bands, Athletic Sports on the Great Ground, &c. Artists in Concert—Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, Madame Sinico, Madame Gye-Gotti-Bettini, Signor Gardoni, Castelli, and M. Faure. Full Saturday Band and Crystal Palace Choir. Conductor—Mr. Manns.

The Firework display, by Mr. C. T. Brock, the Company's Pyrotechnist, whose recent displays have given such satisfaction, will include the great Egyptian Salute, immense cataract of fire, and other chief features of recent display.

Band of the Coldstream Guards (Mr. F. Godfrey), &c.

Admission, 5s., or by Guinea Season Tickets. Stalls for concert should be secured at once.

NOTE.—Concert, 3.30; Athletic Sports on Cricket Ground from 3.30 till 7.0; Rockhills Garden open from 4.30 till 8; Coldstream Guards' Band for promenade on terrace, 7 till 8.30; Fireworks at 9; Palace lighted up after Fireworks until 10.30.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

PROSPECTIVE ARRANGEMENTS.

THE SEASON WILL TERMINATE ON SATURDAY, JULY 30.

Last appearance but five of Mdlle. CHRISTINE NILSSON, previous to her departure for America.

THIS EVENING, "LA SONNAMBULA." Elvino, Signor Mongini; Il Conte Rodolfo, Signor Foli; Alfredo, Signor Zoboli; Un Notaro, Signor Archisti; Teresa, Madame Corsi; Lisa, Mdlle. Vitali; and Amina, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska. Conductor, Signor Arditi.

MONDAY, July 18, Rossini's Opera, "OTELLO." Otello, Signor Mongini; Rodorigo, Signor Gardoni; Iago, M. Faure; Elmiro, Signor Foli; Emelia, Mdlle. Carli; and Desdemona, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

TUESDAY, July 19, "IL TROVATORE." Manrico, Signor Mongini; Il Conte di Luna, Mr. Santley; Ferrando, Signor Rinaldini; Ruiz, Signor Archisti; Un Zingaro, Signor Trevers; Inez, Madame Corsi, Azucena, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Leonora, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.

WEDNESDAY, July 20, a Morning Performance, when will be given Gounod's Opera, "FAUST." Faust, Signor Peretti (his first appearance); Mephistopheles, M. Faure; Valentine, Mr. Santley; Siebel, Madame Trebelli-Bettini; and Marguerite, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

THURSDAY, July 21, Meyerbeer's Opera, "ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO." Roberto, Signor Mongini; Raimbaldo, Signor Rinaldini; Bertramo, Signor Foli; Alberti, Signor Ragney; Cavalieri, Signor Archisti; Signor Castelli, Signor Zoboli, Signor Trevers; Elena, Mdlle. Fay; Isabella, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; and Alice, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

ON SATURDAY, July 23, will be produced (first time in England) Wagner's Opera, "I LANDESE DANNATO" ("Der Fliegende Holländer"). L'Olandese, Mr. Santley; Erik, Signor Peretti; Daland, Signor Foli; Il Timoniere, Signor Rinaldini; Maria, Madame Corsi; and Senta, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.

Acting Manager . . . . . MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

SATURDAY NEXT.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Instituted 1822.—Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1830.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CHRISTIAN,
HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

President—THE EARL OF DUDLEY.
Principal—PROFESSOR W. STERNDALE BENNETT.

The PUBLIC CONCERT of the Institution will take place at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, HANOVER SQUARE, on SATURDAY the 23rd inst. commencing at Two o'clock.

There will be a complete Orchestra and Chorus, formed by the Professors and the late and present Students of the Academy.

Conductor—MR. JOHN HULLAH.

Single tickets, 5s.; family tickets, to admit four persons, 16s.; to be had of the Musicsellers; at the Hanover Square Rooms; and at the Academy, 4 Tenterden Street Hanover Square. By Order, JOHN GILL, Secretary.

THE ANEMOIC UNION (under the direction of Mr. LAZARUS) consists of the following eminent instrumentalists from the Opera Orchestras, Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies, &c.:—Flute, Mr. Henry Nicholson; Oboe, M. Barret; Clarionet, Mr. Lazarus; Horn, Mr. T. E. Mann; Bassoon, Mr. J. Hutchins; and Pianoforte, Mr. W. Shakspeare, R.A.M. Vocalist, Madame Thaddeus Wells. Mr. Lazarus begs to inform Secretaries of Musical Societies, Literary and Scientific Institutions, Directors of Orchestral Concerts, Concert Agents, &c., that the Fourth Annual Tour of the Anemoic Union will commence in September, 1870. Complete Programmes can be given, or Mr. Lazarus will be happy to offer the services of the Anemoic Union to assist in full Orchestral Performances, or in Chamber Concertal Music. Terms for one or more Concerts may be known on application to MR. HENRY NICHOLSON, 19, Halford Street, Leicester.

UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE.

HERR FERDINAND LUDWIG'S MORNING CONCERT, FRIDAY, July 15th, 1870, will take place at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, to commence at Three o'clock. Artists—Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mdme. Alice Fairman (Contralto), and Mdlle. Liebhart; Mr. Lewis Thomas and Mr. Vernon Rigby; Herr Daubert, Herr Ludwig, and Mr. Frederick Chatterton. Messrs. Broadwood's Grand Pianoforte will be used. Ticket—Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Seats, 5s. 6d. To be had at Herr F. Ludwig's Residence, 1, Albert Street, Regent's Park, N.W.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL, AUGUST 23rd, 24th, 25th, and 26th, 1870. Mdlle. Tietjens, Miss Edith Wynne, and Madame Sinico; Madame Patey and Miss Thirlwall Severn; Mr. Vernon Rigby and Mr. Montem Smith; Mr. Lewis Thomas and Mr. Santley. Conductor—Mr. TOWNSHEND HAYES.

MISS ROSE HERSEE.

MISS ROSE HERSEE begs to announce her RETURN to England, but that she will be unable to accept any Concert Engagements during her stay. She will return to America at the beginning of September, to fulfil an eight months' engagement as Prima Donna Assoluta of the English Opera Company, and cannot now take any European engagement earlier than June, 1871. 39, Fitzroy Square, W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. EMANUEL'S new song, "THE CHARM," at his principal Engagements. Address for Concerts, Oratorios, &c., 28, Old Road Street.

TO TUNERS.

WANTED, a First Class HARMONIUM TUNER and REGULATOR, one who has a knowledge of Pianoforte Tuning preferred. Apply to Cramer, Wood, & Co., Dublin.

MISS ANNA JONES (Associate of the London Academy of Music) is open to Engagements for Concerts. Address, 4, Mortimer Street, Regent Street.

MISS FANNY CHATFIELD (Mezzo-Soprano), from the Conservatoire, Cologne, is open to Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, Fairlawn House, Forest Hill, S.E.

HARMONIUM FOR SALE.

HARMONIUM to be SOLD, a Bargain, splendid instrument by Alexandre, two rows of keys, 22 Stops, Rosewood Case, cost £95. Suitable for a large school, Chapel, or Professional Gentleman.—92, Chalk Farm Road, Haverstock Hill, N.W.

MUSIC PRACTICE FOR SALE.

A SUCCESSOR is wanted by a Gentleman. Income between £400 and £500 per annum, in one of the principal towns in Scotland. A good musician would be certain to succeed. For further particulars address "Music," care of J. Purdie, 83, Princes Street, Edinburgh.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

MISS ANNA JONES will sing SCHIRA'S "DO NOT WAKE ME FROM MY DREAM," at Rhyl, August 9th.

MR. WALTER REEVES will sing "WAKE, LINDA, WAKE," WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S popular serenade, at the Store Street Concert Hall, THIS DAY (Mr. Lansdowne Cottell's Concert).

MISS FRITH (R. A. M.) will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S waltz aria, "THE NAIADES," and the romance, "A SUMMER EVE," during her engagement at Harrogate, commencing next Monday, under the direction of Mr. Julian Adams.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC. (Average number of Students 100.) Concerts Fortnightly, Town and Country.—Inclusive Fees.—Candidates for the Free Scholarships must attend the Academy Saturdays, from Twelve to Seven, and in return for Lessons, will have to perform in Public when required. Further particulars, and opinions of the Press, may be had of C. WEBER, Sec., Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ADDRESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

Just Published,

THREE SHORT PIECES for the ORGAN. Set 3.
By EDWARD J. HOPKINS. Reduced price, 1s. 6d.
THREE CHANTS TE DEUMS, in A, A, and G, with explanatory preface. Price 3d. each.
BENEDICTUS in A, in simple chant form, for voices in unison, with a varied instrumental accompaniment. Price 1½d.
METZLER & Co., 37, Great Marlborough Street.

"FAR AWAY." Song. 4s. By Miss M. LINDSAY (Mrs. J. W. Bliss). "There is great beauty in this melody."—Vide Standard. "The melody is so sweet and plaintive."—Vide Brighton Gazette. The same for Pianoforte, by Carl Leist, 3s. Free by post half-price. London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street. May be had everywhere.

NEW SONG BY

MADAME LA BARONNE W. DE ROTHSCHILD.

"DANZIAM,"

(Danzons—Valse Chantée.)

Composée pour MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON,

PAR

Madame la Baronne W. de ROTHSCHILD.

Price 4s.

(Edition de Heugel & Cie., Paris.)

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

In the Press, to appear immediately, Nos. 3, 4, and 5, of "REVIVALS," consisting of:—

No. 3. SONATA, in C Major.
„ 4. SONATA, in E Minor.
„ 5. SONATA, in E Flat Major.

BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

(Never before Published.)

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

Just Published,

"OLGA,"

PENSÉE POUR PIANO.

PAR

LOUIS DIEHL.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD.

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"LITTLE WILLIE."

"LITTLE WILLIE." By JULES BENEDICT. Sung with distinguished success by

MISS EDITH WYNNE,

at Mr. Benedict's Concert, published, price 3s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG,

DEDICATED TO MDLLE. NILSSON.

"I LOVE AND I AM LOV'D"

("J'aime, je suis aimé").

PUBLISHED IN A, C, AND D.

Sung with distinguished success in Paris and London. Also transcribed for the Piano

E. L. H I M E.

Each sent for 24 stamps.

DUFF & STEWART, 147, Oxford Street,

"The charming singing of the composer himself—Herr Reichardt—and of M. Jules Lefort, has already won for this romantic song a considerable reputation. The style is such as we look for from the author of 'Thou art so near, and yet so far,' and is equally happy with that widely known and favourite ditty. No great compass is required—only from D below to E fourth space—and Herr Reichardt's newest song is conceived in so truly vocal a spirit, and is so effective in performance, that we have no hesitation in commending it to our readers—soprano or tenor. A word for Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, whose translation, free though it be, from the original French of M. Arnould, is a thing to be remembered. Nothing in its way more elegant, more refined, more truly poetical, has been seen for many a day, and the manner in which the spirit, if not the letter of the French is preserved is equally admirable."—The Queen.

Just Published,

"THE REASON WHY,"

SONG.

The Words by Mrs. C. A. DOUBBLE.

The Music by L. M. WATTS.

(Composer of "Home of my Heart," song, price 3s.)

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

A LETTER OF FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

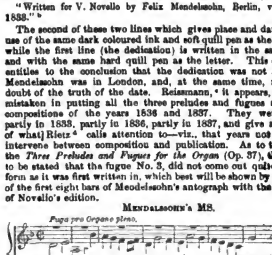
By Frederick Thomae, Ph. D.

(Continued from page 457.)

This chronological excursion will kindly be excused, so much the more as no reference to the composition spoken of is made in the published letters of Mendelssohn. Rietz. has specified [a] the Three Preludes for the Organ (Op. 37), and the Fugue for the Organ (Op. 37, No. 1), both of them composed at Spire (Speyer), the Palatinate, Bavaria, amongst Mendelssohn's compositions of the year 1837, and the Fugue for the Organ in G major (Op. 37, No. 2), written at Leipsic, amongst those of 1836. But one will in vain look for the Fugue No. 3. There is no doubt that Rietz was not aware what had become of the autograph notes, although he does not expressly mention it, in the preface, amongst the published compositions omitted in his Catalogue; what was done in the autograph MSS. by which Mendelssohn was in the habit of recording both date and place of composition is wanting. I am glad, therefore, to be able, on this occasion, to give a supplement to his Catalogue, which by the thorough accuracy, reliability, and neatness in which it was elaborated, would do honour to any librarian—namely, just after the notes, Mendelssohn has recorded (fol. 24*a*):—

"Written for V. Novello by Felix Mendelssohn, Berlin, v. 29 Mrtz, 1838." [b]

The second of these two lines which gives place and date, shows the use of the same dark coloured ink and soft quill pen as the composition, while the first line (the dedication) is written in the same pale ink and with the same hard quill pen as the letter. This circumstance entitles to the conclusion that the dedication was not added before Mendelssohn was in London, and, at the same time, removes any doubt of the truth of the date. Reissmann, [c] it appears, is straightly mistaken in putting all the three preludes and fugues amongst the compositions of the years 1836 and 1837. They were composed partly in 1833, partly in 1836, partly in 1837, and give another proof of what Rietz [d] calls attention to—viz., that years not unfrequently intervene between composition and publication. As to the history of the Three Preludes and Fugues for the Organ (Op. 37), there remains to be stated that the fugue No. 3, did not come out quite in the same form as it was first written in, which best will be shown by a comparison of the first eight bars of Mendelssohn's autograph with the first six bars of Novello's edition.



In the second form we have, evidently, to deal with nothing but a rewriting of the first, based, very likely, on a copy taken for the purpose of remodelling.

Like as the wind strips off the leaves of the trees, Time is taking away generations of man; and if we look round, where are at present the millions who, in 1833, struggled for life, or whom curiosity brought together in the Metropolis? Most of them who, just passing the meridian of their years, stood in the full vigour of their life and on the top of their glory, have departed in peace a long time to rest from their labours and laurels, and for those who flourished in the very spring of youth, winter has come to cover their temples with the snow of age. This, our essay, will have given an example how it is, already at present, not quite without difficulty, in all its references, to understand a plain letter written thirty or forty years ago; and we must be glad if the trouble spent in following the traces leads to any result at all. Thankfully, therefore, we have to renew the memory of Vincent Novello, who took care for the preservation of a remarkable document of past times. It is but gratifying to record his right understanding how little safe treasures of that kind are in private possession, and his liberal readiness, not daily, I dare say, to be met with, in committing a valuable collection of autograph manuscripts to a public library, where they are preserved, as far as it stands in human power, both from being lost or destroyed by accident, and most readily accessible to all who have an interest in them. To be worried about are the inhabitants of this country, who, in the British Museum, are possessed of a place which does not let them doubt for a moment where to deposit the fragile products of the past, which they want safely to be brought to the future; and as the Englishman is right in being proud of the British Museum, unanimously considered the most splendid collection of monuments both of art and literature of most different people and ages, united in the most splendid buildings ever, perhaps, erected for that purpose, so it will still be an object of admiration for the foreigner. Still, ever as large as the collections may be, any addition, even the smallest will be a welcome one, and assure a place in the records of the great national institution to the name of the giver; moreover, if it happens to be a somewhat larger gift, worth forming a separate volume, then, O gentle reader of this same gift, in golden letters, be printed on the red Russian leather back, and the friendly beams of the sun falling upon them, will shine far through the silent halls. If all disciples and amateurs of learning are called to gather up the fragments that remain, by thy goodness the knowledge of a certain part of the life of a great and noble man cannot die; it can only fall into a sleep, and though it may be a hundred years' sleep (like that of Briar Rose, the fair King's daughter), be sure, once upon a day, a lucky prince will be chosen to penetrate the thorny hedge of historical research to wake his bride out of her long slumber; may he even appear in the simple habit of an English schoolmaster, who in charge of opening to the dear boys the secrets of the Latin Grammar, and showing them the way through the labyrinths of the Greek, retires for the leisure of his holidays to the sublime solitude and noble comfort of the Reading-Room of the British Museum. The lucky prince having appeared, the thorns will turn into fine unfading flowers, and he will, under express thankful mention of thy liberality, gather them into an odorous nosegay, smelling out of an article in the Musical World.

[a] P. 510.

[b] i.e.—Berlin, the 29th March, 1833.

[c] August Reissmann, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. [Berlin, 1867], p. 220.

[d] Preface, p. 501.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Students' Concert on Thursday evening, June 30th, was attended by so large an audience that it was impossible to obtain admittance into the concert-room "proper;" so we must satisfy the curiosity of our readers in an unsatisfactory manner, by merely transcribing the programme:—

Pianoforte Duet (in E flat), No. 3, Op. 14 (Clementi); Miss Smith and Miss Hemmings. This duet was performed by J. B. Cramer and Moscheles, at the complimentary dinner given to the author by the musical profession, at the Albion Tavern, 17th of December, 1827. Glee, "Though he be now a grey, grey Friar" (Bishop); Miss Goode, Miss Palmer, Mr. Shakespeare, Mr. Thwaites, and Mr. Parry. Allegro con Fuoco (from Sonata in D minor) for the Pianoforte (Weber); Miss Mayo. Liederkreis (a circle of songs) (Beethoven); Mr. Shakespeare. Prelude and Fugue (in C sharp minor), and Prelude and Fugue (in C sharp major), for the Pianoforte (J. S. Bach); Miss Burleigh. Aria, "Batti, batti," Don Giovanni (Mozart); Miss Penn—Violoncello obbligato, Mr. Aylward. Trio (in E), Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello (Mozart); Miss Waite, Mr. Morley, and Mr. Aylward. Song, "The Garland" (Mendelssohn); Mr. Howells. Rondo (in D), Pianoforte (Mozart); Miss Turner. Clavier-Musik a due Macuali, Aria, con variazioni, for the Harpsichord (J. S. Bach); Mr. Docker. This Harpsichord, lent and prepared for the occasion by Messrs. Kirkman & Son, was made by Joseph Kirckman in 1798. It has been entirely renovated, produces 22 different effects or changes, and is one of the last Harpsichords made after the introduction of the Pianoforte. Song, "Alone" (Lady Thompson); Miss Ferrari, accompanied by the composer. Sonata in C minor (MS.), (first two movements), for Pianoforte and Violin (Cook, student); Mr. Cook and Mr. Morley. Trio, "Le Faccie un Inchino," Matrimonio Segreto (Cimarosa); Miss Goode, Miss Rebecca Jewell, and Miss Marion Severn. Ronde pierrotle, Pianoforte (W. S. Bennett); Miss Moultrie. Madrigal, "O that the learned poets" (Orlando Gibbons, 1602).

The accompanists of the vocal music at the pianoforte were Mr. Kemp, Mr. Wingham, and Lady Thompson, the accomplished composer of the song, "Alone," who honoured Miss Ferrari with her valuable co-operation.

The annual public concert of the students is announced to take place at the end of the present month at the Hanover Square Rooms, when several old members of the Academy will lend their aid.

Digitized by Google

THE LATE MR. MARK LEMON.

From the birthday of Punch Mr. Mark Lemon was the chief of the staff of writers and artists who have been shooting folly on the wing and wounding with "the wasp's edge of the epigram" every public abuse —or social error—during nearly thirty years. If the lip of a wit be warfare upon earth, how must he have been tried, who, during so many years, has been called upon to hold the balance even among groups of rival wits? If there were nothing to add to Mr. Mark Lemon's account with the periodical literature of his time beyond his deserts as the hearty, amiable, and honest director of a turbulent set of intellects, he would have a strong claim on the grateful remembrance of his generation. To his nice discrimination and his instinctive abhorrence of extremes in opinion and expression, the famous journal of which he was editor from the beginning owes the services of men much more brilliant than he ever pretended to be; men so very much of the popularity which has marked the thirty years of its existence.

The qualities that enabled Mr. Mark Lemon to maintain his place at the head of the Punch table, in the presence of Thackeray and Douglas Jerrold, are to be found by a conscientious review of the varieties of literary work which he did apart from Punch. It is said that Mr. Lemon wrote sixty pieces. Undoubtedly he was a prolific writer for the stage, and the best of his sympathies were given to the boards. He was an excellent actor, as well as an artful and effective dramatist. He had sympathies so quick and warm that a sad event, a misfortune, or the sight of pain or emotion brought the tears welling to his eyes as quickly as they spring to the lashes of a girl in her teens. Hence, his dramas are strongest where they depend on emotion. The play of his humour was mild, but it was ever gracious and funny. In short, there is in all his dramatic doings the atmosphere of a happy nature. The man was as genial as the dramatist; so that when he turned from the stage, and wrote for children, or for the holyday-makers in the Illustrated London News, he was sure to please. There was a smile upon his page. He seldom made you laugh; but he put you on good terms with the world and the writer and yourself.

The natural inclination of Mr. Mark Lemon was not towards comic literature. He had fun in him; his was a generous and a laughing lip; but there was a fine warm fibre underlying all, and holding the man together. It was by this element in him that he succeeded in holding satirists and humorists and caricaturists together. Appointed navigator in troubled waters, he poured out the oil of his gentle nature without stint. His approach brought many weather; his voice was balm to the angry; he loved the quiet, orderly, becoming way.

The incidents of Mr. Lemon's life were few. He was born in 1809, we are told, in the neighbourhood of Oxford Street, and in the middle rank of life. His bent was early cast among theatrical people, and his impulses were towards the stage. That the boyish fancy never wholly ceased to operate in him is proved by the zest with which he joined Mr. Charles Dickens's amateur troupe in later life; and by his recent impersonation of Kolstaff. Humour with an indulging tenderness was his instinctive quality; and he was a practised, painstaking and discreet performer. He was only thirty-two years of age when he assumed the direction of the most successful satirical and humorous organ of his day. From that time till his death he rejoiced in the even tenour of his life; in the affection of those whom he controlled; and he was never soured because his lieutenants were greater heroes than their captain. Mr. Lemon had been in feeble health for some time past, but there appeared no cause to fear an immediate end to his life. His mind was busy within a few days of his death, and he died peacefully in the midst of his family, of whom he was deservedly the idol.

The writer of sixty dramatic pieces, of a hundred songs, of scores of pleasant essays and stories, may be forgotten not many years hence; but by the help of all these disjecta membra some literary historian may, in future, raise up a figure of a true, bright, and happy worker, under whose benignant eyes something new and valuable in journalism was produced, in the middle of the nineteenth century.

MUSIC IN RACE.

Mr. Henry F. Chorley read a paper some time since, with this quaint title, before the Anthropological Society of London. We are indebted to our able contemporary the Choir, for the subjoined condensed report of what Mr. Chorley had to say on the subject:—

"He began his remarks by apologizing for having made the attempt to deal with so vast a subject as national music in the limits of a single paper. In a course of lectures at the Royal Institution he had some years ago dealt with the subject at greater length. These lectures he had prepared for publication, but had purposely held them back because of the unsettled condition of some parts of the subject. All he could offer at the present time would be fragments, not completed-work. The difficulty of knowing how much of national music so-called is genuine, was great. His experience convinced him that genuine national music exists in smaller quantities than has been believed. Then how often were airs incorrectly written? Notation, it must be remembered, was a modern art, and could not be accepted without caution. If poets commit errors in writing the ordinary words of their poems, how much more common are mistakes in the multiplicity of signs in musical notation. Of the travellers to whom we are often indebted for the notation of national airs, nearly all are amateurs, and many are ladies. Then as to the ancient pictures of musical instruments, it was a mistake to accept them as correct. Literal truth in art was a thing only recently gained, and this had no doubt been obtained at the expense of imagination. He would not therefore of necessity believe in the pictures of preposterous harps, played by preposterous men, on the walls of Egyptian palaces. While speaking with gratitude to all those who had investigated this subject of national music, he would say that he thought the instruments of the ancients had been too much overlooked. The modification which accent and rate of movement produce in music is very great. Who would suppose that the stirring 'Scots wha hae' and the plaintive 'Land of the leal,' were the same air? The pastoral air from Messiah, 'He shall feed his flock,' was then played, and repeated in double quick time with the accent strongly marked, producing an excellent and pretty dance tune. As to the music of worship, said Mr Chorley, we must distinguish between what is mystical and what is congregational, between what is witnessed and what is partaken of. For himself he had never been moved so deeply by gorgeous ritual music such as he had seen at Cologne or Vienna, as he had been by the simple, unisonous singing of a vast congregation, which came upon the ear like the voice of many waters. Here he would notice that in German oratorios, whenever a psalm tune or chorale occurred in the music, it was the custom of the congregation to lift up their voices and swell the sound of choir and orchestra. But in England these oratorios were turned into mere concert music. After a short reference to the music of the synagogue as the most ancient service music in existence, Mr. Chorley passed on to say that the social conditions and the varying characters of different nations affected their music. For example, France and Italy have in their national music nothing to correspond with the German students' songs, while the madrigal comes from the south. He knew of no more vivid expression of nationality in music than was to be found in the German songs of the table. He had in his time done a good deal in adapting English words to German music, but the result had always been unsatisfactory. This could not be helped. To each, his own. The strong, stirring, muscular songs of the Germans have no equivalent. In the early history of nations, as must be evident to all, music did not keep pace with art and manufacture. Witness the curious productions of Eastern mosaic, when compared with the cacophony, the mere drum music, in which the people delighted. Some of the most beautiful of national airs come from the north—from Russia, Denmark, Norway, &c. The airs of Servia were equally noted for beauty. The music of chimes and bells must by no means be over-looked in the study of national music. Their purpose was no doubt originally to warn, and to collect men in cases of danger. Here he could not but be reminded of Miss Ingelow's poem, 'The high tide in Lincolnshire,' where the summons from the belfry tower was described with so much force and picturesqueness. The music of bells was so free and so changing, that he believed it had suggested many effects in melody. A Norwegian air, evidently intended in such a way, was put in as an example. In the low countries it was the custom of organists to play on the bells, and he had himself tried the art in Holland years ago, but found it to require much more physical strength than he possessed. He had said nothing of the music of our own Islands. He was reminded of the odd story of the man who wrote a book on Iceland, one chapter of which ran as follows:—'Chap. VI. On Snakes in Iceland.—There are no snakes in Iceland.' With British national music the predicament was of a precisely opposite kind. There was so much to be said that he could say now deal with it to any advantage. He might hope, however, at some future time to resume the subject on which he had so imperfectly spoken that night. A vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Chorley for his paper."

SCHULTZ ALIAS PRÆTORIUS.*

Hieronymus Prætorius, whose original name was Schultz, changed it, after the fashion of his time, into the Latin name of Prætorius.† Born at Hamburg in 1560, where his father, Jacob Schultz, was organist at the Church of St. Jacob's, he improved rapidly under his instruction as a performer on the piano and organ, and also in the theory of music. Afterwards he completed his studies at Cologne on the Rhine. At the early age of 20 the office of Cantor was offered to him at Erfurt. In 1580 his father died, and he was then nominated as his successor at St. Jacob's, which appointment he held until his death—the 27th of January, 1629. At a very early period of his life he was already recognized through the whole of Germany as a great performer on the organ; but his fame as a composer spread beyond his native country. From 1699 to 1625 he published motets, Magnificats, and many other works of church music, some of them for twenty parts in counterpoint, which style was at one time admired as the pinnacle of musical art. Schultz's compositions were in such high repute that some of them were performed in the Pope's Chapel at Rome, which city he himself visited. After the performance of one of his compositions a Cardinal exclaimed emphatically, "What a pity that a man of his genius should be a heretic." For the choir of St. Jacob's he wrote a manuscript upon parchment five yards long by one yard wide, being a choral service in the old notation of the monks. In this manuscript he compiled all that was requisite to make it a complete missal, which was the general want at that time. Later it was published by Francis Eliers, and received the name of the Musical Bible. This celebrated work stood in such high estimation that it came into use in every church through the whole of Italy. Gerber, in his Encyclopædia, mentions some of the church music of Schultz, especially some motets dedicated to the Landgrave Maurice of Hesse and the Duchess of Saxony.

* Sketches of Composers and Musical Writers of the Earlier Centuries.—No. III.

† In the 16th century most artists of repute adopted the travailing fashion of Latinizing their names, instead of using their German, French, or English ones. In the 18th and 19th centuries the same mode was in vogue, especially among singers, to turn their names into Italian ones, thinking to receive more favour from the public by the exchange. To give an example of our time, I may mention the celebrated Sisters Crivelli, whose original name was Crowell. They were born at Bielefeld, a small town in Westphalia, where their father, who was a tobacco manufacturer, loved music passionately and was himself a tolerable amateur tenor singer. I believe he never dreamt that his daughters would shew the weakness to alter their name into Italian.

Digitized by Google

DR. FERDINAND RAMLER.

July, 1870.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The operas given since we last referred to the doings at this theatre have been La Sonnambula, Un Ballo in Maschera, La Figlia del Reggimento (followed by Acts II and III of Semiramide), Don Giovanni, and Signor Mario, vice Herr Wachtel, as Don Ottavio—a change of which few would be likely to complain, Fra Diavolo, Dinorah, Hamlet, Le Domino Noir, and I Puritani—all but three of them repetitions. Amateurs of the old school, who remember that until Mr. Lumley introduced his famous "long Thursdays," which combined singing with dancing in almost equal proportions, the nights for Italian opera were two (Tuesdays and Saturdays), may reasonably look with amazement at the present state of things. During one week (the week before last), there were no less than ten performances of Italian opera—six at Covent Garden and four at Drury Lane. If these ten performances were all more or less productive, the conclusion must inevitably be adopted that, from a luxury, Italian opera has become a necessity. However our ministers might tend that way, we are, nevertheless, unable to think so. Necessities are not to be paid for at opera prices, any more than bread and beer are to be paid for as venison and champagne.

The first representation of Un Ballo in Maschera—among Verdi's best, though, from some unaccountable cause, if popularity be synonymous with attractiveness, by which we intend the power of drawing large audiences, by no means his most popular work—is always an agreeable event for the admirers of his music. The distribution of the characters on the present occasion was as strong as the company at the disposal of Messrs. Gye and Mapleson would allow, and the general performance, if not strikingly effective as regards the choral and orchestral accessories, was on the whole up to the average mark. The character of the unhappy Amalia might have been confided to a younger, but hardly to an abler representative than Mdlle. Tietjens, the Amalia in 1860, when Un Ballo in Maschera was first given in this country, during Mr. Mapleson's brief series of performances at the Lyceum Theatre (the part of the amorous Duke Riccardo being then sustained by the late Signor Giuglini—whose place, by the way, has yet to be filled up). Mdlle. Tietjens was admirable throughout, but most especially admirable in the great finale of the opera, where, after a scene with Riccardo, the surprise of the lovers by the conspirators, and the shame and indignation of Renato at discovering how he has unwittingly been made the instrument of shielding an intrigue against his own honour (Act 2). Nothing could be more impressive than her soliloquy when Amalia is about to pluck the magic herb which the sorceress has told her is an antidote to her criminal affection for Riccardo. The duet with Riccardo, too, was all that could be wished. Signor Mario was Riccardo, and we believe that if this accomplished gentleman were to continue singing far another decade he would still remain the ideal representative of the gallant Duke of Naples.* No other singer on the boards can make love as he does, and not one can give so completely as he does the impassioned expression demanded by impassioned musical phrases. The duet in question was a striking example in point, and, above all, the address to Amalia—"Non sai tu che so l'anima mia?" If in other parts of the opera Signor Mario's voice occasionally failed him, we could have pardoned that, and much more, for the duet, and for the quintet of Act 2, "E scherzo od è follia"—where Riccardo treats as a pleasant joke the foreboding of the sorceress. As of old, the quintet, worthy pendant to the quartet of Rigoletto, was unanimously asked for again—a compliment as much due to the incomparable setting of Signor Mario as to the beauty of the music. Mdlle. Vanalni is a fair representative of Oscar, the page, to whose music her high soprano voice is well fitted; Mdlle. Scalchi, as Ulrica, the sorceress, is just what she is in every other part—Mdlle. Scalchi; Signor Graziani's Renato is dramatically as mysterious as ever, his most finished vocal achievement being, as usual, the soliloquy, "E sei tu," with its melodiously lachrymose episode, "O dolcezze perdute!" in which the flute plays so agreeable a part; and Signors Tagliafico and Capponi (Armando and Angri) are once again model conspirators. We have heard the finale to Act 3, where these worthies and their confederates mock at the woes of Renato *—one of Verdi's most ingenious and well-planned concerted pieces—more effectively executed; but the last act—the scene of the masked ball and the assassination of the Duke (in which, as it is to the last act of Auber's Gustave) was as full of animation as on former occasions.

The revival of Auber's sparkling Domino Noir calls for a few remarks. Two years ago, with Madame Lemmens-Sherrington as the heroine, it made but little impression; and now, with Madame Pauline Lucca as the heroine, it scarcely makes more. Considering the remarkable beauty of the music which, to say nothing of its other qualities, is one unceasing stream of tune—tune as piquant and characteristic as it is purely original—this may surprise many, but not those who, knowing what careful preparation a work so full of delicate points requires, know also that without such careful preparation an adequate performance is out of the question. That such preparation has been allowed to the Domino Noir it would be untrue to assert; and we are bound to add that a less satisfactory execution of an opera which, in its school, stands unequalled and alone has rarely been listened to. The last act, with the inimitable "chattering chorus" of nuns, was little better than a burlesque. All the efforts of Signor Vialetti were unequal to the task he had in hand. That Madame Lucca acts the part of Angèle almost to perfection few will be surprised to hear. Here and there, a trifle overbold for the timorous though adventurous young lady who, accompanied by a congenial associate, leaves the convent of which she is about to be made abbess, on the very night before her installation, for the sake of attending a masked ball which a gentleman for whom she has conceived an attachment is expected to attend, the impersonation, as a whole, is nevertheless, admirable—original, diverting, and full of life. On the other hand, the music suites neither the voice of Madame Lucca nor her peculiar style of singing. The other characters are represented by Signor Naudin (Horace), Cotogni (Giulino), Tagliafico (Count Egliori), and Olanyi (Gil Perez); Mdlles. Madigan (Brigida), Bauermeister (Gineinta), and Anese (Ursola)

As Elvira in the Puritani—that often vainly revived opera of Bellini—Madame Adelina Patti has won a new triumph. That she could sing the music to perfection no one ever doubted, any more than that she would give dramatic significance to a part however in itself devoid of significance (which may be said more or less of all the dramatis personæ in the Puritani). Madame Patti does both, and if any artist now living could impart new life to Bellini's last opera it would be this young and gifted lady. The other parts are sustained by Mdlle. Locatelli (Henrietta), Signor Vizzani, the new tenor (Arturo), Signors Bagagliolo, Graziani, Rossi, and Fallar (Riccardo, Giorgio, "Sir Bruno," and Walton. About these Signor Vizzani excepted, there is nothing new to say; but to the Elvira of Madame Patti we hope to return. Enough just now that her reception was throughout enthusiastic.

The operas which have been given this week are the Puritani, second time (Monday); Le Nozze di Figaro (Tuesday); and Don Giovanni with Madame Lucca, for the first time in England, as Zerlina (Thursday). To the Zerlina of Mdlle. Lucca we may return. The opera announced for this evening is Il Barbiere.

The second concert in Floral Hall was quite as crowded and quite as success-ful a- the first. All the leading artists of the company took part in the programme, and the applause was frequent and hearty. Nevertheless there was nothing whatever to call for critical remark, but a single new piece being introduced.

* The Gustavus III. of Auber.

* The Ankastrom of Auber's opera.

Puzzle.

No. 2.

It is a puzzle to me why Madame Vanzini should have been prominently brought before the public when young and inexperienced, and shelved now that her experience has matured her powers, and improved her style. Is it that Tietjens, or Patti, or Lucca, or Sessi object to young artists becoming favourites?—or are managers ever influenced by matters which have nothing to do with professional merit?

2 Provincial Dilettante.

Digitized by Google

MIGNON AT DRURY LANE.

That the opera of Mignon will prove as successful here as it has been for some years in France, its birthplace, in Germany and elsewhere, is more than probable. The story of Mignon is quite as interesting as that of Gretchen, and quite as good for the purpose of music, while the figure of Mignon is as familiar to every one as that of Gretchen, Juliet, or Ophelia. MM. Barbier and Carré cannot fairly be arraigned for taking what was suited to their hands from so celebrated a romance as Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship. It has been a custom with operatic composers, time out of mind, even before Gluck, Piccini, and Sacchini went to the Greek dramatists, and long before Zingarelli took Romeo, and Rossini took Otello, to seek for materials in well-known masterpieces, dramatic or otherwise; and the two long-associated French librettists have thus only done what custom has sanctioned, still sanctions, and is likely to sanction. Moreover, they must be accredited in several instances for exhibiting more than ordinary cleverness. They have not entitled their work Guillaume Meister, and are, therefore not fairly open to a special criticism brought against them—namely, that, in order to make their heroine the conspicuous figure, they have omitted many characters which play important parts in the romance of the German poet. This criticism appears to us unsound. If every character in Wilhelm Meister were introduced into the libretto, and, as a natural corollary, given something to say and act in accordance with the respective significance of each, the libretto itself, without music, would take four long nights to represent, and with music superadded, at least as many again. This would be Wagner out-Wagnered. Instead of a Niebelungen in four parts, a night for each part, we should have a Wilhelm Meister in eight parts, a night for each part. MM. Barbier and Carré knew better. What they wanted was a heroine, engaging in herself, to constitute the central figure of situations and the main cause of incidents out of the judicious arrangement of which a good plot for a lyric drama might be constructed. In Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre—the first part of the greatest of German novels, "philosophical" or "romantic"—they found the heroine, the situations, and the incidents; and we must admit that they have employed them with singular dexterity. Mignon is quite as good an operatic book as Faust (which, by the way, had better have been entitled Margaret); and how Faust has succeeded as an operatic book all the world knows. Those who complain of the desecration of the works of the great masters by the sliders and abettors of dramatic composers point to Milton and Dante as the next threatened, forgetting that, more than a century and a quarter since, Handel made use of Samson Agonistes—not virtually as an oratorio, but as a sacred drama, that might in certain countries, be performed in theatres—and that Dante, in one way or another, has frequently been called into request. But this question has been exhausted long ago. The worst that can justly be said against MM. Barbier and Carré is that instead of letting Mignon die, they let her live, with that object entirely changing the catastrophe. Thus the most touching and pathetic incident of the romance is lost. To have preserved it, however, the French authors must have altogether remodelled their plan and we doubt whether that would have served the purpose in contemplation half as well.

Presuming our operatic readers to be more or less acquainted with the story of Mignon, we refrain from perplexing them to no purpose about explanations of the points in which the French libretto, now converted into Italian by Signor Giuseppe Zaffira, differs from the German romance. Enough that the most striking situations in which Mignon is concerned are, however modified, in a measure preserved. The truth is that Mignon is Mignon, just as Gretchen is Gretchen, under any circumstances. Such powerful and attractive individualities cannot be altogether effaced, any more than the salient features of a Venus by Titian can be altogether destroyed by ever so indifferent a copy. A greatly condensed version of the "argument" as given in the book of the opera, will therefore answer every purpose :—

"Mignon, daughter of noble parents, has, when a child, been stolen from her home by gipsies. Her mother dies of grief; while Lotario, the father, forsakes his home, and roams from place to place in search of his child. For years, Mignon, unconscious of her origin, leads a wandering life with the gipsy tribe, of which her beauty renders her the ornament. The chief Giarno, compels the girl to dance and go through various performances in order to obtain money, threatening her with the stick whenever she refuses. Guglielmo, a young student on his travels, happening to be a spectator of Giarno's ferocity, purchases Mignon from her master. Touched by Guglielmo's kindness, Mignon conceives for him an irrepressible attachment. Guglielmo, unconscious of this affection, falls a prey to the fascinations of Filina, belonging to a troupe of Thespians, on their way to perform at a castle where a fête is to take place. Among the guests invited is Guglielmo. Filina, the object of his admiration, is the idol of the hour, and her success at the castle serves but to increase Guglielmo's fondness. Mignon watches with silent grief the progress of Guglielmo's love, and, unable to endure the jealousy, is about to throw herself into a lake, when a harp, played hylan unseen hand, is heard, and in a moment Lotario appears. Mignon, little dreaming that it is her father who stands before her, flies to the aged minstrel and implores his counsel. Carried away by her emotion, she prays that vengeance may overtake the abode in which her rival is, in the glory of her triumph. The performance installs the castle terminates. Filina appears, surrounded by a crowd of admirers, loud in praises of her beauty and talents. Of a sudden a glare illumines the scene—the castle is in flames. Lotario unconsciously interested in Mignon, has, half crazed with grief, lent an ear to Mignon's imprecation, and set fire to the castle. A scene of confusion ensues. Mignon is nowhere to be found. Guglielmo, after an eager but fruitless search, rushes amid the burning rafters, and, in a few moments re-appears, bearing the hapless girl in his arms. In Lotario's manorial residence, on the banks of an Italian lake, lies Mignon, overtaken by illness resulting from the peril she had so lately escaped, and the struggle to conceal her affection for Guglielmo. Guglielmo, who has meanwhile assisted in transporting Mignon to the home from which Lotario had so long been absent, has discovered the secret of her affection. Through the medium of a long-concealed casket, containing a girdle worn by Mignon when a child, as well as by her utterance of the words of a prayer which her parents had taught her, Lotario discovers, beyond a doubt, that Mignon is his long-lost daughter. The recovery of her surviving parent, and Guglielmo's declaration of love, finally, after a trying crisis, restore Mignon to reason and happiness."

The music of M. Ambroise Thomas is, regarded as a whole, a highly favourable example of the modern French school. Written expressly for the Opéra Comique, it naturally conforms itself to the traditional exigencies of that theatre, to which even Meyerbeer, with his Etoile du Nord and Pardon de Ploermel, was in a measure compelled to submit. The setting of the dialogue to accompanied recitative for the Italian stage of course gives additional weight to the opera, inasmuch as M. Thomas is not only addicted to writing concerted music, but writes it in a thoroughly musician-like style, being not only a master of the orchestra, but a master of vocal harmony and combination. Farther than this, he possesses the somewhat exceptional gift of being able to confer individuality, through his music, upon each of his prominent characters. To make much out of Guglielmo (Wilhelm Meister), even as he is metamorphosed by MM. Barbier and Carré would be scarcely possible; but M. Thomas has treated him according to his deserts—as a kind of sentimental nondescript. In three instances, and those the three most important, the French composer has been eminently successful. We refer to Lotharie, the old harper, Mignon's father; Filina, the coquette; and Mignon herself. Each becomes a distinct character, not less musically than dramatically, and each, not merely in the solos, which would have been comparatively easy, but in the concerted music—a task of far greater difficulty—is made to preserve its characteristic type. Mignon is a musical creation to be placed higher, in our opinion, than the same composer's Ophelia. True, Ophelia is a rarer apparition than Mignon, who when once on the stage is seldom away from it; but this by no means rendered the task of the composer easier; on the contrary, it made it one of heavier responsibility, and his success is, on that account, the more to be commended. When we add that the scenes in the opera which are full of life and bustle are appropriately rendered by the music, and that where sentiment is predominant the music is as happily in keeping, almost always, indeed, equal to the occasion, and though (which many will regard as a strong argument in its favour) as essentially the music of M. Thomas throughout as anything with which we are acquainted that ever came from the pen of M. Thomas—we have said all that space will allow, and in fact all that is necessary. To describe a work of this character piece by piece would bore our readers without enlightening them. To be fairly judged, it must be heard as a connected whole.

The performance need not take long to describe. That it is highly creditable to the theatre and to Signor Arditi, upon whom so much responsibility devolves, was hinted in our brief notice of the first representation. But amid the general excellence one particular feature stands out—the Mignon of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. The Swedish songstress has achieved, and worthily achieved, many successes, but hardly any success, perhaps, so thoroughly complete as this. Her Mignon is one of the gentlest, most beautiful, and most truly poetical creations of our time. To say that she looks the Mignon of Ary Scheffer would be to give her less than half her due. She is the Mignon of Goethe's Wilhelm Meister—which is paying her a far higher compliment. A column might be taken up in describing the fine and subtle touches which prove how deeply she has studied the character, how perfectly she has succeeded in making herself identical with it in the minds of those who know the Mignon of the poet, and who witness her impersonation. We shall attempt no such description. We shall merely add that as Mignon, a wretched slave of the travelling showman, Giarno, as Mignon, with a deep but concealed passion for Wilhelm Meister, her deliverer, accompanied by almost as deep a hatred for Filina, her rival in the affections of her new master, and as Mignon, made inconceivably happy by the arrowal of a love about which she had long ago despaired, Mdlle. Nilsson is equally graceful and charming, equally impressive, true to the poet and to nature. Her last scene, when Wilhelm consoles the hitherto unhappy maiden by the declaration of his affection, is so exquisitely touching as to make one almost regret that Goethe had not allowed Mignon to live, instead of to die suddenly—as in the romance—of a broken heart, just at the moment when she has brought the glad news to her master of the arrival of the lady to whom he is about to be wedded. Witnessing this scene, we are almost inclined to pardon MM. Barbier and Carré for the liberty they have taken in altering the dénoûment. How Mdlle. Nilsson sings the music of M. Thomas need not be said. As she sings Ophelia so she sings Mignon; but as in Mignon she has more to sing the pleasure she imparts is all the greater. We cannot enter into details, nor need we again describe the enthusiasm which this very admirable performance has drawn forth, and which was even more marked at the second representation of the opera on Saturday night than at the first.

Digitized by Google

Nearest to the Mignon of Mdlle. Nilsson comes the Lothario of M. Faure, whose impersonation of the old harper is both striking and picturesque, and who in the last scene of the opera rises to the dignity of the situation and is as conspicuous a figure in the scene as Mignon herself. Madame Volpini acts the part of Filina, the heartless coquette, with wonderful animation, singing the florid music assigned to her with a fluency that leaves nothing to desire. Madame Trebelli-Bettini does all that can be done for the small part of Frederico, and gives the air interpolated expressly for her by M. Thomas in her most brilliant style. Signor Gassier is a capital Laerte (manager of the strolling "troop" of actors), and Signor Ragour a Giarno whose treatment of Mignon surprises nobody, as well does he delineate the rather ruthless taskmaster. Signor Bettini represents "Guglielmo" Meister after the approved fashion of the French stage; and Mdlle. Fioretti's finished and graceful dancing gives zest to the ballet—which by the way, has been judiciously curtailed.

The opera is got up with the utmost care. The scenery is good and to the purpose; the costumes are new and in keeping; and the stage business (directed by Mr. Stirling) is extremely well managed—a better instance of which than the burning of the castle, in Act 2, could not be cited.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

The operas performed during the present week have been Otello (Tuesday); Ruy Blas (Wednesday); and Mignon (Thursday). The opera announced for to-night is the Sonnambula. Meanwhile Herr Wagner's Fliegende Holländer is in active preparation.

MISS ROSE HERSEE.

Our advertisement columns record the arrival in London of Miss Rose Hersee, after an absence of ten months. During that period she is said to have travelled over 15,000 miles, and to have sung 148 times in opera, besides occasional concerts, and at the recent Beethoven Festival in New York. At the end of her first engagement, in March, she was re-engaged by Mr. Carl Rosa and Mr. C. D. Hess (partners in the late "Parepa-Rosa opera company") until the June following. Mr. and Madame Rosa having recently returned to enjoy a little repose in England, Mr. C. D. Hess remains sole manager of the English opera company; and in order to supply the vacancy caused by the retirement of Madame Rosa, he has made arrangements with the only rival troupe (the "Richings-Barnard company") who will in future be combined with Mr. Hess's company, presenting one of the strongest operatic combinations for many years seen in America. Miss Rose Hersee is evidently determined to reserve herself for America, inasmuch as she declines concert engagements during her present stay in England. At the beginning of September she, we understand, returns to America, as prima donna assoluta of the combined English Opera companies, for a season of eight months. She is to receive upwards of £2,500, besides a benefit, travelling expenses, &c. The brilliant success achieved in the States by Miss Hersee is a proof that our "cousins" are willing to give a hearty welcome to artistic talent, come whence it may; and the youthful prima donna may be excused if she dedicates her vocal powers exclusively to those who know how to appreciate and remunerate them.

SERVICE AT THE FOUNDLING.

A writer in the Church Times gives a lively account of his visit to the Foundling Hospital, where he assisted at the Sunday service, and watched the children dine, as per regulation. Respecting the former exercise he says:—

"It was simply Choral Matins of that mixed, not to say jumbled, type which is now happily dying out, wherein the priest only reads or monotones his portion, while the choir sing theirs. When the clergyman was 'took the desk' was I have not the faintest idea, but he was one of that class commonly spoken of as 'performing the service' very well; 'Yes! our curate is a beautiful reader.' Now, a 'beautiful reader' is my pet aversion. What can be worse than to hear the Lord's Prayer mutilated as it was last Sunday on this wise:—'Give us this day our daily ber-read' and forgive us our ter-respasses, as we forgive them that ter-respass against us.' It certainly was excessively ter-rying, but let it pass. The singing was, of its kind, nearly perfect. The Psalms were rendered antiphonally, the five professional singers taking one verse, the children the other. The latter have been very carefully trained, and especially have they been trained to read as well as to sing. Every word was distinctly enunciated, and yet there was no drawling. The children had evidently been taught what so many of our choir boys and men have yet to learn, viz., to lay a slight stress upon the final consonants, and not to slur one word with another. If choirmasters would but practise their boys frequently in monotonous reading, being careful to make them keep exactly together, and pronounce each word distinctly, more especially as regards the last syllable of the words, our Psalmody would be wondrously improved and as a model of what chanting ought in this respect, to be, it would be difficult to find any choir better than that at the Foundling. One or two things struck me as odd, and by no means to be imitated. (1) Unless my eye deceived me both boys and girls sat during the prayers. (2) There was no anthem or hymn after the third Collect. (3) That though the responses at Matins were all sung, those in the Litany were merely said, and very weakly said too. Of course Tallis's Litany is, theoretically speaking, a poor thing when the suffrages are recited merely in monotone, while the responses are sung by the choir; but half a loaf is better than no bread, and the sudden change from the sung responses at Matins to the mumbled Litany was the reverse of edifying. I call it a sudden change, for there was no pause after the third Collect, and the anthem which ought to have been sung there was relegated to the interval before the sermon while the preacher was attending to the demands of his toilet in the vestry. After the Litany, while the 'reader' went to the altar, a hymn was sung, and well sung too. It was that piece of Newton's, 'Oft as the bell with solemn toll;' not a very lively composition. Table Prayers were said by the 'Er-reader,' and again, for our sins, we were doomed to the 'ber-read' and the 'ter-respasses, with 'ger-raven' to follow by way of a change. The preacher who was at the south end of the altar did nothing but read the Epistle, and that in a scarcely audible voice. A few of the people turned to the east at the Creed, and joined in reciting it. Then came the great musical event of the morning—the anthem. It was one of Spohr's. 'Blest are the departed,' and it was certainly given admirably. The children formed the chorus, and exceedingly well they sang their part, the volume of sound adding greatly to the effect. The sermon, which followed, was on the 'Strait Gate,' quite colourless in point of doctrine, but a well written essay for all that, and delivered with just enough expression to make the five-and-twenty minutes which it occupied pass pleasantly enough. It was preceded, if I mistake not, by a semi-extempore prayer, or rather by a mutilated Prayer Book Collect. The voice of the preacher was at this time so low that I could scarcely catch his words. Evidently the most solemn portion of the devotions, both at the Foundling and elsewhere that I have been, is that which follows the sermon. Instead of seeing the boys' faces as in other portions of the service, at this point only the tops of their heads were visible, and the faces of the girls were hidden by their aprons. This must be the result of careful drill, for the rows of boys' scalps were perfectly uniform, and all the white aprons took exactly the same shape when they were held before the faces of the girls. The children are in admirable order, and behaved exceedingly well throughout the whole service."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—As an old reader of your paper, and knowing no one to whom I could apply with so much confidence, I venture to ask you if you would kindly give me some information on the following points:—

1. Is it vacation, or term time now, at the Paris Musical Conservatory?
2. Are any of the best Parisian musical teachers likely to be in Paris at the present season?
3. In what town of Germany is the best musical conservatory?

I am just going to take my sisters on the Continent, chiefly to complete their musical education, and my anxiety to obtain for them the best instruction possible will, I hope, form an additional excuse for my thus troubling you.—With every apology, I am, Sir, your obedient servant, E. A.

Mansion House, Hereford, July 7th, 1870.

[The first question we are unable to answer. To the second we may safely say—no. To the third we should answer—the Conservatory at Cologne, presided over by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller.—ED.]

Digitized by Google

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

P. S. S.—The Huguenots and St. Paul were both produced in 1836.

A PIANIST.—Professor Sterndale Bennett has two pianoforte concertos in MS., both of which have been played by himself in public. The first in E minor, the second in A minor. His sonata in F minor, and his fantasia in A major, originally published at Leipsic, may both be obtained of Messrs. Ashdown & Parry, having been printed in England by their predecessors, Messrs. Wessel & Stapleton. The capriccio in D minor (dedicated to Cipriani Potter) can be had of Messrs. Lamborn Cock & Co.

NEMO.—Anything more barren than creative art in Germany at present does not exist. Like the successors of Cæsar, German musicians still cry out, "We are Cæsar." Nevertheless there is hardly at the time being a genuine composer in all Germany. It is either the vague mystery of Schumann, the bombastic emptiness of Wagner, the hysterical twaddle of Liszt, or the super-sick-mock-sentimentality of Proch that rules the roast. We had rather none of it. Let "Nemo" console himself with Offenbach.

SPHINX.—The pianoforte was invented about the year 1700, and was brought partially into use about 1750, and then only in the form of the small "Square," of five octaves, F to F. The grand pianoforte from C to F, was not in use much before 1780. Extra treble notes, viz., the half octave to C, were not added before 1792. The two instruments differ chiefly in this, that whereas the tone is drawn from the strings of the pianoforte by the blow of a hammer, that of the harpsichord is produced by the action of a small quill or plectrum—["Sphinx" should be a little more diligent with his musical history.]

AN AMATEUR.—We are sorry we cannot agree as to the excellence of the company of singers and actors referred to by "An Amateur." We have been bored enough here in London with such operas as they represent, and have no wish to make a journey of nine or ten miles to hear them. Of course, to those who reside in the vicinity they may be pleasant enough, and save time, expense, and trouble; but we doubt if any real amateur in London would accept a free admission to hear any one of them, however well performed.

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1870.

ENGLAND AND BEETHOVEN.

THOSE who went to St. James's Hall—the upper room, not the Christy's—last Monday evening, were reminded that Beethoven was born exactly one hundred years ago. We are really very much obliged to the Philharmonic Society for doing so good a turn to a great genius and a heedless public. There was imminent danger of the fact being altogether overlooked during the "London season;" and what a catastrophe that would have been, we shudder to think. Everybody knows how far the gay and brilliant crowd, making up what is called Society (with a capital S), is devoted to Art in all its branches. The individual members of that gay and brilliant crowd represent the cultivation and refinement of our dear country; and, Beethoven being the greatest musical genius that ever lived, they positively adore him. True, appearances are against this statement; but what would you have? Society (with a capital S), like the property it represents, has duties as well as privileges. It may adore Beethoven, as it undoubtedly adores Raphael, Michael Angelo, and Shakspere, thereby exercising a privilege not to be denied; but, alas! duty comes with a prior claim, and puts all such matters in the background. The impersonal ruler of Society, who is veiled in greater mystery than the mystery surrounding the Grand Llama, ordains that to be done which in the doing must entail exquisite pain. It ordains, for example, that the gay and brilliant crowd shall run after a prima donna without reference to her work or workmanship, refusing to be comforted when she cannot be found; that a so-called opera shall be patronized, the music of which is contemptible, while the executants match it; and that when the highest representatives of a fashionable Mumbo-Jumbo give a concert they shall studiously ignore all that is great and noble in art. Who, then, can wonder to find Beethoven—he never wrote a show opera, purveyed music (!) for a Schneider, or wrote down to the level of (English) Court taste—neglected by the representatives of English cultivation and refinement? It is even possible that, had the Philharmonic Society forgotten the centenary, Society would have gone down to its country-house sadly conscious of an outrage on its artistic instincts, but comforted by the thought that the duty England expects every man to do had not been neglected. But the Philharmonic Society, an aristocratic institution, which gives concerts "by special desire," consulted the exigencies of Society, and Society will now go down to its country-house satisfied with having duly attended to everything—Beethoven included.

But how about the common people, who, in their way, have learned to hear Beethoven gladly, and who do neither suit nor service to Fashion? Are not the mighty masses to be considered? Will not somebody erect an altar whereon may be deposited their multitudinous offerings? In other words, are we to have no popular Beethoven Festival, to make an event which can come only as often as the aloe blooms? It would appear not. The Crystal Palace, which has been quick to honour illustrious men, and profit itself, by fêtes and festivals, is reserving the main of its energies for Handel next year, and devoting the balance to M. de Lesseps and the "Egyptian Salute." This means, in effect, that the metropolis will do nothing—unless South Kensington, desirous of earning a much-needed popularity, puts itself forward as the champion of the art it graciously means to patronise when the huge Stilton cheese is finished. There remain the provinces as a forlorn hope. What festivals are due in this centenary year? Hereford, which counts for little; Birmingham, which counts for much. Surely, at the latter, Beethoven will be honoured as he deserves. Turn to the preliminary announcements. O tremulously anxious reader, and see how the musical magnates of the hardware capital (so-called), have improved the occasion—that is to say, how they have laid themselves open to the charge of preferring anything living to a dead lion. Costa, Benedict, Barnett, Sullivan, Stewart, and Hiller are in the programme; but the giant by the side of whom these worthy musicians account themselves as nought, and to whom the present year emphatically belongs, is nowhere. And, so, the centenary will pass, with one or two straggling immortelles, as England's tribute to the greatest of all composers.

What a good thing it is we are not a sensitive people on matters connected with high art! Otherwise there would be shame and humiliation, as we hear from time to time of Beethoven fêtes and festivals. That there will be nothing of the kind in England is, happily, assured; and the friends of the greatest musical enthusiast, among us need not lock up his razors.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

AN Austrian subject lately addressed a petition to the "très-illustre, très-puissant et très-clement" Emperor Napoleon III., in which he modestly asked of his Majesty a pension of two thousand florins, and admission to the Conservatoire of Music, promising that, in a little while, he should be able to astonish the world. The document was accompanied by its writer's carte-de-visite. His Majesty sent both to the commission now engaged in remodelling the Conservatoire, by whom the affair was treated as a matter for laughter. Not so fast, Messieurs; the Austrian subject merely failed to distinguish between having a high opinion of one's self and showing it.

Digitized by Google

Mignon was performed for the last time this season, on Thursday evening to an immense audience. Its run has been interrupted by the necessary departure of some of the principal artists; but there can be no doubt that the masterpiece of M. Ambroise Thomas will be the favourite opera of next season.

M. TARRDOU, winner of the Grand Prix de Rome last year, having had enough of the Eternal City, flung up his position the other day, and returned to France. No wonder, poor lad. Studying music in Rome must be equivalent to studying the Beautiful in Leicester Square

AT Nancy, three subscribers to the theatre brought an action a few weeks ago against the director for giving 111 representations, instead of 112, the number announced. The cause was about to be called, when it was made known that defendant had consented to a verdict and payment of damages. The damages were assessed by an arbitrator, at one franc twenty-five centimes to each subscriber.

THE Italian musical journals give enthusiastic accounts of the production, at Genoa, of Signor Petrella's opera, I Promessi Sposi. At the second representation the maestro was called forty-five times after one particular romance. (How much simpler to have kept him on the stage during forty-five times the period usually occupied by a call!) At the third representation the same furore was manifested; and Petrella, a singularly absent man, was among the most uproarious of those who insisted on seeing the composer. "He was quite overcome," says an Italian journalist who relates the incident, "by the charm of his own music."

GERMAN newspapers announce that Herr Benedix, author of a hundred plays, is, at the age of seventy-one, in great distress. It is only just," says the Gartenlaube, "that the public should take measures for ensuring comfort, during the last years of his life, for one who has given it so much diversion." Herr Benedix is author of Aschenbrödel, of which School is a clever imitation. He is also author of the piece from which Léon Gozlan's Dieu merci! le couvert est mis is derived. It was from a Russian version of Benedix's dramatic sketch that the French version was prepared (Gozlan being ignorant of the original). If, after being played in Russia, France, and England, Benedix is little known out of his own country, it is not the fault of Benedix. The German actors are joining in the subscription opened for his benefit; and there would be propriety in foreign authors and managers, who have profited by his talent, doing the same.

ACCORDING to Le Ménéstrel, his Majesty of Bavaria, Defender of the Faith according to Wagner, has gone into business as an impresario and musicseller. We are gravely told that "ce porte-couronne" now owns a theatre and three Wagnerian scores, paying the Prophet for the use of the latter 16,000 francs per year. Herr Wagner has, undoubtedly, the best of the bargain; but what do the worthy German beer-drinkers think of their sovereign's new occupation. Will they diminish his civil list?—or will the theatrical and musical accounts form an item in the Bavarian budget? Again, if the tradsman be bankrupt, what becomes of the King? Could the brokers seize the crown? and, if the King be discrowned—for which there are Bavarian precedents—would he be permitted to retire behind the counter? Here are complications for German brains to unravel.

THE "grand spectacular romance," Undine, by Mr. R. Reece produced at the Olympic, suggests a serious question.—Why treat fairy tales in a burlesque fashion? Mr. Reece has followed La Motte Fouqué's story, and achieved a work which abounds with "effects." Had he set about his task in a serious spirit, there is no reason to doubt that something fanciful would have been the result. But he has been fettered by a desire to be "funny" without indulgence in those extravagances found so delightful at the Strand. He abstains from the normal pun, his songs are few, and he scorns the "break-down;" but he makes Bertalda talk about the "author of a play but newly damned." This is a concession to the popular belief that on the stage the fantastic can only be treated with irony; and here the irony is expressed by making people of the Middle Ages talk like the subjects of Queen Victoria. A thousand absurdities, with anachronisms among them, may make up a droll compound; but anachronism pure and simple is not more "funny" than a mistake in the multiplication table. We cannot conceive anything less provocative of mirth than a speech by Cicero on the Alabama claims. One effect of this half-comic treatment is the annihilation of distinctive character. Mr. G. Belmore can make nothing of the demon, Kühleborn; Miss Reinhardt cannot lift up Bertalda; nor can Miss Lizzie Russell derive inspiration from Undine. As a vehicle for acting of any kind Undine is naught.

ACCORDING to the Wiener Fremdenblatt, Herr Joseph Strauss lies in a hopeless condition. His medical man says that he is suffering from typhus fever, which, on account of his extreme bodily weakness, is exceedingly dangerous. Herr Johann Strauss has written to the papers, affirming that the cause assigned by the papers for his brother's illness is an utter invention, without a particle of truth in it. We are glad to hear this, for the sake of the officers of the Russian army, who are said to have approved of the course which their imaginary brother-in-arms had thought fit to take against the unfortunate conductor.

FORTUNATELY no lives were lost when the theatre at Brunn was burnt down, the other day, although a great many persons had already taken their seats. The theatre probably would have been saved, had the engine, hose, and tanks been in working condition; of course they were not. Perhaps if a law were passed ordering that the manager of every theatre should be securely locked up in a room within the building from the moment the doors were opened, and not set at liberty until after the performance, there would probably be fewer theatres burnt down. The room selected should be as near as possible to some fruitful source of danger, say the chandelier. The key, too, of the room should be handed, for safe custody, to some pious individual, such as a Churchman or Non-Conformist of fine bigoted principles, with a firm conviction that all theatres are snares laid by the Devil for the unwary, and that it is wicked to read Shakspere. It is very certain that the manager would not be released one instant before the time fixed by law.

THE mise en-scène of Die Walküre is said to have cost 50,000 florins. The scenery is very fine, especially "an interior," by Herr Jank, in the first act, and "the summit of a rocky precipice," by Herr Döll, in the third. The costumes, however, are not all quite correct. The costume of Wotan is especially open to criticism. The King of Bavaria is the proprietor of the entire Nicbelungen Trilogy, the price paid being an annuity of 8,000 florins to the composer. The pianoforte arrangement and the book, on the other hand, have been purchased by the publishing firm of B. Schott's Söhne, Mayence.—As a specimen of the diversity of opinion with regard to Die Walküre, we will quote two papers, the Schwäb. Mercur and the Nürnb. Correspondenz. The critic of the former says: "From the libretto, which sins against all moral feeling more, perhaps, than any other piece written for the stage, we turn in astonishment and disgust; as for the music, only in the first act does it exhibit any trace of Wagner's talent; after that, everything sinks down to the dead level of monotony characterizing Tristan und Isolde." As a set off to this, the critic of the second of the above papers observes: "From out the gigantic structure of this mighty creation there is wafted to us a sort of spiritual breath, compelling us to devotion, veneration, and inward enjoyment." The writer of the present paragraph, having carefully read the libretto in question, and being, moreover, of sane mind, can only say that—but he will restrain himself; he will content himself with observing that, if Lord Campbell's Act extended to Munich, the Die Walküre would be summarily suppressed. What a pity Lord Campbell's Act does not extend to Munich.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—Signor Everardi, late of the Italian Opera Company, has been appointed professor of singing at the Conservatory, in place of Signor Repetto, deceased. Signor Everardi is an accomplished artist, and a fervent admirer of Bach and Handel.

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

An evening concert took place in Westbourne Hall, in aid of the funds of the Amateur Authors' Club, on Thursday week. The following artists gave their services, and sang and played to the gratification of all present:—Mesdames B. Reeves, Deck, M. D'Etienne, Dela, S. Smith, and Hayes; Messrs. F. Elmore, H. Gordon, Koutski, F. Chatterton, Telesinski, and Schultz. Messrs. H. Parker, Ganz, and Lehmeyer were accompanists. The concert was a success.

Miss Ellen Jarman's concert took place at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Thursday, July 7th, and was well attended. Miss J. played Weidl's "Na pha ultra," Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 53 (by desire), a solo by Sivrai, and a Galop di Bravura, in all which she proved herself a remarkable pianist. Miss Jarman was assisted by a young vocalist, Mdme. Rivoldi (late of Manilla), who sang some Italian scenas and English songs. Miss Lindhurst gave ethe waltz aria, "The Nafades;" Mdlle. D'Elise, John Barnett's new song, "The Parted" (encored), and "A Summer's Eve;" Mr. W. Reeves, "Alice, where art thou?" and "Thy image o'er my pillow;" Mr. W. C. Bell, "The War Cry hushed" and "My Winsome Rose;" and Mr. C. J. Bishnsden, his new song, "Dearer to my soul than art." Some instrumental violoncello pieces by G. Macfarren, &c., were given, and the whole concert, conducted by Messrs. G. L. Cottell and Weber, proved satisfactory.

Miss Kate Gordon's annual concert took place on Wednesday evening at the Hanover Square Rooms. Miss Gordon played Thalberg's Second Fantasia, a "Galop de concert," a sonata by Beethoven for violin and pianoforte (with Herr Carl Deichman), and Osborne and De Beriot's grand duo from Guillaume Tell. She also took part with Mr. Oberthür in his brilliant duo, for harp and pianoforte, from Lucrezia Borgia, receiving in all loud and well-merited applause. Mr. Oberthür played his Harp Meditation with much effect. Madame Weiss, an old favourite of the public, sang Balfe's "Power of Love," and Tito Mattei's "Non è ver," besides joining in some concerted pieces with Messrs. James and Renwick. Mdlle. Draudil and Messrs. Albert James and Renwick each contributed songs, &c. Messrs. A. Carden, Van Noorden, and Oberthür were accompanists.

The concert given by Mr. Henry Holmes, at Stafford House, on the 27th ult., was generally of an excellent sort; and particularly noteworthy because of a quintet in E major (Op. 87), the work of the concert-giver himself. The quintet was played by Messrs. H. Holmes, Folkes, Burnett, Hann, and Pezze, whose interpretation of its various movements left no doubt in the mind of the audience that a valuable addition has been made to our store of (mostly one) of English chamber music. Mr. Holmes was assisted by, in addition to the artists already named, Miss Sinclair, Miss Watts, Miss Wynne, Herr Stockhausen, and Mons. Waldeck.

An entertainment, under the patronage of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, in aid of the funds of the Gentlewomen's Self-Help Institute, was held in the hall of Stafford House on Monday afternoon. There was a very fashionable attendance. The singers were Madame Rudersdorff, Miss Poole, Miss Marian Severn, MM. Rorsow and Waldeck; the instrumental performers were Miss Field, Mr. W. C. Cowen, and Mr. W. H. Holmes (pianoforte); Mdlle. Therese Liebe (violin), Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton (harp), and Signor Giulio Regondi (concertina). Mr. Benedict was conductor at the pianoforte. The dramatic artists were Mr. and Mrs. Rousby and Mr. Nelson, all gave their services gratuitously on behalf of the institution criticism would be out of place; but a mere recapitulation of what was done will suffice to show that the programme was both varied and interesting. Miss Marian Severn gave Henry Smart's "Lady of the Lea;" Madame Rudersdorff contributed Haydn's canzonet, "She never told her love," Signor Randegger's Venetian song, "Beneath the blue transparent sky," and a Spanish national air; Miss Poole sang Mr. J. D. Chatterton's "My soul is dark" (accompanied on the harp by Mr. Balsir Chatterton); Mr. Korsow (baritone) an air from Meyerbeer's Pardon de Ploermel and a Russian romance; Mr. Waldeck an air from Verdi's Due Foscari. Other vocal pieces were in the programme, for which we were unable to stay. Not the least agreable performances were those on the pianoforte, which comprised Schumann's Nachtstücke and Stephen Heller's Chasse (Miss Field), two pièces de salon composed and performed by Mr. W. F. Cowen, and Mendelssohn's Song Without Words in A, from first book, followed by a brilliant fantasia, entitled "Scottish Chimes" (Mr. W. H. Holmes), Mdlle. Therese Liebe, one of the most talented of the lady violinists who now seem to multiply among us, played a well-known solo by Vieuxtemps, and Mr. Balsir Chatterton performed with Signor Giulio Regondi a showy duet for harp and concertina. Between the first and second parts of the concert the neat and pleasant little piece called Delicate Sound, in which Mr. Charles Matthews and the late Madame Vestris used to be famous, was represented in stage costume by Mrs. Rousby (Pauline), Mr. Rousby (Citizen Sangfroid), and Mr. Nelson (Alphonse), to the evident satisfaction of the audience, upon whom not a point was lost. After this Mrs. Rousby recited some verses written by Madame Una Howard expressly for the occasion, and inscribed to her Grace the Duchess of Sutherland. It is believed that a considerable sum will have been secured for the Gentlewomen's Self-Help Institute by this well-planned and successfully carried out entertainment.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A hundred years ago Beethoven was born, and Beethoven commemorations are just now in fashion. In Germany their number will be legion before the actual birthday arrives next December; while even New York has found time to keep the feast, burning gunpowder, hammering anvils, and singing "Hail Columbia" in honour of the mighty master, with as much zest as Boston displayed, not long ago, when making a similar noise in honour of peace. Observing all this, English music lovers have been anxious about the credit of their own nation, which cannot afford to let the event pass unnoticed. There was good cause for anxiety. The Crystal Palaeer, arely tackward in stimulating hero-worship, kept, as it still keeps, silence, and the programme of the festivals at Birmingham and Hereford showed, as it still shows, a neglect of Beethoven utterly unaccountable. Happily the Philharmonic Society came to the rescue, and on Monday last honoured itself as well as the master by giving a special performance of certain representative works. Our oldest musical institution could do this with singular propriety and grace. It had relations with Beethoven himself of the most honourable sort; engaging his services in health, and, when his countrymen neglected him in sickness, easing the burden of care laid by scanty means upon a sensitive nature. "Say to these worthy men that if God restores me to health I shall endeavour to prove the reality of my gratitude by my actions." This was all the acknowledgment Beethoven could make; but the Philharmonic Society may well regard it as the greatest distinction earned during fifty-eight years of labour. A connection begun thus, and sustained by frequent performances of the master's works, imposed an obvious duty upon the society which has been discharged with earnestness and success.

The programme showed the different styles of the master at several stages of his career; and did so in a manner to which little or no objection could be made, bearing in mind the conditions under which it was drawn up. With regard to several selected dates works more thoroughly representative might have been chosen; but the limits of a single concert are far too narrow for the adequate illustration of even a part of Beethoven's career. All things considered, therefore, the Philharmonic programme was a satisfactory scheme. It began with the Symphony in C, No. 1 (1800), and ended with the Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (1823), the years between being represented by the Choral Fantasia (1808); the overture to Leonora, No. 3 (1806); the scena "Ah! perfido" (1796); the terzetto, "Tremate, empi, tremate" (1801); and the Dervish chorus from the Ruins of Athens (1811). Both symphonies were well, if not perfectly given, the pastoral movements of No. 9 showing especial care in performance. As a matter of course the Ode to Joy—for which it is vain to wish a fanfless rendering—tried the choralists somewhat; but its difficulties were overcome with more than average ease. The solos were confided to Miss Aratella Smythe, Miss Elton, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley, could hardly have been in better hands. The Leonora overture calls for no remark, but the Choral Fantasia has seldom been performed in a fashion more worthy of its surpassing beauty. Madame Arabella Goddard's rendering of the solo part, for example, was distinguished by exquisite taste and brilliant execution to a striking degree, and fairly won for the accomplished pianist a demonstrative recall. An encore was awarded to "Ah! perfido," which Mdlle. Nilsson sang with a dramatic power leaving absolutely nothing to desire; and a like honour fell to the Dervish chorus.

It deserves to be noticed, in conclusion, that during the Philharmonic season Mr. Cusins has directed the performance of all Beethoven's symphonies; and that, as a special feature of Monday's concert, a bust of the great musician, surrounded by flowers, had a conspicuous place.

DAY'S LITANY

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—I should feel greatly indebted to any of your readers who would give me any information on the following point:—

Day's Litany of 1560 gives the Litany chant thus:—C, D, B flat, C; which corresponds to—G, A, F, G,—instead of G, A, F sharp, G, which is the common form. I would ask, 1st—How is this to be accounted for? 2nd—Is there any other evidence in ancient English or Foreign Books of the existence of a Litany of this form?

I may add that the harmonies of Day's Litany are such, in one or two places, as to forbid the idea of the B flat of the plain song being an error.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A. B. S.

Digitized by Google

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Morning Post of July 18th, speaks as follows of Madame Adelina Patti's Elvira :—

"The performance of Madame Adelina Patti as Elvira, in the opera of I Puritani is another piece of evidence in favour of the great versatility of her talent. The wondrously gifted lady sings Bellini's florid music with an astonishing freedom and effect. From the first scena to the last in which she appeared her singing and acting were so good and unusual, that each piece she sang formed a link in a chain of the most brilliant success. A well deserved recall after the scena, 'A quel nome,' was the first of a series of successes during the evening, and the aria, 'Son vergin vezzosa,' was so superbly sung by her that it was rapturously encored, and greatly applauded after it was repeated; her vocalization was neat, free, and effective, the high D frequently introduced being as clear as a bell and as light as a star. Her acting was also more individual and fitting than usual, and when during the temporary loss of reason she, as Elvira, sang 'Qui la voce,' she introduced some extraordinary cadenzas, touching a high E flat with great fulness and distinctness, the audience recognized her unexceptional vocal gifts and artistic power by a perfect storm of applause. The wondrous charm with which Madame Patti invests every part in which she appears seems to be intensified in her performance of Elvira; and as it was the first time that an English audience has had the privilege of hearing her astonishing interpretation of the music, and as her success was so great, there is no doubt but that the part of Elvira in I Puritani will form a very welcome addition to the operatic characters performed by her during any future engagement she may make in London."

Why Madame Patti has not played the part long ago is difficult to explain.

CHURCH CHOIRS IN LONDON.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—The object of your correspondent, P.G., in his two letters upon Church Music, evidently has been to eulogize Messrs. Goss and Cooper. This has been the burden of his song. He should be appointed "Poet-Laureate" to the organist and composer to Royalty. But I would ask how is it that this choir, over which these immaculate musicians have presided for thirty years, is at present, and ever has been the worst in the United Kingdom. "A tree is known by its fruits." If the music of one is so elevating, and the administrative skill of the other so beneficial, how is it that no influence of such has been seen upon their choir? ARGUS.

[There is an easy and obvious answer to Argus's query, which we leave "P. G." to supply.—ED. M. W.]

STUDENTS' PRIVILEGES.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—As a musical student, will you kindly allow me to ask why those studying for the profession should not be allowed some privileges with regard to the "Grand Concerts." At present, "articled pupils" have to pay precisely the same as the general public. This happens to be a matter of being able to afford (in addition to other educational expenses), the two lowest prices, one is either unable to get a seat, or is so far from the performer that the best piano parts, if not lost, are not that source of instruction they might be, if we were nearer. Theological students can attend lectures and receive nearly all their instruction free, at a very reduced rate, but a singer has to pay full price for all that he hears. It seems that all professions have provided encouragements for learners except the musical profession. The ablest lectures in other sciences may be heard by young men-students at a very low rate and often free. Why not place the pupil in music on a level with pupils in other theories of study? To become an orator one must hear oratory as well as study. Painting also ought to be seen by those who would become painters. And is it not true that the student of the voice should hear singing as well? True; but that which is calculated to inspire with fresh zeal for study is absolutely out of our reach. If some reduced rate of charge was allowed to those articled for the profession a great boon would be conferred upon many an earnest student. TENORE ROBUSTO.

Westbourne Square.

[We confess ourselves unable to see what claim "Tenore Robusto" has to admission to concerts gratis. Such a privilege might be extended to the advanced pupils of a recognized Academy. But there it must stop.—ED.]

THE Grand Prix de Rome, for this year has been gained by M. Maréchal, a pupil of Victor Massé's, aged eighteen. His composition is entitled Le Jugement de Dieu. The jury have decided, but their decision is seriously called in question, and much dissatisfaction exists.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—You very properly ask, on the ground that it is "new to you," for my authority as to Mendelssohn's low estimate of the Creation. If it is new to you, doubtless it is new to many others; any light, therefore, respecting the opinion of the most eminent musician of the century, upon a work so unboundedly popular throughout the whole civilized community, would be a valuable contribution to the common stock. Those who lived in his day, and in his circle could probably call to mind some occasion when Mendelssohn would have spoken of Haydn. It was before my time. My evidence is merely hypothetical; though without entirely excluding that in presenting it I cannot but express the hope that if to any one who knew the man, or who may have additional testimony on the very interesting point, the evidence I adduce may not be conclusive, they will kindly, by contributing what they know of Mendelssohn's expressed opinions, aid the public in a right and true verdict. To express an opinion of a brother-artist, when that opinion might not be in accordance with the general sentiment, would not be easy to perform gracefully; yet there are matters so far above all petty considerations in questions of art, that diffidence in respect to them ceases to be commendable. The greatest of our musical men preserved a firm reticence when leading remarks were addressed to him, calculated to "draw him out" as to his estimate of other musicians. Yet it is not difficult to read the innermost thoughts of the huge Titan respecting the works of others. Beethoven was unwilling to say much, if anything, concerning Haydn and Mozart. Mendelssohn about Haydn, so far as I have read his published opinions, is almost totally silent. From one who had the honour of a tolerably intimate acquaintance with him, and whose musical sentiments were always the echo of Mendelssohn's, I carefully inquired what he (Mendelssohn) thought of Haydn. The reply amounted to a very slight estimate of the symphonies and vocal music, with a slight exception respecting the quartets; and a very slender estimate of the greater portion of the Creation; a little reserve, if I remember rightly (for it was years ago) in favour of the chorus, "Awake the Harp." In the published letters of Mendelssohn there are some letters from his father to him. (Some think the letters of the father to the son better than any of the son to the father—this in passing.) In one of these letters, Vol. II. page 79, there is an apology from the pen of the father for the descriptive music in Haydn's Creation. When it is taken into account that in mentioning Haydn previously (page 9) he says: "Haydn's Mass was scandalously gay,"—and further on (page 10): "Unluckily, I could not find among all the music here even one tolerable solemn Mass, and not a single one of the old Italian masters; nothing but modern dross,"—the happy Felix must have written or said something concerning the "descriptive" music of the Creation, calculated to draw out from the father the following significant defence Although, both what Mendelssohn said or thought of it, as well as the general style and construction of the great work itself, offer tempting themes to dilate upon, I will content myself with these much at present; concluding with the father's significant and worthy words:—"It seems to me that both the oratorios of Haydn were, in their sphere, very remarkable phenomena. The poems of both are weak, regarded as poetry; but they have replaced the old positive and almost metaphysical religious impulses by those which are more nature, as a visible emanation from the Godhead, in her universality, and in her thousandfold individualities, instils into every susceptible heart. Hence the profound depth, but also the cheerful efficiency, and certainly genuine religious influence, of these two works, which hitherto stand alone; hence the classical effect of the playful and detached passages, with the most noble and sincere feelings of gratitude produced by the whole; hence is it also, that I, individually, could as little endure to lose in the Creation, and in the Seasons, the crowing of the cock, the singing of the lark, the lowing of the cattle, and the rustic glee of the peasants, as I could in nature herself; in other words, the Creation and the Seasons are founded on nature and the visible service of God—and are no new materials for music to be found there?"—Yours, very truly,

July 13th, 1870. IDEALIZER.

[We may remind "Idealizer" that Abraham Mendelssohn knew no more of music than Leopold Mozart, that both were pedants, and both shortened the lives of their marvellous sons, incomparably more valuable lives than their own, by overwork. Leopold made a wild beast show of his children. Abraham Mendelssohn tried to make his son Felix an Admiral Crichton. The world lost the one at the age of 36, the other at the age of 39. The world owes no gratitude either to Abraham or Leopold. On the contrary. What was Mendelssohn's real opinion of Haydn we are unable to say, but we know he had a great veneration for the German masters who preceded him. For our own part, if the descriptive music in the Creation were burnt we should not greatly care.—ED. M. W.]

MR. NIMMO was personally complimented by the Earl and Countess of Stamford and Warrington for the admirable way in which he had managed the "Three days' entertainment," got up in aid of the funds for the restoration of Enville Parish Church. The whole affair was a "brilliant success," and a large sum of money must have been collected on the occasion.

Digitized by Google

ORGAN NEWS.

THE GRAND ORGAN FOR THE COLSTON HALL, BRISTOL.

Such progress has been made with the grand organ for the Colston Hall, that no doubt remains of its being opened on the 1st of September next. It is being built at a cost of £2,500, by Willis, of London. Many detailed particulars respecting it than have yet appeared will prove interesting. The compass of four sets of manuals will be from C C to C in altissimo, 61 notes, being four or five more than in any organ in this neighbourhood. The Pedals will be from C C C to G, 32 notes, giving also an unusual range.

The stops of the Pedale will be:—Double diapason, wood, 32ft.; open diapason, wood, 16ft.; violin, metal, 16ft.; violoncello, metal, 8ft.; octave, wood, 8ft.; mixture, three ranks, metal; grand bombard, 16ft. The stops of the Choir will be:—Dulciana, 8ft.; lieblich, gedeckt, 8ft.; clarabel flute 8ft.; violoncello, 8ft.; flute octaviante harmonique, 4ft.; flageolet, 2ft.; corno-di-bassetto, 8ft.; bassoon, 8ft.; posaune, 8ft. The stops of the Great organ will be:—Grand double diapason, 16ft.; open diapason, 8ft.; violin, 8ft.; clarabel, 8ft.; octave, C C C to G, 32 notes, giving also an unusual range.; octave, 4ft.; quinta, 5ft.; super octave, 2ft.; fourniture, four ranks; trombone, 16ft.; trompa harmonic, 8ft.; clarion, 4ft. The stops of the Swell will be:—Contra gamba (lower octave closed wood), 16ft.; salcional, 8ft.; open diapason, 8ft.; lieblich gedacht 8ft.; vox angelica, 8ft.; principal, 4ft.; fifteenth, 4ft.; echo cornet, three ranks; contra posaune, 16ft.; cornopean, 8ft.; hautboy, 8ft.; clarionet, 8ft.; vox humana, 8ft.; clarion, 4ft. Tremulant to vox humana and hautboy. The stops of the Solo will be:—Flute harmonique, 8ft.; concert flute, 4ft.; corno-di-bassetto, 8ft.; oboe orchestra, 8ft.; tuba major harmonic, 8ft.; clarion, 4ft. The couplers will be:—Sole to Great, Swell to Great, sub-octave on itself; Swell to Great, unison; Swell to Great, super-octave on itself; Choir to Great, Solo to Pedals, Swell to Pedals, Great to Pedals, Choir to Pedals, Orisande. The patent adjustable combination movement will be applied, in four changes, to each of the manuals. Four pedals acting on those of the great organ will also affect the pedal organ, and adapt it to the power then obtained in the great organ. Four pedals also will act on the couplers, as composition pedals act on ordinary stops. A double-acting pedal will produce a P P pedals, even when the tutti pedal is arranged. The swell and great organs will be played through the agency of the pneumatic lever. The wind will be supplied from bellows placed beneath the organ in a chamber prepared for them. These bellows are to be constructed with suitable feeders for mechanical power, which will be supplied with wind by two of Duncan's hydraulic engines. They are also to draw their air down from an altitude somewhat above the pipes in the hall above. The wind thus obtained is to pass into reservoirs, constructed to obtain absolute steadiness, and from them to pass to the various sections of the wind-chests, at suitable pressures, for the various ranks of pipes. The wind-chests will be furnished with the patent prise-medal valves of 1862. The keys will be constructed of ivory, of great thickness, and fronted with moulded ivory. The combination pistons will be electro-gilt. The key fittings will be in wainscot oak, French polished; and the whole of the interior will be constructed in the same style as the organ now building for the Royal Albert Hall. The case for this instrument designed by Messrs. Foster & Wood, architects, of Bristol, will be in a style to correspond with its character, and with the style of the hall.

MADAME NADINE DUNORD.

The Examiner and London Review, in reviewing M. De Kontski's concert speaks as follows of Madame Nadine Dunord, the young Russian vocalist:—

"The dramatic aria from L'Africaine, 'Sur mes genoux fils du soleil,' was rendered with exquisite taste and feeling by Madame Nadine Dunord. We might almost go so far as to pronounce this the gem of the vocal performances."

The Morning Post writes as subjoined:—

"Madame Nadine Dunord, the Russian singer, who made so favourable an impression at St. James's Hall, will give her matinee at the Marquis of Downshire's, in Belgrave Square."

The Era has the followieg criticism:—

"Admirable in this German composition, she was heard to far greater advantage in the 'Sleep Song' from Meyerbeer's L'Africaine. It must be conceded that this lady's voice is not great, but her ability in using it to express variety in musical sentiment has been rarely surpassed. In the whole range of opera there is not a score trying air than the one in question. We have never heard it more intellectually rendered than by this lady."

At a Council of the College of Organists, held on June 30th, the following gentlemen were admitted to fellowship:—W. S. Bambridge, of Marlborough College; Edward Bunnett, of Norwich Cathedral, Mus. Doc.; F. E. Gladstone, of Chichester Cathedral; John Stainer, of Magdalen College, Oxford, Mus. Doc.; and E. H. Turpin, of London.

WAIFS.

M. Gounod has left Paris, on a visit to some friends in Bretagne.

Theatres figure in the French budget of the next year to the time of 1,600,000 francs.

Mdlle. Schroder has recovered from small pox, and gone to her native place, Breslau.

Herr Carl Formes has returned to America. He arrived at New York last month.

Mr. Henry Smart has just completed King René's Daughter, a cantata for female voices.

M. Pasdeloup was married last week, in a very quiet fashion—so says Le Ménestrel, without giving the name of the bride.

The King of Italy has conferred the order of the Iron Crown on M. Parodka, the singing master, now residing at Florence.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Mr. A. S. Sullivan have been elected members of the committee of the Mendelssohn Testimonial Fund.

Mdme. Gompertz-Bettelheim will take part in the Beethoven commemoration at Vienna. So will the Abbé Liszt, who has promised to conduct the Mass in D.

How little hot weather agrees with theatre-going is shown by the receipts of the Paris places of entertainment, which amounted, during June, only to 747,219 francs.

The death is announced, in Egypt, of Themistocles Solera, author of the libretti of Verdi's two operas, Nabuco and Attila. He belonged to the Viceroy's police.

M. Naudin is engaged as leading tenor in the theatre of the Khedive at Cairo. Signor Nicola de Giosa, a pupil of Mercadante's, and late of San Carlos, will be the musical director.

In our notice of Mdlle. Georgi's benefit at the Gaiety we inadvertently stated that Mdlle. Constance Georgi sang the Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia. The singer was the bénéficiaire herself.

More than £10,000 out of the £15,000 required to meet Earl Dudley's proffered donation towards the restoration of Worcester Cathedral has already been subscribed by the leading residents in the city and county.

M. Ledue, the music publisher, has undertaken a very serious task. Under the title of Bibliothèque Lyrique he has commenced the issue of 200 operas, arranged for voice and piano, at the uniform price of three francs each.

Mdlle. Thérèse Castellan, the accomplished young lady-violinist, had, on Tuesday last, the honour of playing before the Court at Windsor, and after her performance was highly complimented by their Royal Highnesses the Princesses, &c., &c. The honour may be the more highly prized, inasmuch as, if there could possibly exist such a phenomenon as an English lady who played publicly on the fiddle, it is certain that she would never be invited to "Court."

In the Biography of Charles Dickens, by Mr Hotten, attention is called to the novelist's use of blue ink. It is true that he always used a particular blue ink which has the advantage of drying quickly, and of not clogging the pen—advantages shared by the violet ink, now also in vogue. The fact that Mr. Dickens always used ink of a decided and unalterable blue is not more worth mentioning than that he always wrote on blue paper. Now blue ink upon blue paper will try the eyes of most men, and some have a vivid recollection of the difficulty of reading the painful dazzle of blue upon blue. The printer who had to read his minutely written manuscript must have had a fine time of it. The point is worth noting as an illustration of the physical perfection of his vision. Though he somewhere speaks of his eyes as being none of the best, there never was a man who surpassed him in powers of seeing. The physical organs were in their kind perfect, and did their duty with indubitable accuracy. Their quickness of apprehension was prodigious.

We read in the Church Times:—

"The second festival of the Ryedale Choral Union was held in the fine old Parish Church of St. Peter's, Pickering. Thirteen choirs, comprising two hundred and fifty voices, took part in the service. There was a rehearsal at 11.30. At 3.30 the clergy and surpliced choirs left the National Schools in procession, beginning in the churchyard to chant Psalm cxxi. Psalm cxxii. was also sung as a processional. The anthem, 'the Lord is my Shepherd,' the hymns, 'For all Thy Saints,' and 'Saviour, blessed Saviour,' were, like the Psalms, &c., well sung. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. Pigou, vicar of Doncaster, after which alms were collected. Every part of the church was crowded, the vestry and porch were full, and great numbers were in the churchyard. After service, the choirs and others partook of tea in the Castle yard. The day was fine, and both Church-people and Dissenters vied with each other in making it a happy one."

Digitized by Google

Mr. John Dunne, was made Doctor of Music, in the Examination Hall of Trinity College, Dublin, at the "Summer Commencement," on Thursday, July 7th. His cantata, for the degree was performed on the Saturday previous, in the Theatre of Trinity College. The Nobleman's Son at Capernaum is founded upon the fourth chapter of St. John's Gospel, verse 46. The work consists of nine numbers,—a tenor solo, "Praise and glory to the Lord;" a symphony and chorus with short solos; a recitative and chorus, "What was the hour when he began to amend"? an air, "Thy life had almost gone, my child"; a chorus, "Thy story to us belief imparts"; an eight-part-chorus, (which of course Mr. Dunne was obliged to write in order to show his skill in harmony); and a final chorus and trio, "Night and morning we for him with our souls did yearn." Altogether, judging from what we hear, the work must have satisfied the authorities that Mr. Dunne was fully entitled to the degree.

Our correspondent, a Left tenant Kernel, is incorrect in surmising that Cob-nuts are a variety of the Horse-chesnut. The racing expression of "cracks" does not refer to either species. Commodore Nutt did not invent shell-jackets, though the famous crackers are their origin to his genius. The "Nut-brown Maid" was not composed by Shelley, as you seem to imagine, and the phrase "a nutter failure" need not of necessity apply to the fact of finding it a bad one. Yes, certainly, there is a town named Knutsford, in Cheshire, but it is principally remarkable for the thick heads of its juries, which may possibly explain your confusion as to nuts. What you say about "cracking the Gordian nut" we attribute to your ignorance or the heat of the weather, also your observations on the years of the Verze di Cocco, which are unworthy of you, and if the singer in question did exhibit too much of the "voce di testa" (we pass over your remark about "detest her" and so on, because, really—) or "nutty flavoured" voice, there are some, remember, who like that sort of thing, and who instead of the liquid "ut de poitrine" prefer a good strong heady whine. However, for all further information we must refer you to Nuttall's Dictionary.—Punch.

A sort of indignation meeting has been held in Dublin touching the supposed parsimony of the Government towards an Irish Academy of Music. The grant tendered towards the Irish Institute does not seem generous, but it is curious to observe the attempt to make political capital out of it. "There is not a man in the Irish community," writes an Irish newspaper, "who on reading the report of the proceedings yesterday will not say he is disheartened that the Irish Academy of Music would not be permitted to languish through want of means if a native Legislature controlled the exchequer of Ireland. Could not the Music question be allowed to stand over for a short time, without threatening us just now for its sake with an agitation for repeal of the Union or a Federal Parliament? Our hands have been pretty full of Irish difficulties this year, but our Dublin contemporary may feel assured that as soon as we have a little leisure we shall not neglect, in the interest of our neighbours, a reasonable share of the fine arts, quæ ad humanitatem pertinent. But business must be got through first. Meanwhile, the Irish Academy might go on as it has been doing without eleemosynary aid. The advantages of assistance to the English Institute have not been uniformly apparent, and three years ago the sum was placed on the estimates to its account. At any rate let us have no grievance established on the point, with a foregone conclusion to add it to the sum total of wrongs with which various kinds of agitators are trading across the Channel.—Daily News.

THE LATE REV. W. H. HAVERGAL.—A man to whom Psalmody Reformers owe a great debt, passed away to his rest, on April 19th. In the early days of our interest in Psalmody, we remember hearing from the Rev. J. J. Waite, who afterwards did such a great work throughout the country, of Mr. Havergal. There can be no doubt that something of that enthusiasm for sterling tunes quickly sung, and for broad and simple harmonies, which Mr. Waite carried with him everywhere, was caught as an inspiration from the author of "Old Church Psalmody." When Dr. Lowell Mason visited this country, one of his first and most sacred pilgrimages was to Mr. Havergal's house in Worcester, and we well remember the heartiness and earnestness with which Dr. Mason acknowledged the obligations of American psalmodists to this good man. We believe it was Dr. Mason who, soon after that, undertook the publication of Mr. Havergal's interesting book, on the "History of the Old Hundredth Psalm Tune," which was printed in America. The man whose sanctified genius inspired two such other men as these we have named, was indeed honoured with great usefulness. We think it likely (though we do not possess, in these cases, such distinct information) that Mr. Mercer and Sir Henry Baker, whose publications have wrought so great an effect in the Church of England, would gladly acknowledge a similar obligation to Mr. Havergal. In 1829 he resided at Astley Rectory, near Bewdle, Gloucestershire, and it was here that he met with that accident which nearly deprived him of sight, and laid him aside from clerical duties for several years. During this period he found relief to a studious and active mind in the study of music, and afterwards, during a long life, employed the intervals of ministerial and pastoral activities in compositions for the Church. Many of these have become very popular. His anthems, in the severe and classical style, are constantly found in cathedral use. His Psalm tunes have been freely used in all modern collections. And some of his "Hymns and Sacred Songs" written for his grand children, are very delightful memorials of poetic as well as musical genius. His departure was peculiarly peaceful—more like translation than death.—Tonic Sol-fa Reporter.

BADEN.—The programme of the Fourth Musical Soirée of the Administration included a Concert-Overture by Signor Bottesini, which was well received. M. Alard played two fantasias, of his own composition, on Robert and Faust. Herr Woworsky, from the Royal Opera-house, Berlin, sang an air from Weber's Euryanthe, and took part with Mdlle. Bosse in a duet from Spohr's Jessonda. He was exceedingly successful, so much so that M. Dupressoir presented him in the name of the Administration, with a diamond breast-pin, and engaged him at once for next year.

BIRTH.

On the 8th inst., at 44, Burlington Road, Mrs. RAWDON HASTINGS COMYN (MADAME MARIE STOCKES), prematurely, of a son (still born).

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

LAMBORN COCK & Co.—"Bal Mocrito," arpanetta polka, da L. Badea.
NOVELLO, EWER, & Co.—"Remember Lord, thy mercy" anthem, for four voices, by J. C. Procter.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street, W.
And may be obtained of SIGNOR FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,
HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.
THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. VON WEBER have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Chaste Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s. d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3 0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3 0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	...	3 0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3 0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	3 0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad)	FLORENCE PERCY ...	3 0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED?	ANNIE ANDREWS ...	3 0
	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published
"A SUMMER SONG,"
NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By HENRY WALTON.
Price 3s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

Just Published,

"I FIND OUT WHOM I LOVE,"

SONG.

Words (by permission) from

"THE YOUNG LADIES OF GREAT BRITAIN."

Music by R. T. GIBBONS.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

THREE PIANOFORTE PIECES BY A. GOLLMICK.

"MERRY THOUGHTS." Morceau de salon .. .. 4s.
"ADELINE." Pensée .. .. 2s.
BELLE HUMEUR." Pièce .. .. 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

SUNG BY MISS BANKS,

"ONE MORNING, OH! SO EARLY,"

SONG.

The words from "Mopsa the Fairy," by JEAN INGELOW (by permission).

The Music by CHRISTABEL.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"THE REJECTED FLOWER,"

SONG.

The Poetry by Mrs. BRUCE.

The Music by DEWDROP.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

TARANTELLE,

POUR LE PIANOFORTE.

Par PAUL SEMLER.

Prix 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"MY COTTAGE HOME."

BALLAD.

The Words by the Rev. W. NORVAL, M.A.

The Music by A. M'CARROLL.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published.

TWO SONGS BY MARIA HAYES.

No. 1. "I'M WEARY WAITING" .. .. 3s.
„ 2. "INVITATION" (Barcarolle) .. .. 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 2, Regent Street, W.

Just published,

NEW SONG,

"TAKE THIS FORGET-ME-NOT,"

The Words by Miss E. CORNER.

The Music by ADOLPH GOLLMICK.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just published,

"THE BELSIZE GALOP,"

By EDOUARD SCHUBERTH.

Played with distinguished success, and rapturously encored, at the Belsize Conservative Association Ball, Willis's Rooms, on Tuesday evening, will be published next week by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,

PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.

LYON & HALL,

WARWICK MANSION.

CAMPANA'S

NEW OPERA,

ESMERALDA,

PERFORMED AT

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

WITH IMMENSE SUCCESS.

All the favourite Songs, Duets, Trios, &c., sung by Mdlles. Patti, Scalchi, Signors Graziani and Naudin, are now published.

ALSO,

	S.	D.
The Full Score - - - -	25	0
All the Favourite Airs, by F. Nava	5	0
W. S. Rockstro's Gipsy Rondo -	4	0
„ „ Bolero - - -	4	0
„ „ Brindisi - - -	4	0
„ „ Grand Fantasia -	5	0
Kuhe's Grand Fantasia - - -	4	0
Brinley Richards' Bolero - - -	3	6
Goodban's Fantasia - - -	3	6
Rimbault's Gems of "Esmeralda," easily arranged - - - each	2	0
No. 1. The Bolero. | No. 3. The Quartet.
„ 2. The Brindisi. | „ 4. The Grand Duet.
Dan Godfrey's Esmeralda Galop -	3	0

A QUADRILLE AND WALTZ

By DAN GODFREY are in the press.

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

Digitized by Google

TITO MATTEI'S

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL

COMPOSITIONS.

	Solo.	Duet
Grande Valse	5 0	6 0
Seconde Valse (Bouquet de Fleurs)	5 0	...
I Furtivi (Grand Fantasia)	6 0	...
Pas de Charge (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Il tramonto del Sole	4 0	...
Il fallotto (Galop de Concert)	4 0	...
Un Sogno d'Amore (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Addio del Passato (de Verdi) Transcription variée	4 0	...
Una notte d'Estate (Nocturne)	4 0	...
Etude de Concert	5 0	...
Dancing Leaves	4 0	...
Stergellina (Barcarole)	4 0	...
La Harpe (Romance)	4 0	...
Souvenir d'Italie (Nocturne)	4 0	...
La Gaité (Scherzo)	3 0	...
The Fairy's Reverie	4 0	...
La Mandoline (Etude Caracteristique)	4 0	...
Oh dear, what can the matter be (Transcribed)	4 0	...
Quadrille Brillante (for Piano). 1st Set	4 0	4 0
9/8 Waltz	4 0	...
Non è ver (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Blooms in on the Rye (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Marche Orientale (Bottesini) (Brilliantly Transcribed)	4 0	...
Orphée aux Enfers (Divertissment)	...	6 0
Vaillance (Fantasie Polka)	4 0	4 0
Eco di Napoli (Tarantella Bevignani)	...	5 0
Una Perla (Morceau de Salon)	4 0	...
Le Nid et la Rose (Melodie). Just published	4 0	...
Galop de Concert (Le Bearnais). Just published	5 0	...

VOCAL MUSIC.

Never more ("Non è ver), with English and French Words	4 0	...
Non è ver (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Non torno (Romanza). Sung by Signori Ciabatta e Caravoglia	4 0	...
Lo scapato. Sung by Mr. Santley	4 0	...
Dèh Parla (Romanza)	4 0	...
Io la Perdei (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ternèra (Romanza)	4 0	...
Ma cosa vuol da me (Canzonetta)	4 0	...
Vo Danzar (Valser). Sung by Mdlle. Carlotta Patti	5 0	...
La Pesca (Canzone). Sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas	4 0	...
Margellina. Sung by Signor Stagno	4 0	...
Il farfallone. Sung by Signor Ferranti	4 0	...
Un Rosajo (Romanza) Sung by Signor Cotogni	4 0	...
Niente per Forza (Canzonetta)	4 0	...

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

SYDNEY SMITH'S

METHOD

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE.

Sixty-four Pages, full Music Size. Price 5s.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to ensure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—Examiner, April 30.

"The author leads the pupil on by carefully graduated instructions; the exercises are also admirably progressive, and in the appendix a capital collection of suitable and attractive pieces is given, many of them entirely new, and all judiciously fingered for the instrument of which he is so skilful a master."—Lady's Newspaper, May 7.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

"MIGNON,"

OPERA IN THREE ACTS,

BY

AMBROISE THOMAS.

As sung at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, by Mlles. NILSSON, VOLPINI, TREBELLI, and MM. FAURE, BETTINI, and GASSIER.

THE OPERA COMPLETE, FOR VOICE AND PIANO, WITH ITALIAN AND FRENCH WORDS, 20s.

ATTO I.

No. 1. Stanze (per Basso). Price 3s.

No. 2. Aria (per Tenore). Price 6s.

No. 3 bis. Lo Stesso (per Baritono). Price 6s.

No. 3. (Romanza di Mignon (per Messo-Soprano). Price 5s.

No. 3 bis. La Stessa (per Soprano o Tenore). Price 5s.
No. 3 ter. La Stessa (per Contralto o Baritono). Price 5s.
No. 4. Duetto del Rondinelle. Price 5s.

No. 4 bis. Lo Stesso (per Soprano o Tenore). Price 5s.
No. 4 ter. Lo Stesso (per Contralto o Baritono). Price 5s.
No. 5. Trio. Price 5s.

No. 6. Strofe (per Soprano). Price 5s.

ATTO II.

Intermezzo. Gavotta per Piano Solo Price 4s. 6d.
No. 7. Madrigale (per Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 7 bis. Lo Stesso (per Tenore). Price 5s.
No. 8. Duetto (per Soprano e Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 9. Valsa del duetto. Price 6s.

No. 9 bis. La Stessa (per Mesco-Soprano). Price 6s.
No. 10. Stiriana (per Mesco-Soprano). Price 5s.

No. 10 bis. La Stessa (per Contralto o Soprano) con Varianie. Price 5s.
No. 10 ter.
No. 10 quater. Stiriana Rondo. Price 6s.
Cantata dalla Signora Christina NILSSON.

Aria (Filina) . . Signora VOLPINI. Price 6s.

No. 11. Melodia (per Tenore). Price 5s.

No. 11 bis. La Stessa (per Messo-Soprano, o Baritono.) Price 5s.
No. 12. Recitativo (Cantabile per Messo-Soprano) Price 5s.

No. 13. Duetto (per Messo-Soprano o e Basso) Price 5s.

Sof - - - ferto hai in! - - - - -

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 20s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 31. SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1870. PRICE { 4d. Unstamped. 5d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—LAST GRAND SUMMER CONCERT and fashionable PROMENADE THIS DAY, SATURDAY. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Mdlle. Lewitzky, Madame Sinico; Mdlle. Felice, Signor Peretti, Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Zoboli, Orlo. Full Saturday Band and Crystal Palace Choir. Conductor, Mr. MANN.

These delightful concerts take place in the Central Transept—the most agreeable locale imaginable for concerts in hot summer weather. The enjoyment of music is considerably enhanced by the groups of statuary and bank of flowers. The alriness and general comfort of this vast concert-hall are beyond comparison with the heated atmosphere and closeness experienced in theatres and concert-rooms.

Admission by half-crown tickets, purchasable beforehand, at the Palace, 3, Exeter Hall, and usual agents; by payment at doors, 5s.; or by Guinea Season Tickets. Stalls, 2s. 6d. at the Palace and Exeter Hall.

NOTE.—Rockhills Gardens will be open for promenade from four till seven. The great Wisteria Blossoms, shown an unusual number of autumn blossoms. Cricket match between the Oakfield and Crystal Clubs will be played on the cricket ground. Wickets pitched at eleven.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

LAST NIGHT OF THE SEASON.

For the Benefit of Mdlle. CHRISTINE NILSSON, and positively her Last appearance previous to her departure for America.

THIS EVENING (Saturday), the 1st Act of Verdi's Opera, "LA TRAVIATA." Alfredo, Signor Perotti; Gastone, Signor Rinaldini; Il Barone Douphol, Signor Castelli; Marchese D'Obigny, Signor Ragaer; Medico, Signor Trevero; Flora Bervois, Madame Corsi; and Violetta Valery, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. To be followed by the 3rd Act of Flotow's Opera, "MARTHA." Lionello, Signor Perotti; Plunkett, Mr. Santley, Lord Tristram, Signor Medini; Nancy, Mdlle. Carl; and Martha, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, who will sing "The Last Rose of Summer." To conclude with the 3rd Act of "LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR." Raimondo, Signor Foli; Arturo, Signor Ragaer; and Lucia, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.—Conductor, Signor ARDITI.

Acting Manager .. .. MR. JARRETT.

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the opera will commence at half-past. The box-office of the Theatre is open daily from Ten to Five. Stalls, one guinea; dress circle, 10s. 6d.; amphitheatre stalls, 5s.; amphitheatre, 2s. 6d.

MR. CARRODUS'S QUARTET PARTY.—Violins—Messrs. Carrodus and Val Nicholson. Viola—Mr. Amor. Violoncello—Mr. Edward Howell. All communications to be addressed to Mr. Val Nicholson, 269, Stanhope Street, Regent's Park.

HERR FERDINAND LUDWIG begs to announce to his Friends and Patrons that he will remain in London till August 15th, after which he will return to Germany for Two Months.—1, Albert Street, Regent's Park, N.W.

MISS ROSE HERSEE.

MISS ROSE HERSEE begs to announce her RETURN to England, but that she will be unable to accept any Concert Engagements during her stay. She will return to America at the beginning of September, to fulfil an eight months' engagement as Prima Donna Assoluta of the English Opera Company, and cannot accept any European engagement earlier than June, 1871. 39, Fitzroy Square, W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. EMANUEL'S new song, "THE CHARM," at his principal Engagements. Address for Concerts, Oratorios, &c., 28, Old Bond Street.

MISS FANNY CHATFIELD (Mezzo-Soprano), from the Conservatoire, Cologne, is open to Engagements for Concerts, Oratorios, &c. Address, Fairlawn House, Forest Hill, S.E.

MISS KATHERINE POYNTZ begs to announce her departure to the Continent, and that she will return to Town on the 1st October next. In the meantime all communications to be addressed, care of LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street, W

MISS MARIAN SEVERN will sing HENRY SMART'S popular Song, "THE LADY OF THE LEA," at the Hereford Festival.

MADAME EMMELINE COLE having Removed, begs to request all letters respecting engagements may be addressed to 26, Great Western Terrace, Bayswater.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC. (Average number of Students 100.) Concerts Fortnightly, Town and Country.—Inclusive Fees.—Candidates for the Free Scholarships must attend the Academy Saturdays, from Twelve to Seven, and in return for Lessons, will have to perform in Public when required. Particulars, and opinions of the Press, may be had of C. WEBER, Sec., Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

MISS MARIAN ROCK will play ASCHER'S popular Transcription, "ALICE," at Westbourne Hall, Bayswater, August 9th.

THE Advertizer wishes to obtain a situation for his brother as ASSISTANT or SALESMAN in a Music Warehouse in London. He is a good Musician, both practically and theoretically, and understands the mechanism of the Organ and Pianoforte. He has gentlemanly manners and good address. Salary required, moderate. Address: J.S.H., 7, Birchmore Terrace, Cardington Street, N.W.

MISS ALICE FRITH, R.A.M., will sing WELLINGTON GUERNSEY'S popular Waltz Aria, "THE NAIADES," every evening during the ensuing week, at the Spa, Harrogate.

MISS MARIAN ROCK will play SAUERBREY'S "LORELEY," at Westbourne Hall, Bayswater, Tuesday, August 9th.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

VIOLONCELLOS FOR SALE.

TWO FIRST-RATE VIOLONCELLOS for SALE at Mr. Hart's, 14, Princes Street, Soho, W., the property of the Right Hon. Sir Charles Adderley, M.P. 1. An Amati. 2. A David Techler.

MR. WILFORD MORGAN will sing his popular song, "MY SWEETHEART WHEN A BOY," August 15th, and during the month, at Dublin, Belfast, and Cork.

Now ready, with English Words,

MIGNON'S SONG,

"HAST THOU E'ER SEEN THE LAND,"

SUNG BY

MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON,

With distinguished success, in the new Opera,

"MIGNON,"

The English Words by JOHN OXENFORD, Esq.,

The Music by AMBROISE THOMAS.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co, 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THE BELSIZE GALOP,"

By EDOUARD SCHUBERTH.

Played with distinguished success, and rapturously encored, at the Belsize Conservative Association Ball, Willis's Rooms, on Tuesday evening, will be published next week by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Digitized by Google

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

In the Press, to appear immediately, Nos. 3, 4, and 5, of "REVIVALS," consisting of:—

No. 3. SONATA, in C Major.
„ 4. SONATA, in E Minor.
„ 5. SONATA, in E Flat Major.

BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

(Never before Published.)

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

WAGNER'S OPERA, "L'OLANDESE DANNATO" (Der Fliegende Holländer), the favourite airs arranged for the Pianoforte by ARTHUR O'LEARY, price 4s.
LAMBORN COCK & Co., 62 and 63, New Bond Street. W.

"FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ABBESS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HENRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

Just Published,

"THE WILD ROSEBUD,"

SONG,

Sung by Miss EDITH WYNNE. The Words by GOETHE.

The Music by JOSEPHINE WILLIAMS, R.A.M.

Price 3s.

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Published This Day,

"THE WIND BLOWS FRESH FROM THE LAND."

DUET FOR MEZZO-SOPRANO AND BARITONE.

By HENRY SMART.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

"STAR OF THE VALLEY."

SONG.

Composed by HENRY SMART.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Now ready, with English Words.

OPHELIA'S BALLAD,

"THERE THOU SLEEPEST, WHERE THE FLOOD IS DEEPEST,"

Sung by Mdlle. CHRISTINE NILSSON, with immense success, in the Opera of "HAMLET."

The English Words by JOHN OXENFORD, ESQ.

The Music by AMBROISE THOMAS.

Price 1s. 6d.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"OLGA,"

PENSÉE POUR PIANO.

PAR

LOUIS DIEHL.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA
(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA
(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

Just Published,

"HOPE ON,"

BALLAD,

The Words and Music by Mr. and Mrs. ST. LEGER.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG,

DEDICATED TO MDLLE. NILSSON.

"I LOVE AND I AM LOV'D"

("J'aime, je suis aimé").

PUBLISHED IN A, C, AND D.

Sung with distinguished success in Paris and London. Also transcribed for the Piano

BY L. HIME.

Each sent for 24 stamps.

DUFF & STEWART, 147, Oxford Street.

"The charming singing of the composer himself—Herr Reichardt—and of M. Jules Lefort, has already won for this romantic song a considerable reputation. The style is such as we look for from the author of 'Thou art so near, and yet so far,' and is equally happy with that widely known and favourite ditty. No great compass is required—only from D below to E fourth space—and Herr Reichardt's newest song is conceived in so truly vocal a spirit, and is so effective in performance, that we have no hesitation in commending it to our readers—soprano or tenor. A word for Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, whose translation, free though it be, from the original French of M. Arnould, is a thing to be remembered. Nothing in its way more elegant, more refined, more truly poetical, has been seen for many a day, and the manner in which the spirit, if not the letter of the French is preserved is equally admirable."—The Queen.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE PIANOFORTE. Third Edition. 4s.; free by post for 28 stamps. "It is unapproached by anything of the kind that has hitherto been produced."—Oriental Circular. "It is, par excellence, the book for beginners."—Scholastic Reputor." London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS & Co., New Burlington Street; and of all Musicsellers and Booksellers.

THE CAUSE OF ENGLAND'S GREATNESS. New Song. Words by DR. CARPENTER. Music by J. L. HATTON. Free by Post 1s. 6d.
N.B.—Performed (by desire) three times in one evening by the Buxton Brass Band.

IF A MAN DOES HIS DUTY HE NEEDN'T DESPAIR. Song. Words by C. J. ROWE. Music by J. L. HATTON. Free by Post, for 18 stamps.

TIRED. Sacred Song. Music by Miss M. LINDSAY (Mrs. J. W. Bliss). No 1 in D flat; No. 2 in D. Each free by post for 18 stamps. "It is not at all improbable that this song will shortly rival in popularity her well-known songs, 'Far Away, and 'Resignation.'"—Vide Brighton Gazette.—London: ROBERT COCKS and Co, New Burlington Street.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,
PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS.
LYON & HALL,
WARWICK MANSION.

Digitized by Google

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL.

Professor Heinrich Dorn has published in the Post the following interesting article:—

According to an official report in the Vaus Zeitung, the Berlin Musikverein and the Berlin Tonkünstlerverein have applied to Herr von Hülsen, and requested him to act as chairman of a new Festival Committee, about to be formed. Very sensible!

We well know that Herren Bumke, Phillip, and Thadewald are most worthy men and sterling musicians; their efforts, by means of a Congregation which they founded, to improve the pecuniary circumstances of the poorer class of musicians, have already been attended with material benefits to the performers in small bands, and to the members of the Musical Exchange (Musikbörse) as it is called; but to do anything successfully in Berlin at the present moment, when the eyes of the whole artistic world are directed hither, and after Bonn, as the birthplace, and Vienna, as the residence, of the deceased master, have made every preparation for a Musical Festival of an extraordinary description—there needs a brilliant name, which these gentlemen do not possess, while the institution they represent does not enjoy sufficient credit to accomplish the task they would undertake. The intention, too, expressed in their first address: "Of laying, with the surplus from the Beethoven Festival treasury, the foundation of a Concert Hall on a grand scale, shows only too plainly that they are as far from having formed a correct idea of the expenses to be incurred, as they have of other points, unless Herr von Hülsen and were obliging enough to forward to a different address from the customary one the Opernhause receipts of Fidelio, and the Theatre Royal receipts for Egmont. Let the enterprising gentlemen, who have already retired, console themselves with the consciousness that their intentions were good, and let individual members of the Musikverein support, to the best of their ability, the forthcoming performances.

Just in the same way, the Berlin Tonkünstlerverein had no excuse for placing itself at the head of such an undertaking, save the very justifiable one, that some body or other must take the initiative. In former partner, the Musikverein, was, it is true, in a position to get up, unaided, grand musical performances, and consequently to assist effectually in any performances of the same nature; but this power is utterly wanting to the Tonkünstlerverein, the very small concerts its members able to play any instrument save the piano are either members of the Royal orchestras, or their substitutes, and so little independent that no reliance can be placed upon their promises of co-operation. As I myself, in my character of vice-president, am still an honorary member of the Verein in question, I am well acquainted with the praiseworthy efforts made by it, and I fully appreciate them; but I cannot see in them the foundation on which to raise a Beethoven Festival Committee for Berlin. I, therefore, repeat my firm conviction that it is a very sensible proceeding to change the whole plan, and, with Herr von Hülsen as chairman, form a fresh committee, with which—in just consideration of the original promoters, and also because he would make a most able secretary—Dr. Alsleben should be associated as delegate of the two Associations.

Other names are now mentioned on the committee: Herr von Hülsen, Joachim, Radecke, Ries, and Taubert; these are men whom all Germany knows; men who have not first to be looked up in the Berlin Directory; men with whom it is certain that the artistic notabilities in the commercial world, and among the aristocracy, will gladly ally themselves. For this reason we can no longer doubt that Julius Stern, though not at present in Berlin, will not refuse another invitation to co-operate in the undertaking. Without vigorous support from Stern's Verein and the Singakademie, it would be difficult to get up a really imposing Beethoven Festival. In order to ensure the co-operation of the last-named body, its chief director, Professor Grell, was, of course, also appointed a committee-man, though, on account of his health, he gratefully declined the office, which must necessarily entail great fatigue. The writer, too, of the present lines did not deem it becoming to accept the honourable call made on him; it is sufficient that the future conductors, and the virtuosos who will cast a lustre over the Festival, should be invited by the practical musicians to attend the preliminary deliberations; there is always ballast enough on such occasions—but the vessel must not be needlessly overladen. It certainly would not have been so by a man like Tausig, had he, in this instance, joined the cream of our artistic contemporaries in Berlin, but the act-of for his proposed co-operation was: that Richard Wagner should be offered the chief direction of the Festival. This ridiculously pretentious project was naturally at once rejected, and Herr Tausig subsequently thought fit to return his diploma as honorary member of the Berlin Tonkünstler Verein.

What a strange thing it is that certain persons never learn to distinguish what is becoming from what is unbecoming! For instance, the Vienna Committee asked Herr R. Wagner to be one of the conductors at the Beethoven Festival. Scarcely had the Illustrirte Zeitung of the 16th June published the fact that Herr R. Wagner, 'with grateful appreciation of the honour done him,' declined according to the invitation, than that gentleman trumpeted forth, in the columns of the Vienna papers, that he did not write and answer the committee, but had conveyed his refusal orally through a friend (because certain persons, not fanatic Wagnerites, were on the committee). That a man may be a celebrated composer, and yet not observe the slightest measure in his behaviour, is a fact which—as all the world knows—Wagner has sufficiently shown for years past. This incident, not in the least surprising on the part of the composer of Tannhäuser, would, therefore, hardly have been touched upon here, were it not so different from the conduct of another great artist, who behaved in a diametrically opposite manner under similar circumstances. The Vienna Committee requested Herren Wagner, Liszt, and Lachner, to conduct the most important works; Herren Joachim, Laub, and Madame Clara Schumann, to add lustre to the Festival, by taking part in it as solo instrumentalists. In consequence of the rude expectoration of a man like Wagner, Joachim, the master, stated that though he much regretted it, it was impossible that he could respond to the flattering invitation. He might easily have assigned some material circumstance or other as a pretext for his refusal, if, out of consideration for the persons included in the same invitation, he had not deemed it his duty to be truthful; he would, he said, have gone, had he seen a possibility of his being able to co-operate joyously.

"Had, for instance, the direction of the concerts been confided to one of the local conductors of Vienna, I should not, on such an occasion, have cared about the greater or less amount of partiality I feel for one name or the other, but, simply, like a pilgrim inspired by a hearty wish to dispose my best offerings on the holy shrine, have quietly accommodated myself to existing arrangements. But the direction of the concerts has been confided to artists from other places and with strongly expressed tendencies, and, though I must confess that it would have been impossible to select more celebrated names, I cannot, unfortunately, shut my eyes to the fact that in my opinion, the picture of Beethoven's sublime and simple grandeur, which in plain moral majesty has gradually subjected the entire globe, is thereby disturbed. As, under such circumstances, it would be impossible for me to enter, heart and soul, into the joyous work, I am, doubtlessly, acting in the spirit of the honourable Committee by keeping away from the Festival, in order not to interfere with the unanimous feeling of rejoicing."

This is the language and the behaviour of a true artist!

Although our Berlin Committee, at its first meeting, on the 12th June, selected the 17th December, and following days, as the date of the Festival, their decision may be considerd merely temporary. As regards the Theatre, it is, perhaps, a matter of indifference whether the Festival is held shortly before or long after Christmas; but for the concert-room and all the inconveniences connected with it, the proximity of Old Boguy, otherwise so profitable, might be attended with a certain amount of danger. Videant consules ne detrimentum res publica capiat.

SALZBURG.—The "Kaiser-Concert," as it is termed, was announced to take place on the 18th inst., in the Aula Academica. In September the Beethoven Anniversary Festival will be celebrated.

ALTENBURG.—A genuine Stradivarius, of the year 1708, and which, for a long time past has been in the possession of a family here, was lately purchased by the Russian violin virtuoso, M. Beseklirsky. He gave only the comparatively moderate price of two thousand thalers for it.

LEIPSIC.—The Abbate Franz Liszt left lately for Weimar, after staying here several days. He was present at a concert of Riedel's Verein, when portions of his Missa Choralis were performed. A soirée was also given him by Herr Riedel.—Herr Friederich Hasse, hitherto a member of the company at the Theatre Royal, Berlin, will be the new manager of the Stadttheater. Herr von Strantz, the stage-manager of the first-named establishment, will, it is said, accompany him.

WEIMAR.—On the 8th inst. the Abbate Franz Liszt left here on a visit to the Duke of Meiningen at Liebenstein. He then went to Munich, to be present at the performance of Herr R. Wagner's Walküre. Thence he directed his course to Oberammergau, to witness the celebrated Passions-spiel. It is his intention to return, by Regensburg and Vienna, to Hungary, and, in the house of his friend, Baron von Augus, at Sexard, to live in retirement some months, which he proposes to devote exclusively to his musical labours. Whether he will then return to Rome is a matter of doubt, since he has received a pressing invitation from his friend, and patron, the Grand Duke, to spend the autumn and winter here.

Digitized by Google

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

Among the operas played last week were Otello, Il Trovatore, Faust, and Robert le Diable. These were all repetitions, and it is only necessary to refer once again to Faust, in which a new tenor appeared for the first time. So many young tenors have failed to create any marked impression in the principal character of M. Gounod's best opera that when it is added that Signor Perotti's impersonation showed undoubted intelligence, and that his singing was more than average, we have awarded him considerable credit. That, in spite of his Italian name, the newcomer was not Italian, but German, could hardly fail to be detected. The peculiar quality of the Germao voice and the method of delivering it are unmistakable. Signor Perotti was very favourably received, and we shall doubtless hear more of him. The other chief parts were sustained, as before, by Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (Margaret), Madame Trebelli-Bettini (Siebel), M. Faure (Mephistopheles), and Mr. Santley (Valentine)—to replace any one of whom would not be easy. This was the only morning performance of the season, for which, inasmuch as the house was crowded in every part, it seems hard to account.

The long-promised Italian version of Herr Richard Wagner's romantic opera, Der Fliegende Hollander, under the title of L'Olandese Dannato, was produced at this theatre on Saturday night, with every mark of success. Thus Mr. George Wood has, though late in the season, redeemed another promise, and again justified the confidence reposed in his management. The utmost care has been taken in putting the opera upon the stage; while, to judge from the result, Signor Arditi must have bestowed even more than his accustomed diligence in preparing the music, which, like all Herr Wagner has written, even his earliest known dramatic work, the grand opera of Rienzi brought out some time ago at the Dresden Theatre Lyrique), is trying in equal degrees for orchestra, chorus, and solo singers. The abandonment of the first idea of introducing Herr Wagner as an operatic composer at our Italian Opera by his Tannhäuser, and substituting his Fliegende Hollander, was, we think, judicious; for though between the composition of Tannhäuser and that of the Fliegende Hollander there was only an interval of three years, the Thuringian opera is far more than three years in advance of its immediate predecessor. In the Hollander the composer may be said to have struck into the new system afterwards destined to make such a noise in the world, and to lead to such bitter and acrimonious controversy. Having thus felt his way, he developed it more elaborately in Tannhäuser; and from Tannhäuser to Lohengrin was but a step towards the goal which, through the successive stages of Tristan und Isolde and the Meistersinger von Nurnberg, was ultimately reached in the trilogy of the Nibelungen. If we are to welcome such music and ultimately to adopt the Wagnerian doctrine of the "Art-work of the Future," it is as well to begin from the beginning—with an opera, in short, composed when the Prophet was more like other men. We have always thought, moreover, that Herr Wagner's very best, because least extravagant, dramatic work, was the Hollander, which, amid much that is incoherent and formless, contains much genuine music, and the promise of much more to come. Every step since taken in advance of it seems to us a step in the wrong direction.

The opera is powerfully cast at Drury Lane; and to Senta and the nameless Dutchman, to save whom from perdition the Norwegian maiden sacrifices her life, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska and Mr. Santley are provided with parts which have, already in one performance, enabled them to win the highest possible distinction. The other characters are supported, and well supported by Signor Perotti (Erik the Hunter), Signor Foli (Daland, the Norwegian skipper), Signor Rinaldini (the Helmsman), and Madame Corsi (Maria).

Strange to say, considering the attraction one night suppose would attach to an opera by a composer who, in one way or another, has been the incessant talk of the musical world for more than 30 years, and scarcely any of whose dramatic music, occasional selections at concerts allowed for, is known in England, the house was not crowded. The revenge, however, the audience was uproarious from first to last. The overture which provides material for all the most important dramatic situations of the opera, was loudly encored; and, no wonder, the execution being beyond reproach. Happily, Herr Wagner allows few opportunities for encoring in the course of his work; and had Signor Arditi been satisfied with acknowledging the applause, instead of repeating the overture—perhaps the least coherent, certainly the noisiest piece of the whole—he would have acted more discreetly. However, almost every piece was applauded with more or less heartiness; and this may in a measure be explained by the fact that the audience, from the drawing up of the curtain and the exhibition of the Norwegian vessel at anchor, to the self-immolation of Senta and the disappearance of the Dutchman's ship in the last scene, found themselves in presence of something quite new and strange, something for the greater part unlike anything whatever they had previously witnessed. The calls for the principal singers at the termination of each act were hearty and unanimous.

The operas performed during this week (the last of the season) have been Otello (Monday); L'Olandese Dannato (Tuesday); and Lucia di Lammermoor (Thursday). A composite entertainment, including an act from Traviata, an act from Martha, and an act from Lucia—for the benefit of Mdlle. Nilsson, and her last appearance in England before her visit to America, is announced for this evening—the last performance of the season.

APROPOS OF THE HOLLÄNDER.

"But there arose a colossal genius, a flaming spirit, to whom was decreed a crown of fire and gold." The speaker is Abbé Liszt; the individual spoken of, Herr Richard Wagner, whose star, last Saturday night, was visible above the English horizon for the first time. Previously, nothing but scintillations of its brightness could be detected; and not a few sympathetic souls chafed under the deprivation. Let us hope that, at last, they are happy.

One or two general reflections arise out of the production of Der Fliegende Hollander, and may be best dealt with at the outset. We shall probably hear many quotations of "Magna est veritas," &c, and many remarks to the effect that the English press, having kept Wagner out of the country for years, has, at length, been overcome. There will be great jubilation at the supposed victory of truth over prejudice, and great kindling of hope, now that the Apostle of Future Music has gained a footing in the land. The sight of happiness is always agreeable to a well-constituted mind, and we have not the smallest desire to interfere with the pleasure of young Anglo-Germany. It must be stated, nevertheless, that the habit of persistently keeping Wagner out of England is a chimera, only a little less wild than the poet-composer's own theory as to the opposition he encounters. Herr Wagner went to sleep not long ago, and dreamed of a ubiquitous and omnipotent organisation of Jews, which met him at every turn, eager to be avenged upon the man who sneered at Mendalssohn, and called Meyerbeer "the most despicable music-manufacturer of the period." With regard to England, Herr Wagner saw in his dream that our religion, being largely influenced by the Old Testament, made us very susceptible to the operations of the Jewish league, and secured for his enemies an easy victory. Waking up, he wrote a pamphlet, in which these fancies were put forward as realities; and his disciples naturally imitate their master. Hence the latter was not more self-deceived than are the former. Supposing, however, that the charge made against the press were true, there is an obvious and sufficient justification. It is possible to look upon Herr Wagner's music as destructive to the interests of art; and inasmuch as music upon which all art-interests are staked wage war. To establish a sanitary cordon, in hope of keeping out such poison, would be, therefore, an act of which the doers need feel no shame. We should question its policy, nevertheless; at all events, with reference to the fully-developed Wagnerian theory and practice. Pope's dictum,—

> "Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As, to be hated, needs but to be seen"—

is thoroughly applicable to the art-vice of which we speak—applicable enough even to disprove the sequel; for under no circumstances should we "first endure, then pity, then embrace," say, Tristan und Isolde. It follows that Herr Wagner's opponents can desire no better thing than the production in England, of all his works, and if a manager could be found willing to sacrifice a fortune on their account, he would deserve recouping from the national treasury, with a bonus added.

The foregoing observations are however, very nearly beside the mark when connected with Der Fliegende Hollander. Whatever the fate of the opera may be, it can bear only in a slight degree upon the Wagnerian controversy—for the sufficient reason that the opera itself but faintly illustrates Wagnerian doctrines. The inventor of future music, if Herr Wagner be the inventor (which those will doubt who read the curious correspondence between him and Lelly in Raabe's Cultusstudien aus drei Jahrhunderten), is no Minerva, sprung, fully developed, from the brain of Jove. Like Beethoven he has had "styles," commencing with the Italian-French Das Liebesverbot and Rienzi, just "feeling his feet," to use a nursery expression, in Der Fliegende Hollander—where, also, he came in contact with his beloved legends—and finally running off on his own account in Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Tristan und Isolde, and the Nebelungen. It is probable, therefore, that Herr Wagner now looks upon Der Fliegende Hollander as Jupiter looked at Gaia might have looked upon the toy-spear of his youthful days, and we can imagine how regretfully the composer of Lucerne has heard that London selected what he did at thirty years of age in preference to an illustration of his riper genius. Herr Wagner may, however, console himself with the thought that Der Fliegende Hollander is very good milk for babes, and that, when the digestive powers of English amateurs are stronger, a cry will be raised for something more substantial. Under the circumstances we have detailed, there is no need to argue for or against Herr Wagner's distinctive theories, which his third opera but dimly foreshadows. To those, however, who, knowing somewhat of their realistic character are attracted by daring novelty, we would commend the words of Lortzing: "If art is to be anything at all, it must indulge in a great many things that are unnatural; and herein lies the charm of art, that, notwithstanding its heterogeneous means, it can bring about an illusion that shall resemble real life." To these remarks may fittingly be added those of Goethe: "Herein lies the dangerous demon for you young-sters: You are quick to create new ideas, but how about giving them shape and form? Every branch of art has its weak point in theory, which must be retained in practice, because by suppressing it you come too near to Nature and art is made inartistic." The passage we have italicised may thus be used as an exorcism, and ought effectually to "lay" the ghost of Future-Music whenever it appears.

Digitized by Google

THADDEUS EGO.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The operas represented last week were Lucrezia Borgia, L'Etoile du Nord, Faust e Margherita, and Rigoletto. Lucrezia was given for the benefit of Mdlle. Tietjens, whose very striking impersonation of the Duchess of Ferrara there is not another word to say. Suffice it that the German songstress was greeted as she deserved. The other chief characters were sustained, as before, by Mdlle. Scalchi (Orsini), Signor Graziani (Alfonso), and Signor Naudin, who, most worthy of tenors, played on the same evening in Massaniello, two acts of which masterpiece followed the opera of Donizetti.

The revival of L'Etoile du Nord, with Madame Adelina Patti as Catarina, must always be a welcome event. It is four years since Meyerbeer's gorgeous lyrico-musical romance of history was last played at this house, when Madame Patti essayed Caterina for the first time, and proved herself equal to any Caterina in a musical sense, and in a dramatic sense superior to all. Four years in the accomplished lady have, in consonance with her entire artistic career, been virtually four years of progress, and it would be difficult now to find any point of her performance open to criticism. The characteristic air and dance when Caterina, in gipsy's costume, sings away the Cossacks, or "Calmo sia il mar" (in the libretto les deux se disent), and the expressive prayer and barcarole, when Caterina leaves her friends to follow the wars, in the first act, the animated incidents of the camp and the tent scene, in the second, and the gradual return of Caterina to reason, among old friends and faces, in the third and last, preserve all their old charm, accompanied even by greater spirit and greater finish of detail. The music of Peter is too low for that careful and meritorious artist, Signor Cotogni; who is by no means so much at sea, under other circumstances, as he might be. Nevertheless, there is much to praise in his general conception; and had the always solicitous M-yerbeer been living, he would, doubtless, have made the requisite modifications to ensure the excellent baritone's co-operation—especially since he will sing the romance in C—two movements of which were played on Saturday, and one a year ago—as a whole; so that we need do no more now than express a satisfaction far greater than is usually excited by new works. The finale is especially well constructed, and may lay claim to many merits of being original. Mr. Santley made his own soloist; but, with all due recognition of his skill, we hope the concerto will soon have the better rendering it deserves. Among the successful vocalists was Miss Ferrari, who sang Meyerbeer's "En rain j'espère" with a neatness of execution and a truth of expression warranting great hopes of her future. These remarks fairly apply also to Miss Rebecca Jewell's rendering of Donizetti's "La dea del lago;" and both ladies were honoured by very hearty applause. The orchestra, ably led by Mr. Weist Hill, was entirely composed of those who have at some time or other been connected with the Academy.

Between the parts the prizes of the year were distributed by Mrs. W. E. Gladstone, who was loudly cheered both at the beginning and end of a task which she performed in the most kindly and graceful manner. The list of forthcoming works read ever by Professor Sternlale Bennett, Principal of the Academy, ran as follows: Special letters of commendation for students who had already received silver medals were given to Miss Rebecca Jewell, Miss Linda Scates, Miss Marion Severn, Mr. W. Shakspeare, and Mr. S. Kemp. Silver medals: Miss Wade, Miss C. Gardner, Mr. T. Wingham. Bronze medals: Miss Goods, Miss Bairnsfather, Miss Jessie Ferrari, Miss Pocklington, Mr. Parry, and Mr. Cook. Prizes of books: Misses Westmorland, Whomes, Moultrie, Townshend, Channell, Burleigh, H. Watson, Newman, Taylor, Sophie Ferrari, Messrs. Beazley, Brion, Prentice; Dockes, W. Parker, Walker. Letters of commendation: Misses Field, Crawford, Martin H. Baillie, Bishop, Turner, Salmon, Hurley, and Smith; Messrs. Faning, Howells, and Waddington.

PILLNITZ.—Margarethe Binder died here on the 8th inst., and was buried in the cemetery at Hosterwitz, at which place Carl Maria von Weber passed several summers, and finished Preciosa. This lady was the first representative, both with respect to time and merit, of the heroine in the above opera, and the composer, when speaking of her to the Dresden public, said: "She is the Preciosa I imagined."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The operas represented last week were Lucrezia Borgia, L'Etoile du Nord, Faust e Margherita, and Rigoletto. Lucrezia was given for the benefit of Mdlle. Tietjens, whose very striking impersonation of the Duchess of Ferrara there is not another word to say. Suffice it that the German songstress was greeted as she deserved. The other chief characters were sustained, as before, by Mdlle. Scalchi (Orsini), Signor Graziani (Alfonso), and Signor Naudin, who, most worthy of tenors, played on the same evening in Massaniello, two acts of which masterpiece followed the opera of Donizetti.

The revival of L'Etoile du Nord, with Madame Adelina Patti as Catarina, must always be a welcome event. It is four years since Meyerbeer's gorgeous lyrico-musical romance of history was last played at this house, when Madame Patti essayed Caterina for the first time, and proved herself equal to any Caterina in a musical sense, and in a dramatic sense superior to all. Four years in the accomplished lady have, in consonance with her entire artistic career, been virtually four years of progress, and it would be difficult now to find any point of her performance open to criticism. The characteristic air and dance when Caterina, in gipsy's costume, sends away the Cossacks, or "Calmo sia il mar" (in the libretto les deux se disent), and the expressive prayer and barcarole, when Caterina leaves her friends to follow the wars, in the first act, the animated incidents of the camp and the tent scene, in the second, and the gradual return of Caterina to reason, among old friends and faces, in the third and last, preserve all their old charm, accompanied even by greater spirit and greater finish of detail. The music of Peter is too low for that careful and meritorious artist, Signor Cotogni; who is by no means so much at sea, under other circumstances, as he might be. Nevertheless, there is much to praise in his general conception; and had the always solicitous M-yerbeer been living, he would, doubtless, have made the requisite modifications to ensure the excellent baritone's co-operation—especially since he will sing the romance in C—two movements of which were played on Saturday, and one a year ago—as a whole; so that we need do no more now than express a satisfaction far greater than is usually excited by new works. The finale is especially well constructed, and may lay claim to many merits of being original. Mr. Santley made his own soloist; but, with all due recognition of his skill, we hope the concerto will soon have the better rendering it deserves. Among the successful vocalists was Miss Ferrari, who sang Meyerbeer's "En rain j'espère" with a neatness of execution and a truth of expression warranting great hopes of her future. These remarks fairly apply also to Miss Rebecca Jewell's rendering of Donizetti's "La dea del lago;" and both ladies were honoured by very hearty applause. The orchestra, ably led by Mr. Weist Hill, was entirely composed of those who have at some time or other been connected with the Academy.

Between the parts the prizes of the year were distributed by Mrs. W. E. Gladstone, who was loudly cheered both at the beginning and end of a task which she performed in the most kindly and graceful manner. The list of forthcoming works read ever by Professor Sternlale Bennett, Principal of the Academy, ran as follows: Special letters of commendation for students who had already received silver medals were given to Miss Rebecca Jewell, Miss Linda Scates, Miss Marion Severn, Mr. W. Shakspeare, and Mr. S. Kemp. Silver medals: Miss Wade, Miss C. Gardner, Mr. T. Wingham. Bronze medals: Miss Goods, Miss Bairnsfather, Miss Jessie Ferrari, Miss Pocklington, Mr. Parry, and Mr. Cook. Prizes of books: Misses Westmorland, Whomes, Moultrie, Townshend, Channell, Burleigh, H. Watson, Newman, Taylor, Sophie Ferrari, Messrs. Beazley, Brion, Prentice; Dockes, W. Parker, Walker. Letters of commendation: Misses Field, Crawford, Martin H. Baillie, Bishop, Turner, Salmon, Hurley, and Smith; Messrs. Faning, Howells, and Waddington.

PILLNITZ.—Margarethe Binder died here on the 8th inst., and was buried in the cemetery at Hosterwitz, at which place Carl Maria von Weber passed several summers, and finished Preciosa. This lady was the first representative, both with respect to time and merit, of the heroine in the above opera, and the composer, when speaking of her to the Dresden public, said: "She is the Preciosa I imagined."

Digitized by Google

THE REHEARSAL OF THE AMMERGAU "MYSTERY."

The interest which the representation of the decennial Mystery Play in the Ammergau has again excited among English tourists may warrant us in offering our readers an account of a visit lately paid by a German, Herman Schmid, for the express purpose of observing the preparatory arrangements and training of the actors. Herr Schmid had contributed an account of the Passion Play of 1860 to the pages of the Gartenlaube. He now sends to that journal a narrative of the visit which he paid to Ober Ammergau during Lent of the present year. He started in cold weather, passed frozen lakes and snow clad wood-lands on his upward ascent, and arrived late one evening at the Schabenwirth, the now somewhat noted hostelry of the village. Here he was at once greeted by the sound of a first-rate instrumental band, numbering thirty performers. It was the orchestra, practising the intended prelude of welcome to the audience. The company around him consisted mostly of young men, playing quietly at cards, and having the air of wandering artists. He found that they were mostly intended performers in the play, and, like three-fourths of the Ammergauers, carvers in wood by trade, whence a certain air of picturesqueness which they had imparted to the trimming of their hair and beards. The following morning was a Sunday, and having found that during Lent there was no Sunday acting-rehearsal every week, besides a Thursday musical rehearsal, Herr Schmid hastened to the abode of the parish priest to try whether it were possible to get a view of the proceedings. Herr Müller, the priest, shook his head. The exclusion of every stranger during the rehearsals was, he said, a fixed principle with the Ammergauers. But, indeed, as the snow had broken into the newly erected theatre, of which it had been intended to make the first trial that day, he was pretty sure no rehearsal would take place in the procession; he would inquire, however, he added, moved by the evident disappointment of his visitor and also by the infinential introdnctions which he brought with him, and should he find from the performers that there was to be one, he would lay the request before the assembled corps dramatique, with whom alone rested the decision. Back to his hostelry goes Herr Schmid. There is much busy passing to and fro; he is convinced that a rehearsal is in proparation—evidently he is forgotten or refused. But suddenly in comes the waiter, and summons him to the spot. It is now to be destined theatre that he finds the actors, but in a long, low, temporary apartment, formed by throwing several rooms into one. They are in the midst of their business. At a table near site the pastor, Herr Müller, together with his assessor in the cure, Herr Rochus Dedler, the author of the present text and arrangement of the Passion Play, who, after a quarter of a century's active work in the Ammergau, retired upon a small stipend to remain, emeritus, in the home to which his heart is given. A villager with the book open before him, and ready to act as prompter if needful. Tho visitor retires softly to a window, and at once feels the magic spell upon him. He shall tell his own impressions.

"I had already witnessed and borne a part," he says, "in many stage rehearsals; but at the first glance I saw plainly that this was something very different from a play in the ordinary sense. It was evident, for instance, that proceeded the very remarkable effect which the dramatic performance of these simple villagers unquestionably produces on the beholder. In the first place, I felt convinced that the solemnity of the subject, the thrilling import of its mighty tragedy, was present with and above all technical preparations, and took from them the haste, restlessness, and distraction inseparable from dramatic preliminaries in general. These performers are not occupied with the thought that they are acting a play setting forth as it were a representation of certain transactions apart from their own lives. Rather they are putting their whole selves into their assumed parts—they give the utterance of their own simple feeling without any sort of art or of study. And in this absence of premeditated effect, this spontaneousness, lies the secret of their truth to nature and of the deep impression produced on the beholder. No manager here conducted the arrangement of the scenes, no inspector watched over their succession; nor was any such functionary needed, for all the actors listened and looked their parts when mute, or spoke and moved when the right moment came. Scarcely twice had the prompter to interpose with some trifling correction. Every speech was delivered with precision, every gesture was in order, and, notwithstanding the unfavorable conditions of the temporary stage, even the crowded scenes were performed with a method and accuracy perfectly astonishing; as, for instance, that of the seizure of Jesus on the Mount of Olives and the confusion of the soldiers at His approach; they fall back all at once, literally as if struck by lightning, and yet in well-arranged groups, without any word or sign to guide them beyond the words of the dialogue."

Herr Schmid goes on to observe, in explanation of this dramatic achievement of the Ammergauers, that they perform not from vanity or love of gain, but because they look upon their work as a kind of moral obligation. Then, again, the accuracy of representation has grown into a tradition among them, they have been brought up to know the whole drama by heart, and its decennial celebrations are matters of current history among them from their earliest years. Every posture, every grouping has its prescription. What with the 104 men and fifteen women with speaking parts, the 250 mutes (including children), and the orchestra, stage servants, &c., no fewer than 500 person—half the population of the place—bear a share in the Passion Play. It is a strict rule that none but Ammergauers, born or adopted may perform; and if occasional deficiencies of skill are observable, it is because some new inhabitant has not yet sufficiently imbibed the tradition of the local stage. The artistic taste displayed throughout the arrangements is no doubt partly attributable to the prevalence of the wood-carving trade among the population. The different "characters" are assigned by vote, and it is customary to retain each actor, as far as possible, for the part in which he has already shown his capacity. That Peter is represented again this year by Hett, who performed the part with such inimitable naiveté on a former occasion. Lechner resumes his part of Judas; Lang that of Caiaphas; Annas, Pilate, Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea, and others have also their former representatives. The individual who impersonated the Christ of the drama in 1860 has left the Ammergau and a new man has been appointed for the part, Joseph Meier, also a figure carver, a young man of tall, slight build, and pensive countenance, with a long thick beard and rich hair, good inien, and melodious voice. The character of Mary has likewise a new exponent in Franciska Pflunzer, daughter of a wood carver and drawing-master who performed the part of Christ in 1850, and since then acted that of Annas. Franciea is a slight, graceful girl, having a mild, attractive countenance, and a voice sweet, though not strong. It has an odd effect to see so young a person representing the Saviour's mother at the time of the Crucifixion; but the popular conventional notion of the Madonnas as always young is not to be dispensed with. St. John has a new representative in Johann Zwink, the very embodiment, when properly dressed, of the apostle's figure in the picture of some old master. The parts of Martha and Magdalene are well assigned, the expression being given to the former of activity of tone and the dreamy enthusiasm of the other. Herr Schmid was several times appealed to while the rehearsal was in progress to say what he thought of it, and what faults he could point out:—

"But I took good care, not to make any criticism. What did it matter if here and there the guttural tone which an Ammergau has in common with a Tyrolese, was a little too strong, or if at times the word Vater was pronounced Vatter, or if I could have suggested that this or that sentence might be constructed in a more scholarly style? I was strongly convinced that the character of the whole thing depended on its naiveté and originality, and that no infringement could be made on these qualities without introducing some sense of insecurity and artifice."

In the evening Herr Schmid found himself in a small social circle of the villagers. They had got over their shyness of the stranger, and were ready to make him one of themselves with cordial hospitality. There was the future Peter of the drama, a perfect model for the sculptor, with his natural bald head, full beard, and venerable aspect; Judas, with red beard, pale shrewd countenance, and intense eyes; Annas, with iron-grey beard and thoughtful, melancholy expression. He describes them all as simple, open-hearted, sensible men, content with their moderately gainful trade, whose placid lives are marked to them by the successive epochs of the Passion Play, and whose memories love to linger on the incidents of each repetition. It was with a reverend awe that Annas recalled the occasion when he had been required to perform the part of the Saviour; and his description of the sensations accompanying the mock Crucifixion managed by supporting the body with ropes on a cross so raised that there were three yards between the ground and his feet were very curious. The performers seemed to take great pleasure in the growing interest evinced by the outside world in their exhibition, and to be very anxious to support its credit on the approaching occasion. They gave Herr Schmid an account of the ordinary performances which constitute their theatrical education during the ten years' interval of the Passion Play. These consist chiefly of religious pieces, dramatized legends, and the like; but sometimes modern secular plays are performed, as at one time Schiller's Wilhelm Tell, an arduous effort for a village company. We have heard that Shakspere also has been acted. On the following day Schmid visited the hall where the scenic decorations were being painted. Both here and in the costume department great taste were being shown to rectify certain historic and artistic errors pointed out on the last occasion. And in this direction (it strikes us par parenthèse) may there not be possible room for fear? May not the poison of self consciousness be creeping in?

The stage on which the representation takes place is a very large space, nearly quadrangular, in the midst of which is curtained off a theatre of the usual form. The front of this constitutes a proscenium, and the spaces on each side represent streets of Jerusalem. At the two corners of the middle stage are the palaces of Pilate and Herod, with two stories each, so that no fewer than eight distinct spaces are obtained in which the play can be simultaneously conducted by a mass of performers greater than any ordinary modern theatre is made to hold. A scene like that in which Christ is shown to the multitude, who tumultuously demand Barabbas, has immense effect given to it by this arrangement. The proscenium is curious as a feature of so remote a country theatre, as it would seem to be somehow a relic of classic tradition. Its combination with the subdivided "mystery" stage of the middle ages is still more curious, and affords a hint, Herr Schmid thinks, which might be made available for future stage reform in polished capitals. In the evening he attended a musical rehearsal, where he was greatly surprised at the proficiency displayed by both instrumentalists and vocalists, the former numbering thirty, the latter twenty villagers. The music itself is the composition of one Dadloer-Rochus, a schoolmaster and native of the Ammergau, and is something in the style of Haydn's oratorios. It is simple but melodious, and not without grandeur in some of the choruses: the Hallelujah at the end is very powerful. The effect of the singing, however, was somewhat marred by the absence of a former female vocalist, who had retired to a convent. A deputation had just gone forth to procure leave from the convent authorities for her return to the world for this single occasion, the only one for which she could be induced to leave her retreat. What the success of the embassy might be no one knew, and much anxiety was felt on the subject.

Digitized by Google

FESTIVAL PREPARATIONS.

As the timely presence of a general with his troops is in itself an earnest of victory, it will be gratifying to all well-wishers of the Birmingham Festival to know that the generalissimo of the coming musical campaign joined his choral forces on Monday when the occasion was signalized by a grand review in the customary form. Sir Michael Costa's reception by his vocal corps d'armée was all that the most exacting conductor could desire, and the performers on their part certainly had no cause to complain of the manner in which their exertions were acknowledged. The subject of rehearsal was the cantata—our own work, Naaman, written for, and originally produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1864. The favourable verdict then passed upon it by an enthusiastic, yet critical audience, has been endorsed in the interval, by the musical opinion of London, and, indeed, every other town where the work has been heard, and Naaman has now taken its stand firmly among the most attractive and original productions of the oratorio class which belong to our time. It is somewhat and not altogether creditable to the gratitude of the Birmingham Festival managers, that so charming a work by a man moreover so closely allied to Festivals ows so much, should not have been heard again even in a fragmentary form, since the occasion of its first production; but we ne d not now dwell on that neglect, seeing that Naaman is announced for performance on the Wednesday of the festival week. In view of this event, of course, its rehearsal has become necessary, and as no one can be so competent to conduct that preparation as the composer himself, Sir Michael Costa has had to begin his Festival drudgery rather sooner than might otherwise have been the case. At the conclusion of the practice, Sir Michael courteously apologised for detaining the choir beyond their usual hour on the previous evening. He added that he would come down again for rehearsals on the 15th, 17th, and 19th of August, after which time he hoped further practice would be unnecessary. Till then, however, there would be three rehearsals weekly. Mr. Peyton, in the course of the evening, stated that he had just received a letter from Dr. Hiller, who was rather uncertain, in the present state of affairs, if it would be possible for him to come to England; but he hoped it might, in which case he would ask the choir to give him an extra night for rehearsal.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Daily Telegraph speaks of the performance of Der Fliegende Holländer in these terms:—

"The general performance, while not free from shortcomings, did great credit to Signor Arditi's skill—band and chorus, for example, satisfying all reasonable demands. It need hardly be pointed out that the Hollander is by far the most prominent character in the opera. Even when absent from the stage he is present to the mind, so well has his personality been interwoven with the general structure of the plot. Any cast weak here is, therefore, certain to fail, however excellent in other respects. Happily the Drury Lane management could command the services of Mr. Santley, whose impersonation of the Dutchman was one of those great successes which come but rarely, even to the best artists. For England at least, our English baritone has "created" the part; and we can conceive nothing more natural or more safe than a recognition of this fact by his successors, should there be any. Art, garb make-up, Mr. Santley was perfect. His Hollander looked like a man weary and worn by present anguish, and by that "hope deferred, which maketh the heart sick;" while every movement seemed labour against the weight of a fearful doom. No more pitiful figure can be imagined, nor one more likely to excite the devotion which, at length, terminated his wanderings. Not to dwell upon every detail, we may instance the second act as embodying Mr. Santley's most striking display of dramatic power. The eager yet melancholy gaze so long directed by the Hollander upon Senta; the pathetic expression given to his rising hope of redemption though her agency; and the rapture with which he receives an assurance of the maiden's love, are but a few from among many examples of art not far short of the highest. It may be superfluous to declare that Mr. Santley sang magnificently; but we must do so nevertheless, because we remember what sort of music he had to sing. Few things are more trying than the Hollander's soliloquy in Act 1; fewer still demand higher qualities in the interpreters than the duet in Act 2; but Mr. Santley was never wanting. Englishmen have had reason to be proud of this artist—they have now reason to be prouder still. The Senta of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska was worthy of Mr. Santley's Hollander. To no prima donna before the public is the rôle better suited, and assuredly none could have made it more effective. Mdlle. di Murska's dramatic resources carried her triumphantly through the very exacting situations in which she appeared, while the character was prevented wholly in the light properly belonging to it, as that of a woman animated by a spirit of self-sacrifice, not less unswerving than heroic. To say that the clever Hungarian lady sang with correctness and force is simply to declare what everybody is prepared to assume. Daland is but a commonplace individual, with no penetration, and little sympathy. As a master piece individual, with no penetration, and little sympathy. As a master piece individual, with no penetration, and little sympathy. As a master piece

ERRATUM.—The New Valse de Salon performed at Miss Ellen Jarman's concert, was the composition of Mr. Frederick Jewson, not of Mr. Frederick Lawson, as stated in our last week's impression.

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1870.

SQUABBLES.

OUR German cousins are unanimously shouting, "With God for King, and Fatherland," all their political differences and rivalries being lost in presence of a common object of hate. So much the better for their warlike prospects. Karl Blind and Von Bismarck charging a Frenchman, side by side, is an edifying and a hopeful spectacle,—save to the Frenchman, who can hardly be so much master of the situation as when those doughty heroes pommel each other. It would seem that German hate is stronger than German love. The face of an enemy unites Teutonic hearts and hands; the name of their greatest genius sets them quarrelling and scolding like female paupers over the last parish loaf. The contrast is not creditable, especially after the very tall talk in which they indulge respecting their great men. Nobody can use more lofty expressions than your German; he evolves out of his moral consciousness (whence the famous camel) an appreciation of merit in the abstract which is itself an abstraction; and so the quintessence of German humanity bows before the sublimation of German genius, the world and all its belongings—petty passions and the like—being removed to an infinite distance. This is the pretension; the reality appears to be somewhat different. Let us show it.

The folk of Berlin are, or were, getting up a Festival in honour of Beethoven, intending it to come off next December. One would have thought the illustrious name of the greatest musician competent to act as oil upon the waters of German musical controversy. Had the case been put to us beforehand, we should have pictured an instant cessation of strife, and a mighty unison of previously squabbling tongues, lifting a "Hoch" to the very heavens. Has this happened? Not a bit of it. The name of Beethoven has simply afforded a new pretext for mutual throat-catching and be-pommelling. The initiative of the Festival was taken, it appears, by Herren Bumke, Phillip, and Thadewald, Whereupon it was said by those who did not take the initiative—"These are men of no name; worthy men and sterling musicians, doubtless; but not brilliant. Herren Bumke, Phillip, and Thadewald, be pleased to remove your respectable individualities out of the way, and make room for those who do not require to be looked up in the Directory." Exeunt Herren Bumke, Phillip, and Thadewald, feeling very small indeed; and enter a band of men with names, not having among them Herr Tausig, the pianist. But Herr Tausig was invited—nay, pressed to give his services to the honour of Beethoven. "Come, O Tausig," said the Committee with names,—"come, let us worship and bow down at the shrine of genius." Did Herr Tausig gird up his loins and run? No. He thought of the living Tausig more than of the dead Beethoven, and tried to get out of the latter a means of honour to the former. "I, Tausig, the pianist, will make capital out of this matter. I will assert my power, advance my friends, and then do honour to Beethoven." He tried it on:—"Gentlemen of the Committee with names, I will join you on one condition—Herr Richard Wagner must be sole conductor." The Committee shook their illustrious heads derisively. "Very well, gentlemen, then there is no Tausig for you; and I forward, moreover, my resignation as honorary member of your Tonkünstler Verein." Poor Beeth——, no; poor Tausig!

The scene changes to Vienna.

Somebody or somebodies took the initiative of a Beethoven Festival in the Austrian capital, under the very shadow of Beethoven's tomb, where, if at all, the voice of squabbling should be hushed. These would have several conductors, and Herr Richard Wagner should be one of them, as became his position in the world o German music. So they called upon Herr Wagner; but the Prophet declined—said a Vienna paper—"with grateful appreciation of the honour done him." This statement Herr Wagner could not brook. Was it to go forth to the world that he, Richard Wagner, had behaved like a gentleman, and shown himself amenable to the ordinary courtesies of life? Perish the thought!—else, where would be the difference between Richard Wagner and other men? So the Prophet wrote to the Vienna papers:—"I never troubled to answer the Committee, but told a friend I should decline, who told somebody else." Thus Herr Wagner cleared his character of the grave suspicion of doing a civil thing, and rehabilitated himself in the estimation of his friends. Herr Joachim was also invited to co-operate, and he, too, acted characteristically—that is to say, he wrote a polite reply; but even Herr Joachim could not associate with some others to whom the committee's favour had been extended. Here are his words:—

"Had, for instance, the direction of the concerts been confided to one of the local conductors of Vienna, I should not, on such an occasion, have cared about the greater or less amount of partiality I felt for one name or the other, but, simply, like a pilgrim inspired by a hearty wish to dispose my best offerings on the holy shrine, have quietly accommodated myself to existing arrangements. But the direction of the concerts has been confided to artists from other places and with strongly expressed tendencies, and, though I must confess that it would have been impossible to select more celebrated names, I cannot, unfortunately, shut my eyes to the fact that, in my opinion, the picture of Beethoven's sublime and simple grandeur, which in plain moral majesty has gradually subjected the entire globe, is thereby disturbed. As, under such circumstances, it would be impossible for me to enter heart and soul into the joyous work, I am, doubtlessly, acting in the spirit of the honourable Committee by keeping away from the Festival, in order not to interfere with the unanimous feeling of rejoicing."

All who know Herr Joachim must feel the pain involved in this refusal, and the strength of the motives which induced him so to act. But is it not pitiful that over the tomb of Beethoven there should be discord among those who profess to reverence his memory? Contending Italian factions have been known to cease their strife and kneel side by side, till the Host had passed; when they rose and went at it again. Cannot our squabbling German friends take counsel by the lesson?

AT last one of the operas of Richard Wagner has been produced on the English stage. Judging from the scantiness of the attendance—the house was little more than half filled—the curiosity to hear it could not have been intense. The audience was in a great measure composed of professors of music, soi-disant amateur critics, their ancients and familiars. These, as a rule, are unprofitable customers. We remember seeing a letter from the publisher of a musical paper, requesting one of his contributors to discontinue a very remarkable series of original articles,—"for," said the publisher, "all our intellectual readers are on the free list." If the director of the Italian Opera Drury Lane ever chanced to see this letter, the first performance of Der Fliegende Holländer, under the Italian title of L'Olandese Dannato, may probably have brought it back to his memory. The real paying public kept away; but the professors, &c., went to the theatre in shoals. They were all, like the music publisher's "intellectual subscribers"—on the free list. Their enthusiasm was wonderful, almost as wonderful as that of the daily papers on the Monday following, and almost as unaccountable. Wagner is now, if the audience of Saturday last may be accepted as arbiters of taste, safely installed among us. In the course of time we shall be alive to his transcendent merits, and impregnated with the truth of his "system"—a system which sets aside music as an absolute art, denies the generally accepted relations of keys to each other, and scoffs at independent, rythmical melody.

Digitized by Google

So be it. If Wagnerism is truth we shall all find ourselves the wiser and the better for its adoption. But it should be clearly understood that the whole Wagner is not in the Fliegende Holländer—nay, not the twentieth part of the whole Wagner. In Tannhäuser there is more of him; in Lohengrin more still; but it is not till we come to Tristan und Isolde that we behold the man and his system in their edifying completeness. Strange to say, we prefer the Fliegende Holländer, which is both interesting and intelligible, to the "whole Wagner," which is neither interesting nor intelligible. Nevertheless, we urgently recommend Tristan und Isolde to the attention of our operatic managers; it will form a strong and healthy contrast to the Sonnambula, the Trovatore, and other works, popular in spite of their simplicity. Once conquer Tristan— and the Niebelungen follows as a matter of course. When we have swallowed the Niebelungen—then, and not till then—we shall have swallowed the whole Wagner.

"Sir Tristram was a champion doughty"—

There is one little difficulty, however. To get up Tristan would alone occupy about a twelvemonth; so that two seasons of a London Italian Opera will have to be exclusively devoted to rehearsals—not a single performance, under the circumstances, being possible. The subscription then must be—for rehearsals only.

P.S.—At the second performance of L'Olandese, the professors, &c., again went in shoals, and the real paying public kept away. At the same time the work has many great beauties, and is admirably performed; moreover its production is highly creditable to the management.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

SAPETE che cosa ha detto Pippo Pippi che ci vuole per giudicare la musica di Wagner? Nientemeno che "lunghi e complicati studi; spirito educato sapientemente; senso dell' udito esercitato nelle sue varie manifestazioni; memoria molteplice per ben confrontare, e finalmente una specie di natura eclettica per saper discernere e gustare il bello negli stili (e anche ne' pugnali?) e nelle scuole disparate."—C' è da ringraziare ancora se per giudicare la musica di Wagner non ci sia bisogno di aver studiato l' astronomia, l'algebra, la geometria, l'ostetricia, e di aver una rendita di 50,000 lire . . . . ed i capelli lunghi!

"Pourquoi prolonger la querelle?" says Monsieur de Retz in Le Ménestrel, referring to his little difference with ourselves. Ah! why indeed? We have not the smallest desire to do so, because, having chastised Monsieur de Retz once, we wish to forget all about him till he offends again. But he will not let us forget; and, even in his last letter, there is a reminder of the famous twenty Hanoms. "Le Musical World," says Monsieur de Retz, "est furieux que je me permette d'avoir un avis different du sien." Dear Monsieur de Retz, curb the gambols of that lively imagination which suggested the Hanoms, and look soberly at actual facts. We shall never wax furious at your differing from ourselves, but rather rejoice as at a proof that we are right. What brought down upon you our lash was a garbled translation made to back up your own opinions. Don't do it again, Monsieur de Retz, or, instead of visiting you with whips, we shall try the effect of scorpions.

IN a recent number of the Economist appeared the following, apropos of one of the analytical programmes issued by the Philharmonic Society:—

"We are in favour of analytical notices of the music performed at all concerts being distributed among the audience, but, very reluctantly, all concerts being distributed among the audience, but, very reluctantly, object to Mr. Macfarren's opinions, valuable as they are, being so positively expressed as they were in the programme on this occasion. An analysis of a composition need not be, and in fact should not be, a criticism. The object of the writer of such a notice should be to point out the salient features of each work, its progress and plan of construction, and leave the hearer to form his own opinion of the composition as a whole. Such an analysis assists the listeners in following the intentions of the composer, but a criticism, however just and impartial, is not required, and becomes objectionable when it is enthusiastic."

THE infinence of war upon music has already become apparent. They shout the "Marseillaise" and "Le Rhin Allemand," in France ceaselessly; while Germany retorts by vociferating any known song (Legion is the name) which "cracks up" the Fatherland. So far, there is no harm done. If the soldiers of William and Napoleon find their march to the grave relieved by such means, who will deny the poor fellows whatever consolation they may get out of it? But the war has estopped music of a different sort, elsewhere. This is the centenary of Beethoven's birth and Germany was preparing fêtes in honour. Was preparing, mark you; for the actual "is" preparations of another sort. Who knows but that next September, when the Beethoven statue at Bonn should have lowered above a worshipping crowd, the stone effigy may not be in as many pieces as ever was God Dagon before the Ark of Israel? Bombs are indiscriminating.

BETWEEN the parts of the Royal Academy Concert, elsewhere reported, Professor Bennett addressed Mrs. Gladstone on behalf of the Committee, thanking her for again undertaking to distribute the rewards to the deserving students, and stating that he felt sure she would be glad to know that at no period in the history of the institution had there been so many students as at the present, and that the result of the examinations had been most satisfactory. He then proceeded to say with regard to the rewards themselves they were divided into "letters of special commendation," silver medals, bronze medals, books, and "letters of commendation." The first named were given to students who, having already gained the highest prize that the Royal Academy bestows, cannot be rewarded otherwise than by a special letter of commendation from the Committee.

A CURIOUS piece of patchwork must have been the "Grand Requiem" proposed by Verdi to be written by no less than thirteen composers as a tribute to the memory of Rossini. The performance was not to take more than one hour and a half, thus allowing about seven minutes to each composer. No restriction of key or time was laid on any of them beyond the obligation of "beginning and ending in the initial key" (whatever that may mean). The following were the expected contributors to this strange work:—Bazzini, Bazzini, Pedrotti, Cagnoni, Ricci, Nini, Boucheron, Coccia, Gaspari, Platancia, Petrella, Mabellini, and Verdi. Whether it was ever completed or ever performed we are unable to say. *

Die Walküre has been completely "snuffed out," to use a homely but expressive form of speech, by the war. But the public at Munich had had enough of it, even before the outbreak of hostilities. Of course the Wagnerites will attribute exclusively to the war the want of interest shown for this last effusion from the bipenned Prophet of Lucerne. To them, at any rate, the war will prove useful, as it will furnish an

* It was completed, performed, and laid on the shelf.—A. S. S.

Digitized by Google

exeuse for the non-success of Die Walküre.—A quelque chose malheur est bon. The artists, no doubt, are as tired of the work as the public, only they are not so anxious for its withdrawal, because it is for them a very generous milch cow. Mdlle. Kinderman and Herr Stehle receive five hundred florins every time they play in it, and the other leading artists two hundred florins each. Surely these are what Horace would call "Attalica conditionea." Would that we could speak as favourably of all the new-fangled tenors employed by Herr R. Wagner in his operas as the singers can of the terms they obtain for appearing in those operas.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

We had unintentionally overlooked the concert given by Mdlle. Sedlatzek on the 15th ult., whereat the bénéficiaire sang, in excellent style, Engel's "La Rosa," Adler's "Voglein wo hin so schnell," Virginia Gabriel's "Bery," and, with Mdme. Lancia, Donizetti's "A figlia incanta." All Mdlle. Sedlatzek's efforts were well received; and the concert, as a whole, gave much satisfaction. Mr. Emile Berger was the conductor.

Miss Emma Wellisch's concert, on the 15th nit, was distinguished most of all, by her playing of the Introduction and andante from Beethoven's Sonata Pathetique, Osborne's dnet, "Les Huguenots" (with Mdme. Ward), and several selections of less importance. That Miss Wilfisch is a clever and rising painist those who noticed her facility and intelligence in different styles could not have the smallest doubt.

A successful inaugural meeting of the Bow and Bromley Institute was held last week in the recently built room over the Bow Railway Station. Mr. Samuda, M.P., was in the chair. The musical arrangements, under the management of Mr. W. J. Fielding, were most ably conducted. Tha glees, "My Love's like the Red Rose," "The Chafers," "The Chongh and Crow," and "Come, boys, drink," were excellently sung. Mr. Chaplin Henry's song, "Homeward bound" and Mr. Fielding's "Birth of St. Patrick" were deservedly encored; whilst Miss Palmer's "Rescued," Mr. Cummings' "Tripping through the Meadow," and Miss Wells's "Old Cottage Clock," were all in good taste and highly applauded. Mr. Joyce Fielding was an efficient accompanist; but the special favourite of the evening appeared to be Miss Amy Weddle, who, for her playing of a grand fantasia, and "La danse des Fées," received quite an ovation.

A concert was given in St. James's Hall on Monday week, in aid of the funds of St. John's Hospital for Diseases of the Skin, Leicester Square. The artists were Mesdames Dunord, Banks, Crellin-Pyne, Baxter, Faulle, Deck, Della Motte, Crevelli, Cassell; Messrs. Jules Lefort, Urio, Belletti, Deck, and Montebelli, vocalists; Mdlle. De Bono, Chevalier De Kontski, Herr Oberthür, M. Paque, and Signor Gene, instrumentalists. Miss Banks sang "Ah, my heart is weary!" (Kate Ward) and "The Faithful Echo" (Gans). Madame Dunord gave "L'Enchantress" (De Kontski), and (with Signor Urio) Verdi's "Miserere," in excellent style. Madame Baxter sang "Quando a te lieta" (Gounod), accompanied by M. Paque; Madame Faulio gave "O mio Fernando" (Verdi); Signor Urio sang the tenor romanza from Faust; Mdlle. De Bono played a solo for violin (Vieuxtemps), and Chevalier De Kontski a fantasia of his own. Herr Oberthür's solo harp was much applauded, as was M. Paque's fantasia for violoncello The audience was large.

The pianoforte recitals given by Miss Kate Roberts are always interesting, and attract considerable attention both on account of the selection of music and the way in which she executes every number. The last recital was no less attractive than the previous ones, and drew together a numerous audience. The principal features were Schumann's Quartet in E flat, Bach's Concerto in C minor for two pianofortes, Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriciuso, Chopin's Polonaise, for pianoforte and violoncello, and Handel's Hornpipe. The quartet of Schumann is one of those compositions which makes large demands on the executive skill of a pianist, and can only be done justice to by one of the première force. It is, however, one of Schmann's best appreciated compositions, and, well performed, cannot fail in producing a favourable impression. The scherzo, as well as the other movements, was done full justice to by Miss Kate Roberts and her able coadjutors—Herr Wilner (violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts's (viola), and Mr. E. Howell (violoncello); Miss Kate Roberts's performance of Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriciosa is too well known and admired to need comment. The introduction of Handel's "Gigue" or "Hornpipe," was, however, a novelty, and received especial attention. Miss Kate Roberts was called upon to repeat it, so charmingly was it rendered. In Bach's concerto Miss Roberts was joined by Mr. A. Barth as pianist, and Mr. Reynolds as contra-bassist. Miss Ellen Glanville contributed some vocal music, which agreeably varied the proceedings.

A morning concert was given in the Hanover Square Rooms on the 15th inst., by Herr Ferdinard Ludwig, a pianist whose pretensions lie in the direction of classical music. Herr Ludwig played first, Beethoven's Sonata in D major (Op. 10), doing so in a style which showed him to be an able exentant, as well as a conscientious and intelligent artist. He was loudly applauded, not with conventional applause but with the genuine article, which, when found, there is no mistaking. Herr Ludwig also distinguished himself in an Andante Religioso for soprano voice, violoncello (Herr Daubert), harp (Mr. Chatterton), and piano. The composition, a very pleasing one, was ably rendered; Mdme. Rudersdorff, doing every justice to the vocal solo. A selection of smaller pieces by Schumann, Mendelssohn, &c. was next performed by the concert-giver, the result being to convince his audience that a pianist of no mean rank had appeared before them. Besides the artists already named Herr Ludwig was assisted by Mdlle. Liebhart, Miss Alice Fairman, and Mr. Lewis Thomas; each of whom materially promoted the success of the concert.

GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.

Miss Fanny Holland's first benefit at the Gallery of Illustration took place on the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday, when her admirers assembled in large numbers. The programme consisted of Ages Ago, a new operetta, The Bold Recruit, by Mr. F. Clay, and Mr. Corney Grain's "Musical Sketch." So much has been already said about the admirable performances at this popular place of entertainment that we have only to state now that Ages Ago had all the merits of previous representations; that The Bold Recruit was received with much favour and is likely to prove attractive, and that the applause bestowed upon Miss Holland must have been as gratifying to her as the acknowledgment of her merits undoubtedly was to her numerous admirers.

REVIEWS.

The reviewer's pen may have been idle through the crush of the season now drawing to an end, but composers and publishers know no rest. Like Tennyson's "Brook," they "go on for ever;" and we must either marvel at the faith displayed in an omnivorous musical appetite, or the appetite itself which can absorb so much that is worth so little. From the huge pile of new works before us we select immediately a batch of songs, most of them capable of being easily dealt with, and, therefore, such as become the present high temperature, both for critic and reader.

"Oh, meet me at the stile" (a very slight variation upon "Meet me in the lane") is a simple and correctly-written ballad by Richard Fletcher, who publishes it at 10, Winsley Street. There is really nothing more to be said about the work, save that the verses are, here and there, of doubtful quality. Why, for example, does the poet talk of hours meeting "as the rain?" when "as the snow" would have been more correct. But—we beg pardon—"rain" rhymes with the last syllable of "again," and poetry is crépiante. "My Native Land" (C. Lowdale), a song by Mr. Frederick Boscovitz, has the true ring of nationality about it, a bold and fluent melody being especially noticeable. We must, nevertheless, object to the heterogeneous character of the accompaniment, which boasts of three different styles in each verse. By-the-by, British hotel-keepers should combine to sue for the gratis distribution of copies. Let them mark this sentiment:—

> "My native land, my native land,
> I love, I love but thee,
> In other lands I will not dwell
> Nor other countries see.
> I care no more for sunny France
> Nor any distant shore,
> My boast shall be my British home,
> The land where I adore."

Where is "mine host" who does not believe that these verses do equal honour to the poet's head and heart, especially at the beginning of the touring season. It is to be hoped, however, that the fraternity will not count too much upon the success of Dr. Rabies's song, and postpone that long-delayed reduction in the price of claret.

Miss Virginia Gabriel is, as usual, a diligent contributor to our stock of ballads. In her "Desirée" (Chappell & Co.) She had to contend with verses not of the most inspiriting sort, and the result is far from happy. Moreover, both melody and accompaniment are commonplace. "Cleansing Fires" (Cramer & Co.) has often been sung by Mr. Santley; and its character is, therefore, known. We may say, nevertheless, that the song does Miss Gabriel very great credit; and if favour be secured by worth, will take a high place in public esteem. "Sowing and Reaping" (Chappell & Co.), a sacred song of somewhat original construction, though presenting no originality of theme, will find many admirers, by whom an instance of consecutive octaves which occurs in each verse, is not likely to be regarded as of much importance. Such blemishes, however, occur frequently in Miss Gabriel's music, and should be guarded against. Mr. J. L. Molloy's song "The Wandering Jew" (Boosey & Co.) is more remarkable for Mr. C. L. Kenney's powerful verses than for anything else. The music is an obvious imitation of Schubert; and all its effects are echoes, more or less faint, of what the great German-song composer has made familiar. But Mr. Molloy should be credited with having chosen a noble model; and followed it closely enough to prove that, if not an original writer, he is the next best thing—a good imitator. "There was a Rose" (Duff & Stewart) presents an excellent example of Mr. Berthold Tours's peculiar style and skill. We like its melody and general construction very much; but not Mr. Tours's fondness for roaming about in search of keys. His use of the minor seventh is incessant, and the effect is as though one had got into a labyrinth without the convenient ball of thread which serves as a guide out again. Mr. Tours is a musician of ability, and, we are sure, has no need to shelter weakness behind a cloud of chromatics. The words are mystical and, sometimes, awkward; as when the poet says:—

Digitized by Google

> "The world could never tear it, love,
> That gem of gems from me"

—we know, of course, what he means, but the form which conveys the idea is an extremely queer one.

"The Bright Sun is Shining" (Weeks & Co.), by Catherine Few, has the merit of timeliness, and is, undoubtedly, a well-meant, not altogether unsuccessful, effort. But what may be the fair composer's reason for writing D, C, in the melody, against C, B flat, in the bass; Anybody able to produce a song so generally correct must have a motive when committing such an offence, and we are lost in wonder at its nature. Perhaps, however, the printer is to blame and not the composer. "Sibyl" has written two songs, "Up-hill," and "When I am dead, dearest" (Weekes & Co.). The first is a sort of dialogue between a traveller and an unimpersonal responder; the traveller asking, among other things, the superfluous question, "Does the day's journey take the whole long day?" "Sibyl's" music is of such a quality that we cannot waste time upon it. She should submit it to a corrector who knows what are the accepted rules of composition. This course she apparently took with "When I am dead, my dearest," a song so good and so well written that we can hardly imagine it as coming from the same hand. The subject is mournful, but to those who see in this no objection, "Sibyl's best effort will prove acceptable. Herr Reichardt's new song, "I love and I am loved" (Duff & Stewart), is written in the composer's well-known style, and equally deserves popularity with the best of his previous effusions. In construction it is somewhat elaborate, but there is an appropriate meaning belonging to every distinctive feature, while the effect of difficulty nothing stands in the way of general use. The original French verses have been translated by Mr. J. V. Bridgeman with his customary care and success. "Fire-side Dreams" (Cramer & Co.), Herr Reyloff's latest song, has been rendered familiar by Madame Sainton, and we need not enter into details about it. Enough that the music is not much to our liking, and that the words, if they teach anything, hold no second marriage as the best consolation for afflicted widowers, which may, or may not, be true. Mr. C. H. Couldery's "Come, May, with all thy flowers" (Lamborn Cock & Co.), is a lively and pretty effusion, appropriate to the season it invokes, and, therefore, likely to have a favourable reception. There is nothing particularly original in its melody or accompaniments, but the qualities we have named go a great way. Another song by the same composer, "Oh, Charity, blest Gift of Heaven" (Lamborn Cock & Co.), supplies another example of Mr. Couldery's ability, and, with its companion, deserves the favourable notice of those who would encourage efforts worth encouragement.

"I'll twine for thee a wreath of flowers" (Ashdown & Parry) is a setting of Lord Byron's well-known words, by Robert Hilton, a member of the Salisbury Cathedral choir. As a rule he does well who expects little of anything from cathedrals, especially of anything good in music. The song before us makes no great pretensions, and is exactly what a singer might purvey for himself who has to meet the requirements of a dinner connection. Of its kind, however, it is a good thing. The melody is pleasant, if not striking, and the unassuming accompaniments claim the merit of correctness. "On the Crest of the Green Wave dancing" (Chappell & Co.) is a spirited song by W. S. Rockstro, written with freedom and effect, while not suggestive of previous effusions upon the same attractive subject. The words present rather a curious jumble. In the first verse we have a sketch of the fisher-boy "drenched by the angry sea, and numbed by the pitiless cold." In the second verse the boat comes to the front and the poet says of it:—

> "The saucy craft sits laughing,
> As though she would fain implore
> Oh here let me ride, on the full spring tide,
> And be tossed by the foam no more."

The idea of a "saucy" craft sitting and laughing out a prayer to rot under the pier head is certainly original. The third verse brings forward the boy again; and, assuring us that he is destined to be drowned, offers up a prayer for his ultimate safety to the Great Harbour above. But the singers of songs are not, usually, particular about their words, and, Mr. Rockstro's music being what what we have described, there is no reason why "The Crest of the Green Wave" should not be lifted into popular favour. A ballad by the same composer, "He's none to love but me" (Chappell & Co.) may claim the credit of being a true ballad alike for the narrative embodied and the simplicity of the music. Mr. Rockstro has been content to write an unpretending folks-tune, leaving the singer to make his own effect; this being we need not say, an essential feature in all such compositions. The subject illustrates filial devotion exemplified by a young lady who refuses to marry while her "dear old Dad" survives; and who, when at last "in bridal raiment clad" resolves not to go far from his grave; all which is very touching and laudable, though as a general rule, it might prove slightly inconvenient.

"The Star's Message" (Chappell & Co.), by Berthold Tours, has a familiar though fanciful subject. It represents a mother rocking her fatherless child to sleep, and singing of the message conveyed from heaven by a star which shines upon the cradle. There is much scope in the verses for effective writing, and Mr. Tours has taken advantage of it after his fashion. We are disposed to think, however, that music less obviously striving to make an impression would be more in keeping, especially as those passages where simplicity is apparent—the "Twinkle, twinkle little star," for example—are the best. But the song is, after all, far above the average in point of merit, and deserves corresponding attention. Six melodies for the piano (Cramer & Co.), by T. M. Mudie, complete a set of twelve, the first six of which we noticed some time back. It has often been our agreeable task to point out the elegance with which Mr. Mudie writes, the fluent, Haydn-ish character of his melodies, and the scholarly finish that distinguishes all he does. These qualities are apparent in the works now before us, and entitle them to the favourable regard of every amateur amateur. To give an adequate criticism of each melody would take up more space than we can afford, and it must suffice to mention two or three which strike us as particularly noteworthy. These are a Scherzo in G minor, full of lightness and grace; a Pro-cession March in B flat major, characterised by great dignity and breadth; and a Barcarolle in G major, which ought to become a favourite with all amateur pianists whose taste rises above the ordinary morceau de salon. Mr. Mudie does well to furnish regard of every in some degree, against the twaddle of mere "pot-boilers."

A set of waltzes—"Dreamland" (Lafleur & Son), is the work of G. Reading, and has been, the title-page informs us, "Entered Stairs' Nail," with all mysterious announcement we do not pretend to explain. The same title-page also shows a lady reclining in an easy chair, and gazing steadfastly at the ceiling; near which three angels, much encumbered by wings and robes, are kneeling on a slice of London fog, playing the pipes and harps supposed to be affected in heaven. We presume the angels are playing Mr. Reading's waltzes; if so, we can only say that the fact does not add, in our estimation, to the charm of their celestial company. "O Charity, best gift of Heaven" (Lamborn Cock & Co.), by Claude H. Couldery, shows considerable feeling for the words. The words are excellent, and the song, as a whole, meets with our entire approval. Another by the same composer, "Come, May, with all thy flowers" (Lamborn Cock & Co.), deserves equal commendation. It is pretty, graceful, and appropriate as regards the music; while the verses are of more than average merit.

We have a curious title in a "Welsh Waddeer's Lullaby" (R. W. Ollivier), by G. L. E. Raggett, and our first impulse is to ask why a Welsh waddeer? and why a lullaby? But we cannot expect to get an answer, but the second is met by the fact that a wakeful baby in a "leafy lair" has to be soothed to slumber. The music is pleasing, though the accompaniment is heavy. Miss Elizabeth D. Crose is the authoress of some verses entitled "Lead me forward, O my star" (Boosey & Co.), to which Mrs. G. Holman Andrews has set music. We must congratulate both ladies upon their work, about which there is nothing lugubrious or morbid, such as the title might indicate. Given with taste and expression the song would not fail to make a considerable effect.

Dr. Ferdinand Ræhles has our thanks for his pianoforte arrangement of the Fandango in Le Nozze di Figaro, a charming example of dance music, till lately cut out of the opera to its manifest advantage. Dr. Rahles has done his work well, and presented those lovers of the piano who also love Mozart with an opportunity of gratifying both preferences. Mr. Brinley Richards' fantasia, "Ireland," (Chappell & Co.), is a transcription of "The last Rose of Summer" and "St. Patrick's Day," done in the free and showy style which makes the transcriber so popular. The piece requires considerable executive power, but when well played it is undeniably effective. An autumn song, "When the days draw in again" (Chappell & Co.), displays to advantage the ability of a composer, Mr. Samuel Reay, whose skill has long been recognized. A more charming song we have rarely met with. The melody is a perfect thing of its kind, and the accompaniment, though simple, everywhere reveals the hand of a musician. We can give the autumn song a hearty and unqualified approval. Mr. George Barker's "Dora" (Chappell & Co.) hardly comes up to the same mark. Its phrases are more commonplace; and the whole is less striking. Nevertheless, it has merit, and those who can imitate the brogue of the Green Isle will welcome the song. Schubert's "Gute Nacht" (Chappell & Co.), with German and English words, has been added to the publishers' répertoire of the Monday Popular Concerts. We need not write a line in its praise, such music pleading its own cause with sufficient eloquence. Let those who do not know the song buy it.

Digitized by Google

WAIFS.

The following gentlemen have been elected Directors of the Philharmonic Society for the ensuing season:—Messrs. G. F. Anderson, J. B. Chatterton, J. T. Calkin, Ferrari, J. McMurdie, Williams, F. B. Jewson.

The first secretary of the late Prussian Embassy to Paris is a nephew of the famous danseuse, Taglioni, whose name he bears.

A grand international musical festival is to take place at Antwerp next April should events permit.

M. de Lauzières has undertaken the translation of M. Flotow's L'Ombre into Italian.

M. Pierre Dupont, perhaps the greatest French song writer since Béranger,* has just died at Lyons.

The agent of Mr. Max Maretzek is said to be in Paris organising an opera troupe for New York. Report talks of 150 engagements already made. Why not 1,500 at once, and have done with it?

L'Europe Musicale announces that Mdlle. Sessi has returned to Paris from Covent Garden, "ou elle a été très-fêtée trois mois durant." Has she, indeed!

The French War Minister allowed the young men of the Conservatoire de Musique fourteen days before joining the reserve, in order that the Concours may take place as usual.

A French paper says that the marriage of Mdlle. Reboux will not interfere with her public career. Her husband, we are informed, resides at Cardiff.

The friends of Dr. Spark, of Leeds, will be pleased to hear that he has returned to England, after his lengthened ramble among the organists of Germany. Dr. Spark was compelled to come back vid Hamburg, not being allowed to cross the French frontier.

La Comédie informs us that Mdlle. Nilsson has received at Drury Lane 3,750 francs (£150) per night, the highest sum ever given to an artist, Jenny Lind excepted. We compliment La Comédie on its lively imagination.

In the year 1865 Rossini wrote to the reporter on the bill relating to mechanical musical instruments, which passed the French Chamber by a large majority, a letter in which he said he felt great pleasure in hearing airs of his composition played by the instruments against which the bill was directed.

The Comite des Etudes Musicales, in connection with the Paris Conservatoire, have published a very flattering report on Signor Bottesini's Method for Double Bass. They give, without reserve, their approbation "to this conscientious work of an eminent artist." The report is signed by MM. Auber, Ambroise Thomas, and Victor Massé, among others.

Miss Clara Gottschalk, sister of the late lamented pianist and composer, L. M. Gottschalk, intends to publish, added by Monsieur R. M. Espadero, of Havana, a composer of great talent and friend of her late brother, all the posthumous works of the celebrated artist. The family state that they recognize no edition whatever of the posthumous works except that issued by themselves.

Is a man mad because he loves Scotch music and the bagpipe? We should scarcely expect to be answered affirmatively by a jury North of Tweed; but an Edinburgh Court lately pronounced against the will of a certain Maxwell Stewart. His testament was of a strange character. All young women of seventeen on the lands of Carnoch were to receive a certain sum. The estate of Lochnagar, in New South Wales, was to be applied for the encouragement of Scotch music, especially reels and strathspeys, and the music published by Neil Gow & Sons; and a professor of Scotch music was to teach the violin and the music of that firm, in the parish of Inverkip. The equilibrium of evidence would perhaps have puzzled the Scotch jury; but one fact made the scale of Lochnagar's sanity kick the beam. Maxwell Stuart used to throw open his window every Sunday morning and play the fiddle while people passed to church. That was enough for the twelve good Sabbatarians and true. Stewart might be compos mentis, and yet love a reel; might like a farm-wench, and live like a beggar-man; "play the fiddle o' the Sabbath"!—that was decisive. The jury found he had been as mad as a March hare.

The subjoined letter, apropos of the "Marseillaise," was published in the Daily Telegraph of Tuesday:—

"SIR,—Have the kindness to inform your Paris correspondent and your readers that the melody of the "Marseillaise" is German holy music, found in an old church of the German village Holgheim, to which the French adapted only their words.—Yours, &c., G.

July, 23.

The scene in the Champs Elysées, with the rival open air concerts, singing the "Chant du Départ" against "Monsir pour la Patrie," on Sunday night, was one of extraordinary excitement; but let me note a curious fact, as applicable to the pins and the maps as to street singing—nobody knows the "Marseillaise," just as nobody can make out the line of campaign. The tenor at the Alcazar broke down a night or two ago at the second verse, and there were none present who could put him right. The first verse and the last only trickle easy to men's lips. Everybody can sing "Amour sacré de la Patrie"—but how many understand the reference to Bullier in Rouget de Lisle's verse?

The "Rhin Allemand" was to be sung last Tuesday evening in Paris with much pomp and circumstance. It appears that at the time these verses were composed every one was talking of Becker's lines, which were read out in presence of a select company at Madame Emile de Girardin's house. "You should answer that ode," said the hostess, turning to Alfred de Musset, who immediately lighted a cigar and retired to the garden. Before the cigar was finished he came back with his now celebrated reply, which was warmly applauded by the assembled littérateurs. In those days M. Bulos, of the Revue des Deux Mondes, to whom all Alfred de Musset's efforts belonged by contract, was afraid of awaking German susceptibility and losing subscribers; so he printed "Le Rhin Allemand" in a review with a very limited circulation.

On one occasion last year Madame Adelina Patti was announced to appear in the Figlia del Reggimento, but after the doors were opened and the audience had begun to arrive, notices were posted that Madame Patti was suffering from severe hoarseness, and unable to sing. Another opera was substituted. It was trying after paying fancy prices to hear Patti in the Gazza Ladra or Figlia to be put off with the everlasting Trovatore; but the charming singer's many admirers were, at least, consoled to learn that her recent attack of illness had not been of an alarming kind. The severe hoarseness which prevented her from appearing at Covent Garden had not disabled her from singing at Marlborough House on the same evening, where, it was said, she never warbled more enchantingly.

STOCKHOLM.—Meyerbeer's Dinorah was produced here for the first time a week ago. Mad. Michaëli was highly applauded as the heroine.

* A greater than ever was Béranger, because more healthy in sentiment and more universal in sympathy.—D. F.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

BOOSEY & Co.—"Nocturne," for the Piano, by Joseph McKewan.

ROBERT COCKS & Co.—"Two Spirits pierced their wings," by Anne Fricker; "If a man does his duty," by J. L. Hatton; "Teach me, white Swan, thy Lay," by Alfred B. Burrington.

LAMBORN COCK & Co.—Two Epitaphs, by Herrick (as one composition) for three equal voices, by J. McMurdie, Mus. B.

Advertisements.

THE VOICE & SINGING
OF
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent-street.
And may be obtained of Signor FERRARI, at his residence, 32, Gloucester Terrace Hyde Park, W.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
HAS maintained its high character for a quarter of a century; and the flattering testimonials received from Grisi, Parisini, Lablache, and many of the Clergy and Statesmen, fully establish its great virtues. No Vocalist or Public Speaker should be without it. To be obtained of all Wholesale and Retail Chemists in the United Kingdom.

Digitized by Google

MR. JULES BENEDICT'S NEW SONGS, &c.

THE following Compositions by the accomplished Pupil of C. M. Von Weber have been acknowledged by the Musical Profession and General Public to combine every requisite to ensure to the Vocalist a Classical Style and a Correct Taste for the Art, whilst the popularity of some of them has rarely, if ever, been excelled. The leading singers of the present day have sung them at the Musical Festivals, Concerts, etc., where they have been received with the utmost favour and delight.

	Poetry by	s. d.
LITTLE WILLIE	LOUISA GRAY ...	3 0
NOW THE SHADES GROW DEEPER	JOHN OXENFORD ...	3 0
THE ECHO SONG (sung by Madame Adelina Patti)	...	3 0
THE PARTING (La Partenza)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
LE CARNEVAL DE VENISE (with Variations)	ITALIAN WORDS ...	3 0
SIGHING FOR THEE	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
WHEN MY THIRSTY SOUL (Mr. Santley's great song)	THOMAS MOORE ...	3 0
MINE, THOU ART MINE (composed for Clara Doria)	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0
ROCK ME TO SLEEP, in F and E flat (Edith Wynne's great ballad)	FLORENCE PERCY ...	3 0
WHY ART THOU SADDENED? ... ... And the Answer to it.	WELLINGTON GUERNSEY	3 0

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THEY NAMED HER NAME BEFORE ME,"

BALLAD.

Composed by FREDERIC PENNA.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"LITTLE WILLIE."

"LITTLE WILLIE." By JULES BENEDICT. Sung with distinguished success by

MISS EDITH WYNNE,

at Mr. Benedict's Concert, is published, price 3s., by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Just Published,

"I FIND OUT WHOM I LOVE,"

SONG.

Words (by permission) from

"THE YOUNG LADIES OF GREAT BRITAIN."

Music by R. T. GIBBONS.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

THREE PIANOFORTE PIECES BY A. GOLLMICK.

"MERRY THOUGHTS." Morceau de salon	4s.
"ADELINE." Pensée	3s.
"BELLE HUMEUR." Pièce	3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

SUNG BY MISS BANKS,

"ONE MORNING, OH! SO EARLY,"

SONG.

The words from "Mopsa the Fairy," by JEAN INGELOW (by permission).

The Music by CHRISTABEL.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THE REJECTED FLOWER,"

SONG.

The Poetry by Miss. BRUCE.

The Music by DEWDROP.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

TARANTELLE,

POUR LE PIANOFORTE.

Par PAUL SEMLER.

Prix 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Now ready, with English Words,

SWEDISH AIRS,

Sung by Mdlle. CHRISTINE NILSSON.

No. 1.—YOUTH.

("ON MOMENTS OF YOUTH FONDLY DREAMING.")

No. 2.—THE ROSES.

("WHEN THE MORN IS BREAKING.")

No. 3.—THE BALL.

("COME, THOU FAIR-HAIRED BEAUTY.")

Price 1s. 6d. each.

The English Words by JOHN OXENFORD, Esq.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Now ready, with English Words,

DRINKING SONG OF HAMLET,

"OH WINE! COME DRIVE AWAY THE SADNESS."

Sung by Mr. SANTLEY, with great success, in the Opera of "HAMLET."

The English Words by JOHN OXENFORD, Esq.,

The Music by AMBROISE THOMAS.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published.

TWO SONGS BY MARIA HAYES.

No. 1. "I'M WEARY WAITING"	3s.
" 2. "INVITATION" (Barcarolle)	3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

NEW SONG,

"TAKE THIS FORGET-ME-NOT,"

The Words by Miss E. CORNER.

The Music by ADOLPH GOLLMICK.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"PLEIN DE DOUTE,"

SONATA FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.

Adagio maestoso, Allegro con brio, Romanza, Intermezzo, Scherzo and Trio, Rondo brillante. Composed and Dedicated by permission to

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD,

By BERNARD FAREBROTHER,

London: LAMBORN COCK & Co., 63, New Bond Street.

Just Published,

THREE SHORT PIECES for the ORGAN. Set 3. By EDWARD J. HOPKINS. Reduced price, 1s. 6d.

THREE CHANT TE DEUMS, in A, A, and G, with explanatory preface. Price 3d. each.

BENEDICTUS in A, in simple chant form, for voices in unison, with a varied instrumental accompaniment. Price 1½d.

METZLER & Co., 37, Great Marlborough Street.

NEW SONG BY

MADAME LA BARONNE W. DE ROTHSCHILD,

"DANZIAM,"

(Danzon—Valse Chantée.)

Composée pour MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON,

PAR

Madame la Baronne W. de ROTHSCHILD.

Price 5s.

(Edition de Heugel & Cie., Paris.)

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published

"A SUMMER SONG,"

NOCTURNE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

By HENRY WALTON.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Digitized by Google

SYDNEY SMITH'S FOUR New Pieces.

FAUST.

Fantasia on Gounod's Opera.

(By kind permission of Messrs. Chappell & Co.)

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

THOUGHTS OF HOME.

Pensée Maritime.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

I LOMBARDI.

Fantasia on Verdi's Opera.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

COQUETTERIE.

Caprice Brillant.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

LONDON:

ASHDOWN & PARRY,

HANOVER SQUARE.

CAMPANA'S NEW OPERA, ESMERALDA,

PERFORMED AT

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

WITH IMMENSE SUCCESS.

All the favourite Songs, Duets, Trios, &c., sung by Mdlles. Patti, Scalchi, Signors Graziani and Naudin, are now published.

ALSO,

	s.	d.
The Full Score - - - -	25	0
All the Favourite Airs, by F. Nava	5	0
W. S. Rockstro's Gipsy Rondo -	4	0
" " Bolero - - -	4	0
" " Brindisi - -	4	0
" " Grand Fantasia -	5	0
Kuhe's Grand Fantasia - - -	4	0
Brinley Richards' Bolero - - -	3	6
Goodban's Fantasia - - -	3	6
Rimbault's Gems of "Esmeralda," easily arranged - - - each	2	0

No. 1. The Bolero. | No. 3. The Quartet.
" 2. The Brindisi. | " 4. The Grand Duet.

Dan Godfrey's Esmeralda Galop - 3 0

A QUADRILLE AND WALTZ

By DAN GODFREY are in the press.

CHAPPELL & CO.,

50, New Bond Street, London.

Digitized by Google

BOOSEY & CO.'S
NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS FOR THE ORGAN.

	s.	d.
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN-BOOK. Twelve New Pieces of Various kinds	7	6
HENRY SMART'S ORGAN STUDENT. Twelve Pieces for Practice of the Pedal Obbligato	5	0
HENRY SMART'S FIFTY INTERLUDES and PRELUDES ...	2	6
HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK, a Collection of Hymn Tunes harmonized in various ways, with Independent Organ Accompaniment. "Indispensable to all students."—Musical Standard. ...	5	0
J. L. HATTON'S ORGAN-BOOK, a Collection of New and Original Compositions	7	6
HESSE'S ORGAN-BOOK, in two vols. 4s. each, or one vol., boards, 12s. This book, containing 53 Compositions, includes all Hesse's Principal Works.
JULIUS ANDRE'S ORGAN-BOOK. 29 of his best Pieces. ...	6	0
WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN. Op. 32. Six Books in one vol.	6	0
J. T. STONES ORGAN-BOOK, an arrangement of 16 Classical Compositions	5	0

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS complete in 7 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

46. SONATAS, Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and Op. 7.
47. SONATAS, Op. 10, Nos. 1, 2, 3—Op. 13, and Op. 14, Nos. 1 and 2.
48. SONATAS, Op. 22—Op. 26—Op. 27, No. 1 (Moonlight), and Op. 27, No. 2.
49. SONATAS, Op. 28 (Pastorale), and Op. 31, Nos. 1, 2, 3.
50. SONATAS, Op. 49, Nos. 1 and 2. Op. 53—Op. 54 (Aussedonata), and Op. 57.
51. SONATAS, Op. 78—Op. 79 (Caracteristique)—Op. 81—Op. 90, and Op. 101.
52. SONATAS, Op. 106—Op. 109—Op. 110, and Op. 111.

Complete in one volume, 7s. 6d.

MOZART'S SONATAS complete in 5 numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

129. SONATAS, Nos. 1 (Fantasia and Sonata), 2, 3.
130. SONATAS, Nos. 4, 5, & 7.
131. SONATAS, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11.
132. SONATAS, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15.
133. SONATAS, Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Complete in one volume, 5s.

SCHUBERT'S SONATAS, complete in four numbers of BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. 1s. each.

134. SONATAS, No. 1 (Op. 42.) No. 2 (Op. 53.)
135. SONATAS, No. 3 (Op. 120.) No. 4 (Op. 122.) No. 5 (Op. 143.)
136. SONATAS, No. 6 (Op. 147.) No. 7 (Op. 164.) No. 8.
137. SONATAS, Nos. 9 and 10.

Complete in one volume, 4s. 6d.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING OPERAS FOR PIANOFORTE, in the MUSICAL CABINET, have a larger circulation throughout Europe and America than any other Editions. Each Book contains from 48 to 80 pages, including Overtures.

FIGARO
ROBERT LE DIABLE
DON JUAN
LUCREZIA BORGIA
DER FREISCHUTZ
CRISPINO E LA COMARE
TROVATORE
NORMA
DON PASQUALE
FRA DIAVOLO
RIGOLETTO
ZAMPA
GRAND DUCHESS
FIDELIO
BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA
SONNAMBULA
BALLO IN MASCHERA
TRAVIATA
MARTHA
WILLIAM TELL
CROWN DIAMONDS
MASANIELLO
DOMINO NOIR

Also, in Volumes containing four Operas, 4s. each.

NEW NUMBERS OF

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.

138. GOUNOD'S TEN SONGS, including the "Serenade" and "Oh roules sous aller!"
139. TWELVE SONGS by ARTHUR SULLIVAN and J. L. MOLLOY
141. GOLLMICK'S EIGHT VOLKSLIEDER for Pianoforte, including "The Broken Ring," "Soldaten Lied," "True Love," &c.
140. STEPHEN HELLER'S 24 Studies of Expression and Rhythm.

Price 1s.; post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING BOOKS of SONGS in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post-free, 1s. 2d. each.

98. SANTLEY'S TWENTY-SIX SONGS, including many original compositions, published in no other collection.
97. EIGHTEEN NEW SONGS by CLARIBEL, DOLORES, VIRGINIA GABRIEL, BALFE, BAKER, &c.
94. TWENTY CELEBRATED SONGS by THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY, ALEXANDER LEE, &c.
83. THIRTEEN FAVOURITE DUETS, including "When a Little Farm we Keep," "My Pretty Page," "As it fell upon a Day," "Tell me where is Fancy Bred," "The Lesson Duet," &c.
6. SIR HENRY BISHOP'S SONGS.
44. MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S SONGS.
43. SIMS REEVES' SONGS.
93. TWENTY-FIVE NEW CHRISTY'S SONGS.

BOOSEY'S SACRED MUSICAL CABINET

Price 1s.; post free, 1s. 1d. each.

1. TWENTY-FOUR SACRED SONGS BY CLARIBEL.
2. THE MESSIAH, FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
3. THE CORONATION FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO.
4. NORDMANN'S FIFTY VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.
5. TWENTY-FIVE SACRED WORKS FOR HARMONIUM.
6. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR HARMONIUM.
7. WELY'S OFFERTORIES FOR ORGAN.
8. ANDRE AND HESSE'S VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
9. TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY CHANTS.
10. ANTHEMS BY MODERN COMPOSERS.
11. SONGS FOR SUNDAY EVENING.
12. SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN.
13. TWELVE CHRISTMAS CAROLS AND HYMNS.
14. TWELVE GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER HYMNS.
15. KENT'S ANTHEMS, ARRANGED FOR HARMONIUM.
16. TWO HUNDRED PSALM AND HYMN TUNES WITHOUT WORDS.
17. THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
18. SACRED FANTASIAS BY FAVARGER, KUHE, BRINLEY RICHARDS, &c.
19. ELLIOTT'S VOLUNTARIES FOR HARMONIUM.

SHILLING BOOKS OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC in the MUSICAL CABINET. Post free, 1s. 2d. each.

113. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FOR THE YOUNG.
100. ROBERT SCHUMANN'S SCENES OF CHILDHOOD. Complete. And Nine other Short Pieces.
120. THALBERG'S ART OF SINGING. Six Pieces.
122. THALBERG'S HOME, SWEET HOME, LAST ROSE, and LILLIE DALE
117. CHOPIN'S VALSES. Complete.
114. BEETHOVEN'S FORTY-FIVE WALTZES.
23. TEN OVERTURES, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and Auber.
99. FRANZ SCHUBERT'S FOUR IMPROMPTUS, and SIX MOMENS MUSICAUX. All complete.
97. LEYBACH'S SIX MOST CELEBRATED FANTASIAS, including "Puritani," "Sonnambula," &c.
86. MENDELSSOHN'S EIGHT SHORT PIECES, including "The Rivulet," Two Musical Sketches, Andante and Rondo, &c.
85. STEPHEN HELLER'S PROMENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE. Complete.
80. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWELVE SHORT PIECES FOR PIANOFORTE.
84. KUHE'S EIGHT FANTASIAS
79. TEN DRAWING-ROOM PIECES, including "The Shepherds' Song," "Perles et Diamens," "Il Carrivale," &c.
23, 24, 25. MENDELSSOHN'S SIX BOOKS OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. Complete.

BOOSEY'S SHILLING ORATORIOS, MASSES, and CANTATAS.

HYMN OF PRAISE.
HAYDN'S IMPERIAL MASS.
GOUNOD'S ST. CECILE.
MOZART'S 12TH MASS.
ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.
JUDAS MACCABÆUS.
THE MESSIAH.
WALPURGIS NIGHT.
BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C
ACIS AND GALATEA.
MOZART'S REQUIEM.
DETTINGEN TE DEUM
ISRAEL IN EGYPT.
THE CREATION.

BISHOP'S GLEE BOOK, 28 Glees 2 0

	s.	d.
BOOSEY'S NATIONAL GLEE BOOK, 60 Glees	2	0
THE CHORALIST, 96 Part-songs. 2 vols, each	1	0
MENDELSSOHN'S 24 Part-songs	1	0
The above Works, for Societies in penny numbers.
THE CHILDREN'S CHORAL BOOK, 44 easy Part-songs ..	1	0
A GARLAND OF SONGS, 50 Part-songs for village and school use	1	0

LONDON:
BOOSEY AND CO., HOLLES STREET.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PRESS,

Paradise

AND

THE PERI

CANTATA,

BY

JOHN FRANCIS BARNETT

DEDICATED BY PERMISSION TO

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES,

AND TO BE PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THE

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL

LONDON:

HUTCHINGS & ROMER,

9, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.

Published This Day,

MIGNON WALTZ,

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE,

ON AIRS FROM

AMBROISE THOMAS'S ADMIRED OPERA

MIGNON,

BY

CHARLES GODFREY.

Price 4s.

LONDON:

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET.

Published This Day,

LITTLE FAUST WALTZ,

FOR THE

PIANOFORTE,

ON AIRS FROM

HERVÉ'S POPULAR OPERA,

LE PETIT FAUST,

BY

CHARLES GODFREY.

Price 4s.

LONDON:

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET.

Printed by HENDERSON, RAIT, and FENTON, at No. 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, in the Parish of Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex.
Published by WILLIAM DUNCAN DAVISON at the Office, 244, Regent Street.—Saturday, July 30th, 1870.

Digitized by Google

The Musical World.

"THE WORTH OF ART APPEARS MOST EMINENT IN MUSIC, SINCE IT REQUIRES NO MATERIAL, NO SUBJECT-MATTER, WHOSE EFFECT MUST BE DEDUCTED: IT IS WHOLLY FORM AND POWER, AND IT RAISES AND ENNOBLES WHATEVER IT EXPRESSES."—Goethe.

SUBSCRIPTION, FREE BY POST, 30s. PER ANNUM,

Payable in advance by Cash or Post-Office Order to DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, London, W

[Registered for Transmission Abroad.]

VOL. 48—No. 33. SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1870. PAGES { 4d. Unstamped. 8d. Stamped.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY (Saturday).—OPERA and PROMENADE. "MARTHA" (First time).

Lionel	.. ..	Mr. W. Parkinson.	Sheriff	.. ..	Mr. G. Fox.
Plunket	.. ..	Mr. A. Cooke	Nancy	.. ..	Miss Lasc.
Lord Tristan	.. ..	Mr. O. Summers.	Henrietta	.. ..	Miss B. Cole.

Full Orchestra and Chorus. Conductor—Mr. Manns.

Admission, 2s. 6d.; or by Guinea Season. Stalls, 2s. 6d.

THE Advertiser wishes to obtain a situation for his brother as ASSISTANT or SALESMAN in a Music Warehouse in London. He is a good Musician, both practically and theoretically, and understands the mechanism of the Organ and Pianoforte. He has gentlemanly manners and good address. Salary required, moderate. Address: J. H. S., 2, Birchmore Terrace, Cardington Street, N.W.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

"I NAVIGANTI."

MADAME LEMMENS-SHERRINGTON, Mr. CUMMINGS, and Mr. FOLI will sing Randegger's popular Trio, "I NAVIGANTI" (The Mariners), at the Birmingham Festival.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

MDLLE. ILMA DI MURSKA will sing Benedict's popular Variations on "THE CARNIVAL OF VENICE," at the Birmingham Festival.

HEREFORD FESTIVAL.

MR. VERNON RIGBY will sing Blumenthal's popular Song, "THE MESSAGE," at the First Concert of the Hereford Festival, in the Shire Hall, Wednesday evening, August 24.

HEREFORD FESTIVAL.

MISS MARIAN SEVERN will sing Henry Smart's popular Song, "THE LADY OF THE LEA," at the Hereford Festival.

HERR FERDINAND LUDWIG begs to announce to his Friends and Patrons that he will remain in London till August 15th, after which he will return to Germany for Two Months.—1, Albert Street, Regent's Park, N.W.

MR. HARLEY VINNING will sing L. Emanuel's new song, "THE CHARM," at his principal Engagements. Address for Concerts, Oratorios, &c., 2a, Old Bond Street.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC. (Average number of Students 100.) Concerts Fortnightly, Town and Country.—Inclusive Fee.—Candidates for the Free Scholarships must attend the Academy Saturdays, from Twelve to Seven, and in return for Lessons, will have to perform in Public when required. Further particulars, and opinions of the Press, may be had of C. Weber, Sec., Norfolk Road, Bayswater.

PUPILS WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 16, son of a late Professor of Music, is desirous of obtaining Pupils for Instruction in the earlier branches of Pianoforte playing. Terms, Fifteen to Twenty Shillings per Quarter. Apply to Mr. L., 20, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.

MR. WILFORD MORGAN will sing his popular song, "MY SWEETHEART WHEN A BOY," August 15th, and during the month, at Dublin, Belfast, and Cork.

"THE BELSIZE GALOP,"

By EDOUARD SCHUBERTH,

Played with distinguished success, and rapturously encored, at the Belsize Conservative Association Ball, Willis's Rooms, on Tuesday evening, will be published next week by

Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, London W.

MADAME EMMELINE COLE having Removed, begs to request all letters respecting engagements may be addressed to 38, Great Western Terrace, Bayswater.

"LORELEY."

MISS MARIAN ROCK will play E. Saurbrey's new transcription of "LORELEY," at the Agricultural Hall, This Day, August 13th.

"ALICE."

MISS MARIAN ROCK will play Ascher's popular transcription, "ALICE," at the Agricultural Hall, on Saturdays, August 13th and 20th.

"MIGNON."

MR. CUMMINGS will sing the admired tenor air from Mignon, "AH NON CREDEVI," at the Birmingham Musical Festival, August 30th.

HERR LEHMEYER begs to announce to his Friends, Pupils, and the Profession, that in consequence of his sudden departure for Germany, he could not fulfil all his Engagements, and requests all letters to be sent to his address, 14, Store Street, W.C.

ORGANIST WANTED.

WANTED an ORGANIST for a Mission Church about starting in a sea side town. Services Gregorian. Salary, £30 per annum. Might be introduced at once to a good connection, if able to lead a musical society. Apply to 2, Lombard Rooms, Lombard Street.

THE ANEMOIC UNION (under the direction of Mr. Lazarus) consists of the following eminent instrumentalists from the Opera Orchestras, Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies, &c.:—Flute, Mr. Henry Nicholson; Oboe, M. Barret; Clarionet, Mr. Lazarus; Horn, Mr. T. E. Mann; Bassoon, Mr. J. Hutchins; and Pianoforte, Mr. W. Shakspeare, R.A.M. Vocalist, Madame Thaddeus Wells. Mr. Lazarus begs to inform Secretaries of Musical Societies, Literary and Scientific Institutions, Directors of Orchestral Concerts, Concert Agents, &c., that the Fourth Annual Tour of the Anemoic Union will commence in September, 1870. Complete programmes can be given, or Mr. Lazarus will be happy to offer the services of the Anemoic Union to assist in full Orchestral Performances, or in Chamber Concerted Music. Terms for one or more Concerts may be known on application to Mr. HENRY NICHOLSON, 19, Halford Street, Leicester.

HANDEL HOUSE, CLEVEDON.

MESSRS. BARNARD, THOMAS, TRIBE, & Co. are instructed by the Executors of Mr. Edmund Gurney, Deceased, to Dispose of, by Tender, the Lease of the Valuable Shop, Bank, and Premises, known as Handel House, Clevedon, Somerset.

The Purchaser of the Lease will be required to take at a valuation the stock of Pianos, Harmoniums, Music, and Fancy Goods, and the whole of the Furniture.

The House is commodious, and admirably situated in the most central part of this rapidly-increasing watering-place; has a sea view, and comprises the Bank Premises, the Residence of Messrs. Harwood and Co. as yearly tenants; Music Shop, three drawing-rooms, nine bedrooms, three dining and breakfast-rooms, two kitchens, store-room, china pantries, lavatories, cellars, and offices; and offers special advantages for the letting of lodgings, and carrying on the existing business. The parts now let to Messrs. Harwood & Co. and Mr. Bell produce in the aggregate £170 per annum, which may be further increased by letting another suite of apartments, leaving ample room for the proprietor. The death of the late owner is the sole cause of the property being disposed of, and it is one which may be recommended with confidence.

Tenders will be received by the Brokers up to Twelve o'clock on Monday, the 22nd August, at which hour they will be opened at their Offices, Bristol, in the presence of those who attend; but the Vendors do not bind themselves to accept the highest or any tender. Payment, one moiety Cash, and remainder by bills at three and six months, with approved security; or an allowance for cash at the rate of five per cent. per annum.

For Conditions of Sale, and orders to view the Stock and Premises, application must be made to Harry Woodhouse, Esq., Solicitor, Clevedon; Mr. Mayhall, Confectioner, Clevedon; or at our Offices, Bristol, London, Cardiff, and Swansea.

Dated Albion Chambers, Bristol,
July 29th, 1870.

Digitized by Google

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

In the Press, to appear immediately, Nos. 3, 4, and 5, of "REVIVALS," consisting of :—

No. 3. SONATA, in C Major.
„ 4. SONATA, in E Minor.
„ 5. SONATA, in E Flat Major.

BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

(Never before Published.)

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

Now ready, with English Words,

MIGNON'S SONG,

"HAST THOU E'ER SEEN THE LAND,"

SUNG BY

MDLLE. CHRISTINE NILSSON,

With distinguished success, in the new Opera,

"MIGNON,"

The English Words by JOHN OXENFORD, Esq.,

The Music by AMBROISE THOMAS.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co, 244, Regent Street, W.

Now ready, with English Words.

OPHELIA'S BALLAD,

"THERE THOU SLEEPEST, WHERE THE FLOOD IS DEEPEST,"

Sung by Mdlle. CHRISTINE NILSSON, with immense success, in the Opera of "HAMLET."

The English Words by JOHN OXENFORD, Esq.

The Music by AMBROISE THOMAS.

Price 1s. 6d.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"THE WIND BLOWS FRESH FROM THE LAND."

DUET FOR MEZZO-SOPRANO AND BARITONE.

By HENRY SMART.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"STAR OF THE VALLEY."

SONG.

Composed by HENRY SMART.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

Just Published,

"OLGA,"

PENSÉE POUR PIANO.

PAR

LOUIS DIEHL.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"REVIVALS,"

EDITED BY

J. W. DAVISON.

No. 1. GRAND FANTASIA

(IN E AND A MINOR AND MAJOR),

No. 2. DRAMATIC FANTASIA

(IN C MAJOR),

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, BY

WILHELM FRIEDEMANN BACH.

Price 6s. each.

 Both of the above named Fantasias were played for the First Time in Public at the Monday Popular Concerts by Madame ARABELLA GODDARD.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG,

DEDICATED TO MDLLE. NILSSON.

"I LOVE AND I AM LOV'D"

("J'aime, je suis aimé").

PUBLISHED IN A, C, AND D.

Sung with distinguished success in Paris and London. Also transcribed for the Piano by

E. L. HIME.

Each sent for 24 stamps.

DUFF & STEWART, 147, Oxford Street,

"The charming singing of the composer himself—Herr Reichardt—and of M. Jules Lefort, has already won for this romantic song a considerable reputation. The style is such as we look for from the author of 'Thou art so near, and yet so far,' and is equally happy with that widely known and favourite ditty. No great compass is required—only from D below to E fourth space—and Herr Reichardt's newest song is conceived in so truly vocal a spirit, and is so effective in performance, that we have no hesitation in commending it to our readers—soprano or tenor. A word for Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, whose translation, free though it be, from the original French of M. Arnould, is a thing to be remembered. Nothing in its way more elegant, more refined, more truly poetical, has been seen for many a day, and the manner in which the spirit, if not the letter of the French is preserved is equally admirable."—The Queen.

"LITTLE WILLIE."

"LITTLE WILLIE." By JULES BENEDICT. Sung with distinguished success by

MISS EDITH WYNNE,

at Mr. Benedict's Concert, is published, price 2s., by

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, London, W.

Published This Day,

"STARLIGHT,"

REVERIE, FOR THE PIANOFORTE,

By FRANZ ROSENFELD.

Price 2s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"THE REJECTED FLOWER,"

NEW SONG.

The Poetry by Mrs. BRUCE.

The Music by DEWDROP.

Price 3s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

BRIGHTON CONCERT AGENTS,

PIANOFORTE AND MUSICSELLERS,

LYON & HALL,

WARWICK MANSION.

Digitized by Google

THE ITALIAN OPERAS.

(From the "Saturday Review.")

Before proceeding with our review of Drury Lane it is as well to say what remains to be said about Covent Garden. This may be done in a few sentences. To the three-and-twenty operas already enumerated four more have to be added—Le Domino Noir, I Puritani, Norma, and L'Etoile du Nord. The delightful work of Auber, the perfection of that type which may be described as the representative type at the Opéra Comique, seems destined to mishap on our Italian stage. Either the Italian conductors undervalue it, or, which is more likely, are unable to catch its spirit; for it must be owned that Le Domino Noir fared no better under Sir Michael Costa, two years ago, than it has fared this season under Signor Vianesi, who is very far from being a Costa. Nor is Mdlle. Pauline Lucca more at home in Angèle than was Madame Lemmens-Sherrington. Her predecessor. True, Mdlle. Lucca imparts more vigorous life to the character; but her singing is as inferior as her acting is superior to that of Madame Lemmens—neither one nor the other, as actress or as singer, be it understood, approaching the desired ideal. The less further said about Le Domino Noir the better. A more generally unsatisfactory performance of an opera which, for its due effect, requires the utmost care and finish of detail it would not be easy to recall. I Puritani was revived for the sake, we presume, of exhibiting Madame Adelina Patti in a part which she had not previously essayed in London. Madame Patti did all that could be done under the circumstances, singing the music of the Elvira (especially the polacca, "Son' vergin' vezzosa") as it had not been sung since Angiolina Bosio's time, and investing the character with more than ordinary dramatic significance. But even Madame Patti's genius is unequal to the feat of galvanising a corpse; and Bellini's opera at the present time is little else. For a long time I Puritani survived on the strength of its melodies. A beautiful air, a brilliant cabaletta as these undoubtedly are, they have, in the natural course of things, become almost exclusively the property of street organs; though it may be taken for granted that some of them (for instance, "A te o cara," and "Qui la voce") will exist long after the opera to which they belong is forgotten. Moreover I Puritani without an Arturo is virtually impossible; and Signor Vizzani, the Arturo with whom Madame Patti had to co-operate, was even below the average of Arturos of recent years. So that, as, in addition, the two basses (Giorgio and Riccardo) were not remarkable, the interest appertaining to this revival centred mainly in Elvira. In Meyerbeer's gorgeous musico-melodramatic spectacle, L'Etoile du Nord, Madame Patti, whose admirable impersonation of Caterina need not again be praised, was scarcely more fortunate. But the chief associate—this time not a tenor, but a bass, or rather bass-baritone—was Signor Cotogni, to whom was assigned the weighty character of Peter. The music of this half savage, half heroic personage lies throughout too low for Signor Cotogni's voice; and all the modifications he introduces serve to make his name no better. L'Etoile du Nord had been shelved four years, for want of an adequate representative of the Imperial drunkard—Signor Attri, the Peter of 1866, being no better fitted for the part than Signor Cotogni. As presented now, almost the entire responsibility devolves upon Madame Patti, whose performance, musically and histrionically, may defy criticism. How enchanted Meyerbeer himself would have been with this perfect embodiment of one of his pet creations those who knew him best can certify. M. Neudin is a fair Danilowitz, though not comparable with Signor Gardoni, formerly at the Royal Italian Opera. Most of the other dramatis personæ are inadequately sustained; and Corporal Gritsenko, with his obstreperous and interminable clatter, is a more formidable bore than ever. Gritsenko was a bore even with the late Lablache, for the sake of whose name and co-operation Meyerbeer, in an evil hour, consented to swell out that insignificant personage into undue proportions, thus destroying the natural balance of his work; and if a bore with Lablache, how much more a bore with Signor Ciampi may be readily imagined. To atone for all shortcomings, we have the mise-en-scène—a feast which, at most amateurs, however rare we are disposed to think, would cheerfully dispense with half the scenery, machinery, costumes, &c., for a little extra precision and refinement in the delivery of the musical, vocal and instrumental. Norma was performed once, with Mdlle. Tietjens as the heroine, the occasion being for her "benefit." The last week was a week of "benefits." Madame Patti selected Faust for her's, and gave a portraiture of Gretchen which we must still persist in thinking stands alone; Mdlle. Lucca, with considerable hardihood, fixed upon the Zerlina of Mozart's Don Giovanni—a part which by no means comes within so naturally as the Zerlina of Auber's Fra Diavolo; and Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi, Mr. Gye's new and versatile soprano, chose Gilda, in Rigoletto, her performance neither adding to nor detracting from her reputation. The second representation of L'Etoile du Nord terminated a season more remarkable for activity than for enterprise. One only novelty was produced—the Esmeralda of Signor Campana, which is not likely to be heard of again, and which, by this time, in all probability, has gone to join in oblivion the scene composer's Almina, its senior by ten years, and in every respect its worthy companion.

CREMONA.—M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon will be produced during the approaching season.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS—DRURY LANE

In an article on the Italian Operas, some time since, we said that "the co-existence of two houses, whatever risk it may entail upon speculators, is an advantage to the public." The experience of the season now at an end has proved that we were right. No frequenter of the Opera can have forgotten the meagre fare provided last year by Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, with their respective companies thrown into one. Mr. Mapleson at Drury Lane, and Mr. Gye at Covent Garden, the year previous, each singly provided more attractions than when, rivalry thrown aside, they afterwards united their fortunes. But we need not further dilate upon a subject already worn threadbare.

If Covent Garden has been accredited this season with an efficient company, Drury Lane must be accredited with one even more so. The singers who abandoned the Gye-Mapleson coalition would have sufficed to form the nucleus of a highly attractive troop. With Mdlles. Christine Nilsson and Ilma di Murska, leading sopranos, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, leading contralto, and Madame Sinico, leading seconda donna (prima donna on occasions); with Signor Mongini, the "Wachtel of the South," Signors Gardoni and Bettini, principal tenors, and Mr. Charles Lyall, tenore buffo; with Mr. Santley and M. Gassier, chief baritones, Signor Foli, leading bass, and Madame Corsi, Mdlle Vinta, Signor Zoboli, &c., more or less capable representatives of subordinate parts, Mr. Wood, the new director, might complacently have folded his arms, and exclaiming, "Here is my company," have awaited the issue. But as unfamiliar faces are welcome, and reinforcements useful on emergencies, he was well advised in making other engagements. This he did with a liberal hand. The ladies' department was strengthened by Mesdames Volpini and Monbelli, Mdlles. Reboux and Pauline Lewitsky (sopranos); the gentlemen's by Signors Perotti and Rinaldini (tenors), Signor Castelli (basso buffo), M. Verger, Signor Raguer, and last not least, M. Faure (baritones). It the outset was mentioned that Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi, Mr. Gye's new star, was announced to appear as Valentine in the Huguenots, but she not forthcoming, an engagement was subsequently made with Madame Caroline Barbot, to fill her place. Operatic amateurs are aware that Madame Barbot was at one time recognised as a great artist, both in Paris and St. Petersburgh; but four years ago she lost her voice, and a single performance of Valentine at Drury Lane Theatre sufficed to show that she had not recovered it, and that there was small likelihood of her ever recovering it.

The orchestra (with Herr Strauss as leading violin), a body of instrumentalists now at least equal to that at the other house, has enjoyed the advantage of performing throughout the season under one conductor; and it is not high treason against Covent Garden to insist that the unaided efforts of Signor Arditi are not the theatre have been more efficacious, more fruitful in results, than the combined efforts of Signors Vianesi and Bevignani at the other. The chorus at Drury Lane, once more, with the exception of some twenty resident singers, gathered from all parts of the Continent, but chiefly from Italy and Spain, is a strong a body of young and fresh voices as could be desired. Imperfectly trained at the beginning, and unfamiliar with a majority of the operas advertized in the prospectus (especially those tracing their origin to Germany and France), it has, nevertheless, done excellent service in the course of the season—for which no little credit is due to Signor Santi, the diligent chorus-master.

Although Drury Lane opened its doors three weeks later than Covent Garden (April 16th), no fewer than eighteen operas have been given. Considering that not merely the interior of the theatre had to be entirely transformed, but new music to be copied, new costumes made, and a new mise-en-scène provided for each separate work in succession, this shows enormous vigour and despatch, the more so inasmuch as all the operas were decorously put upon the stage—without extravagance it is true, but with a scrupulously strict view to completeness. We subjoin a list of them, in chronological order as they were brought out:—Rigoletto, Lucia, Il Barbiere, Faust, Il Flauto Magico, Le Nozze di Figaro, La Sonnambula, Abu Hassan (Weber), L'Oca del Cairo (Mozart), Robert le Diable, Martha, Dinorah, Don Giovanni, Il Trovatore, Otello, the Huguenots, Mignon (A. Thomas), and L'Olandese Dannato (Wagner). Those operas to which the creations of new composers are here added were heard on a London Italian stage for the first time.

Verdi's Rigoletto was performed on the opening night, with Mdlle. di Murska as Gilda, Signor Mongini as the Duke, and Mr. Santley as Rigoletto. Mdlle. di Murska made simply in deference to Mdlle. Nilsson, while singing the music admirably, gave a reading of the part of the Jester's daughter more thoroughly dramatic than we have been accustomed to, and who, although she had never played it before (at least in London), achieved an unquestionable success. We have heard and read of this gifted lady as "the eccentric prima donna." Why "eccentric" we are unable to divine. Eccentric or not, however, since her first appearance here in May 1865, Mdlle. di Murska has maintained a very high position, and what is better, maintained it by legitimate means. In spite of certain defects of style, now, we believe, ineradicable, she is both a singer and an actress of the first class, and during the season just terminated has conferred invaluable services upon the theatre to which she is attached. It was as the heroine of Donizetti's eternal Lucce di Lammermoor that Mdlle. di Murska made herself known among us, and what strikes as forcibly now as it did five years since, when she came upon the operatic world with all the interest belonging to a strange phenomenon, is the absence of conventional stage business in her entire assumption, the originality of her conception, and the manner in which she goes through scene after scene in a way of her own, never at any moment recalling the peculiarities of other singers. This, we may add, is as noticeable in her Gilda as in her Lucia. In both operas she has had much ado to contend with Signor Mongini, whose very powerful voice and unrestrainable enthusiasm too often lead him into excesses which, while detracting from the effect of his own performance, impart the semblance of caricature to what he intends most earnestly, and sensibly interfere with the convenience of his associates. Instances to the point have been as frequent with Signor Mongini as they were in the case of Mario; but especially noticeable in La Sonnambula, the third opera in which he appeared with Mdlle. di Murska. When, in 1859, as Elvino, also at Drury Lane Theatre, he made his début in London, Miss Victoire Balfe being thy Amina, Signor Mongini was criticised for the same want of self-control we are condemning now. Eleven years might surely afford time enough for improvement; but it is to be feared that this artist's particular malady is incurable. True he is "journalier," as the French express it, and on some occasions does far better than on others; but he is never quite satisfactory, always keeping his hearers in apprehension of an outburst, which may come at any time or place most inappropriate. With such splendid means as he possesses the more is the pity.

Digitized by Google

Madame Monbelli, one of the new comers, made her appearance in the Barbiere di Siviglia, and if nothing but a pleasing and flexible voice, with the easy command of florid vocalization, were demanded for Rosina, her success would have been complete. But much more is wanted for the adequate presentation of such a character. The deportment of Madame Monbelli is neither easy nor graceful, and, indeed, she seems to be unfamiliar with the usages of society on the stage. That she excels as a concert singer was proved in the summer of 1869; and that she has maintained her position this year is entirely owing to her achievements in the concert room—more particularly, it should be added, to her brilliant execution of "Una voce poco fa," in some passages of which it is difficult to recognize the composer, so profusely are they embellished. The fame Madame Monbelli had acquired through the medium of Rosina's familiar cavatina doubtless caused the manager of Drury Lane Theatre to select Rosina for her début; and "Una voce" made the one solitary impression of the evening. The second part essayed by Madame Monbelli rather helped to confirm than to modify the opinions induced by the first. Her lack of histrionic talent was perhaps still more conspicuous in the half dreamy, half mischievous page of Beaumarchais and Mozart. Whoever advised her to attempt Cherubino gave her ill counsel. Nor is the music of Le Nozze so well suited to her voice as the music of Il Barbiere; and neither in "Non so più cosa son" nor "Voi che sapete" did she appear to catch the spirit of the text. Madame Monbelli in the direct opposite to Mdlle. Lucca, being just as coldly correct as Mdlle. Lucca is impulsively incorrect. Neither gives the legitimate readings; but their incapacity springs from very different sources. Perhaps the best thing Madame Monbelli did in the season was the scena and air from Il Pegno, in Il Flauto Magico; into this she threw something like animation, and the duet between Papagena and Papageno (Mr. Santley) was listened to with satisfaction at each representation of Mozart's romantic opera.

Mdlle. Mélanie Reboux, another of the new comers, is an artist of quite a different stamp. Although her face and figure do not lend themselves favourably to stage illusion, it is to characters in which serious emotion has to be exhibited that Mdlle. Reboux now most strongly inclines. This may surprise many who remember her, at Her Majesty's Theatre (in 1864), playing the small part of Vincinnette, in M. Gounod's Mireille, but who are ignorant that ambition has since directed her steps to a higher walk. We question whether the art, or the lady herself, has gained by the move. That Mdlle. Reboux has laboured hard to become dramatic, and in a great degree succeeded, can no more be justly denied than that she reveals intelligence in all she does. On the other hand it is as little to be questioned that her voice, not naturally fitted for such work, has suffered through the exertions she must have used in compelling it to her will. The result is that, while still equal to Mdlle. Reboux's parts, besides of one who by constant and not always wisely directed labour has hope lessly impaired her physical resources. To give out the upper notes with force demands a painful effort on her part, and when obtained they are almost as frequently out of tune as the contrary. Mdlle. Reboux was unfortunate in choosing such a character for her début as the heroine of Faust. All the first dramatic singers, all the most engaging artists of the day from Tietjens, Miolan Carvalho and Désirée Artot, to Patti, Lucca, and Nilsson, besides others of lesser note, have played Margaret in London. Mdlle. Reboux equals none of those we have named, and surpasses few of those we have left unnamed; and indeed we can praise little or nothing in her performance beyond its intense and abiding earnestness. Charm it has none, either vocal or dramatic. Mdlle. Reboux only played in two other characters—Norina in Don Pasquale and Don Giovanni. Her Countess Almaviva and her Donna Anna were much of a kin, distinguished by the same quality of earnestness, counterbalanced by a vocal inefficiency most detrimental in the one instance to "Dove sono," and in the other to "Or sai che l'onore"—the precise tests by which the competency or incompetency of a representative of either character is tried.

